PREFACE

Recent years have witnessed great activity in various fields of research, the results of which are of high importance for students of the Bible. The records of antiquity discovered in Egypt and the Euphrates valley, with which Palestine stood in such close relations, have been carefully examined by expert scholars. Much light has thus been cast upon the history of these far-off days, and upon the condition of the world in patriarchal times. The Palestine Exploration Fund and kindred societies have carried forward the work of exploration and excavation in Palestine itself. Adventurous scholars have risked the perils of travel and research in Arabia. Sir W. M. Ramsay has earned the gratitude of Christendom by, practically single-handed, lifting the veil which for centuries had obscured the Asia Minor of apostolic days. A great mass of information has thus become available for the use of Bible Students, bearing upon the Peoples, the social and religious Life, &c., in Palestine and the neighbouring countries, from pre-Israelite times to the days of the apostles.

At the same time the attention of scholars has been concentrated upon the Literature of Scripture, with a view to determine such questions as the Date, Authorship, and Mode of Composition of the various books. Vital interest has been revived in many of the writings, especially in the Old Testament, by a fuller knowledge of their relations to and significance for the age in which their authors lived. The Editors of this Dictionary acknowledge the value of the service rendered to the cause of Sacred Learning all the more willingly because they are unable to accept many of the so-called "results" of Higher Criticism. This applies particularly to the detailed and minute analysis of the different books. Here, indeed, the Critics are hopelessly at variance among themselves. This is not surprising when it is remembered that the "results" so often rest on no more stable ground than questionable assumption and conjecture: these, again, being conditioned by the mental idiosyncrasies of individual Critics. The wise words of the late Mr. W. E. H. Lecky may be quoted as expressing the judgment of an enlightened and impartial mind:—

"Connected with this subject [credibility of statements] is also the question how far it is possible, by merely internal evidence, to decompose an ancient document, resolving it into its separate elements, distinguishing its different dates and different degrees of credibility. The reader is no doubt aware with what rare skill this method of inquiry has been pursued in the present [nineteenth] century, chiefly by great German and Dutch scholars, in dealing with the early Jewish writings. At the same time, without disputing the value of their work, or the importance of many of the results at which they have arrived, I may be pardoned for expressing my belief that this kind of investigation is often pursued with an exaggerated confidence. Plausible conjecture is too frequently mistaken for positive proof. Undue significance is attached to what may be mere casual coincidences, and a minuteness of accuracy is professed in discriminating between different elements in a narrative which cannot be attained by mere internal evidence. In all writings, but especially in the writings of an age when criticism was unknown, there will be repetitions, contradictions, inconsistencies and diversities of style, which do not necessarily indicate different authorship or dates" (Historical and Political Essays, Thoughts on History, p. 8).

Excellent work has been done in the larger Dictionaries of the Bible recently published, in the way of focussing the information now available. These are written, however, from a more advanced Critical point of view than the Editors of this Dictionary are able to adopt. Their size and price, also, put them beyond the reach of many who are keenly alive to the necessity for competent and trustworthy guidance in their study of the Scriptures. The Editors therefore believe that there is a place for a Dictionary of the Bible which, leaving aside all that is merely theoretical and speculative, shall present simply and clearly the state of ascertained knowledge on the subjects dealt with, at a price which shall bring the latest results of scholarly investigation within the reach of every earnest student of the Bible.

The Editors have kept steadily in view the needs of the Working Clergyman, the Local Preacher, the Class Leader, and the Sunday School Teacher; while not forgetting the ordinary Reader of the Bible. They have drawn, wherever possible, on their own personal acquaintance with the Lands of the Bible, the Peoples, their Manners and Customs, and the Conditions of their Life. Many articles of special importance have been entrusted to scholars whose distinction in their own subjects commands universal respect. The writers are responsible for the views which they express.

The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Truro had undertaken to write the article on the English Bible. Unfortunately he was prevented by illness from doing this; and at very short notice Mr. Maclean Watt of Alloa kindly wrote the article.

The DICTIONARY deals with Biblical Antiquities, Biography, History, Literature, Manners and Customs, Natural History, Geography, and Topography.

Repetition has been avoided by a careful arrangement of cross-references. Space has also been saved by a system of easily understood contractions, thus making possible a fuller treatment of the more important subjects.

The numerous Illustrations, it is hoped, will prove not only attractive but highly useful. Some, e.g., show at a glance objects of interest, ancient methods of work, &c.; others enable the reader to realise more vividly the Background and Atmosphere of the Bible History.

The Editors and Publishers are deeply indebted to Dr. Mackinnon of Damascus, Dr. Paterson of Hebron, Dr. R. J. Drummond of Edinburgh, Mrs. Gibson, D.D., LL.D., of Cambridge, and Arthur W. Sutton, Esq., J.P., Bucklebury Place, Woolhampton, Berks, for many photographs used as illustrations; to Oliphant Smeaton, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., Edinburgh, for valued counsel and assistance, especially in the reading of proofs; and to John Hutchison, Esq., LL.D., Glasgow, for help with articles in the Apocrypha. They have to thank Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. for permission to use the following illustrations from Wood's Bible Animals, in addition to those acknowledged in the text, viz.: Fallow deer, p. 198; Gerizim, p. 221; Glede, p. 226; Goat, p. 227; Hawk, p. 251; Heron, p. 262.

They have also to thank the Palestine Exploration Fund for the following illustrations, besides those acknowledged in the text, viz.: Carmel in Judæa, p. 81; Kerak, p. 370; Lydda, Church of St. George, p. 403; Michmash, p. 464.

EDINBURGH, December 1909.

N.B.—The initial appearing in the body of an article stands for the subject at the head.

In Scripture references the figures on the line denote the chapters, the small superior figures the verses: thus Jn. $3.^{16}$ stands for John, chap. 3, verse 16.

In the titles of books, the small superior figure indicates the edition.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

BY

THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF RIPON

The Bible is the book which for generations has inspired the religious life of the English-speaking people. It has exercised a wide and deep influence upon national thought, life, and character. This in itself is a historical fact all the more remarkable now that we have begun to understand better the nature of the Bible. It is no unfair reflection upon our forefathers, who drew mental and moral vigour as well as spiritual consolation from the Bible, to say that their understanding of the Bible was often crude and inexact: happily the ethical power of the Bible is not lost, even when certain passages and portions are not wholly understood. Indeed the very misunderstandings serve to throw into clearer light the wonderful influence of the Bible upon our country's history. For here is one striking aspect of this influence: the Bible is a collection of writings which represent the literature of the Hebrew people. The literature of the Jews — a small people, whose historical importance was never very great when compared with the world-ruling monarchies, and whose political history closed two thousand years ago—has become the moral guide of a great people of the West, and has become to them a very real message of God, inspiring their courage and largely shaping their destiny.

There must be some special qualities in this literature to produce so remarkable a result; for be it remembered that it is not as literature that the Bible was read by our forefathers. It was read much more for its ethical force and spiritual outlook than for its literary qualities. It would perhaps be true to say that two or three generations ago the idea of the Bible as literature would have been regarded as almost irreverent. Some scholars might have tolerated such a description, but popularly it would have been resented, if not condemned. And yet, as a simple fact, the Bible is a collection of the literature of the Hebrew people, and in this fact there lies deep and real significance.

For let us for a moment consider the growth of what we call modern civilisation: this growth has been largely aided by the influence of the great peoples of the past. Greece and Rome have contributed their share to those thoughts and ideas which, having found acceptance in the experience of the past, have passed into the great treasure-house of Western civilisation. In one sense the sceptre has never departed from Greece or from Rome. In the realm of thought and art Greece still rules, and the sovereignty of Rome still finds expression in the laws of European nations. But Greece and Rome exercised their influence to a great extent by reason of their power of conquest. Their genius was allied with military power: their literature gained opportunities of circulation as the power of the sword brought new territories beneath their sway. But Jewish literature owed nothing to the sword: Israel never had an Alexander or a Cæsar, and yet the literature of the Hebrew has spread far beyond that of Greece or Rome, and has entered into the life of Western peoples after a fashion which Greek and Roman literature have never done. Further, Greek and Roman literatures have made their way, if I may use the expression, piecemeal into Western life: Europe has known the poems of Homer and Virgil and Horace, the plays of Sophocles and Æschylus and Terence separately; but Europe has accepted in the Bible a complete collection of Hebrew literature—it has not known Job and Isaiah, Daniel and the Apocalypse, Ruth and the Gospels separately, but just the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, as one book. There must have been some singular and appropriate quality in this Hebrew literature to bring about so remarkable a result. This quality I believe to be its very clear and distinctive religious quality. The Bible is religious in a way in which the greatest works of Greece and Rome cannot be said to be religious; the Bible is literature, but it is literature impregnated with a religious spirit which can find no counterpart in the literature of any other race.

To say this is not to undervalue what other races have done for the advancement of the world. We owe philosophical insight to Greece; law and practical statesmanship to Rome; but in the Bible we have the literature of a people who surpassed all other people in religious sensibility and insight. Religious consciousness is to be found among all races, but if we want to find the high-water-mark of the religious consciousness of mankind, we must find it in this literature of the Hebrew people. Here the spiritual nature of man speaks in its clearest and most harmonious tones. We may make a comparison to illustrate our meaning. Let a man dwell among the best creations of Greek art, let him drink in its spirit, and he will find that by degrees he has created in himself such a standard of taste that he can no longer admire, still less take pleasure in, the products of a barbarian art. In the same way those who have been nourished in the religious writings of the Jewish people realise how far they transcend in spiritual and moral elevation the religious conceptions of other races. Naturally here we are thinking of the loftiest heights which Jewish religious literature has reached: there are levels higher and lower in this literature as in all others, but when we walk with Hebrew prophets and teachers on their own mountain ranges, we know that we breathe with them an atmosphere of heaven which, except in Christian literature, is never found.

In writing thus we are for the moment leaving aside some of the difficulties which meet the Bible student. There are difficulties—historical, literary, and ethical—which such a student must be prepared to encounter, but even as these are recognised and met, it ought never to be forgotten that it is to the Jewish literature embodied in the Bible that the advancing world has owed a religious quickening and invigoration which has profoundly influenced its history and development.

Hitherto we have dealt with the Bible as a whole; but we must remember that the Bible consists of two great divisions—the Old and the New Testament. To the simple and devout student of past generations this division between the Old and New Testament was of little importance: the two helped one another; one showed prediction, the other fulfilment. Many problems and questions, however, have arisen in more recent times, and in their discussion old views of the relationship between the various parts of the Bible have been modified, but the devout reader of olden days was not wholly wrong: the New Testament is fulfilment in a great and noble sense of the anticipations, hopes, yearnings, prophecies, which breathe through the books of the Old Testament. This we may frankly recognise; but we must also remember that there is a sense in which the New Testament forms a special collection of literature: it is the literature of the dawn of Christianity; it gives us the story of the origins of the greatest religious movement which the world has ever seen. Herein lies its value in the discussion of questions which have for so long held a position of exaggerated importance in the minds of those who look upon religion from without; for the New Testament gives us the history and judgment of the Christian Church of Apostolic times, and transports us into that happy atmosphere which prevailed before heated disputes about matters of formal belief and external organisation had transformed personal trust into mere unethical correctness of opinion. In reading the books of the New Testament we are raised to higher levels; many of the popular and bitter disputes lose their meaning and value. On the Mount of Transfiguration the great leaders vanish, we see no man save Jesus only, and we know that if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His.

To return—the Bible is a literature: it would not be true to say that the understanding of the spiritual value of the Bible depends upon our appreciation of its literature, but it certainly is true that the spiritually-minded man who can understand its literary form will enter more completely into its spiritual teaching. The opportunity of clearly understanding the literary form of the various books of the Bible is within the reach of all Bible students; the critical study of the Bible carried on in such a destructive spirit has given place to a rigorous and reverent study, free alike from crass credulity and from eager scepticism: the desire to understand what the books of the Bible really stand for has superseded all irreligious and superstitious passions. Consequently the wish to exhibit the books of the Bible in their true literary form has become more general; in other words, it is recognised that the Bible contains a literature, and that it is part of the duty of the commentator to make clear what is the literary character of any special book or passage.

The first obvious distinction which needs to be made clear is the distinction between prose and poetry. The utterances of the Bible writer or speaker need to be classed: is it poetry or prose that we are reading? Professor Moulton, in his most useful work, The Modern Reader's Bible, has endeavoured to exhibit the books of the Bible in such a way that the reader may at once understand the literary form of what he is reading. He shows that often, for instance, in the prophets, the sacred seer will fall into lyric or dramatic utterance: suddenly the speaker changes—it is no longer the prophet speaking in his own character, it is the prophet making himself the mouthpiece of others—sometimes, perhaps, of Israel, sometimes of God Himself. These changes in the character of the speaker need to be noticed, or the reader will fail to grasp some of the most beautiful and pathetic turns of speech. Let the reader take the last chapter of Hosea, let him read it as Professor Moulton has printed it, and he will hear the pleadings of Divine love and the penitent responses of the restored and reconciled Israel: we are not listening to a passage which baulks our understanding by an unintelligible change in form of utterance, but we are present at a scene in a wonderful spiritual drama. This would be lost sight of to one who had no appreciation of the literary form adopted by the prophet.

The moment we begin to realise the presence of a true literary form we adjust our minds to its appreciation; we measure the passage according to a true standard. It is not too much to say that many of the crassly erroneous views which have obtained currency among Christian people are due to the ignorance of literary form—or rather, perhaps, to the inability to measure the significance of the passage in consequence of such ignorance. Poetry and poetical forms of speech are common among Oriental people; truth was uttered in various forms, of which the allegorical and poetical were frequent; indeed it belonged to the spirit of emphasis to use imagery in stating truth; the imagery would seize the mind of the hearer, would be remembered, and the wide application of the truth would be discerned through experience. The Jewish writers loved allegorical forms of this kind. Witness the way in which the dreams of the chief butler and chief baker are interpreted by Joseph: as we read the story we are in the presence of the Easterns; parables are told and their meaning is unfolded. Had this allegorical and poetical spirit been better understood we should have avoided many of those fierce controversies which have troubled Christendom, and which so frequently arose because Western minds took literally what was spoken poetically. The Western commentator turned poetry into prose, and so developed a heresy.

But, besides realising the literary form, we need to remember that the Bible is a growth: that is, the books of the Bible belong to different and far-sundered epochs; they reflect, therefore, the ideas and customs of varying periods. The political conceptions of the reign of Solomon were very different from those of the Captivity, and those of the Captivity differed much from those of our Lord's day. In this fact the Bible differs from other so-called sacred books. The Koran and the Book of Mormon claim to be ready-made revelations given at one period of time to some specially appointed prophet. There is no historical perspective in such books; they are fixed in a changeless form. The Bible, on the other hand, grew from age to age, and attained its supremacy not by any loudly-announced claim but by its own slowly manifested fitness.

We may illustrate this by reference to the formation of what has been called the Canon. Theologians speak about the Canonical Books of the Bible. Certain books have been included in this Canon: others have been excluded. Christian Churches have sometimes differed respecting the books which ought or ought not to be reckoned Canonical. The best test of the value of any book is time: time applies its testing rod to all men's works, and the books of the Bible found their way into the Canon by the verdict of time: their value was felt and known before any authority gave them formal recognition. Certain ecclesiastical assemblies or councils have given this formal recognition, but behind their formal acknowledgment there is the endorsement of time. The verdict then formally pronounced was anticipated by the acclamation of souls.

The value of the books of the Bible does not depend, then, upon any formal or official declaration, however worthy and reverend such declaration may be, but upon approved worth. We must dismiss from our minds all idea that the books of the Bible are bound together by the tie of a common epoch; nor must we imagine that there was one time and one only when the writer of any and every book of the Bible was formally attested. The books belong to different times, and their admission into the Canon was various and gradual.

There is no trustworthy historical account of the formation of the Canon of the Old Testament. The legend that it was due to the influence of Ezra or the judgments of "The Great Synagogue" is not to be relied upon. It is more likely that the Canon of the Old Testament was gradually formed, and the very structure of the books renders this more than probable. There were, as Bishop Ryle has pointed out, stages through which the books themselves appear to have passed—an elemental stage, in which the various parts of the book were formed; a second stage, in which the book was reduced to literary form; and lastly, a stage in which they were selected as worthy a place in the national Canon.

A little reflection will show us how naturally these books may have passed through these stages. In every nation there are certain old songs and legends which have been transmitted from age to age. The deeds of heroes, the achievements of sages, the striking story of some impending calamity happily averted: these have been incorporated in popular songs and tales. These are not valueless: they tend to form national life and character; and when some one arises with literary gifts or the instincts of authorship, these songs and stories find a place in his chronicle. In this way we may find embedded in the Old Testament certain songs or poems, e.g. the Song of the Sword (Gn. 4.[23, 24]); the Song of Moses (Ex. 15.[1]); the Song of Deborah (Jg. 5.). Such poems possess the warm idealism of the writer; they are not history, but they shed a radiance upon history, as all contemporary verses may do. To read them as history is to miss their meaning and power. Similarly, there are stories which can only be described as half prose and half poetry. The mistake of later ages has been in reference to these—first to read them as prose and to receive them as literally true, and next to read them as poetry and to disbelieve them altogether. Neither of these methods is wise : both show a lack of literary judgment. These splendid stories are like the gorgeous garment with which the hero is clad after his victory ; everything is done to make the hero look dazzling—much of his apparel is not his ordinary clothing. The hero did not always look thus radiant, but underneath the splendour of the apparel is the real hero ; and underneath these tales, told in high poetical style, there is, more often than not, truth of fact. These stories take their place in later times : they become the common stock, so to speak, from which prophet and teacher may draw to illustrate or to enforce their teaching.

But growth in the books of the Bible shows itself another way. The laws of the nation grow out of their customs and their experiences. The laws, social and religious, given in the Old Testament are the records of laws or customs which grew up at different epochs, and which were often intended to confirm or to modify previous ancient customs. Severe laws needful in a rude state of society are softened as society becomes regularised. Lynch law is superseded as civilisation grows. The severity needful at first is not needed afterwards. The explanation of many edicts is to be found in the fact that they relax some severe ancient custom. It is with this in mind that we must read some of the Jewish laws. The humane tendency becomes clear when we understand the severity of an earlier stage of civilisation. When so read, the Jewish law is found to be touched with mercy and gentleness compared with the laws of other peoples.

Again, not all ceremonial laws are matters merely of worship. Some are health laws enforced by religious sanction. The ceremonial laws in the Pentateuch must not be regarded as a complete and uniform code : they are rather the accumulations of generations ; they express successive experiences ; they may become interesting studies of national psychological growth.

All through the Bible, then, we find this element of growth, and its value lies in the fact that we can trace the development, moral and spiritual, of a people who, more than any other, have ministered to the religious consciousness of mankind.

The Bible becomes in this way a record of God's dealings with men. It is, in a sense which no other book can claim, a revelation ; for it discloses not only the experiences of men, but it unfolds in fitting degree and order the character of Divine action towards them. If life be education—as we must, I think, believe it to be—the Bible is a rich and varied chronicle of the methods of such education. Whatever difficulties may attach to certain Bible stories, whatever critical questions may be involved in the study of different parts or books of the Bible, the simplest and least educated reader has not been deprived of any really valuable teaching. "The religious value is for all : the historical or quasi-historical for students only," writes Professor Cheyne.

But more than this—our enlarged knowledge derived from the critical study of the Bible enables us to estimate more truly the moral importance of the Divine messages which it records. If we read, for example, Professor Barnes' book on Isaiah, we rise from its study with a heightened admiration of the prophet's character, and a truer and loftier conception of his work. If we read (and we can hardly do better) Principal G. A. Smith's works on Isaiah or the Minor Prophets, we realise the great and progressive work which these prophets wrought in Israel and for all mankind.

But while the intelligent appreciation of what a healthy criticism has done for us is helpful to a clear understanding of many Bible details, and a worthy estimate of Bible characters, the supreme spiritual truth is open to every honest and devout heart, whether learned in criticism or not. For the supreme truth is to know the relationship between God and man : he who knows this and lives by this has all that he needs to know ; for he knows that the soul of man can find its home in the heart of God. He knows also that by slow degrees this supreme truth is unfolded in the Bible. As we follow its leading we follow the unfolding of this relationship ; the stages of the spiritual life are seen to move to higher and higher planes, till we realise that "God is love ; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." The joy of a Divine companionship becomes a changeless truth. "If a man love Me, he will keep My word : and My Father will love him, and we will come and make our abode with him" (Jn. 14.[23]).

The student will realise that in this revelation of relationship a great Divine purpose is fulfilled. The Bible is a literature but not an incoherent literature. As through the changing ages one changeless purpose runs, so in this collection of Jewish literature we may discover a great spiritual goal—the bringing of men to God. They are brought to God through various experiences : the forces of nature play their part—the words of prophets—the vicissitudes of national and individual life ; till in the person of Jesus Christ a revelation tender, complete, intelligible, is reached ; the relationship of sonship is made plain to all and for all time, and the conviction of this relationship is bestowed upon the hearts of men. "God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, whereby we cry, Abba, Father."

Of joy in this relationship no criticism can rob the soul. God is over all nature and over all life: He hath ever been mindful of His covenant: His tender mercies are over all His works: He is loving unto every man: His infinite pity marks our failings and our fall. His forgiveness never fails: no criticism has silenced the voice of Him who said, "Her sins which are many are forgiven." The ample riches of spiritual help are open to all; for no adverse criticism can deprive us of the conviction: "If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rm. 8.[31, 32]).

The spiritual inheritance bequeathed to us in the Bible can never grow less: the spiritual truths unfolded are above all things which criticism, invention, discovery, progress may occasion; and it is to these changeless spiritual truths that we need to direct our thoughts and our souls. There are many inducements to materialism among us—to materialism of conception and materialism of life. Luxury breeds materialism of life: superstitious fear of truth breeds materialism of theological conception. In such times we may find deliverance from both in the words of our Lord: "God is a spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (Jn. 4.[24]).

The Bible student then will certainly go astray who reads all parts of the Bible as though they belonged to one class of writing. To read poetry as though it were prose is to miss much of the beauty and of the teaching which is given: to read all narrative as though it were a prosaic chronicle is nearly as disastrous. Many of the most useful and beautiful stories are charged with a poetical spirit. How many have stumbled over the story of Jonah, or the story of Balaam, and in doing so have missed the message which poetically-minded writers strove to convey. In these cases, if we can seize the moral significance of the stories, we shall be helped to understand what we must call the psychological conditions which moulded the form of the stories. The prophet Jonah, who refuses to carry the message of Divine love, finds that the forces of nature are against him. Balaam, endeavouring for the sake of gain to silence the voice of his own conscience, hears the voice of protest in everything that befalls him: dumb beings grow eloquent against him. This power of transferring the emotions of the soul to surrounding nature is of common experience: the walls cry out against the thief or the murderer. Poets have used this fact, and some of the most impressive passages owe their strength to this transference of emotion from the actor to the inanimate or animate objects around. When Godiva goes forth upon her heroic ride, Tennyson tells—

> "The deep air listened round her as she rode,
> And all the low wind hardly breathed for fear."

When Dante meets the lion he transfers his terror to the atmosphere: "The air trembled" (Inf. i. 48). It is not wonderful to meet the same transference of emotion to external objects in Hebrew literature. Men deeply alive, as these Jewish writers were, to the close contact of the Divine with human life, must not be blamed if they sometimes write as men who are more concerned to make it clear that the voice of God speaks to men than careful to explain how it speaks. Minds full of the consciousness of Divine realities express themselves naturally in a large poetical style which is the despair or the snare of prosaic minds. As Principal G. A. Smith has said, the religious teaching is often independent of the historical incident. History may teach religion; but religion can be taught in sermon, in poem, in parable, or even in fable as well as in history. It is therefore important that the Bible reader should consider, as he reads, the literary form of the passage he studies; for in this way he will be surest of the meaning, and he will not lose the spiritual message in whatever form it comes.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

BY

LAUCHLAN MACLEAN WATT, M.A., B.D., F.S.A.S.

When Christianity penetrated to Britain it came with Latin upon its tongue. There are many conjectures as to how it struck our shores; either, according to tradition, with St. Paul himself, or with Phœnician merchants in search of tin in Cornwall, or in the knapsack or heart of some Roman soldier of the Spanish Legion; and the name of the Nazarene would be spoken by the camp-fires, and whispered through the forests in Britain, before the shaven monks proclaimed the Cross. When the ritual of the Western Church landed in 596 with Augustine, it was probably the Latin Vulgate of Jerome that came with them as their artillery against paganism. Yet for thirty-three years before that momentous arrival, a Celtic brotherhood had been tending the lamp of revelation through gusty persecution; and Gildas tells how, in the time of Diocletian, many copies of the native Scriptures perished in the British towns and villages. The Church of Columba, however, used Latin copies of the Bible; and you can trace the scattered brotherhood of Iona across Europe by the manuscripts they left behind them, with here and there a marginal note in Gaelic, as you find a footprint on the rock, or a dagger in a ford, recalling forgotten history. The story of the mission of St. Augustine is like a poet's dream. Every one knows how, one day, passing through the streets of Rome, Gregory the monk, a man of great mental power and force, which he had already displayed in public life ere he had renounced his worldly career for the anonymity of the cloister, had his attention arrested by a cluster of fair-headed, blue-eyed slaves. "Who are these?" he asked. "They are Angles," was the reply. "Nay, surely," answered he, "not Angles but angels." For a vision swept across his spirit as he spoke, and he saw the barbarous folk, in the island remote beyond Spain, civilised and humanised by the power of Christ. The vision lingered with him; and, long afterwards, he sent Augustine with a band of preachers to the misty land across the flood, to realise his dream.

Of course, the Latin Scriptures were as a sealed treasure to all except the priests and learned men. The first attempt which was made in putting a part of them into English form is that which is called

The Paraphrase of Cædmon.

Tradition makes Cædmon a rude herd at Whitby monastery, founded through the influence of Aidan, who had come from Iona on the invitation of Oswald of Northumbria. Hilda the abbess encouraged the cultivation of the knowledge of Holy Scripture throughout the sphere of her influence. The story has a strong pathos of its own, and should be known to every one. It was the custom, in the evening, when the feast was over, that the harp should pass around, and each man sing a song, some rough lay of grappling battle on lone shores and by the verge of misty cliffs, songs of the pride of conflict and the griefs of war. But, as the harp came to Cædmon, silent near the table-end, he had always to thrust it from him, saying, "I cannot make a song, and I know no song for singing!" till they laughed at him as a dumb companion of the dumb cattle he tended. So he would rise and leave them, and go to the cattle-shed. But one night came visions and voices; and, as he slept in the straw, with the grief of his silence at his heart, a voice pierced his slumber, saying, "Awake and sing!" "Thou knowest I cannot sing," his dreaming heart made answer, "else should I have been shouting my chorus with the rest, instead of being here dumb and songless." "Nevertheless," continued the speaker, "to Me thou shalt sing the song of the beginning of things and of the love of God." And in his dream he felt himself singing verses he had never heard before; but which remained with him when he awoke. The story of the gift spread, and he was led to narrate to the Abbess Hilda, in the presence of the principal monks, the story of his dream, and the verses that had been spoken to him, till his masters became the devout hearers of his holy song. He was taken into the monastery in order that this heaven-given faculty might be cherished as an instrument for Christ, till he died in 680, having added to the English gleeman's instrument a new chord, turning men's hearts away from the songs of brute strength and bloodshed to the story of the grace of God in Christ. He was a rude early Milton, and his work was the germ of an English Bible.

The second influence in this great movement was Aldhelm of Malmesbury.

He resolved that he would bring the Christian faith into contact with the people. He was a musician and a poet, with skill on the popular musical instruments of his time; so on the Sundays, when the people crowded into market, he stood as a gleeman on the bridge, till, having caught the ear of the crowd, he would sing to them God's redeeming love. King Alfred mentions that some of Aldhelm's songs lived till his day on the lips of the people.

In 673, when Cædmon was singing his creation-song in Whitby, and Aldhelm had begun his work at Malmesbury, was born who settled in the monastery of Jarrow, now a land of furnaces and smoke, filled with the clang of iron-works and the building of ships. Those before him had only told the purport of Bible narratives in their own way, but he devoted his leisure to the translation into English of the Gospel according to St. John. He had written, in Latin, for scholars the history of the Church, but this latter was for the hearts of English folk. Death came knocking at the door, upon a day in May 735, ere he was finished. His favourite pupil, Cuthbert, was writing to his dictation. "Dear master, there is but one sentence still left undone." "Write quickly," replied the failing voice. Then, later, "Master, it is finished." The venerable saint replied, "Thou hast said well, 'It is finished.' Now, take my head in your hands, that I may sit facing the holy place where I was wont to pray." And so he breathed his last, leaving his parting gift to his people.

Everything in the matter of religion and scholarship got a strong set-back with the advent of the Danes, who tore down beams and rafters of churches for ships' timbers, and gave most notable cloisters to the flames.

Alfred the Great managed in 878 to arrange a victorious peace with these, and then tried to create a national literature. He prefixed to his body of laws a version of the Ten Commandments, with a curious reading in the Fourth Commandment: "For in six days Christ made the heavens and the earth." The tradition that Alfred translated the whole of the New and a portion of the Old Testament is an exaggeration. He left an unfinished version of the Psalms when he died, and he bequeathed to the ages to come after him the patriotic wish that the youth of his kingdom should aspire to be able to read the Scriptures in their own language.

The next stage is seen in the

"Glosses."

These were interlinear English renderings of some manuscript Latin Scriptures. One of these, in the British Museum, was said to belong to St. Cuthbert; another has the name of one of the Celtic monks written on it.

Ælfric, who flourished in 1005 as abbot of Eynsham, next translated the Pentateuch, with Joshua, Judges, and Kings. His purpose in this was pure patriotism threaded on the intention to teach the duty of battle on behalf of one's country, from the example of the wars of Joshua, which he considered worthy of the study of a prince in times of stress and turbulence.

Out of the Norman period English emerged as the literary language of the kingdom, henceforward modified and at the same time enriched through the new elements which had become incorporated in it. It became thus the instrument of who devoted himself to the translation of Holy Scripture, and who, through the persecution which tried to hamper him in his work, became notable for his freedom of faith and fearlessness of character, till he lives in history as "the Morning Star of the Reformation." The Latin translation from which Wyclif worked was the Vulgate of Jerome; but, as it depended entirely upon manuscript reduplication, the text was liable to great corruption, which of course vitiated Wyclif's version. Europe was trembling under the footsteps of great movements when, in 1324, Wyclif first saw the light. Dante had only been dead three years, Boccaccio was thirty years old, and Petrarch only twenty. It was an important period for England; Wyclif, Chaucer, Langland, and Gower being contemporary. Langland in his "Vision of Piers Plowman" brought into touch with the mind of the English people, through a popular dialect, the Bible-based life of simple truth. He represented the Protestantism of the people, while Wyclif, a Fellow of Merton and Warden of Canterbury Hall, was the type and leader of University Protestantism. He escaped serious attack until 1381, when his teaching on transubstantiation awoke persecution for himself and his disciples, who now were busy apostles, penetrating to distant places. He died in 1384 as rector of Lutterworth, beside the river Swift, into which, forty years later, his bones were cast by the edict of Rome; but, before he died, the fruit of his labour was being carried up and down through England, for he had, through many a patient hour, been toiling at the task of his life, namely, the giving of an English voice to the Latin Bible. It was remarkable how this work was looked upon. Walsingham described him as "an enemy of the Church, and a nourisher of schism"; while Arundel calls him "a pestilent wretch, who had completed his iniquity by inventing a new translation of the Scriptures," and Knighton complains that his work was casting the Gospel pearl abroad to be trodden under the feet of the commonalty, till the jewel of the Church was made by it the common sport. Nevertheless, John Wyclif, by laying down his English Bible on the threshold, kept open God's door of entrance to the English people. His work was, of course, circulated only in manuscript; and it was not until 1848 that it was printed. Its language is quaint and remarkable; yet, some years ago, portions which were read in Yorkshire required no explanation, and you may find in it many words which are even to-day very good north-country speech; as for example, "sowens" for pottage; "birr" for force, as when "the swine rushed with great birr into the sea"; "sour doug" for whey or leaven, the parable of the Leaven being, with Wyclif, "the parable of Sour Doug"; "toun" for a farm and farm-buildings; "wod" for mad; "yowl" for howl; "tak tent" for take heed.

Wyclif's Bible has the glory of the pioneer, but it suffered from the fact that it was a translation from the Latin, which was itself a version from the Greek, which was also, in the matter of the Old Testament, a translation from the Hebrew. It suffered, therefore, from the uncertainty which always must result from the passing from pitcher to pitcher, so much of the truth of the original getting spilt, and so much getting the tang of the vessel upon it. It was not, of course, until a later period that Greek scholarship came into our land, after Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turk in 1453, when the scholars, who made that city their headquarters, were scattered with their precious manuscripts and learning all over Europe. In 1388 a disciple of Wyclif, issued a revision, with a prologue, commentary, and notes, which superseded the earlier version. A hundred and fifty copies of this survive, and were examined by Forshall and Madden in the preparation of their work on Wyclif's Bible. The cost of a manuscript copy of Wyclif's translation was £40. Money was scarce and food dear, and the nation ground between the feudal and ecclesiastical millstones. The truth of the Bible was, therefore, disseminated either through the industry of Wyclif's poor priests, called Lollards, who, as they preached, carried with them copies, and sold them to those who could buy, a few leaves of Peter and Paul costing as much as a load of hay; but, where people could not purchase the precious Book, a Bible club was formed, from whose combined purse a copy was secured, which was read together in quiet places, the exercise frequently meaning punishment and death. By an Act of Parliament at Hampton Court, in 1414, it was declared that "all who read the Scriptures in the mother-tongue shall forfeit land and money." Thus, between the boards of the English Bible, men carried their lives.

Of course, so long as the work depended on the multiplication and dissemination of manuscripts it dragged itself along with a slow and uncertain progress; but time was on the side of the triumph of the English Bible, by bringing about (1) the spread of the study of Greek; (2) the invention of printing, which enabled copies to be more quickly multiplied at a cheaper rate and in smaller bulk than manuscript; and (3) the making of paper out of rags. Gutenberg had been experimenting with movable types before 1439; while Fust of Mentz produced his books so rapidly and so cheaply that he was actually imprisoned as being in league with the devil, who was certainly a strange partner in the cause of light! In 1455 was printed the first Latin Bible, called the Mazarin, from being found in Cardinal Mazarin's library. The printing-press reached England in 1474, and Scotland in 1507; and soon the printed page was to be in the poorest cottage, and its truth in the simplest heart.

Erasmus, the friend of Luther, had lectured on Greek at Oxford, and was Professor in Cambridge from 1509 to 1514. His fame attracted thither the youth of the country from far and near. Amongst those who had drunk at the well of knowledge was William Tyndal.

Of his origin little is known. He was born about 1484, and used the name of Hitchens, both names appearing on the title-page of his first acknowledged publication. He was a hard student, especially of Holy Scripture, Erasmus' edition of the Greek New Testament in 1516 affecting him deeply. He left the university in 1521 to be tutor to Sir John Walsh in his native county of Gloucestershire, where he was frequently drawn into disputes and discussions with the priests, who loved to haunt a good table. Later on he revealed how these arguments, and the petty persecutions which they brought upon him, had made the resolve grow up within him to lay the Scriptures before the people of England in their own mother tongue, "that they might see the process, order, and meaning of the text." On one of these occasions Tyndal declared, "If God spares my life I shall make the ploughboy know more about the Scripture than the priest does to-day." He went to London in 1523, and found shelter in the house of Humphrey Monmouth, a cloth merchant, having sought vainly the patronage of Bishop Tunstall. He came to the conclusion that there was no place in England to translate the Word of God, so he went abroad in 1524; and, though the fruits of his labour came back across the sea, he never again beheld his native land. The first certain date is 1525, at Cologne, where he busied himself with Roye, his assistant, in printing a complete Testament in English. But, through the malign influence of Cochlæus, a priest and spy, they had to flee to Worms with the sheets which had been already printed, where he completed the work, after altering the size from quarto to octavo, though later the quarto sheets also were issued. The Bibles were imported into England packed up in bales of cloth as ordinary merchandise. There is no record of their distribution; but pedlars, merchants, and preachers went everywhere with them; they got into monasteries and prisons, and men and books went to the flames on their account. Campeggio wrote to Wolsey: "We lately heard, to his Majesty's praise, that he had most justly caused to be burned a copy of the Holy Bible, which had been translated into the common tongue. No burnt-offering could be more blessed to the Almighty God." It was evidently a pertinacious burning, for only one complete copy of the octavo remains, while of the quarto but twenty-two chapters of St. Matthew in one fragment abide. But the task of the persecutors was heavier now, for it was no longer the mere hunting out of a few manuscripts. The silent, never-sleeping foe of ignorance was the unknown printer, hid in some secret place abroad, multiplying the Word of Truth. The campaign was not unaccompanied by humour, as in the case of Bishop Tunstall, who, in his eagerness, was induced by Tyndal's friend Packington to buy up and burn the whole edition, the proceeds, however, enabling Tyndal to reprint a more accurate translation, while at the same time the very flames that burnt the Book became its best advertisement. The Pentateuch appeared at Marburg in 1530; the Book of Jonah next year; Genesis, revised and amended, in Antwerp in 1534, in Roman type; and that year came forth a small octavo New Testament with some translations of "The Epistles taken out of the Old Testament." In 1534 also appeared a New Testament by George Joye, of which only one copy exists, in the British Museum, a work of no note, and looked upon by Tyndal as an impertinence.

Tyndal's industry never wearied. In 1534, however, an Englishman named Philips, having won his confidence and borrowed money from him, betrayed him as a heretic. He was thrown into the prison of Vilvorde, where he lay in miserable discomfort, while England was trembling through his work Godwards. It is pitiable to read a letter which he wrote to the governor of the prison, in which he complains that he suffers from the cold, and that it is wearisome to sit alone in the dark; and he begs for his Hebrew Bible, Grammar, and Dictionary. On Friday, the 6th of October 1536, he was strangled at the stake and then burned. His work still lives in the Authorised Version, his nervous, simple English making his Bible truly a handbook for the people in the things of God. It is marvellous to remember that in the very year of this scholar's terrible death the first New Testament was printed in England "by authority." It was as if the flower of all his life had suddenly sprung into fulness from his ashes. The revision of 1535, known as the "G. H. Testament," became the standard for later reprints. In 1536 no less than seven editions appeared, one a beautiful folio. The importance of his work was that it was a scholar's independent translation direct from the original tongues, while at the same time using all the light to be had from Luther and others, so careful and so masterly that its influence is felt, in bulk of vocabulary and phrase, throughout even the last revision made in our own day; while all translations subsequent to his were for the most part revisions of his work.

Next in the roll comes

Miles Coverdale,

who is said to have assisted Tyndal with the Pentateuch. He became a priest in 1514, but after the arrest of Prior Barnes he left his convent to preach in Essex. He had to flee and hide himself in some of the German cities. From 1528 to 1535 he leaves no trace. Two years after his flight a council was held at Westminster, and the Archbishop of Canterbury issued a bill to be read by all preachers, in which it was stated that the Holy Scriptures in English would rather be to further confusion than edification. This stirred up Latimer, who wrote a letter to the king, notable indeed for its boldness and daring. But, in 1531, the cleavage between Henry VIII. and the Pope was taken as an open door through which a popular translation of the Scripture might creep into the life of England. Three years later, Convocation asked the king to authorise a translation to be made by certain learned men who would be named. The archbishop, notwithstanding opposition, set to work at once, and sent round portions to all the bishops for translation. The Bishop of London, however, refused to translate his part. Where Coverdale was all this time no man knew, but suddenly, out of the cloud that enveloped him, came, in 1535, the first complete English Bible, with no name of either translator or printer upon it. The press and place from which this book emerged have never been identified. Coverdale's Bible was not a translation directly from the Greek and Hebrew, but from the German and Latin Versions, though this fact was dropped by the English printer from the title-page. He used Tyndal's translation for the New Testament, and also for the books of Moses and Jonah, along with Luther, the Zurich Bible, the Vulgate, and Pagninus' versions. His is the "Treacle Bible," from the rendering of Jr. 8.22. It is full of pithy old words and proverbial renderings; but it is also a brimming well of musical English, and much of the mellifluous charm of our modern version arises from the masterly collocations of Miles Coverdale's English. It was issued, with various readings, in two editions, in 1537, by authority of the king, and revised by Rogers, who was afterwards martyred. This embodied all the work of Tyndal and Coverdale, and became the fons of all later revisions. Richard Taverner, imprisoned twice, though he died in his bed, in 1539 also brought out a version, once reprinted in 1549. The work of Tyndal was now bearing fruit in English fields; the dead hand had conquered. A third Bible under the editorship of Coverdale, for national circulation, was appointed in 1538 to be done in Paris, because of the superior paper and printing there. But the Inquisition chased the workers and their work home to England. The printed sheets, which were left behind, were condemned to be burned; but the officer of the Inquisition into whose care for this purpose they were committed, wishing to make money, sold them to a haberdasher, and, being discovered, they were brought, with presses and type, across the Channel. The result was the issued in 1539, mainly by Coverdale, using Münster's Hebrew, Latin for the Old Testament, and the Vulgate and Erasmus for the New. This was set up in the parish churches, chained to a pillar, where the people might freely resort, in their own tongue, to the wonder of the love of God, a privilege which takes its place among the strange things of the reign of Henry VIII. The new edition in 1540, with Cranmer's preface, bore the title of "Cranmer's Bible." Henry died in 1547; and, under the gentle reign of Edward VI., the Acts which restricted the freedom of the people in regard to Holy Scriptures were cancelled. But Mary, called "Bloody Mary," succeeded him in his short reign of four years, and the old work of Bible-burning and believer-burning was resumed, while the very texts of Scripture were obliterated from the church walls. Coverdale, consecrated Bishop of Exeter by Edward VI., was now made a prisoner at large—that is to say, he moved about under sureties. While abroad, he had married a Scotswoman, sister-in-law of Dr. John MacAlpine, Chaplain to Christian II. of Denmark, and Professor of Theology in Copenhagen, who got this king to write imperatively that Coverdale be allowed to appear in his presence; and Mary had to agree. So, in February 1555, safe, though with the smell of fire upon him, Coverdale passed across the sea, the panther's teeth having just missed him. After the death of Mary he returned, but spent his latter days in obscurity and poverty, till he died in 1569 at the age of eighty-one.

A band of Protestant refugees, who had taken advantage of the shelter afforded them at Geneva, interested themselves during their exile in translation of the Scriptures, which they looked upon as the arsenal of their faith; and in 1557 a version of the New Testament, "for simple lambs," was accomplished by one of their number, who married a sister of Calvin. This book was the first English translation of the New Testament divided into verses, following the example of Stephen's Greek Testament; and it had many "annotations of all hard places." But it was superseded by the publication in 1560 of the whole Scriptures, in what is known as

William Whittingham,

which was the people's Bible, the handbook of the English Puritan, and of the Scottish Covenanter. It is known to collectors as "the Breeches Bible," from the translation of Gn. 3.7, although the same rendering appeared in Wyclif's manuscript. This was the first Bible issued from a Scottish press, and was known as the "Bassandyne Bible," from the name of its printer, and held its own in Scotland till the close of the eighteenth century, when it was still the pulpit Bible of Crail, in Fife. It passed through 160 editions, Laurence Tomson's revision of the New Testament in 1576 gradually taking the place of the earlier version. It had an address to Elizabeth, and an address to the reader. The example of the previous translation in regard to the New Testament was followed in this by breaking up the Old Testament into verses and printing in Roman type. So popular was it that an edition of the Authorised Version was issued in 1649 with the Genevan notes.

In 1563 Archbishop Parker initiated a scheme of Scripture revision, probably suggested by the tradition of the origin of the Septuagint, namely, by a number of scholars working independently. On the basis of Cranmer's Bible, Münster, and Pagninus, it appeared five years later, and was known as

The Bishops' Bible.

And between 1568 and 1606 it went through nineteen editions. The result of the method was of course a mosaic of attainments, though the influence of the Great Bible and the Genevan was felt throughout. It was enacted that each bishop and archbishop should have in his dining-room or large hall a copy convenient for the benefit of servants and strangers. Coverdale's Psalter had, in the thirty-three years of use, endeared itself to the ear and heart of the English people, and could not be displaced by the bishops' version. The two appeared side by side in the folio Bible of 1572, but Coverdale held the field, and still maintains it in the Book of Common Prayer, while the Genevan Bible remained the book of the household, notwithstanding that the bishops' had the sanction and authority alike of Church and Parliament.

The Roman Catholics, turning, in their exile during Elizabeth's reign, to the thought of God's revelation, published in 1582, from the College of Rheims, an English version out of the Vulgate, on the ground that the Hebrew and Greek texts had been corrupted by the Jews and heretics. The Old Testament appeared at Douay in 1609. The translators, Allen, Martin, and Bristow, warn their readers against the Protestants, who had cast "the holy to dogges, and pearles to hogges," but the had all the defects of a translation from secondary sources, the Vulgate being an imperfect rendering of the Septuagint, while the English style carried with it a stiff Latin form, though to it we owe such enriching words as allegory, advent, victim, &c. The prefaces are surcharged with high Romish doctrine, and the notes are full of ridiculous fables of the saints and fathers. It was an attempt to win England to Rome; but it was, after all, a book gathered by deliberate choice from side tracks in preference to the highway.

In 1601, at Burntisland, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland expressed dissatisfaction with the existing versions of the Bible in use, and the king made a characteristic exhibition-speech. But in 1603, late on Saturday, 26th of March, he was awakened out of sleep, to be hailed as "King of England, France, and Ireland" by Sir Robert Carey, an English knight who had ridden from London in sixty hours in order to be the first to carry the momentous news that Elizabeth was dead. James had an itch for the repute of scholarship, and though George Buchanan the humanist, who was his tutor, truly expressed his feeling that he had done his best when he had made him "a learned ass," he could not keep him from braying. A chance remark and the flatteries of the time, however, secured the blessing of a Standard Bible,

The Authorised Version,

one of the most remarkable by-products of any epoch. To settle the divisions and difficulties of the Church the king had called the Hampton Court Conference in January 1604, and Dr. Reynolds of Corpus Christi College, the leader of the Puritan party, suggested a new translation of the Bible. This at once set on fire the fancy of the king, who had already been working at the Psalms in verse, with Sir William Alexander of Menstrie, Earl of Stirling. The work was not commenced till 1607, by two companies at Westminster, and two at the University seats of Oxford and Cambridge. Its inner history is practically unknown, but in 1611 the result came out to the world, printed by Robert Barker, with that dedication to the king which reeks of flattery but which must have been balm to his soul; and the most able preface by Dr. Smith, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester. No marginal notes, except for philological purposes, were permitted, as the book was not to be a controversial publication; but an opportunity of a fling at the Puritans was not to be missed, as in the heading of Mk. 6. regarding dancing, afterwards altered. The chapter headings were all new, and still remain, with the exception of twelve. The dates, based on Ussher's chronology, did not, however, find a place till the edition of 1701 by Bishop Lloyd. The "Authorised Version" was never sanctioned by Parliament, nor formally "Appointed to be read in churches." It was really "authorised" from the final approval of the English-speaking people as a whole. The genealogy of it, through the Bishops' Bible, from the Great Bible, Matthew's, and then Coverdale's, which was in the main Tyndal's, made the work in reality the crowning monument of the labour of the martyrs. It also has had its nickname editions, the first two issues being known as the "He Bible" and the "She Bible" from the rendering of Ru. 1.[15]; while another is known as the "Judas Bible," owing to a misprint in Mw. 26.[36], the name of the apostate apostle appearing instead of "Jesus." A quiet process of revision, steadily proceeding up till modern days, made many emendations on this version; but, though Lightfoot in 1645 suggested a new translation, and the Long Parliament in 1653 ordained that it be proceeded with, the Authorised Version lived on unmoved, in the life and love of the people. It is truly an English book. Its words are in bulk Saxon, the Lord's Prayer in Matthew having fifty-nine of its words pure English, and only six of Latin origin;

indeed the first thirty-five words are Saxon undefiled.

In 1870, on the report of a Committee appointed by Convocation, in consideration of the great advances made by Textual Criticism, through the work of Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Tregelles, two companies were appointed to revise the version of 1611. The revisers included scholars of all churches, and worked in co-operation with two representative American companies. Beginning in 1872, the result of their labours was published in 1881 as

The Revised Version.

The alterations due to an improved Greek text affect readings only, not doctrines, though some omissions are striking, as e.g. the doxology of the Lord's Prayer, the three heavenly witnesses, the eunuch's confession at his baptism ; but many of the new renderings, on the other hand, clarify at one glimpse what before was obscure, or even incomprehensible. This is especially seen in the Old Testament, where the effect of the results of Oriental travel and discovery, with the modern advance of Oriental scholarship, often gripped the true sense with the power of a fresh revelation. Still, with all that it has to recommend it, the affection of the people clings to the old phrases of the Authorised Version, endeared by association in history and in life ; and it will probably take as long for the Revised Version to displace the Authorised as it did for Jerome's revision to displace the old Latin text.

The Influence of the English Bible on English Literature has been stupendous and immeasurable. In fact, as English Literature itself must always feel within it the beat of the heart of the Elizabethan Age, and be enveloped almost for all time in the intellectual and moral atmosphere of that creative period when light broke into chaos, and liberty walked through the land singing of God and the soul, so still, to-day, the great influence which threads true literature is that of the English Bible, whereon, as upon an irresistible tide, floated the immense conceptions of the terribleness of sin, the balefulness of godless self-seeking, and the shattering compasslessness of the soul that drifts, blinded, away from the guiding star of God. The growth of the English Bible meant the growth, development, and enrichment of the vocabulary which was the vehicle of literary expression, the thread of the tapestry on which the master-artists wove God's revelation to their period. In its progress one sees the advance from the day of a stammering tongue to a crisp, rich utterance, carrying with it the essence of unnoted and forgotten tributary forces. Of course, in itself, the struggle towards embodiment of thought and feeling helped to mould and tune the language through which the whole Scripture was to be borne into the hearts that waited for it ; and a reciprocal influence must be wisely acknowledged. Proverbial wisdom, ebbing and flowing through lives of effort, failure, or success, gets worn into concise and epigrammatic phrase, and one can see the influence of this securing a footing on Tyndal's printed page. But once there as the handmaiden of the great thoughts of God, she became marshal of the prophetic and poetic speech which characterises great literature. The Drama which grew up alongside of the groping after divine truth that found issue in Bible translation, was intensely, from the beginning, affected by Scriptural teaching, having its source in the Church, and its agents Churchmen. But, when the Miracle, Morality, and Mystery left the churchyard and invaded the streets and common lives of men, it developed into that unexcelled phenomenon of English tragedy, finding its culmination in Shakespeare ; and the great lessons of the soul's triumph and cataclysm were spoken often in the very word and form of the English Bible. Bishop Wordsworth has shown in his book, Shakespeare and the Bible, how the vocabulary of Shakespeare is saturated and impregnated with Biblical influences. It would have been wonderful had it been otherwise, for the very salt of the sea that he had waded in, and the sand of the shore that he traversed, would be found upon him. His age had the Bible close before its eyes. It was natural, therefore, that he should refer, when his creations were in similar circumstances, to Pilate's vain attempt to wash his hands white, to Herod, Lazarus, the sword of Deborah, and the outstanding figures of Holy Scripture. It was natural also that, even without being a deep student of the Bible, through much of his writings should be heard the echo of the tune of the English Scriptures, and that Biblical references should come in casually amongst his fancies.

In Spenser, Biblical morality, embodied in knights and virgins, moves through the world conquering and putting to shame evil, sin, and oppression.

Even such careless and irreligious poets as Marlowe and the imaginative school which surrounded him, when applying the ethical and spiritual lessons of their plays, clinch these by a reference to the Word of Truth.

Sir Walter Scott, perhaps the most moral teacher and writer of any age, was deeply influenced by Holy Scripture, perhaps none more so except Shakespeare. His allusions are so numerous and so devout that the mere excerpting of them from his works would make a volume itself. They reflect life-companionship and close communion with holiest things, and confirm the spirit, which, when he lay, a dying man, and asked Lockhart to read to him, made him reply to Lockhart's inquiry as to what book he should read, "Can you ask? There is only one Book now."

Wordsworth and Browning are, of course, purely Christian poets, the unexcelled teaching of the latter being deep draughts from the fountain of the soul's best life. Under the grip of Wordsworth's English you feel the flexible fibre and edge of that strong English weapon which was forged out of the brave heart of Tyndal long ago. Johnson, Tennyson, and Ruskin are steeped in word, image, and form in the Holy Book which has so much moulded the thought and action of the English-speaking race.

Nothing could have been more pregnant with suggestion for a mind like Carlyle's than the book of Proverbs, and the soul-probing, mystery-searching of Job. The Gospel of Work which he adopted as his own peculiar message, with his sense of the universal spaces and influences invisible which give depth and meaning to human joys and sorrows, the faith in the goodness of God and the blindness and littleness of men, had their source undoubtedly in that old Book which built up the independent character of the sturdy race from whose loins he sprang. Arising probably from his innate dislike of Jews, he truncated his faith by cutting it free from the metaphysic of Revelation, and adopting only the ethic of Christianity; yet in his style were reflected, almost without knowing it, the rhapsody and thought of the prophets, which he had heard so often by the fireside of his father, the stonemason of Ecclefechan.

In the same way, in the Scottish peasant Burns, it was the general teaching of the indestructibleness of honour, and the humanness of the Divine Fatherhood drawing the divine in humanity towards it, that made his verse throb with the power of tears. His teaching maintained the bias it had received from that familiar converse with the Genevan Bible, and the outlook and inlook through the soul-windows of the exiles under the shadow of the Alps.

Especially striking has been the influence of the Psalms in both utterance and thought, on the life, actions, and politics of men, the field of philosophical and poetic literature having been sprinkled throughout with shining gems from the Psalter.

The subject is inexhaustible, and affords a sphere of reading with a purpose, through all that Englishmen have ever written.

APOCRYPHA OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

These are not of the same value as those of the Old Testament, as their influence was not so great. The main benefit of their study, as it seems to us, over and above the revelation of the progress of Christian thought, is the indirect evidence of the inspiration of the writings of the NT. afforded by their weak, jejune, childish character as compared with the genuine works of the apostles. The most of these writings never were in any danger of being received into the Canon. Certain of them were treated in some churches as if canonical. The most important of these are the Epistle of Clement, and the Homily, which is generally called the 2nd Epistle. There seems no reasonable doubt that the epistle attributed to Clement is his genuine work. It is largely founded on the Epistle to the Hebrews. The occasion of its being sent was disorders in the Church of Corinth, not unlike those that occasioned the Pauline epistles to that Church. It is especially valuable for the light it throws on the doctrines and institutions of the early Christian Church. Very noteworthy is the evidence of loyalty to the emperors in chap. 61., written as it is immediately after a season of persecution. The Anonymous Homily, generally called the 2nd Epistle of Clement, is worthy of study because of the frequent quotations it makes fm. the Synoptic Gospels, and apparently also fm. other lost sources. A striking note is that the books of the New Testament are denominated "The Apostles," in contradistinction fm. the "Biblia," the Old Testament. It is the earliest example of a Christian Homily. The Epistle of Barnabas is appended to the Codex Sinaiticus, as we have already said: in a Latin version it had appeared appended to the Vaticanus. It is quoted frequently, and treated with the respect due to Scripture, as if it had come fm. the pen of the companion of St. Paul. Eusebius, however, has no doubt about its spuriousness. Its object is to show that Judaism is utterly abolished. It is weak and prolix. The "Shepherd of Hermas" was supposed in early days to have been written by the Hermas saluted by Paul (Rm. 16.[14]). It is a series of allegories somewhat operose and confused. It opens with five visions, in wh. he is shown the upbuilding of the Church. The fifth vision is that in wh. an old man appears to Hermas and gives him certain instructions; this introduces "the Twelve Commandments," wh. form the second portion of the "Shepherd," and the "Similitudes," wh. form the third. The main interest in this work, as in others of its class, is the insight it gives into the views and practices of the early Roman Church. Eusebius (HE. iii. 3) seems to have been loth to exclude the "Shepherd" fm. the homologoumena. In the same section Eusebius refers to the Gospel of Peter. This work has been recovered comparatively recently in Egypt by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt; it is obviously ancient, but as obviously unauthentic; one noticeable thing is the favourable view given of Pilate. Less valuable is the work also referred to by Eusebius and found at the same time, the Revelation of Peter. In Egypt also were found by the same explorers several fragments containing "Sayings of our Lord." At first it was hoped we had found the Λόγια referred to by Papias; this hope proved fallacious. They are, however, very interesting, some possibly authentic. The Didachē, or "Teaching of the Apostles," ought also to be mentioned—a small treatise giving exhortations as to personal conduct, and directions as to the performance of the various acts of worship. As to baptism, it may be administered by pouring water on the head thrice in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Directions are also given as to the right observance of the Eucharist. One striking thing is that all first-fruits are to be given to the prophets, "for they are your High Priests." It is evidently a document of the first century. There are besides many Pseudonymous Gospels, some of them dating fm. the second cent.: the principal of these are, the Protevangelium of James, narrating the marvels wh. accompanied the birth of Mary on to the birth of our Lord; the Gospel of Thomas, wh. surrounds with marvels the infancy of Christ; and the Gospel of Nicodemus, elsewhere treated. The others are all founded on these to wh. we have here referred: with the exception of the last, childishness is the most marked characteristic. There are also Apocryphal Acts as of Peter and Paul, and of Paul and Thekla, wh. are ancient and interesting, tho' valuable only as explaining the notions of the later Middle Ages, wh. find expression in their pictures.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

A NUMBER of writings pseudonymous as to claim of authorship, and imitations of the book of Daniel as to content, wh. appeared mainly between the Testaments, are called Apocalyptic because they profess to be Revelations or Apocalypses of the future. Most frequently they bore the names of prophets and seers already venerated as having enjoyed a specially intimate association with Deity. The majority of these writings are of Jewish origin. A singular fate befell the vast mass of them; much read in the first ages of the Christian Church, between the sixth and seventh centuries they disappeared utterly, and were rediscovered mainly in the course of the nineteenth century; sometimes resurrected from where they had been buried under false names in some ancient library; sometimes released from imprisonment in the literary dungeon connected with an Abyssinian church. Though Jewish in origin, only traces of any of them are to be found in the Talmud, and in no case is any of them quoted as Scripture. In the Christian community, on the other hand, they had great influence, and are not seldom quoted as authoritative. Notwithstanding, only one of them, 2nd (4th) ESDRAS, was received at all, even among the deutero-canonical Scriptures of the Apocrypha. Its position there was sufficiently precarious; though received in the English Apocrypha, in the Vulgate since the Council of Trent it was relegated to a position outside the Canon, after Revelation, and not even assigned that by the Lutheran Church. In the case of this book, not only was there no Hebrew original forthcoming, but, unlike the other books of the Apocrypha, there was not even a Greek translation. However, these writings are yet of great interest and of no little value. As the writers were Palestinian Jews, these books reveal the trend of thought and hope in the Holy Land before our Lord came. As the prevalence of certain kinds of plants and animals reveals the character of the soil and climate in wh. they have flourished, so it is with literature; the prevalence of certain forms of literature enables us to determine the nature of the spiritual atmosphere, the mental soil from wh. they have sprung. These Apocalyptic writings enable us to understand the nature of that field in wh. the Great Sower of the seed scattered the good seed of the kingdom of heaven. We purpose to restrict our study to those Jewish Apocalypses which originated before the Advent, and to those that saw the light within a century and a quarter after it. To study this subject intelligently certain points have to be considered: the Nature of Apocalyptic; the Occasion of Apocalyptic; the Authors of these Writings; the Books wh. make up Apocalyptic Literature; and the Doctrinal Significance of Apocalyptic.

(1) The Nature of Apocalyptic.—Apocalypse is related to prophecy; indeed in some respects it more fully represented what many even in comparatively recent times regarded as the very essence of prophecy. To many the prophet was one who cd. tell what was to take place and that only; prediction was the essence of prophecy. It is more generally recognised now that the essence of Hebrew prophecy lay in the revelation of the will of God as the great source of righteousness. The moral needs of their contemporaries, their immediate audience, bulked most largely with them: prediction was at times a sign demonstrating the reality of their commission; or it was the unveiling the hidden moral consequences of a course of conduct. On one subject the prophets were predictive; they were sure that the Divine purpose involved the coming of a Messianic King who shd. "restore the kingdom to Israel," when the "people wd. be all righteous." What, however, was subsidiary to prophecy was essential to Apocalypse; it always professed to unveil the future.* The attitude of the prophet and of the Apocalyptist to his predictions was different; while the first had to "search what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ wh. was in them did signify," the second had, if we lay aside the canonical Apocalypses, no doubts as to the purport of his vision. In literary method there was a difference. While the Apocalyptist had visions in wh. the future was revealed to him in symbol, and he described what he saw in prose, the prophet, even when he did not use the forms of verse, was always hovering on the brink of it, and his utterances were always lyric in their essence. While the prophets most generally denounced nations that had sinned by name, the Apocalyptist usually veiled the nations under symbols; in Ezekiel and Zechariah, the contemporaries with the rise of Apocalypse, we find this literary device resorted to. The vision of the

* The case of the book of Jubilees is apparently an exception, as it narrates only what had taken place in the past Jubilees; yet this is only apparent, for the times the accounts of wh. are given were beyond the sphere of actual, indeed much of it beyond the sphere of possible, records, and therefore only to be known by revelation.

Apocalyptist was wider than that of the prophet; while the latter was occupied with the fate of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, the Apocalyptist surveyed the whole world and looked forward to the end of time and the final judgment.

(2) The Occasion of Apocalyptic.—When those of the Jews who returned fm. the Babylonian captivity endeavoured to set up again their national worship, while they were in a measure successful in that, they found that the nation in its political aspect cd. not be restored. They were not even permitted to retain such shadowy independence as the possession of kingship implied; a thing allowed by Persia to so many of her tributaries. Fm. the date of Nehemiah's final return to the court of Artaxerxes to the conquest of South-Western Asia by Alexander the Great, a cloud settled on the history of Judæa, so dense that Josephus appears to have thought that Darius Codomannus, who was conquered by Alexander, immediately succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus. Not only had kings disappeared fm. the commonwealth of Israel, but after MALACHI, who probably was a later contemporary of Nehemiah, prophets also had ceased. The rule of the Persians was always tempered in regard to the Jews by the acknowledgment of a certain religious kinship between themselves and the Jews. With the advent of the Greek empire Judaism became even more a church and less a nation than it had been under the Persians. Not only was there the intrusion of different political ideals, but their religion was exposed to a severer ordeal than before. The idolatry wh. the Jewish people had learned to hate and despise in Babylon appeared under new and seductive forms. All the æsthetic elements in their nature were played upon by the artistic beauty of "the gods of Greece." To this was added the glamour of military glory wh., alien to the whole prophetic ideal as it was, appeared in new splendour in the achievements of Alexander, the founder of the Greek empire. Deeper and deeper became the degradation. Youths gave themselves over to the games of the Palæstra and became ashamed of their religion and its most sacred rites. While on the one hand the zeal of many of the sons of Israel waxed cold, the spirit of many of the more religious among the Jews began to burn within them, and they in consequence were prone to look into the future filled with direful imaginings as to whereunto this wd. grow. In earlier days such a state of things wd. have awakened the voice of a prophet who, speaking in the name of the Lord, wd. have denounced all this tampering with idolatry. But there was no longer any "prophet among them, or any that knew the time." Indeed it wd. seem as if those who were the last to claim the title of prophet had degraded their office and had worn the prophet's hairy mantle to deceive. In the book of Daniel those who were zealous for God found a model for a different kind of composition, wh. formed a more fitting vehicle for the message they wished to convey to their fellows; further, it did not, in appearance at least, make so direct a claim to personal inspiration. In another way also it suited the changed circumstances of the time. When the prophet spoke it was still a time when small kingdoms had a place in the plan of things; empires had only begun to be recognised as the means by wh. God wd. carry further His preparation for the coming of His Son into the world. With the setting up of the empire of Alexander the day of small kingdoms wh. had occupied little more space than a small English county had definitely passed away. This imperial stage in the evolution of history was recognised by the Jew, imbued as he was with the belief in a coming Messianic prince, as only a step in the preparation for the setting up of God's everlasting kingdom. Further, the deeper the degradation into wh. as a nation they sank, the more were they inclined in thought to indemnify themselves by glorifying the coming kingdom of Messiah the Prince, when the Jews shd. have all nations as their servants. With the advent of the Greek empire, and still more with the advent of that of the Romans, the world became vastly larger to the Jew than it had been before. Fm. a world that so far as effective knowledge was concerned was bounded on the south by the first cataract of the Nile, on the north by Mount Ararat, on the east by the Euphrates, and on the west by the Great Sea and the Grecian Archipelago, "the islands of the sea," they arrived at one wh. extended southward to Meroe, northward to the Elbe and the Tauric Chersonese, and fm. Spain and Britain on the west to the banks of the Ganges on the east. This burden of knowledge killed the poetic in them; fm. the lyric ecstasy of the prophet those who saw visions sank to the prose, sometimes prosy, narrative of the Apocalyptist. Connected with this is the further characteristic; the Apocalyptist is less intensely moral than the prophet; the former appealed to the intellect but the latter to the conscience.

(3) The Authors of these Apocalypses.—In studying these books no one can fail to be struck with the sameness of ruling ideas wh. characterises them. They are clearly the product of one school, and that a school of dreamers. None of these books bear evidence of being the productions of men whose feelings have been stirred and strained by conflict in the struggle of life. They seem rather to be spectators of life than actors in it. One class of men is known to have flourished at the time when, fm. other reasons, we are to conclude that these writings originated—the Essenes—who suit this description. They were not, like the Sadducees, taken up with politics and using religion as a cloak of covetousness; nor, like the Pharisees, fanatics for the mere letter of the law; they sought the life of contemplation, away fm. all political conflicts or legal quibbling. Of them Josephus tells us that they had sacred books of their own. He tells us also that they were celebrated as interpreters of dreams, a statement wh. implies that they recognised in dreams a special means of conveying to men a knowledge of the future. Of the many sub-sections into wh. the Essenes were divided, that wh. most represented their special characteristics, and was the best known, was cœnobitic—living in a community of celibates much as did the mediæval monks. This secluded life tends to promote visions and visionaries. The place where they dwelt, the valley of En-gedi, the fertile glen that runs down fm. the wilderness of Judæa, which was occupied sparsely rather than peopled by shepherds who pastured their flocks, and the Dead Sea, the sea of salt, that spread death around its shores, tended yet more to make men see visions and dream dreams. When they wrote down these visions they did not assume the credit of these to themselves — they affixed the name of some ancient worthy, prophet or seer. When they did so we are not to regard them as vulgar forgers, like those of the second and third Christian centuries, who wished the views they favoured to get a credit fm. the name they affixed to their writings wh. they wd. not receive on their own merits. In their dreams the Essenes imagined themselves laid hold of by the spirits of these just men made perfect, and they wrote as they fancied themselves moved. They did not as a rule occupy themselves with the sins of a society of wh. they saw nothing, not even with the covetousness of the rich and the oppression of the poor, nor with the hideous immoralities in wh. the nobles indulged; they had been swept up by the Spirit into a loftier sphere, all petty moralities fell away fm. their sight, the kingdoms of this world appeared only to disappear in the great kingdom of God. To them the Last Judgment was always near, in wh. all wrongs wd. be righted. Fm. this community came not only many of the Apocalyptic writings, but further, the impetus to the writing of the rest. The members of the community at En-gedi were not the only Essenes; there were those who dwelt in the numerous cities and villages that were scattered over Palestine; indeed if Bishop Lightfoot is right they extended their influence and spread their doctrines even in Asia Minor. Of the books contained in the class we are considering, some are more visionary and some less so. We may presume that the less visionary proceeded fm. those Essenes who lived a less restricted life, mingled with their fellows, and did not eschew family life.

(4) The Books wh. make up Apocalyptic.—Here, as we have already said, we shall restrict our consideration mainly to those which were published before our Lord's earthly ministry began; of post-Christian Apocalypses we wd. consider only those that were published not later than the second decade of the second century. (For the two Canonical Apocalypses already treated in the Canonical Section, see Daniel, Revelation.)

(a) The most prominent and important of the Apocalypses that fall within the limits thus laid down is the book, or rather the collection of books, of Enoch. To some extent the book (or books) of Enoch has been considered under the heading Enoch in the Canonical portion of this Dictionary, as Jude has quoted fm. it by name. The impress left by Enoch on the Jewish mind was a strong one. The mystery that surrounded him was fitted to deepen this; like Elijah, and before him, he had been removed into God's presence without tasting of death; even while on earth he had walked with God, enjoying familiar intercourse with Him. By Talmudic Judaism he was identified with the great angel who was all but God and was named Metatron (meta thronou, "beside the throne")—the Judaic escape fm. acknowledging a second person in Godhead and admitting that Jesus was that Person. The lofty ideas the Jews afterwards associated with Enoch must have been present, though in a less developed form, much earlier. We can imagine how the thought of what such a one as this must have seen in his communings with God wd. fill the imaginations of those visionaries by the Dead Sea. Some one, his thoughts going back to Enoch and forward to the Messiah, his visions carrying him now down to the depths of Gehenna, now up to the very presence of God, was moved to write. He felt that though his hand held the pen it was the antediluvian saint, who had never died, that really supplied the thoughts. He was carried up into heaven and saw the ten thousands of the saints and heard the voices of the archangels praising God. He sees, standing in the presence of God, the Son of Man, who is to be the Messiah in God's time. Unveiled before him stand the mysteries of the Last Judgment, and he sees the wicked carried away to punishment; he sees also the final victory of the saints. The course of the heavens occupies a portion of one vision. A subject wh. possessed great interest for the Apocalyptists, the angels that kept not their first estate, these occupied his visions also. Later, another of the brotherhood, remembering that of Enoch's great-grandson it was said, as of himself, that "he walked with God," had his mind filled with similar subjects, but regarded Noah as his guide: he too takes up astronomical speculations. Whether he wrote only the fragments wh. are preserved in "Enoch," or compiled a book fm. wh. a copyist made the extracts wh. appear, none can tell. A later brother still felt himself impelled to write, but he, like the first writer, claimed to be the spokesman of Enoch. He wrote, and his writings were placed before and after those previously published in the name of Enoch. He devotes a great deal of time to the condition of the angels who had sinned; he visits them in their captivity and catalogues their names; he also gives an account of the people of God fm. the beginning to the time of the Maccabæan struggle. He too is occupied with astronomy, and tells the tale of the heavenly bodies in a way yet more elaborate than those wh. preceded. There are still later additions. Although in this we are compelled to maintain our opinion in the face of the formidable authority of Dr. Charles, we regard the centre portion of the book of Enoch as the oldest, and wd. date it before the Maccabæan time. The first and third portions we wd. date about the time when the Maccabæan struggle was nearing its first triumphant period, before the Assidæans were offended and deserted Judas. Between these we wd. place the Noachian portions. Of the later additions some appear to have originated as late as the times of Herod the Great. We ought to observe that Dr. Charles has decided that the writer was a Pharisee: we are not aware of the grounds of this decision. To our view a comparison of the Mishna, a production of the Pharisaic school, with Enoch wd. be sufficient to disprove this identification. Moreover, there is no word in Josephus or elsewhere of the Pharisees being in secret possession of sacred books, as we know the Essenes were. Further, the practical absorption of the whole Essene sect in Christianity explains the vastly greater influence this book exercised in the Church than over Judaism if the author were, as we regard him, an Essene. As is well known, the book of Enoch had totally disappeared fm. the knowledge of European Christendom for nearly a millennium until some copies of an Ethiopic translation were found by Bruce the traveller, in Abyssinia. Later, portions of the Greek fm. wh. the Ethiopic had been translated have been found; it too was a translation fm. a Heb. original, but no portion of this has been recovered.

(b) Daniel was assumed as prompter by a later visionary, and his vision has had a greater success than those either of his predecessors or successors; it was received into the Canon of Scripture as part of the book of Daniel. Our view is that the eleventh chapter of Daniel is of much later origin than the rest of the book. Any one who reads the prophecy of Daniel in the original must observe, when he commences the eleventh chapter, a total change of atmosphere. The style of the Hebrew is different; the animal and angelic symbolism wh. characterises the rest of Daniel has disappeared; instead we are introduced to actual kings of the south and the north. This visionary, who had assumed the name of Daniel, must have foreseen all this warlike turmoil; the marching and countermarching of the armies that fought for the possession of Palestine and Cœle-Syria, coming now fm. the north, fm. Antioch, and now fm. Egypt in the south; and so dreaming, he wrote. It may be, as some have thought, that a vision of Daniel has been lost, and that what we have in the eleventh chapter is a visionary's interpretation of the lost vision wh. it has replaced. It may be noted that, unlike other Apocalypses, it does not end in the Last Judgment, but adopts the first verse of Dn. 12. as its conclusion. Probably this chap. never existed apart.

(c) Later is the Apocalypse of Baruch, which, like so many of this class of writings, had disappeared, but was found in a Syriac version of a Greek translation of a Hebrew original. The conflict with Syria had ended in the independence of Judæa under John Hyrcanus; peace settled down on the community at En-gedi. But when the conflicts with heathenism without ceased, strife began within. A gross insult offered by a Pharisee to the memory of his mother threw John Hyrcanus into antagonism to the whole party. This antagonism was embittered under Alexander Jannæus, leading up to a bloody persecution of the Pharisees. Alexandra, his widow and successor, took the Pharisees into favour. At her death began the terrible fratricidal struggle between her two sons, and the yet more ominous intervention of the Romans under Pompey. This roused the feelings of the recluses of En-gedi. The desecration of the Temple by Pompey led their thoughts to the time when Nebuchadnezzar overthrew the Jewish State and burned the Temple. One of the visionaries feels the spirit of Baruch, the amanuensis of Jeremiah, laying hold of him; he sees Jerusalem falling before the assault of the Babylonian army, and all the woe and horror of the sack. But behind the Chaldæan soldiery he sees four angels of God with torches in their hands; when they have caused the earth to swallow up the Holy Place and its furniture they open a way for the Chaldæans to enter the Holy City. Baruch fasts, and another vision is given him; he is told to exhort Jeremiah to go to Babylon with the captives to strengthen them. This is in singular contradiction to Scripture, wh. relates that Jeremiah elected to remain in Judæa, and that then, after the murder of Gedaliah, he was carried down into Egypt. In answer to a prolonged prayer of Baruch God Himself appears to the saint to comfort him, and tells him of the times to come. There are twelve successive times, symbolised as floods of water alternately dark and bright; these, however, take the Apocalyptist merely to the time of Cyrus. Later are other black waters, the times of persecution under Epiphanes; then another flood of waters, wh. are partly dark and partly bright. This represents the times of the later Maccabees, when brother strove with brother, when hired assassins carried out the behests of envy, and when "blood touched blood." The bright waters may be presumed to be the conquests of Alexander Jannæus and the prosperous rule of Alexandra. The darker flood of Roman interference comes on, but behind it is seen the glorious light of the Messianic kingdom and its splendour. After this Baruch writes an epistle to the nine tribes and a half dwelling in Babylon, and binds it on the neck of an eagle to convey to them. This epistle does not seem to be by the same hand as the earlier portion of the work. As to the date of this Apocalypse, we venture to differ fm. Dr. Charles, and retain the opinion we have elsewhere expressed. Dr. Charles says it was "written in the latter half of the first century of the Christian era." The description of the Roman power, that had overthrown the kingdom of Israel, as a "forest" with a multitude of trees, while it suits Republican Rome does not suit the time when all the powers of the Roman State, no longer distributed among consuls, prætors, tribunes, and senators, was absorbed by the emperor. Then the description of the leader, who was to be the last to survive among the trees when the destroying flood carried them away, suits Pompey much more than any of the emperors; he is a great tree, but only a tree like the rest, not raised, as was the emperor, above all comparison. The name given to him suits this also; he is "leader," madboro. After Tiberius the emperor, alike in Greek and Aramaic, was designated "king." There have been several hands at work on this Apocalypse, as Dr. Charles has pointed out, and consequently the features do not always harmonise, but the results he reaches seem difficult to reconcile with any interpretation of its genesis. The late date he assigns to it fails to explain a feature in the literary history of this book wh. Dr. Charles recognises as singular. Written, as he regards it, by a Pharisee in defence of Judaism, it is accepted by the Christians, but is not acknowledged by the Jews. Dr. Charles seems to us to have failed to recognise the historic conditions of the problem. By the time he thinks Baruch was written Jews and Christians were in antagonism to each other; a Jewish book wd. not have been received fm. the hands of the Pharisees unless it had a considerable known antiquity. Again, though Judaism became wholly Pharisaic, yet this Apocalypse was not acknowledged by the Jews. It must also be observed that there is no indication of the presence in the Jewish community of any sect that, like the Christians, separated themselves fm. their countrymen to associate with the Gentiles. If this was, as we think it, the product of the Essene school, wh. merged so soon in Christianity; if, further, it originated in the century preceding the birth of Christ; all these difficulties find an easy explanation. It is to be noted that Papias attributes to our Lord a description of the millennial plenty wh. is found in Baruch 29. Dr. Charles thinks it was an old traditional imagination, and therefore not at all impossible for our Lord to have used the words in question. However, they suit the place in wh. they occur in Baruch so well that they seem to be original. If so, we must date this Apocalypse in pre-Christian times. We thus see no reason to change our view, that the nucleus, at any rate, of this book was written at the time of the overthrow of Crassus by the Parthians; when the Roman empire was divided against itself.

(d) The next writer took for his model not the visions of Daniel but the book of Psalms. Tho' the collection of Psalms to wh. we refer is called the Psalter of Solomon, there is no evidence that the writer made any claim to being the instrument of the spirit of Solomon. A plea has been advanced with great confidence (by Drs. Ryle and James) that these Psalms are the work of a Pharisee. There is certainly much to make this view plausible, but the fact that these Psalms have been so much more influential among the Christians than among the Jews decidedly militates against it. The writer may have been brought up a Pharisee and later joined himself to one of the freer sub-sections of the Essenes. The author of the Psalter, like the writer of Baruch, was deeply impressed with the disaster that befell Judaism when Pompey seized Jerusalem and took the Temple. He, however, lived to see the body of the proud conqueror cast away on the shore of Egypt, slain by the Egyptian monarch whom formerly he had befriended. Unlike so many of his friends, the writer of the Psalter of Solomon appears at one time of his life to have taken an active share in public business, and scathingly assails certain members of the Sanhedrin whose moral conduct deserved reprobation. The present Psalter of Solomon contains eighteen Psalms; but as there are quotations fm. this work in the Pistis Sophia, none of wh. is to be found in the Psalms we have, and as when the reference is given with the quotation to a special Psalm the number is higher, probably the original Psalter was twice as large as that we have. Of the present Psalms the 18th is the longest and most interesting. It is a long description of the Messianic king and His times. There are several phrases in it, wh. find echoes in the New Testament; thus it is said of the Messiah (v. 42), "On account of His God He shall not be weak, because God shall make Him mighty in His Holy Spirit"; this has an echo in Jn. 3.34, "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him." A further resemblance may be seen in v. 45, "He shall feed the flock of the Lord," wh. is echoed in

Jn. 10.[11], "I am the Good Shepherd." Another striking passage is to be noted, where the resemblance is not so much of words as of spirit (v. 36): "There shall be no injustice in those days of His, because they shall be all holy, and their King is Christ the Lord." There is a dubiety about the reading of the last clause, not, however, because of any difference in MS. authority, but fm. its apparently Christian character, especially as κύριος was the received rendering of the sacred name YHWH. The elevated rank attributed to the "Son of Man" in the book of Enoch makes this calling the Messiah "Lord" not so extraordinary if the writer was an Essene. A manuscript professing to contain portions of some of the missing Psalms has recently been found, but the question of its authenticity may be regarded as yet sub judice.

(e) The book of Jubilees has characteristics wholly different fm. any of the writings hitherto considered. While the writer of Enoch was saturated with the thoughts and symbolism of Daniel, the writer of Baruch had before his mind the prophecies of Jeremiah, and the writer whose works we have just been considering had been a close student of the Psalms of David, the author of the book of Jubilees had devoted most of his attention to the historical books. There is throughout an apologetic colour given to the narrative, as if the writer were always considering how the Greeks or rationalistic Hellenised Jews wd. regard the transactions related. He finds the framework of his scheme of history in the Jubilee, the week of weeks + one, i.e. half a century. The source of this history is the "tablets of the heavens," or as they are called in Daniel, "the Scripture of truth." Moses in the first year of the Exodus, the third month and the 16th day of the month, went up into Mount Sinai, and there had the "tablets of the heavens" opened to him, and in them he was able to read all the past history of the world up to his own time. Every event is set down in its own Jubilee and week of years in that Jubilee, and special year of that week. While in the Biblical account the only women named as living before the flood are Eve, the wives of Lamech, and his daughter Naamah, the writer has no difficulty in assigning wives to all the antediluvian patriarchs. When the morality of an incident seems doubtful in the light of more advanced ideas, the difficulty is got over by judicious omissions or suggested additions. Thus, in the story of the slaughter of the Shechemites by Levi and Simeon, while it is said that they beguiled them, the nature of the snare is omitted; and there is added a "statute in Israel" forbidding the Israelites to give their daughters to a Gentile; yet further, the age of Dinah was declared to be only "twelve years." In ch. 37. we have an account of a conflict between Jacob and his sons against Esau and his sons' mercenaries in the most approved style of the Hebrew Hagada. The writer is so enamoured of the "week" that he maintains that the year has only 364 days, that is exactly 52 weeks, and denounces those who wd. make the year a purely lunar one of 354 days. Dr. Charles, whose opinions always merit the highest consideration, wd. date this book somewhere between B.C. 250 and 100, with the added note that it was nearer the former date than the latter. Personally we think the composition of this book coincided with the beginning of the Herodian rule: the special animus against Edom seems to point to this. We agree with Dr. Charles in regarding the writer as a priest: the importance he gives to ritual, and the prominent place he assigns to Levi, all point to this. Dr. Charles thinks the original language of Jubilees to have been Hebrew; the use of Mastema for "Satan" seems to us to point to Aramaic being the language, a possibility wh. Dr. Charles does not even consider.

(f) Also connected with the great lawgiver is the Assumption of Moses, a book referred to in the Epistle of Jude. The condition in wh. we have this book is somewhat peculiar. It has come down to us only in a fragment of a Latin translation made fm. a Greek version of a Hebrew original. The translator seems to have had but a slight acquaintance with Greek, and no great mastery of Latin. Although it is only a fragment, there is much in it of the highest interest. The picture of Moses ascending Mount Nebo accompanied by his faithful servant Joshua points out its place of origin. Across the Dead Sea fm. the settlement at En-gedi rise the mountains of Moab, and one of them is Nebo, the mount on wh. Moses had died and been buried. The cœnobites wd. naturally be led to think of him as morning by morning they saw the sun rise in splendour fm. behind those peaks. As the writer of the book of Jubilees wrote of Moses, and read of the events of the past in the "tablets of the heavens," so here we find him revealing the future. The difficulties wh. attend the interpretation of this book are great from the number of lacunæ in the sole MS. in wh. it is preserved, fm. the presence of blunders in translation that can be recognised, and the probability of there being yet more wh. we cannot fix, and fm. the possibility that there may have been blunders in the Greek as a version fm. the Hebrew; added to these are the possible mistakes of copyists in all three languages, and one can recognise how far the modern reader is fm. being on certain ground. It seems, however, fairly certain that some date about A.D. 6 is the time of composition. Archelaus has been deposed, and it is thought certain that ere long Philip and Antipas will be deposed also, a hope that events did not fulfil. There is something to be said for Dr. Charles' view of the composite character of this work, but the fragmentary state of the remains forbids dogmatism. The great crux of the book is the person referred to as "Taxo," a Levite who, overwhelmed with the state of Judah, retires with his seven sons into a cave. The probability is that, had we the Hebrew, we might by one or two methods of Gematria make at least a plausible guess as to the person intended. We cannot say that any of the numerous solutions proffered can even be said to be plausible.

We shall only glance at one or two Apocalypses that seem to be post-Christian. Of Jewish origin, they yet appear to have been written by Christians after the promulgation of Christianity.

(a) The first of these is "Fourth" Esdras, wh. we have already mentioned as hanging on the fringe of semi-canonicity. Although by liberal excisions, on plea of removing interpolations, a nucleus wd. be left wh. mt. be maintained to be pre-Christian without it being possible to prove the contrary; yet this remainder wd. be so colourless that it wd. be difficult to explain its existence and preservation. We are therefore inclined to regard it as post-Christian. Certainly the vision of the eagle with its twelve wings and three heads points at the earliest to the reign of the Flavian emperors. It is the work of a Jewish Christian working in a circle of predominantly Jewish ideas. Its Essenian origin is betrayed by the explanation suggested of the number of pseudepigraphic books used by the Essenes, in the tale of Esdras writing with the help of five associates the sacred books, ninety-four in number, twenty-four to be published but seventy to be retained. Besides the Latin version fm. wh. our Authorised is trd. there are Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Armenian versions wh. have been used in the preparation of the RV.

(b) The Ascension of Isaiah. This as we have it is a composite work made up of three elements: the Testament of Hezekiah, the Martyrdom of Isaiah, and the Vision of Isaiah. The Martyrdom and the Testament of Hezekiah seem to have been in the hands of the writer of the Hebrews (Hb. 11.[37]; cp. Asc. Is. 2.[16], 5.[11]). The most interesting is the Vision, wh. gives a semi-docetic account of the birth of our Lord. The date of the first two portions must be fixed to the period of the death of Nero; both portions were in the possession of the writer of the Hebrews; while Nero the matricide king has died, the fact is fresh in the mind, and the Last Judgment is expected immediately. There is more difficulty as to the date of the Vision, but from the fact that it was not only known to Ignatius but assumed by him to be known to those to whom he was writing, it cannot be assigned to a later date than the last decade of the first cent.; it may be earlier by another decade. Probably the combination of these into our present book was the work of a Jewish Christian of the first decade of the second cent.

(c) The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs has hitherto generally been reckoned among the latest of the pseudepigrapha, but the weighty authority of Dr. Charles has been thrown into the scale against this view; he declares for a very early date. He regards this book as written during the reign of John Hyrcanus by "a Pharisee who combined loyalty to the best traditions of his party with the most unbounded admiration of Hyrcanus." Whereas formerly it was held that these Testaments had been written in Jewish Greek, he maintains, and seems to us nearly to prove, that Hebrew was its original tongue. We do not know how he gets over Levi 6.[1], "I found a brazen shield, wherefore the name of the mountain is called Aspis" (Gr. "a shield"). It may be a play on Shirion, a name of Hermon, wh. also means a "coat of mail," only the locality assigned to Aspis does not suit Hermon. At the same time, we do not feel equally impressed with the evidences he adduces for the early date. The insult offered to the memory of the mother of Hyrcanus by Eleazar cd. not be an isolated phenomenon; it was but the culmination of a long process of alienation fm. the Hasmonæans on the part of the Ḥasidim. They had deserted Judas Maccabæus at the battle of Eleasa when Judas began to seek foreign alliances; no Pharisee cd. be loyal to his sect and have an unbounded admiration for John Hyrcanus. Still less cd. an Essene have had such an admiration for him. The description of the High Priest (Levi 18.[2-14]), wh. Dr. Charles assigns to John Hyrcanus, is to us an echo of the Ep. to the Hebrews. It is to be observed that Levi distinctly states that "the priesthood shall fail," and adds, "Then shall the Lord raise up a new priest." The passages in wh. Dr. Charles sees a dependence of our Lord and the apostles on the Testaments of the Twelve show truly a dependence but in the other direction. In one of the cases our Lord distinctly claims originality: "Ye have heard that it has been said by them of old time, 'Thou shalt not commit adultery': but I say unto you, 'That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart'" (Mw. 5.[27, 28]); cp. Benjamin 8.[2], "He that hath a pure mind in love looketh not on a woman to fornication." Yet closer is the resemblance between Mw. 18.[15], "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother"; and Gad 6.[3], "If one sin against thee, speak to him peaceably; and if he repent, forgive him": even greater is the likeness to Lk. 17.[3]. For our part the dependence is clearly of the Testaments of the Twelve on the New Testament, not the reverse. We do not refer to what Dr. Charles regards as Christian interpolations; he does not show what are his criteria for interpolations. We feel ourselves still necessitated to maintain the post-Christian origin of these writings.

The Sibylline Oracles.—Closely connected with the Jewish Apocalyptic writings are the so-called Sibylline Oracles; although at the same time they differ in many points fm. them. They originated, not in Palestine as did the Apocalypses, but in Egypt. Greek, not Hebrew, was the language in wh. they were written, and their models of composition were found not in Daniel and the Hebrew prophets, but in the Delphic and other oracles of Hellenism and their responses; hence they were written in the epic dialect and in hexameter verse. These Oracles did not assume the names of saints of ancient Israel, but professed to be spoken by the Sibyls. Those ancient prophetesses, residing in different countries and believed to have lived at different ages, were supposed to have seen into the future, and in symbolic language to have foretold what was coming on the earth. The story is well known of the Sibyl who came to Tarquin and offered him nine volumes of sacred oracles; on his demurring at the price she burned three of them, demanding the same sum for the diminished number as she had asked for the whole; when he again hesitated she burned another three and once more presented herself, still demanding the same sum of money; now the king bought the books, and they were placed in the Capitol: all this, we say, is well known. In Livy there are frequent references to these books being consulted; whatever their origin, it is beyond doubt that there were sacred documents kept carefully in the Capitol, to be read in times of disquieting omens. If we may judge fm. the occasions on wh. the Senate ordered that these books be consulted, it wd. seem that they resembled in contents those magical treatises found in Nineveh and Babylon, arranged, like them, under possible events, under each of wh. was told what was portended by it, and what sacrifices and ceremonies were due in consequence. When the Capitol was burned during the Civil War between Marius and Sulla in the year B.C. 83 these precious volumes were consumed, and on his securing the supreme power Sulla endeavoured to replace what had thus been lost by means of oracles drawn fm. every quarter; this new collection was placed under guardians like the former, to be used, like it, for consultation in emergencies. This search for oracles stimulated production, as was natural; and the Alexandrian Jews, who had previously invented not a few "oracles" and Delphic verses, were specially active in this industry. Students of Herodotus will remember the number of floating prophecies of wh. he chronicles the fulfilment. These couplets (for generally they are little more) afforded a model for the inventors; hence the dialect and the verse adopted. The object of the Jews was to glorify their national faith in the eyes of the supercilious Greeks. Possibly the earliest attempt at a collection was made in the first Christian century, when not only were previous Jewish forgeries included but also some versicles that had already adorned the pages of Herodotus. New editors took the collection in hand, to the increase of its size. The final redaction may have been as late as the reign of Justinian. It sometimes seems to the reader as if the framework of our extant Oracula Sibyllina had been a poem of Judæo-Christian origin, wh. narrated the history of the world fm. the beginning to the end of time, in wh. elements drawn fm. Greek mythology were introduced into the Bible story, the leaves of wh. had got scattered and mingled with leaves fm. other sources, and were roughly collected into books at a later time. The first book, wh. relates the history of the world fm. the Creation to the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, is fairly consecutive. The story of the Flood and the account of the death of our Lord are given in it at a length out of proportion to the space. The second book appears to be an amplification of the Apocalyptic portion of our Lord's discourses (Mw. 24.), in terms that suggest that the period of disorder wh. began with the death of Caracalla gave vividness to the picture. After that confusion supervenes. In the third book there are passages wh. suggest that they are leaves missing fm. the first, as the account of the building of the Tower of Babel, wh. is associated with the War of the Titans; and the call of Abraham. Mingled with this are accounts of the Ptolemies, the War of Troy, and the Persian invasion of Greece. Not infrequently a book begins in a way that presupposes a plan already formed; thus the fifth begins with an account of each successive Roman emperor fm. Julius down to Hadrian, designating each obliquely, mostly by the numerical value of their initial in the Greek alphabet. Having reached Hadrian, a dive is taken into the indefinite. The eighth book has an acrostic of the name Christ, and the third has a distinct reference to Dn. 11. There are a great number of references to the Gospel history and to the life and death of our Lord, so that it is evident that the Oracula Sibyllina were finally edited by a Christian. In all there are nominally fourteen books of varying lengths, made up of fragments of widely differing dates. Doubtless some of the fragments wd. throw light on the beliefs and expectations of the Jews in Egypt during the century wh. immediately preceded our Lord's Advent and that wh. succeeded, but it is impossible to date them with any certainty.

(5) The Doctrinal Significance of Apocalyptic.—While one wd. not claim for the Apocalyptists inspiration, yet Providence, wh. was passing the nation through a number of educative experiences to prepare them for receiving Christianity, had fitted these men specially to give voice to the thoughts and feelings of their fellows. Therefore we may learn fm. them the extent to wh. the process of preparation had gone. We cannot, in the short space open to us, do more than indicate the lines of advance. In theology proper, the doctrine concerning God, there is advance towards a more worthy idea. Though the prophets had proclaimed the universality of God's rule, yet at times there are phrases used that render it a matter of doubt how far they apprehended the meaning of their own words. Thus in Isaiah (63.[19]) we have the prophet's expostulation: "We are become as they over whom Thou never barest rule" (RV.), i.e. "the Gentiles." To the Apocalyptist all the world was under the government of YHWH. To the prophets Providence was a narrow affair, embracing only the races—the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Assyrians, the Babylonians—that came into immediate contact with Israel. Their intrusion into the affairs of Israel is regarded as due to the moral condition of the chosen people: the accident, so to speak, of their declining fm. the worship of God is the cause of the Assyrian or Egyptian invasion. To the Apocalyptist these empires, as they successively rise and fall, are part of a Divine plan wh. wd. be complete in the coming of the Messiah. The whole world was involved in this Messianic kingdom, not merely Israel, though the special dignity of the chosen people is recognised. This leads us to one of the most important sides of Apocalyptic doctrine: their doctrine of the Messiah, their Christology. This is brought into close relationship to the Logos doctrine. In Enoch we see a being super-angelic, all but Divine, who is called "Son of Man," and who is to be the Messiah; the assertion of His absolute Divinity seems trembling on the lips of the writer. It seems impossible to deny that our Lord's use of this title "Son of Man" was derived fm. the book of Enoch, and with the term the thought of His being the representative and go'ēl of humanity are connected. With this is involved the Trinity: though only faintly perceived, there is what seems to be an idea of a spiritual influence proceeding fm. God yet not God, as in the passage already quoted fm. Ps. Sol. 17.[42]. Although the anthropological side of theology is less to be noted in these writings, yet on the border-line between this and theology proper, the relation between God and man, the writers are sure of the most absolute fore-ordination—that everything is written in the "tablets of the heavens." The doctrine of sin is not prominent; in fact, one of the characteristic differences between prophecy and Apocalyptic is the want in the latter of the denunciation of wrong so frequent in the former. On two subjects the Apocalyptist directed special attention: angelology with its correlate demonology, and eschatology. We know that according to Jewish tradition the men of the Captivity brought the names of the angels back with them fm. Babylon; and rather more than a quarter of a century ago Dr. Kohut endeavoured, tho' with less success than his learning deserved, to identify the archangels with the Zoroastrian Amhaspands. Whatever the source, the angelic hierarchy in Enoch is great and complex. According to this book there were archangels, generally numbered as four, though sometimes the number is larger; there are many classes and divisions, wh. wd. occupy more space than we have at disposal to discuss. The angelology of St. Paul seems to embrace a hierarchy equally complex, and classes equally numerous, but the nomenclature is different. Over against the angels are an equally numerous hierarchy of demons, the angels that kept not their first estate. The name assigned to the leader of these fallen spirits differs in different Apocalypses. Closely connected with this is eschatology; the punishment of the fallen angels occupying a great deal of attention in the opening chapters of Enoch. The establishment of the Messianic kdm. is followed at no long interval by the Last Judgment, and the punishment of the wicked. Alike in Enoch and in 4th Esdras elaborate descriptions are to be found of the place of punishment. To a large extent, though somewhat modified, the views thus expressed have found their way into the eschatology of the Church. Thus in many different lines these Apocalyptists prepared for the reception of Christian doctrine.

THE TARGUMS

During the period of the Exile the land previously occupied by the Jews had largely been taken possession of by inhabitants of other parts of the Babylonian empire to whom Hebrew was unknown, or at all events little known. Aramaic had become the lingua franca of all South-western Asia, so whencesoever the peoples came, and whatsoever their native language, they spoke Aramaic: in it political and commercial business was transacted. Further, the Jews who had been left in the land, few and poor, wd. necessarily learn the language of the immigrants, with whom they wd. come perpetually into business relations, if only in matters of buying and selling. At the same time, since on the banks of the Euphrates and the Tigris the ancient tongue of Babylon embalmed in the cuneiform had been replaced in ordinary matters by Aramaic, the exiles were compelled to use it in their intercourse with their neighbours in Babylonia. The returning exiles, therefore, if they had any knowledge of Hebrew, knew Aramaic more thoroughly. Hebrew in consequence dropped out of use when the returned exiles who remembered their childhood passed away. Although Heb. and Aramaic are cognate tongues, yet to the Jews in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah the law had to be interpreted before they cd. understand it. Dante has to be translated before a French audience can appreciate La Divina Commedia, yet French and Italian are cognate tongues. When the habit introduced by Ezra of having the law read regularly in the synagogue was established, a class of officials arose whose function it was to interpret in Aramaic what was read, as the law always was, in Hebrew. This was called a "Targum," fm. targem (Aram.), "to translate," a root which appears in "dragoman," connected with rĕgam, "to throw"; the sense was regarded as thrown fm. one language into another. For approximately six centuries the Meturgemānim or interpreters spoke their versions: when a verse of the law was read in Heb. the Meturgeman repeated the Targum or version; of the Prophets three verses were to be read, followed by the interpretation. The Meturgeman was under very specific rules. He was forbidden to read his version lest the hearers might imagine it was the original Scripture that they were hearing. The reader was required to keep his eyes close on the roll of the law lest the hearers shd. think he was merely giving the human interpretation of the Divine law. The regular reading of the law through, in the course of a year or set number of years, gave a fixity to the Targum of the Pentateuch long before writing came in to assist memory and to crystallise the traditional rendering.

The earliest committed to writing was the Targum of Onkelos, sometimes called the Targum Babli; its origin must have been in Palestine, but received by the Babylonian schools, and ratified by their imprimatur, it became the received or official "Targum" of the law. There is a difficulty as to who this Onkelos was, and a confusion between him and Aquila, the reviser of the LXX Greek version. Each is said to have made his version under the direction of Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Joshua; both, we are told, were proselytes—the names are the same, the n being inserted to make pronunciation easier. It has been suggested that, as Aquila's translation of the law into Greek was regarded as a model of accuracy, Onkelosi was an adjective fm. that name, and meant "with extreme accuracy." The history of both becomes what in any other than Talmudic literature wd. be too wildly improbable to be called legendary. Onkelos is declared to be a nephew of the emperor Titus; his father's name was Kalonikus (Callinicus). When he became a Jew the emperor sent a cohort to take him prisoner, but he repeated certain texts to them and converted them to Judaism, and this happened not once, but three times. He called his uncle fm. the grave to consult him as to the advisability of becoming a Jew, &c. The law was regarded as the most precious possession of Israel: the duty of correct interpretation was therefore the more incumbent on the interpreter. The version wd. be most carefully made, and when received as correct wd. be handed on with the most scrupulous accuracy from Meturgeman to Meturgeman. The rendering wd. thus get a certain fixity by tradition, if not also something of sanctity. By the middle of the second century, when the last hope of an independent Jewish State had been quenched in the blood of the followers of Bar-Cochba, Aramaic had nearly passed away. The knowledge of the Targum of the law was in as much danger of being forgotten as the vowels of its Hebrew, hence it had to be committed to writing. All the scrupulous fidelity of the traditional rendering of the Palestinian Meturge- mānin was preserved. Hence it deserved to be called Onkelosi, "Aquila like." Only in poetic passages as in the blessing of Jacob—especially in the parts regarding Judah and Joseph—or in the song and blessing of Moses, is expansive paraphrase resorted to.

We subjoin the blessing of Judah (Gn. 49.[8-12]) as a specimen of the poetic expansion sometimes found in Onkelos. We quote fm. Etheridge's translation. "Jehuda, thou art praise and not shame: thy brethren shall praise thee; thy hand shall prevail against thine adversaries, thine enemies shall be displeased; they will be turned backward before thee, and the sons of thy father will come before thee with salutations. The dominion shall be thine in the beginning, and in the end the kingdom shall be increased from the house of Jehuda, because from the judgment of death, my son, hast thou been withdrawn. He shall repose and abide in strength as a lion, and as a lioness there shall be no king that may cut him off. He who exerciseth dominion shall not pass away fm. the house of Jehuda nor the Saphea (the book of the law) from his children's children for ever until the Meshiha come, whose is the kingdom and unto whom shall be the obedience of the nations. Israel shall pass round about in his cities; the people shall build his temple, they will be righteous round about him, and be doers of the law through his doctrine (teaching). Of goodly purple will be his raiment and his vesture of crimson wool with colours. His mountains shall be red with his vineyards, and his hills be dropping with wine; his valleys shall be white with corn and with flocks of sheep."

At times, to avoid the appearance of anthropomorphism, a paraphrase is introduced. As an example of this we may take Gn. 11.[5] MT., "The Lord came down to see the city and the tower wh. the children of men builded" (EV.). Tg.O., "And the Lord was revealed to punish the work of the city and the tower wh. the sons of men had built" (Etheridge). In some cases, in the desire for extreme accuracy of rendering, violence is done to the genius of the Aramaic. In Hebrew אֵת, the sign of the accusative, frequently occurs, especially in the earlier books, and with as great frequency do we find יָת in the Targum—a form rare in ancient Aramaic and unused in more recent forms of the language, as in the Peshiṭtā of the New Testament. In Biblical Aramaic it appears once in Daniel to support the oblique case of a pronoun. In the Sinjirli inscription the cognate ות is used in the same way. The probable date of the Targum Onkelos is late in the second century.

The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel is a rendering of the "prophets" in the Jewish sense of the term into Aramaic. To the Jews, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings are the Nebiim rĕshōnim, "the former prophets." When the Jews were forbidden by Epiphanes to read the law in the synagogue, they began to read portions of the prophets. Like the law the prophets required an interpreter, and in due course the interpretation was committed to writing. This Targum is attributed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, who is said to have been a pupil of Hillel. It is said that when he began to write his Targum, Pal. was shaken by a voice from heaven wh. demanded: "Who is this that reveals My secrets to the sons of men?" This Targum is slightly less exact than that of Onkelos, slightly more given to paraphrase.

As a specimen of his style Jonah 1.[5] may be taken. The verse is rendered in AV.: "Then the mariners were afraid and cried every man to his god, and cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea to lighten it of them." In Jonathan it appears thus: "And the shipmen were afraid and prayed a man to (from) his fear (his god), and when they saw that there was n t in them help, they cast the wares that were in the ship into the sea to lighten it of them."

It appears to have been committed to writing shortly after that of Onkelos—a statement that implies that it is pseudonymous, wh. undoubtedly it is. Jonathan was said also to have translated Job, but that Targum was withdrawn; it is said, however, to have been republished, so that it is supposed to be his Targum of that book we have in the rabbinic Bibles now. The style, however, is not the same. He is said to have intended to write a Targum of all the Kethubim, but to have been forbidden fm. heaven. In the neighbourhood of Safed a cave in the limestone rock is shown as his tomb.

There is a very paraphrastic Targum of the Pentateuch called by his name, usually cited as the Targum of the Pseudo-Jonathan. Closely connected with this is the Targum Jerushalmi, wh. reads like a recension of that of Pseudo-Jonathan.

The extent to which the paraphrase is carried may be seen in Targum Pseudo-Jonathan and Targum Jerushalmi as compared with Onkelos.

Onkelos (Gn. 3.[18]): "Thorns also and thistles shall bring forth for thee, and thou shalt eat the grass of the field."

Pseudo-Jonathan: "'Thorns also and thistles shall grow and multiply for thy sake, and thou shalt eat the grass that is on the face of the field.' Adam answered and said, 'I pray Thee by the mercy that is before Thee, oh Yeya [YHWH], that we may not be deemed like unto the beasts, that we shd. eat grass that is on the face of the field. May we arise and toil with the toiling of our hands, and eat food from the food of the earth, and thus that there may be a distinction before Thee between the sons of men and the offspring of cattle."

Jerushalmi: "'And thorns and thistles shall it multiply for thee, and thou shalt eat the grass that is on the face of the earth.' Then began Adam and said, 'I pray, through the mercy that is before Thee, Yeya (YHWH), let us not be accounted before Thee as the beasts that eat of the grass of the field. May we be permitted to toil with the toil of our hands and eat food from the fruits of the earth, and thus may there be a difference before Thee between the sons of men and the offspring of cattle.'"

The Targum to the Hagiographa is very para-phrastic; sometimes several versions coalesce, and increase the appearance of paraphrase. It is ascribed to Joseph Cæcus—but this was merely a name. The various portions of the Hagiographa seem to have been Targumised at different dates and by authors with different ideas. Job, wh., as mentioned above, was wrongly ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, is very diffuse, and seems to contain elements of very different ages. There are in it frequent cases where different Targumic renderings have coalesced. Psalms is rather better. An example may be taken fm. Ps. 110.[3], "Thy people shall be willing in the day of Thy power," wh. is thus rendered, "Thy people of the house of Israel shall be obedient to the law in the day of battle." *

Proverbs is very close to the original. Its likeness to the Peshiṭtā version has been remarked. The five Megilloth are of varying merit, on the whole abounding in Midrash. There are two Targums of Esther wh. the reader may find in Cassel's Commentary. There probably was, in most of these cases, an earlier Targum wh. was used as the basis for an embroidery of Midrash. There is no official Targum of Daniel or Ezra, Nehemiah or Chronicles. There is a late Targum of Chronicles wh. was published separately; it shows signs in the beginning of the influence of the Jerushalmi. A Targum of Daniel has been found, but it is in Persian. The reason why there is no Targum of Daniel or of Ezra-Nehemiah is supposed to be that Aramaic portions occur in both.

The usefulness of the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan is very considerable. The Targum may at times reveal a text slightly differing fm. the Massoretic, but it always reveals the sense wh. the rabbins, Babylonian and Palestinian, put upon given texts at the actual date at which they were executed. A striking peculiarity is the frequent introduction of memra (word) de Yeya (JHWH) where the text has "God" or Jehovah: thus Gn. 3.[8], "They heard the voice of the 'word' of the Lord God walking in the garden"; Jg. 6.[12], "The 'word of the Lord' is thy help, thou mighty man." This usage suggests the Logos of Philo and of the fourth Gospel. Although neither "Onkelos" nor "ben Uzziel" had been committed to writing, both Philo and the writer of the fourth Gospel wd. have been accustomed to hear in the synagogue the phrase memra de Yeya occupying the place of YHWH; and logos, with its double meaning of "reason" and "speech," being the natural translation of the term with this connotation, would readily lead to the Philonian speculation and the Johannine statement of doctrine in the prologue of the fourth Gospel. We have mentioned only the official Targums, the others are full of Haggadic elements.

There is also a Targum on the Samaritan Pentateuch, wh. is valuable as preserving the dialect of Aramaic spoken in Samaria. In codices of the Sam. Pnt. in parallel columns with the text or on the page opposite to it, there is usually found a Targum or version of it either, as in more recent MSS., in Arabic, or in Samaritan Aramaic. This latter keeps very close to the original, even in poetic passages. As a specimen Jacob's blessing of Judah (Gn. 49.[8-12]) may be taken: "Judah (praised) art thou: thy brethren shall love thee; thy hands shall be on the neck of thine enemies. The whelp of a lion is Judah: fm. the slaughtered, my son, thou hast withdrawn thyself, treading down: when thou couchest as a lion, and as a lioness, who shall rouse thee? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler from among his ranks, until Shilo shall come: to Him shall the nations be subject." It is of use in fixing the text of the Sam. Pnt. See SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH.

* The example of the rendering of Ps. 110.[1] given in M'Lintock's Theological Dictionary is not that in the Warsaw edition of the rabbinic Bible. It is unfortunate that the writer of the article does not give the edition of the rabbinic Bible fm. wh. he made his translation.

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES

I. OLD TESTAMENT

I. Greek Versions.—Until the rise of Christianity the Jewish people were satisfied with the SEPTUAGINT as adequately presenting in Greek the meaning of their sacred law. They even invented miraculous adjuncts to the process of translation in a way that invested it with a quasi-inspired authority. When Christianity appeared, and soon became predominantly Greek, the Jews assumed another attitude towards the Alexandrian translation. Christian controversialists drew their arguments exclusively from the LXX. At times they used passages where the Greek disagreed with the Palestinian text, which was gradually consolidating into the Massoretic. The Jews sought an effective means of answering their assailants, and so desired a translation which would more exactly represent the Hebrew.

(1) The earliest Greek Version, and in many respects the most important after the LXX, is that of Aquila (Ἀκύλας). Epiphanius (Pond. et Mens.), the value of whose evidence on any subject is on a par with that of the Talmud, asserts that Aquila was the stepson (pentherideus) of Hadrian, and that he was sent by the emperor to superintend the building of the Temple at Jerusalem. While there, having been led to study the Scriptures, he became a Christian and was baptized. He was, however, addicted to astrology, and despite the exhortations of the Church authorities, he persisted in casting horoscopes. In consequence he was expelled from the Christian community which he had so recently joined. Thereupon he became a Jew; and in order to avenge himself upon those who had rejected him, he resolved to translate anew the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, in such a way as to deprive the Christians of many of their proof-texts. It seems certain that he was a proselyte from heathenism. The Talmud (see TARGUMS, Onkelos) agrees with Epiphanius in asserting this. The version of Aquila renders the Hebrew into Greek with such slavish literal fidelity that at times it is unintelligible, and frequently violates the laws of Greek grammar: e.g. bĕrēshith, "in the beginning," is derived from rōsh, and kephalē in Greek means "head": he therefore renders bĕrēshith, ἐν κεφαλαίῳ, which really means "in sum." In the same verse 'eth, the sign of the accusative, he translates "with" (sun), and in defiance of Greek grammar he joins it to the accusative instead of the dative case. Hebrew idoms he rendered by the mechanical process of word-for-word translation. Further, in choosing a Greek equivalent for a Hebrew word, he endeavoured to find one with a parallel etymology. If we had Aquila's version in its entirety we should be able with absolute certainty to reconstruct the Hebrew text from which it was made.

(2) Symmachus, who made a version somewhat later than Aquila, is said by Eusebius to have been an Ebionite, with what truth it is impossible to decide. Epiphanius declares that he was a Samaritan; but there is no evidence in the fragment of his version that is preserved that he followed the Samaritan recension in preference to the Massoretic. He had greater mastery of Greek than Aquila, and also aimed at greater elegance of style. He inclined to resort to paraphrase when it suited his dogmatic proclivities. He appears to have written early in the second century.

(3) Of the versions used by Origen in his Hexapla, the third named is that of Theodotion. Of this translator even less is known than of the former two. Irenæus quotes from his version, coupling it with that of Aquila as having neanis, "young man," in Is. 7.[14] instead of parthenos, "a virgin." He declares that both were Jewish proselytes; but that, while Aquila was from Pontus, Theodotion was an Ephesian. The whole of the book of Daniel, as it appears in the LXX, is in the version of Theodotion. We are therefore in a better position to form an opinion of this version. In the main Theodotion appears to have been an emendator of the LXX rather than an independent translator. In the case of Daniel, however, he seems to have translated for himself. Dr. Gwynn (Smith's Dict. of Christian Biog., s.v. "Theodotion") thinks that even in regard to Daniel he was merely a reviser. Evidence of this is sought in Justin Martyr's quotation of Dn. 7.[9-28]. While in general it agrees closely with the original LXX as seen in the Chisian, in a few cases it agrees with Theodotion against the Chisian. Dr. Gwynn thinks that the source of these divergences must be a pre-Theodotion LXX version of Daniel. The variations, however, are just such as might be made by copyists to whom the version of Theodotion was naturally familiar. They would be liable, perhaps unconsciously, to substitute what was customary for what was strange.

In the Hexapla Origen makes occasional use of other three versions; but the surviving fragments are not sufficient to enable us to form any definite judgment as to their respective general characteristics.

II. Syriac Versions.—(1) Of the Syriac versions the most important is the Peshiṭtā ("simple"). Ephrem Syrus regarded it as already ancient in his day (A.D. 308–373), and repeatedly found in it words the meaning of which had been lost. That being so, we can hardly date it later than the first half of the second century of our era. One Syrian tradition claimed for it a far greater antiquity, declaring that the Law was translated by the direction of Solomon. Another, slightly more moderate, attributes it to the priest sent by the king of Assyria to teach the colonists of the Northern Kingdom "the manner of the God of the land."

Laying aside the products of Eastern imagination, the probability is that the Peshiṭtā is the work of a Judæo-Christian. Only a Jew was likely to be so thoroughly acquainted with Hebrew; and only a Christian would desire in this way to make public the contents of the Law and the Prophets. More than one may have been engaged in the task; but the similarity in style throughout is much greater than is found in the various books of the LXX. While as a translation it follows very closely, in some cases it diverges from the Massoretic text: e.g. in Gn. 2.[2], instead of "seventh day" it reads "sixth day" with LXX and Sam. In 4.[8] it inserts "Let us go into the field," also agreeing with LXX and Sam. In Gn. 6.[3] Psh. makes Adam 130 years old at the birth of Seth, agreeing with MT. and Sam., while LXX makes him 230. With MT. it makes Methuselah 187 years old at the birth of Laméch: LXX makes him 167, and the Sam. 67. Note also the remarkable rendering in Gn. 4.[1]. According to MT. Eve says, "I have gotten a man, the Lord (ĕth-JHWH)": so Luther. The Targum renders "from (min) the Lord," and is followed by AV. LXX translates, "I have gotten a man through (dia) the Lord": hence RV., "with the help of the Lord." The Psh. translates, "I have gotten a man for (lĕ) the Lord."

Unlike most translations, the Psh. tries to get rid of redundancies: e.g. in Ru. 1.[1] MT., LXX, and EV. all read, "in the days when the judges judged," but the Psh. has "in the days of the judges." In Jh. 1.[5] MT. reads, "Jonah had gone down to the sides of the ship, and he lay and was asleep": LXX, more graphic, says, "he slept and snored": Psh. says simply, "went down to the sides of the ship and slept." The relation of the Peshiṭtā to the MT. shows that, while the Massoretic text was in process of formation, it had not yet become fixed. The Psalter is evidently by a hand different from that which wrote the rest of the version. In the method of formation the titles of the various Psalms differ from those in MT. and LXX. It is not as close to the Massoretic text as the rest of the version is.

(2) As Greek became predominantly the language of Christianity, the Church depended more and more upon the LXX for its knowledge of the Old Testament. The Syrian Christians therefore felt the necessity for some acquaintance with the renderings of the LXX. A translation of the SEPTUAGINT into Syriac was made by Paul of Tella. It is founded on the Hexaplaric text of Origen. It gives not only all the omissions and insertions of the LXX, but also all the marks made by Origen to indicate the relation in which the text stood to the Hebrew. A large portion of this version has been published at various times, and from different sources. The most important was the book of Daniel, published by Bugati in 1788, which confirmed the then recently published Chisian codex. This version is chiefly valuable for the help it gives in criticism of the text of the LXX, and for the means it furnishes of estimating the changes introduced by Origen in order to conform the LXX to the Palestinian text of the Hebrew. The Coptic and Ethiopic versions of the OT. were also dependent on the Greek.

III. Latin Versions.—Greek, the sacred language of Christianity, was generally known in Italy and Gaul. The early Roman Fathers, Clement, Hermas, and Hyppolytus, as well as Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, all wrote in Greek. In the Roman province of Africa, however, and in Spain, Greek was not universally known.

(1) Old Latin.—The earliest version seems to have been made in Africa. It was a translation from the Greek. This is evident when we compare with the LXX the quotations of Tertullian and Cyprian from the Old Testament. A revision of this version seems to have been current in Italy, which was free from the roughness characteristic of North African Latin.

(2) The Vulgate.—Christian scholars with some knowledge of Hebrew became aware of the great differences between the text of the Hebrew and that of the LXX, from which the version in common use had been made. The need was felt for a version which would more closely represent the original Hebrew. This need Jerome set himself to supply.

This scholar was specially fitted for the task by his acquaintance with Hebrew: although it was not until late in middle life that, in his retirement at Bethlehem, he began the study of the sacred tongue. He first revised the Old Latin, making changes only where errors had quite destroyed the sense. He then settled down to a translation direct from the original Hebrew, and at this he toiled from his sixtieth to his seventy-sixth year. He completed the translation of the Old Testament, and also of the Apocryphal books of Judith and Tobit and the Additions to Daniel. These last, being in Greek, were hastily thrown off. The rest of the Apocrypha, as unauthorised by the Massoretic Canon, he did not translate. They were allowed to stand as in the Old Latin version.

The translation is of unequal value, the historical books being most carefully rendered. In his work Jerome employed every available assistance. He not only used the LXX, but also secured, with great difficulty, a copy of Aquila from a synagogue. His first assistant was a Jewish convert; later he purchased the help of Jewish rabbins. This latter fact lends the Vulgate a certain value as indicating in some degree how far the Palestinian text of Jerome's time coincided with our ordinary Massoretic. Differences do appear in many places: e.g. in Dn. 8.[20] the MT. reads, "the kings of the Medes and the Persians"; but Jerome reads, "the king of the Medes and the Persians." The MT. makes a difference between the name of the Babylonian king Belshazzar and that given to Daniel as a member of Nebuchadnezzar's court, while Jerome makes them identical. In both cases all the other versions have the same rendering. Opposition was offered to the introduction of the version of the Psalms made by Jerome direct from the Hebrew: he therefore substituted a more carefully revised version, made from the Hexapla text of the LXX.

Other versions of the Old Testament, such as the Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, and Gothic, are all late and secondary.

II. NEW TESTAMENT

(1) The Peshiṭṭā.—For long the Peshiṭṭā was believed to be the oldest translation of the New Testament. Recent discoveries have shown this position to be untenable. In the present state of the evidence it is impossible to decide with certainty, but there is reason to think that it cannot be dated earlier than the end of the fourth century, or the beginning of the fifth: the omission, however, of 1 and 2 John and Revelation seems to point to a much earlier date.

The existence of a Syriac Version early in the second century is proved by Eusebius, who says (HE. iv. 22) that it was used by Hegesippus: this refers to the latter half of the second century. At the same time Tatian, the contemporary of Hegesippus, composed his Diatessaron, or combination of the four Gospels into one narrative. It is evident, at all events, that the four Gospels were extant in Syriac before this, since Hegesippus in Jerusalem would quote from documents with which he was familiar, not from the recent work of a contemporary. For more than a century the common form in which the Gospels were used was the Diatessaron of Tatian. It was employed by Ephrem Syrus in his prelections on the Gospel history.

The relation between the Curetonian and the closely kindred Sinaitic recensions is still sub judice. The Sinaitic has this peculiarity, that it is written in Western, not Eastern, Aramaic, which until recently was called Chaldee. In the genealogy of our Lord it is said that "Joseph begat Jesus," a statement that seems to negative our Lord's miraculous birth. We must remember, however, that only in this form could His birth be duly registered. In the Peshiṭṭā the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles closely resemble the Gospels in style. 1 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation are all omitted, as are also the first eleven verses of Jn. 8. and 1 Jn. 5.[7]. The relation of our present Peshiṭṭā to the Greek is not slavish. Not infrequently, when the Greek repeats words in a verse or in adjacent verses, the Peshiṭṭā varies them, possibly in the interest of style. The value of this version, already high, will be greatly increased by the publication of a critically accurate text. A recension of the Peshiṭṭā was published at the instance of Philoxenus in 508, afterwards revised by Thomas Heraklensis. Even in the present condition of the text, the Peshiṭṭā repays careful study.

(2) The Vulgate.—We have seen that there was a Latin version of the Old Testament, at least in Africa, early in the second century. The like is true of the New Testament. This is proved by the citations of Tertullian. This version was somewhat rough in style, and often, instead of translating, it simply transferred Greek words into the Latin: e.g. machæra for μάχαιρα in Jn. 18.[10]. This version survives only in fragments, of which there are over forty, and in quotations found in the writings of the Fathers. These furnish proof that it underwent much revision and alteration. The MSS. in use during the third and fourth cents. differed widely from one another. That circulating in Italy was marked by greater refinement in style and vocabulary, the rough Latinity of Northern Africa being modified to suit Italian taste. Under these circumstances any attempt to restore the Old Latin version is doomed to failure.

Amid the existing confusion the necessity for an authoritative version became obvious. At the instance of Pope Damasus (366–384) Jerome undertook to revise the Gospels. This he did in such thorough fashion as to produce practically a new translation. He then proceeded also to revise the Acts and the Epistles, including the Revelation.

In making his translation Jerome kept so closely to the Greek, even in the order of the words, that Bentley proposed to edit an edition of the New Testament founded directly on the Vulgate. The Vulgate has special interest for English-speaking peoples, as from it Wycliffe made his version. From it also was made the Douay version, in use among English Roman Catholics.

The name Vulgate was not originally applied to Jerome's version; he himself uses the term in his Epistles and Commentaries, now for the LXX, and again apparently for the version in common use, which was a simple rendering of the LXX into Latin—a habit of his which has led distinguished people into blunders.

The Coptic versions of the NT., Memphitic and Thebaic, cannot be traced to any very early date, but the probability is that both were executed about the beginning of the third century. It may be doubted how far a Coptic translation was due to necessity, and how far to the association of special sanctity with the Coptic. It has a value too slight for the criticism of the text of the NT.

The Ethiopic version appears to have been made at a date slightly subsequent to the Coptic versions. Like them, it has been made directly fm. the Greek. While the ancient Ethiopic version is published, a translation into the more recent dialect is often interleaved with it.

The Gothic of Ulphilas dates fm. the fourth century, and is interesting as exhibiting the earliest endeavour to translate the Scripture into the Teutonic tongue.

No versions of the New Testament of more recent date are of any value for Criticism.

PHILO JUDÆUS

The period subsequent to the envelopment of Palestine by Alexander the Great (B.C. 331) witnessed a profound transformation in the spiritual and intellectual outlook of the peoples who dwelt round the Mediterranean basin. In the course of their development all unitary civilisations erect barriers to intimate admixture with foreign elements—this is an inevitable accompaniment of their existence as distinctive cultures; one need only cite contemporary Europe. Alexander's "world-empire," and, even more, its Roman successor, not only tended naturally, but attempted consciously, to destroy these lines of demarcation. The rulers, like good statesmen, desired to create a common spirit wherein their motley subjects might partake, and thus to weld a stable unity from many races. As with similar movements, this one grew slowly. For it involved the fusion of elements dissimilar, if not hopelessly antagonistic, originally. The clear-cut intellect of Greece, enamoured of moderation, was required to combine with the exclusive religious nationalism of the Hebrews, whose extreme monotheistic moralism repelled Hellenic genius; while both had to accommodate themselves to heathen occultism, alien from the Greek because of its intellectual, from the Jew because of its religious, confusion; and to the superstitious nature-worship vestigial irremediably in the Orient, represented familiarly alike to Jews and to hellenised Romans by the variegated cults of the great province, Egypt. So immense were the difficulties of fusion that it is little wonder the process did not reach maturity for three centuries. The spread of Greek as the language of the educated, its use as a commercial medium, and the translation into it of the Hebrew Scriptures (the Septuagint) forwarded the assimilation much. At length it found classical expression in the works of Philo Judæus, the chief ornament of the so-called Jewish-Alexandrian school of philosophy; not philosophy, strictly speaking, however, but a wonderful mixture of philosophical, philological, theological, and mythological factors, all dominated by a theosophical intent. Accordingly Philo must be regarded as one of the most important, because one of the most pivotal, figures in the general thought of "New Testament times." Moreover his extant writings serve to illuminate the intricate, and still obscure, age that intervenes between the latest books of the Old Testament and the formulation of Christian theology. He must be reckoned with, that is, as much for his epoch as for his peculiar teaching; what he represents is at least as impressive as what he tells.

Unfortunately, very little is known of Philo's life. The place and date of birth are irrecoverable. It may be said, with relative certainty, that he was born at Alexandria, Egypt, of a most influential and wealthy, possibly priestly, Jewish family. The probability is that his birth did not fall before B.C. 25 or after B.C. 10. Several relatives occupied the foremost official positions at Alexandria and, later, in the Roman empire. It is unquestionable that he enjoyed every advantage in education—money was no object—and that he possessed riches which enabled him to dedicate his life to thought and scholarship. We are aware that he made a visit—almost in the nature of a pilgrimage—to Jerusalem, perhaps in youth, there to offer prayer and sacrifice in the Temple of the God of his fathers; that he acquired knowledge of the Holy Land, and, to some degree, of the Hebrew tongue. The single event in his career that can be dated accurately was his visit to Rome in the winter of A.D. 39–40. He repaired thither as a member of the triumvirate charged to place the grievances of the Alexandrian Jews before Caligula, and to protest, in particular, against the order that they worship the emperor. Philo was spokesman, most likely chief, of the deputation, whose failure proved a foregone conclusion in this reign. He tells us himself that political activities and worldly affairs had no attraction for him; and, as the external life of the scholar is uneventful, we must reconcile ourselves to the scanty references that can be gleaned incidentally from his own works, as from those of Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome, Suidas, Photius, and Isidorus of Pelusium, who are not always paragons of accuracy. A simple way for the Bible reader to fix the relative date of Philo is to say that, from first to last, he lived contemporary with St. Paul.

Viewed as a whole, Philo's system (and he was anything but a systematist) is an eclectic scheme conceived and executed on an elaborate, even chaotic, scale. And one may allege, not unfairly, that the dominant purpose tends to obscure the systematic features, on the surface at least, if not fundamentally. Philo is an eclectic, because he combines Jewish religious principles, as he conceives them, with certain developments from Greek philosophy regnant in his time; he incorporates with both some elements, chiefly of a mystic character, derived from current Orientalism, and remains unconscious, probably, of the logical conclusions involved in his procedure. It is clear, however, that he addressed himself to a double audience: first, to the educated classes of the Græco-Roman world—to expound and defend Hebrew religion, also to point out its merits as the universal religion of which all vaguely felt the need; second, to his co-religionists—to persuade them that, after all, Greek philosophy bore a message for them, because its principles were not only in ultimate agreement with the traditional tenets of their faith, but served to enforce, if not to formulate, them. As a result, his purpose could be achieved by a line of thought in which Jewish Scriptural beliefs were blended with Platonic, Stoic, and Pythagorean ideas. It may be noted that this process was no new thing; it dates back at least as far as the Septuagint (beginning B.C. 280).

The means adopted by Philo to fulfil his programme hinge upon the famous allegorical method. It is assumed that the Scriptures possess a double sense. The one appears on the surface in the literal statements; it is the "lower" meaning, hence Philo's attacks upon "the sophists of literalism." The other, hidden and spiritual, is manifest only to the trained thinker, the "initiate." The desiderated identity of Jewish and Greek conceptions was to be proven by showing that the latter constitute the esoteric teaching of the former. Philo developed this view, current in rabbinism ere his time, to an unprecedented degree. Thus Moses becomes, in the language of Oriental occultism, the hierophant of the mysteries concealed in the Scriptures, Adam is pure reason, Eve the senses, the serpent desire, Noah the type of righteousness, Abraham virtue gained by higher wisdom, Jacob virtue acquired by practical experience, Rebecca patience, Rachel physical beauty, the ark of the covenant the intellectual world, the cherubim the chief Logoi who proceed from the Logos, who, again, proceeds from the ineffable Deity, and so on. Accordingly the system, such as it is, supplies the full exposition of these latent, allegorical implications—it is the theory of the history, the essence of the veiling prose recital. The same method had been applied by the Stoics to the Greek poetical myths, so that Philo stood upon doubly familiar ground. Obviously enough, of course, such exegesis implies that the thinker knows how to reach the object of his search—he has a key; thus a group of dynamic conceptions is presupposed. In this we find Philo's philosophy properly so styled—a species of theosophy.

Being a theosophy, Philo's thought is based primarily upon the doctrine of God. This, in turn, was influenced powerfully by the strong tendency of the age to separate between God and the world, with an attendant elevation of the former and depreciation of the latter. Hence, too, that vague craving for a new revelation wherein Philo's Jewish outlook found its opportunity. On disengagement from the imaginative, often irrelevant, accompaniments with which he surrounds it, his idea of Deity is found to contain a curious admixture of Jewish and Platonic factors; these, again, lead to certain consequences, derived mainly from Stoicism as to matter, and from Pythagoreanism as to form; Oriental elements also affect the last. According to Philo, then, man may apprehend the existence of God by inspection of the universe, and by revelation; on the contrary, he can never know how God exists. The real being of Deity must remain hidden from him in the nature of the case, because it possesses no qualities. So, like the classical Greeks, Philo holds that God is the eternal, immutable Reason; and with pre-Stoic thought he emphasises, even accentuates, the great gulf fixed between God and the world. As a result, there can be no living God in the Hebrew sense, because God is unchangeable, as Plato, and, even more emphatically, Aristotle, taught. On the other hand, as in Hebrew religion, God lives for Philo, possesses a personality, can reveal Himself. His adoption of Platonic dualism enables him to maintain this over against Stoic monism. In a word, the pressure of Hebrew faith upon Greek speculative conceptions makes it necessary to arrange a medium of revelation. Philo accomplishes this in his second great doctrine—of the Logos.

Man's world is a lower sphere too imperfect for the real presence of the Deity, who would be smirched by the contact. Nevertheless, it is a cosmos, testifying everywhere to rational meaning; therefore, it must be pervaded by an indwelling reason. Thus the Stoics thought, and developed a species of pantheism. No Jew could adopt this view and continue to maintain his national monotheism. But the conception of some kind of Divine effluence seemed indispensable to Philo. Consequently he speaks of the Logos as a "second" Deity, having an existence of its own over against the world, because it embodies the activity of the true God. God creates all things indirectly by His Logos, and this manifestation always retains an operative, or dynamic, character. Quite clear as concerns its independence of the physical universe, the status of this "proceeding" is by no means clear as concerns God. Inevitably, Philo fails to be decisive here. His Judaism inhibits him from dealing with the Logos outright as a "second person," while his Hellenism draws him towards an identification of it with God, as an issue of Divine potency. Faith compels him to monotheism, reason would involve him in a pantheistic or emanational theory. As a matter of fact, he intends the Logos both to mediate between God and the world (thus giving it the imprint of personality), and to be the presence of God's creative power in the world (thus reducing it to the level of a "Word" or active quality, like "Wisdom" —no more). Apparently he was content to let the apposition rest unhealed. Nor did this subterfuge oppress him, because his main interest was in religion rather than in metaphysics. The inevitable vagueness of theosophy, as compared with the scientific precision of philosophy, saves him here. It satisfies him that the Logos effects certain results in and for man; especially it is "the power of God unto salvation." This is enough—the metaphysical problem lapses. As man enters into communion with the Logos he becomes, as Philo says it is, "the Son of God." Accordingly the diremption of human life is surmounted, and the most difficult, distressing questions fall away. It is impossible to enter here upon the intricate question of the relation between the Philonian conception and that of the fourth Gospel. The balance of present evidence is that the author of the Gospel obtained the Logos atmosphere from Philo, although his treatment of the details, especially as respects incarnation, was subordinated to different ends, and developed amid other associations. Briefly, the phrase "Son of God," as applied to the Logos in the Gospel, has no more than a verbal identity with Philo's expression; nevertheless both men are impelled to this fundamental position by the same problem. Philo presupposes also a multiplicity of Divine forces inferior to the Logos. Among these are the Platonic Ideas, now ranked as efficient causes, thanks to Stoic influence; the angels of Judaism and the demons (gods) of heathenism. Ultimately, then, God remains the reasonable "form" of the world, while matter, a "second principle," at first an indistinguishable mass, appears to us in the definite objects of daily experience through the constant operation of the intermediate forces, of which the human soul is one. Escape from the "prison house" of flesh is thus a necessary end, and Philo's ethics contain a distinct ascetic infusion.

Philo's writings serve to show how completely he applied Hellenistic ideas within a Jewish matrix. The principal remains belong most probably to three works, all commentaries on the Pentateuch and the Mosaic law. Of these the popular presentation, written for the information of the Hellenistic world in general, rather than for the scholarly "initiate," has come down most complete. There are at least seven other treatises, of which the most attractive is that descriptive of the causes that led to the Roman embassy, and of the repulse encountered. Some eight works attributed to Philo are in dispute. The most important of these is, probably, Concerning the Contemplative Life, where moral asceticism and monastic communities are extolled.

For the English reader the most succinct account of Philo, particularly of his works, is to be found in E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, division ii. vol. iii. pp. 321f. (Edinburgh, 1886); compare the same writer's article in the Encyclopædia Britannica. An excellent account is also to be found in The Jewish Encyclopædia. The most elaborate English work is James Drummond, Philo Judæus; or the Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy in its Development and Completion (2 vols., London, 1888). A general account may be found in Heinrich Ewald, The History of Israel, vol. vii. pp. 194f. (London, 1885); and in A. Hausrath, A History of New Testament Times, vol. i. second division, chaps. 4–6 (London, 1885); the treatment of Philo, and especially of his writings, is one of the disappointing portions of this history, which gives a picturesque review of the general situation in culture. H. Graetz, History of the Jews from the Earliest Times to the Present Day (London, 1891), gives an account of the causes and results of Philo's embassy to Rome (vol. ii. pp. 183f.), and a strongly pro-Jewish presentation of the manner in which Philo exalted Judaism at the expense of heathenism (ib. pp. 206f.). The best English discussion of the relation between Philo and the fourth Gospel is Ernest F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, its Purpose and Theology, pp. 54f., 145f. (2nd ed., Edinburgh, 1908). In F. C. Conybeare, Philo about the Contemplative Life (Oxford, 1895), a discussion of the authenticity of this treatise is to be found, and one may gather from it some of the influences which moulded Philonian ethics. An English translation of Philo's writings has been made by C. D. Yonge (Bohn's Library); the Greek text of T. Mangey is the one cited usually. Full references to Philo literature are given in Schürer as above, whom it is well to consult in the last (4th) German edition for the latest information.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS

Is a most important figure in the group of authorities for the period of the origin and early spread of Christianity. We are dependent upon him for our knowledge of conditions in Palestine, and, to a lesser extent, of the relations between the Jewish world and the religions, society, and government of the Roman empire. He was born at Jerusalem A.D. 37–38, and died at Rome in the early years of the second century, when we do not know exactly. On both parental sides he sprang from the highest rank of the priestly aristocracy, and enjoyed the advantages conferred by wealth and position. He received a thorough education, becoming intimate with the culture of the Pharisees and Sadducees, while a knowledge of Greek familiarised him with Hellenistic ideas. By his own account, he was already expert in the traditions of the elders at the age of fourteen. At sixteen he forsook learned circles at Jerusalem, being moved probably by current apocalyptic revivals, and withdrew to the desert of Engedi, in order " to slake his thirst for knowledge." He spent some three years here, placing himself under the tutelage of Banus, an Essene hermit, and practising severe asceticism. Belief in the occult, and in magic, shared by him with his contemporaries, was confirmed by this experience, as was his devotion to the law and to ceremonial purity. Accordingly, when he returned to Jerusalem, he did not join the Sadducees, as might have been anticipated from his social position, but became a Pharisee. He explains for the benefit of his Hellenistic readers that the Pharisees are like the Stoics ; a most significant intimation, for it throws a flood of light upon his cosmopolitan point of view. From A.D. 52–66 the misgovernment of the Roman procurators, Felix, Albinus, and Florus, and the anarchy at Jerusalem under Annas, the High Priest (62), inflamed the people,the patriots first, and then the plundered aristocrats, against Roman rule. The brief respite under Festus seems to have abated the zeal of the upper classes, among whom Josephus moved. Thanks to this friction, many malcontents were sent to Rome, and thither Josephus repaired, probably in 64, to intercede for some priests whom he knew well. Like Paul, he was wrecked on the voyage, rescued with a remnant of his fellow-passengers, and landed at Puteoli. There he met Alityrus, a Jewish mimê (actor) popular in Neronian circles, who gained him access to the empress Poppæa, at Rome. Poppæa, herself a Jewish proselyte, espoused his cause. He concluded his mission successfully, and returned to Jerusalem shortly before the revolt of 66, bearing valuable presents from her. More important was the object-lesson he had learned in Roman wealth and power. This served to confirm him in the idea, incipient possibly under Festus, of a modus vivendi between the Jewish leaders and the Roman government. In common with his rank, he held aloof from the war of liberation, but, with the directing classes generally, was swept into it by irresistible popular demand. The second period of his life coincides with the terrific struggle that ensued.

After the disastrous evacuation of Jerusalem by Cestius Gallus, the aristocracy joined the revolution and filled the chief offices, Josephus being sent to Galilee as civil and military governor. This was the point of greatest strategic importance. The appointment of a student by nature and nurture to a position of such military responsibility is remarkable, and must be traced to social influence and political exigency. Josephus' conduct of the preparations for defence embittered the patriots, who suspected him of collusion with the Romans, and, led by John of Gischala, a Zealot extremist, appealed for his removal, without success ; his friends were too powerful, himself too adroit. Whatever may be said of his later literary life, Josephus was a man of the world in practical matters. His half-hearted policy, with its greatness in small things and smallness in great things, has been the subject of denunciation. More than likely he was convinced that resistance would be useless in the long run, and had an eye upon his own fate in what he regarded as the inevitable issue. At any rate his measures were not calculated to check Vespasian with opposition such as might have been forthcoming from a commander animated otherwise. After many dangerous incidents and hairbreadth escapes, concerned not least with his own people, Josephus, himself a fugitive before the Roman army, was shut up with his troops in Jotapata, a stronghold on the north of the lake of Gennesaret, in May 67. The place was defended with desperate valour for forty-seven days, when Titus surprised the weary garrison, scaled the walls under cover of a fog, and put the inhabitants to the sword. Josephus fled for refuge to a cave, where he preserved his life from his associates by the aplomb that never forsook him. Discovered at length, he was taken to Vespasian's camp, where he plied the superstitious soldier with the arts of the mystagogue, predicting his elevation to the purple —an event that actually occurred two years later. Vespasian treated him well, extracting useful information in return. The infatuation of Titus for Berenice, which began now, gave the Jewish aristocrats a new source of influence with the Roman generals, to Josephus' benefit doubtless. At all events, when Vespasian was proclaimed emperor, he liberated his captive, who was taken by him to Alexandria forthwith. According to Roman custom, Josephus assumed the family name of his benefactor, and was known thenceforward as Flavius. He returned to Palestine with Titus, and from the Roman camp witnessed the appalling events that preceded and accompanied the siege and sack of Jerusalem. Here he was in frequent peril, not only from the Roman soldiery, who attributed their repulses to his machinations with the Jews, but also from his countrymen, who regarded him as a base traitor, and tried to kill him, when he went out as Titus' representative to negotiate capitulation. But, thanks to his adroitness as a courtier, he retained the favour of the Flavians through good report and evil. After the siege he accompanied Titus to Rome for the triumph, and the imperial city was to be his future home. With this extraordinary series of adventures the second period of his life closed. So well did he stand with the imperial family that he was relieved of anxiety for life. A royal house lodged him, a pension was bestowed upon him, he received a fertile estate in Palestine, was exempted from tribute, and admitted to Roman citizenship. In a word, the Jewish Pharisee gave place to the Hellenistic literary man, who became an invaluable intermediary between the empire and his own folk, at least from the Roman imperial point of view. Apart altogether from personal questions, his position at Rome is of profound significance as an indication of the influence wielded by Jews throughout the empire at the time, and as an illustration of Roman policy towards distinguished men of other races and faiths, provided they were willing to support the Latin overlordship.

The works that constitute Josephus so invaluable an authority are as follows :—

I. Concerning the Jewish War, completed before the death of Vespasian (A.D. 79). Written originally in Aramaic (not extant now), the author's mother tongue, it was translated into Greek by Josephus himself, who prepared for the task by taking lessons in Greek composition, and learned to use this language fluently. The author's division into seven books is as follows : i., the history from Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 175) to Herod the Great (B.C. 4) ; ii., from B.C. 4 to A.D. 66, including the first phases of the war ; iii., events in Galilee in 67 ; iv., subsequent events till the investment of Jerusalem ; v. and vi., the siege and capture of the Holy City ; vii., the course of the insurrection after the fall of Jerusalem. With all its defects, common to it with other histories at that time, the work is most important, because the production of an actor in the drama and an eye-witness of its tremendous close, and because Josephus had access to Roman State documents. Naturally, he glorifies his own people, so far as compatible with his position at Rome, and his history is " romantic " in this respect. The portions most open to question concern the part played by himself. Here his manifold defects of character must occasion grave doubt. But, on the whole, as history then went, the War is a careful performance. Its general credibility must be granted, even allowing for the lack of accuracy permitted to historical writers in that age. Our defensible suspicion of, even contempt for, the character of the writer should not be permitted to exert bias in this regard.

II. The Antiquities of the Jews, finished about A.D. 94. Josephus divided this work into twenty books, and dealt with the entire history of his people till the war of 66. The books fall into five groups : (1) bks. i.–x., from earliest times to the close of the Babylonian Captivity, that is, parallel substantially with the OT. ; (2) bk. xi., the Persian period of Cyrus ; (3) bks. xii.–xiv., the Hellenistic period, from Alexander the Great, including the Hasmonæan dynasty, and events till the reign of Herod the Great ; (4) bks. xv.–xvii., Herod's reign (B.C. 37–4) ; (5) bks. xviii.–xx., from the death of Herod to A.D. 66. The work is dominated by a distinct tendency. The Jews were suspected, when not hated, in the Roman world, thanks largely to themselves. Josephus attempts to place them in a better light, and to explain the Scriptures to the Gentiles. In short, he addresses himself, not to his own folk, but to the educated classes in Græco-Roman society. For this reason he often softens Scriptural history and omits offensive incidents. The early Hellenistic period is treated sketchily (a most unfortunate gap), while Hasmonæan times are covered largely at second-hand from authorities like Strabo ; the same may be said of Herod's reign, where Nicolas of Damascus is the chief source. The concluding books are constructed loosely. On the other hand, the preservation of excerpts from lost writers, the lists of High Priests, the full consideration of Roman affairs from Caligula, and the incorporation of imperial State papers, afford material of great moment to modern investigators. Perhaps the most striking feature of the work is its total failure to appreciate the spiritual elevation of Jewish religion at its moments of deepest inspiration. The Pharisee in Josephus, and his Hellenistic cultural associations, caused this obliquity, which, negatively, offers many hints regarding religious conditions at the time.

III. The most impressive of the writings was composed probably just after the Antiquities. Since Jerome's time it has been known as Against Apion, but is better described by an older title, Concerning the High Antiquity of the Jews. It is essentially an apology for Jewish religion against heathen misrepresentation and traduction, in two books. Evidently Josephus wrote it con amore, hence its peculiar value. The exposition and defence of Moses and his legislation are warm, even eloquent; the attacks on Greek polytheism, as well as the references to authorities not extant now, are of special interest to the student. The acrid reply to Apion, descending to the level of vituperation, occupies a subordinate place. The whole work shows that its author could forego on occasion his customary attitude of worldly wisdom and calculating self-regard.

IV. Aside from its introductory and concluding chapters, the so-called Autobiography (Vita), written in the first years of the second century, is a misnomer. Stung by the attacks of Justus of Tiberias, an associate of Galilean days, who, in his History of the Jewish War, accused Josephus of heading the anti-Roman rebellion, our author dedicates his Autobiography to a reply. Little reliance can be placed upon its account of his career in Galilee. Indeed, he may be said to invert the facts. But Josephus' position at the Roman court rendered repudiation necessary, while his familiar connection with the Cæsars was calculated to give his explanation a colour that it cannot bear for us.

English readers who desire to obtain a fuller grasp upon the significance of Josephus may consult the following works with advantage. For a conspectus of the entire period, W. D. Morrison, The Jews under Roman Rule (" Story of the Nations " series, London); for a full analysis of the sources, and all co-operant circumstances, Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, division i., vol. i. (Edinburgh, 1890); for an account (somewhat critical) of Josephus' transactions in Galilee, A. Hausrath, A History of New Testament Times, vol. iv. seventh division, chap. 2 (London, 1895). A very unfavourable presentation, from a Jewish source, is to be found in H. Graetz, History of the Jews from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, vol. ii. chap. 10 (London, 1891); against this may be set the objective article in The Jewish Encyclopædia. The most available translation in English is that of Whiston, of which there are many editions; the best English translation of The War of the Jews is that of Traill, edited by Taylor (1862). The best Greek text is that of Niese. Full references to Josephus literature, covering all possible points, may be found in Schürer, whom it is advisable to consult, for the latest information, in the last (fourth) German edition.

THE LANGUAGE OF PALESTINE DURING THE TIME OF OUR LORD

Up to the end of the eighteenth century it was assumed that the language of Palestine during our Lord's life on earth, and by consequence that in wh. His discourses were delivered, was ancient Hebrew, the language of Moses, of David, of Isaiah. This view seemed to be confirmed by the references to Hebrew in John, Acts, and Revelation; as in Jn. 19.[13], "the place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha," so in v. 17, "the place of a skull, wh. is called in the Hebrew Golgotha." We find, however, on consideration, that these words are not Hebrew in the strict sense of the term, but Aramaic. Till within the last quarter of the past century it was practically assumed that Aramaic was merely a later debased form of Hebrew. That idea was finally disposed of by the discovery of the Aramaic inscriptions of Sinjirli, wh. dated fm. the time of Tiglath-pileser. Certainly most of the pseudonymic Jewish Apocalypses were written not in Aramaic but in Hebrew. As these, however, claimed to be the work of ancient patriarchs, and hence to be of great antiquity, it was needful, to give any verisimilitude to the claim, that they shd. appear in the ancient sacred tongue. It may be regarded as certain that at all events Hebrew in the stricter sense of the term was not the ordinary language of Palestine at the period in question. For more than a century now there has been no question on this point.

In more recent times it has been assumed very generally that the language of the inhabitants of Palestine at the period of our Lord's ministry was Aramaic. Most, however, have admitted that the country was essentially bi-lingual, using both Greek and Aramaic. Hence the question becomes narrowed down, and, as it is admitted that Greek was known by practically all the inhabitants, it really resolves itself into the question of the relative predominance of the two tongues—wh. was the most generally used. One method of approaching this question is to endeavour to discover what was the condition of things in neighbouring countries. The country in the nearer East of whose history and habits we know most at this period is Egypt. In that country Coptic had been almost entirely dispossessed by Greek. It is true sacred proclamations were engraved in ancient Egyptian, both in hieroglyphic and cursive characters, but these in the days of the Ptolemies and the Cæsars were always accompanied by a Greek translation—a thing that wd. have been needless had it not been that the majority of the inhabitants had ceased to understand easily the ancient tongue of the country. This is confirmed by the fact that the great mass of the papyri found recently dating fm. the reigns of the later Ptolemies are in Greek. These are not merely literary remains, copies of the works of Greek and classic writers, but private letters—letters even of schoolboys. Egypt had adopted Greek as its familiar language, tho' the sacred services of worship were carried on in Coptic. This practice of heathen Egypt of associating their ancient language with worship was carried over into the Christian Church, but the medium of business and social intercourse was Greek. In Cilicia we have fewer remains, yet the balance of evidence is decidedly to the same effect. Formerly, in the days of the Assyrian ascendency, whatever may have been the primitive language of Cilicia, Aramaic had become that of common use, as we learn from the Sinjirli inscriptions. This, however, had been totally dispossessed by Greek centuries before the days of our Lord's earthly life. In the third pre-Christian century the great lights of the Stoic schools were fm. Cilicia, and they all wrote in Greek, and a Greek university was set up in Tarsus. In the neighbouring island of Cyprus all the inscriptions except the very earliest are in Greek. Again, inland in Lycaonia, Greek was the language in common use; in this the apostles addressed the inhabitants, and in Greek they professed their faith in Christ. It is produced as a mark of special excitement, and perhaps religious fervour, that it was in the speech of Lycaonia they declared that "the gods had come down in the likeness of men," and recognised Hermes in Paul and Zeus in Barnabas, or whatever were the Lycaonian equivalents of these Hellenic divinities. The cripple whose cure caused the excitement understood Greek, for Paul saw that he had faith to be healed; he had listened understandingly fm. the first, and at last did so believingly. Altho' the evidence is yet scantier of countries to the east of Palestine, yet even here, where Aramaic had a much stronger hold, there is evidence of the prevalence of Greek. From the banks of the Euphrates philosophers came to teach in Athens. More of evidence than avowed and serious philosophers is Lucian, the Voltaire, the most marked and influential writer of Greek, yet a native of Samosata in the centre of the Aramaic-speaking district. Earlier, in the end of the first Christian century, is the Assyrian sophist Isacus, whose eloquence in Greek is commended in the highest terms by Pliny. Juvenal refers to him: he must have early been in the habit of speaking Greek to have become so copious and accurate in its use. In Palmyra, altho' laws were proclaimed and engraved in Aramaic, as we know fm. inscriptions, even in regard to municipal dues on carts and carriages a Greek translation had to be appended, as if the ancient tongue was not "understanded of the common people." Nearer to the land of Israel was Phœnicia, and we find the Syrophœnician woman called a "Greek." These things being so, the a priori probability is very great that it was in Palestine as in the neighbouring nations. Indeed, had this not been the case, classic authorities wd. have adduced this peculiarity as one of the many in wh. the Jews were "contrary to all men."

Further, circumstances within Palestine tended to the same conclusion. All over Palestine were Greek cities, cities that prided themselves on their Hellenic culture and Hellenic civic rights. There was the Decapolis, the league of the "ten Hellenic cities": the number was really more, but that was the name assumed. Of these the majority were either in Palestine proper or on its immediate borders. Besides these there were cities in the Shephelah that claimed also to be Greek, as Raphia, Anthedon, Jamnia, Joppa, Apollonia, Cæsarea Stratonis, Dora, and Ptolemais. There were other cities, such as Samaria, Gaba, and Sepphoris, that were Hellenised. Justin Martyr belonged to the first of these, and he was essentially Greek; he seems to have known neither Hebrew nor Aramaic. All of these had mints, and were allowed to coin copper and silver money. On these coins the inscriptions, even far on in the Roman period, are in Greek. As to the cities of the Decapolis, the present writer, in the course of a couple of days' stay in one of them, Gerasa (Jerash), turned up scores of Greek inscriptions but never saw one in Aramaic. This was the case, altho' not a few of the names occurring had Semitic elements. The inhabitants of these cities spoke Greek and prided themselves on this. These cities were the markets of the surrounding country. This wd. constrain even the country people to master Greek, also. The territory formerly Philistine, as also the territory of Tyre and Sidon, and that of the Syrian kingdoms or governments, all predominantly spoke Greek, and with these there was a constant unrestricted intercourse on the part of the Jews. This wd. necessitate and imply a very general knowledge of Greek among the Jews.

A slight contributary evidence of the prevalence of Greek may be found in the number of Greek words in the Mishna, and the nature of them. Matters connected with war and civil government are designated by Greek terms; thus the provincial governor was called hēgemōn and his province hēgemonia. An army was estratīa (στρατία), war pōlemōs (πόλεμος), pay 'opsonīa (ὀψώνιον), &c. The rulers of a town were called 'arche (ἀρχή) collectively. Even the most essentially Jewish council, the Sanhedrin, derived its name from συνέδριον, the prosecutors quṭīqōr (κατήγορος), an advocate pareqleṭ (παράκλητος). Even the reserved right to recall a loan without reference to the Sabbath—even this specially Jewish arrangement—was known by the Greek name prozebūl (προσβολή). Trade and commerce showed the effects of this Hellenisation: a pen was qalamos, an account book pinaqs (πίναξ). So with dress, etzṭolith (στόλα); sandal (σανδάλιον), sūdarīn (σουδάριον). Furniture also, seefsal (subsellium); a seat, qathedra (καθέδρα); a bowl, phīlī (φιάλη); a wine barrel, phiṭos (πίθος). These examples—a selection fm. a multitude—are drawn, of course, from the Mishna, wh. was not committed to writing for nearly a century and a half after our Lord's crucifixion, yet the number of them occurring in a work devoted to purely Jewish questions, written by those who boasted themselves on their Hebrew purism, exhibits the extent to wh. in the last quarter of the second century, Hellenism had permeated Jewish conversational language. This implies that the process was not recent; the writers of the Mishna wd. have avoided everything recent that related them to the Greeks. It really meant that these rabbins were obliged to use these words if they wd. be understood.

Connected with this is the number of purely Greek names we find in Josephus. Altho' the sons of Mattathias and his grandsons all bear Hebrew or Aramaic names, his great-grandsons, the sons of John Hyrcanus I., all bear Greek names—Aristobulus, Antigonus, Alexander. With the exception of John Hyrcanus II. and his grand-daughter all the later Asmonæans bore Greek names. Altho' the Herodians were anxious to commend themselves to the Jews, their subjects, they all bore Greek names except Phasael, the brother of Herod the Great.

Further, we know that the process of Hellenisation had not only begun but had been carried a considerable way before the time of the Maccabees. The younger Jews, to the horror of their fathers, became addicted to the games of the Palæstra: and the drama too was introduced; for this Philo is our evidence. In their eagerness for the games the younger Jews were even ready to obliterate the covenant sign of their Judaism. Of course there was a reaction when Epiphanes attempted to hasten the process and Hellenise their religion—then the Jews resisted. Still in everything else the process of Hellenisation may be supposed to have gone on, as proved by the general use of Greek names and the eagerness with wh. Judas Maccabæus strove to find allies among the Greek republics even while fighting with the Grecian forces of Epiphanes.

We would finally refer to the rarity of any reference in Josephus to an interpreter being used: in two of the cases where it is mentioned the reason is assigned for it wh. wd. imply that had the reason not existed an interpreter wd. not have been employed. In the first case (Jos. BJ. V. ix. 2) Titus sent Josephus to speak to the Jews in their own language, "for he thought they might yield to the persuasion of a fellow-countryman." In the second instance (Jos. BJ. VI. vi. 2) Titus appointed an interpreter as a sign that he, the "conqueror," wd. not talk directly with them. That in other instances Josephus was employed to speak to the Jews, besieged as they were, in their own tongue, was simply that he imagined that they wd. be more easily influenced by a fellow-countryman speaking in their own tongue. He names many of the localities as if they had Greek names, whereas others he calls by Aramaic names—an evidence that these places had Greek names among the people. When trials are carried on, as that of Herod's son Antipater, as Varus was present, and different Greek-speaking persons intervened, the trial must have been in Greek (Jos. Ant. XVII. v. 2–7).

We have in the preceding portion of this article drawn our evidence from sources external to the NT. The book of Acts gives what transpired after our Lord had left the earth ; what the apostles did may be an index to what our Lord had done. Two instances are mentioned in wh. Aramaic was used. The first is when Paul addressed the multitude from the stairs of the Fort Antonia (Ac. 21.[40]) ; we are told he spake to them in the "Hebrew tongue." The result of this was that "they made the more silence" (μᾶλλον παρέσχον ἡσυχίαν) : they wd. have listened, but the language of the home charmed them to the greater silence—they wd. have understood him had he spoken to them in Greek. The next case is Paul's account of his conversion before Agrippa (Ac. 26.[14]) : he says he was addressed in "the Hebr w tongue"—a statement that implies that he might have been addressed in Greek. Further, we know there were Greek—or at all events Grecian—synagogues in Jerusalem: synagogues, that is, of those whose language was Greek, who presumably knew no other tongue, or at all events were so much more familiar with it than with Aramaic that they worshipped with greater comfort in that tongue. It must be noted also that the deacons appointed by the apostles, while presumably Jews, with the single exception of Nicolaus of Antioch, yet all bear Greek names. Prof. Roberts has dwelt on the phenomena of Pentecost. While they all heard in their own tongue "in wh. they were born" the wonderful works of God, they must have had a common tongue to express their wonder, and this must have been Greek. One point he does not note, that Greece is the one country the language of wh. is not represented. No Greek says that he hears in his own tongue the wonderful works of God—because he was being addressed in Greek, as every one expected to be : that was not regarded as a marvel. Peter, then a fisherman, declared unlettered, yet spoke Greek. When Paul is tried before the Sanhedrin, the Roman chiliarch is able to understand the questions in regard to wh. Paul is put on trial, wh. he cd. do were the proceedings carried on in Greek, but not if Aramaic was the language of the court. This, however, we wd. not press, as, however unlikely in the circumstances, interpreters mt. be employed to inform Lysias of what was done.

But from the Gospels our principal proofs must be drawn. We find only three instances in wh. our Lord used Aramaic. When He addressed Jairus' daughter and recalled her to life He said Talītha qūmi (Mk. 5.[41]). Why is that instance singled out ? If our Lord was in the custom of speaking Aramaic there was no reason in mentioning this fact. If, however, He was not so accustomed to do, then we have a revelation of tender consideration : the little girl is awakened fm. the sleep of death in the very same words in wh. she had been often awaked by her mother or her nurse. The next is Mk. 7.[34]—Ephphatha, "Be opened." Here there was a suitability in causing the man who had been till now deaf to hear first in the home language of Palestine. The last instance is the most sacred instance of all, the cry upon the cross, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani. This is natural ; many instances there are of men returning to the language of childhood in the article of death. Moreover, He may have learned the 22nd Psalm not in Hebrew but in Aramaic, when a child at His mother's knee. It is to be noted that the mob around the cross seem not to have thought that He wd. repeat a portion of a psalm in Aramaic, but that, being a claimant to the title of Messiah, He naturally wd. be calling on Elias. Here there is a point to be noted. Eliyahu does not naturally lend itself to this misconception, but if they had expected Him to call out in Greek then Elia wd. be quite naturally and easily misheard for Eli. There are besides individual terms as Raca, in contrast to More, the one Aram. and the other Greek—a use that seems to point to the idea that descending to the vernacular gave an additional insult—involved profounder contempt. We find the same among ourselves : the use of a provincial term of contempt implies deeper contempt than if the term used is one that has classic usage in its favour. This wd. imply that our Lord spoke the Sermon on the Mount in Greek. Another case is the use of Qorban, the technical word for a consecrated offering: this rather implies that our Lord spoke Greek and inserted this one technical word, tho' we admit that this is not to be pressed. The use of Abba by our Lord in Gethsemane also really points to the rest of it being in Greek, and not, as Zahn wd. claim, that it was in Aramaic.

We have mentioned the numerous Greek names to be found in Josephus, and that the seven deacons had all Greek names. We find further that two of the apostles had Greek names, Andrew and Philip. Another has a name that is at all events half Greek—Bartholomew—Bar Tolmai, the son of Ptolemy. Thomas, we are told, was also called Didymus. He was known as commonly by the Greek translation of his nickname as by the Aramaic original. Of those with whom our Lord came in contact was the blind beggar at Jericho, Bar Timæus: that too is a Greek name. Simon of Cyrene, whom the soldiers compelled to bear the cross, certainly has a Jewish name, but his two sons have foreign names, the one Greek and the other Latin, "Alexander and Rufus." The Syrophœnician woman, who, we are informed (as noticed above), was a Greek, speaks to Him and is addressed by Him in a language she understands: she understands the language in wh. He speaks to the disciples, and takes advantage of the turn He gives to His objection to formulate a new plea. When the Greeks desire to be introduced to Him He continues His discourse about their coming—there is no evidence that there was any change. "The ruler of the Jews," the second vice-president of the Sanhedrin—if we may rigidly render the title our Lord gives him, "the Master of Israel"—had the Greek name of Nicodemus. We see that all classes, rulers in the Sanhedrin, beggars by the wayside, ordinary tradespeople, had Greek names; this proves the great prevalence of them. In regard to this, a point has to be noted: while between all European nations the commonest names are really present in all of them in slightly different forms, as John, Juan, Jean, Giovanni, Johan, the relationship between Jewish and Gentile names was more remote. Many of the Jewish names involved the sacred name YHWH, and many of the Greek names involved the names of heathen deities. If the Jews had such names as Zechariah and Jehohannan (Joannes), the Greeks had Diotrephes and Apollonius (Apollos): names cd. not therefore be translated out of Aramaic into Greek—a new Greek name had to be adopted. The fact, then, that while they had, so many of them, two names, some of them were so generally referred to by the Greek name alone, wd. seem to prove that Greek, not Aramaic, was the language generally used. Altho' occasionally (twice, in fact) the Aramaic Cephas is used, the Greek Peter is immensely in the preponderance; the cases are, where our Lord gives him the name and in Paul's reference to him in the Epistle to the Galatians. A parallel case may be found in the Spanish gipsies, who, as we know fm. Borrow, have a name in the family and a name for their Spanish neighbours. They all know Spanish and speak it in public, altho' in the family they speak Gitana. Were any one to address a crowd of them in Spanish they wd. perfectly understand what was said, but they wd. be more moved if they were addressed in the tongue of their tents.

Quotations from the OT. in the NT.—That in recording quotations made or in making them the evangelists shd. in general quote fm. the Septuagint does not prove anything. In translating a theological work fm. German into English the translators will generally take the AV. of passages quoted in the original prob. in Luther's version, unless some point is made clearer by retaining Luther's words. In regard to these quotations we must bear two things in mind: first, that there was then no habit, as there is now, of verbally accurate quotation fm. prose writers; further, the possession of the Scriptures, while probably general enough, did not make them easy of quotation. The bulky papyrus rolls wd. not be convenient to handle, so accurate quotation is not to be expected. Further, we cannot deduce anything as to usage in Palestine from Paul's custom in his epistles, wh. were directed to churches composed largely of converts fm. heathenism, whose native language was Greek, and whose acquaintance with the books of the OT. was made through the medium of the LXX. In the case of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Epp. of James and Peter the case is different; they were avowedly written to Jews. Only in one case in Hebrews (13.[5]) is the quotation nearer the Hebrew than the Greek. There are four quotations in James; one of these (2.[11]) differs fm. both the LXX and the Massoretic; all follow the Greek against the Hebrew. Of the more numerous quotations in 1st Peter only one is nearer the Hebrew than the Greek; in most of the other cases the quotations are all but verbally accurate, the variations being such as follow fm. memoriter quotation—a method of quotation wh. implies that the apostle used Greek commonly even in his study of the Scripture.

When we come to the Gospel a new phenomenon meets us. Generally stated, it is this: As a rule, when the evangelist quotes our Lord's words the agreement with the LXX is close. In the case of Matthew and John, and to some extent Mark, when the evangelist himself quotes he is in closer agreement with the Hebrew. We naturally do not see this distinction in Luke, who, being a Greek, used the Greek received version. Such a statement must be confirmed by examples. There are ten quotations in the first four chaps. of Matthew's Gospel; six of these are quotations in the narrative, three are made by our Lord Himself, and one by Satan to our Lord. The first (Mw. 1.[23] fm. Is. 7.[14]), "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and they shall call His name Emmanuel." The Heb. in this passage has "she shall call," the LXX "thou," wh. are liker in the square character; but the tau and vau of the angular script are very like, and if vau is written instead of the tau we have the third pl. instead of the third sing. fem. or second sing. masc. The Greek phrase for "conceive" is different in the evangelist fm. the LXX. In Mw. 2.[6] the evangelist diverges fm. both Heb. and LXX, especially by inserting a negative; the rest of it is evidently translated directly fm. the Hebrew. Translating אַלֻּף as "prince" was possible to one reading the Heb., but impossible to one with only the Greek before him. So too Mw. 2.[15] agrees with the Heb. against the Greek. The phenomena presented by Mw. 2.[18] (Jr. 31.[15]) indicate that the evangelist quoting fm. the Heb. was influenced by acquaintance with the LXX, so as to choose κλαυθμὸς and ὀδυρμός for "lamentation and bitter weeping," but adds πολὺς to represent tamrûrim, "bitter"; the rest is fm. the Heb. In the case of Mw. 3.[3] the LXX is very close to the Heb., and in what difference there is the evangelist leans to the LXX. The next chap. records the temptation of our Lord. Our Lord (Mw. 4.[4]) quotes Dt. 8.[3] verbatim fm. the LXX. In the second temptation the devil quotes fm. Ps. 91.[11, 12] in agreement with LXX, so our Lord's answer is also verbatim fm. the LXX. At first sight there seems a variation in v. 10 as compared with Dt. 6.[13]; in the LXX there is φοβηθήσῃ, while in Mw., as also in Luke, it is προσκυνήσεις. But the Codex Alexandrinus here differs fm. the Vaticanus, wh. supplies the standard text by reading προσκυνήσεις. The Sermon on the Mount may be omitted, as there are in it no real quotations. In Mw. 8.[17] comp. with Is. 53.[4], a quotation that occurs in the narrative. The Heb. as translated by AV. reads, "He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows." The LXX renders, "This Man bears our sins and is grieved on account of us," whereas Mw. according to AV. is, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses." This again is a case where the evangelist has translated direct fm. the Hebrew, but has been influenced by a reminiscence of the LXX, with wh. he was well acquainted. The next case is fm. our Lord's lips (Mw. 9.[13], also 12.[7], fm. Ho. 6.[6]): here the LXX. has been strengthened fm. the Heb. The LXX reads, "I will (θέλω) mercy rather than sacrifice." The Heb. AV. has, "I desired mercy and not sacrifice." The Gospel version is, "I will have (θέλω ἔλεος) mercy and not sacrifice (θυσίον)." The fact that the words chosen are those used by the LXX impels one to believe that here our Lord quotes fm. the LXX but strengthens it by bringing it into closer accord with the Heb. The next case is one in wh. there is no close agreement either with the Heb. or the LXX. In Mw. 11.[10] it is, "Behold, I send (ἀποστέλλω) My messenger (ἄγγελος) before Thy face (προσώπου), and he shall prepare Thy way before Thee." The LXX reads (Ml. 3.[1]), "Behold, I send out (ἐξαποστέλλω) My messenger (ἄγγελος), and he shall survey the way before My face (προσώπου)." The Heb. as rendered by AV. is, "Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me." The words chosen suggest an acquaintance with the Septuagint. The long passage in Mw. 12.[18-21] quoted by the evangelist has no connection with LXX: very few of the leading words are the same. In the second clause there is an instance that proves Matthew's independent use of the Heb. The Heb. is nathatti rûḥi 'alaye, in the LXX we have ἔδωκα, taking nathan in its more common sense, whereas the evangelist has θήσω. In the parabolic discourse of our Lord in Mw. 13. there are two quotations, one of them, in our Lord's words (vv. 14, 15), from Is. 6.[9, 10], wh. is verbatim fm. the LXX. It is to be observed that this quotation occurs four times in the NT. The other is introduced by Mw. himself fm. Ps. 77.[2]; in it, while the first clause is verbatim fm. the Septuagint, the second is a translation fm. the Hebrew. It ought to be observed that the first clause here is close to the Heb., only the number is different, sing. in the Heb. but pl. in Mw. and the LXX—a difference that may indicate a difference of reading in MSS. of A.D. 30 fm. that of the Massoretes. We have two quotations by our Lord Himself in chap. 15.: in both cases the LXX is followed even when its rendering is incorrect. The quotation by our Lord of Gn. 2.[24] in Mw. 19.[5] in the question of divorce is interesting; it agrees with the LXX except in two particulars—it omits the pronoun after "father," and the proposition wh. is combined with κολλάω—just the variations that a person familiar with the LXX mt. make when quoting fm. memory. It is to be noted that as Heb. and Aram. tend to repeat the possessive pronoun after each noun, the total omission of the pronoun indicates that neither Hebrew nor Aramaic was dominant in His mind. The next two quotations in this chapter are also made by our Lord, and agree verbally with the LXX. When, however, Matthew (21.[5]) quotes fm. Zechariah (9.[9]), it is very freely—nearer to the Hebrew than to the Greek. There are three other quotations in this chapter. These are all in the words of the Lord Himself, and all in close agreement with the LXX. In the following chapter there are five quotations, one made very freely by the Sadducees to Christ (Mw. 22.[24]): indeed this may be regarded as a statement of the Mosaic Levirate law without any special attempt at quotation. The other four are quoted by our Lord, and are close to the LXX. The only exception to what we have found to be our Lord's habit is the quotation fm. Zc. 13.^{7} in Mw. 26.^{31}, wh. is close to the Hebrew tho' not identical with it. The next quotation (Mw. 27.$^{9, 10}$) is fm. Zech., named by the evangelist " Jeremiah " : this is taken fm. the Hebrew with transposition of clauses. We need not proceed further ; we seem to ourselves to have proved our case ; our Lord's practice was to quote fm. the LXX, and Matthew's to quote fm. the Hebrew. That Matthew shd. do so is natural when we bear in mind that according to an unbroken tradition he wrote his Gospel originally in Aramaic—a tongue as cognate to Hebrew as Dutch to German. It may have been that it was not directly fm. Hebrew that Matthew translated his quotations, but fm. a traditional Aramaic Targum wh., altho' unwritten, was handed down nearly unchanged. There is, however, no such close resemblance to be observed between the quotations of Matthew and the Targum of Jonathan as might be expected were this true : thus in Mi. 5.^{2}, quoted in Mw. 2.^{6}, Jonathan does not insert the negative. When Matthew translated his Aramaic Gospel into Greek, as Josephus did his history, he may have retained the resemblance to the Heb. in his quotation. The point, however, to be explained is the regularity with wh. our Lord's quotations agree with the LXX as against the Heb. If our Lord was in the habit of quoting the OT. fm. the LXX that wd. explain this. But this wd. imply that our Lord spoke Greek. When Matthew translated his Gospel from the Aram. in wh. he had composed it into Greek, while he appears to have translated his own quotations directly, in regard to his Master's he has conformed with more or less accuracy to the LXX. The only motive for this difference of treatment must have been that this more accurately represented the facts of the case. In Mark there are two cases where the quotation does not seem to be in accordance with the LXX, one fm. the lips of our Lord and the other fm. the evangelist. The first of these (Mk. 14.^{27} quoted fm. Zc. 13.^{7}) exactly coincides with Mw. 26.^{31}. The difference is not great ; in our Lord's quotation the main differences are the difference of tense in the verb for " smite," and the difference of number—" shepherd " instead of " shepherds," as it is in LXX, and a different word for " scattered " : indeed ἐκσπάω can scarcely be said to be an adequate translation of פוין. The sentence looks a reminiscence of the LXX corrected fm. the Heb. The other (Mk. 15.^{28}) in the narrative is nearer the Heb. than the Greek. In one case in Luke there is a manifest difference between the text of the quotation in the Gospel and in the LXX, i.e. in 2.$^{23, 24}$, but in neither is the resemblance close to the Heb. In the case of the fourth Gospel it is difficult to come to a decision. John seems to act more independently of his sources than do the other evangelists.

Altho' Acts as written by Luke might be supposed to be completely Hellenised, as having been written by a Greek, yet in the opening chapters, where he must have used written authorities or got in conversation the evidence of persons who had been witnesses of the events narrated, in all cases the source shines through. The speeches, while Luke epitomises, and they therefore show traces of his style, yet exhibit the original beneath, as one may see by comparing the speeches of Peter and James at the Council in Jerusalem (Ac. 15.). If there was any one who wd. have stood firmly by the Hebrew, or in default of it by the Palestinian Targum, it was James, yet in his speech the quotation wh. he makes (and it is a long one) rests on the LXX mainly. So in Peter's speeches ; when, as in Ac. 2., he is addressing Jews, he quotes fm. the LXX. Although Stephen was a Hellenist, yet as his trial was before the Sanhedrin, and he had been a resident in Jerusalem, if Aramaic was the language commonly used then he certainly wd. have spoken in Aramaic, but judging by the evidence of quotations he did nothing of the kind.

So far, then, as we can sum up the evidence fm. quotations, it is all but conclusive in favour of Greek being the most commonly used language. In no matters are men so conservative as in those relating to religion ; no race is so conservative naturally as are the Jews. Yet it is fm. the Septuagint these Jews are represented as quoting, and it is fm. the Septuagint that our Lord quotes Scripture to them. Only two things prevent us from claiming the proof as being absolutely conclusive. In the first place, the uncertainty of the Heb. text. Our present Massoretic text, behind wh. it is impossible to go in the meantime, appears to have been founded on two texts, one wh. supplies the Qri, the other fm. wh. is drawn the K'thib. The MSS. fm. wh. these have been taken do not seem to have been chosen fm. any specially critical accuracy in them—if we may judge by the numerous blunders that have been perpetuated—but more probably as having belonged to some rabbi of great reputation for sanctity and knowledge of the Law. The Heb. text in Palestine at the time of our Lord may have differed fm. the present MT. in not a few features. In the second place the Greek text is also uncertain. Our ordinary LXX is a reprint of the Vatican text ; this in not a few cases is in opposition to the Alexandrian and the Sinaitic, not to speak of the Lucianic recension. Still, after every allowance is made, it is hardly possible to resist the conclusion that Greek, not Aramaic, was the prevalent tongue.

We would not pretend that there are no arguments in favour of the view wh. we oppose when so many distinguished scholars hold it. Not a few have regarded those Aramaic words and sentences we have referred to above not as exceptional, but as specimens of our Lord's ordinary mode of discourse. An answer to the difficulty of finding a reason for these being singled out is to assert that Mark, knowing that the instances in question were times of high excitement, chronicled the ipsissima verba then. While this might apply to the explanation on the cross, it wd. apply not only to the quotation from the 22nd Psalm, but also to all the other words then uttered; why was this alone given in the very words? One would have thought that if our Lord was in the habit of speaking Aramaic, certainly He must have said, when "He bowed His head and gave up the ghost," not τετέλεσται but meshalam, and then, if ever, was an occasion when the very word spoken should have been recorded. Though less striking, yet a case where one wd. have expected the evangelist to have given the Aramaic words used, if our Lord did use them, was when He commended His mother to the care of the beloved disciple. In fact all our Lord's sayings on the cross, even the simple cry of nature, "I thirst," wd. naturally be regarded as sacred, and given exactly as they were spoken. Only the quotation from Ps. 22. is given. The plea that the evangelist Mark desired to record times of emotion does not apply to the other cases. When Jesus unstopped the ears of the deaf mute with the word Ephphatha, there are neither symptoms of emotion nor occasion for it. While in His word to the little maid whom He raised fm. the dead there is tenderness, wh. is shown in using the Aramaic of the nursery to a child, and so worthy of being emphasised by the very words being recorded, there is no emotion shown or implied that moved the evangelist to single out this occasion had our Lord's custom been always to use Aramaic. But there are cases of emotion in wh. the evangelists do not give the Aramaic, as when He addresses the Pharisees as "Ye fools and blind" (Mw. 23.[17]). If they were in the habit of recording the very words in seasons of emotion, why did they not give the words here? As, however, it is Mark who alone gives these Aramaic phrases, it might be answered that while he had this habit the other evangelists had not. He, however, relates one oc asion in wh. our Lord was filled with emotion (Mk. 3.[5]): "He looked round about with anger"; yet the evangelist does not give the command addressed to the man with the withered hand in Aramaic. The most natural explanation is that Mark gave the Aramaic words where they were used because they threw light on the character of Jesus. One fails utterly to see the cogency of Zahn's assertion that because of these instances Jesus must have addressed the multitudes in Aramaic.

Zahn's discussion of the question in the Introductory Remarks to his Introduction to the New Testament is complicated by his superabundantly elaborate demonstration that it was not Hebrew our Lord spo'e. It ought to be noted that he refers to a various reading of our Lord's quotation of the 22nd Psalm found in the Vaticanus and the Latin of the Codex Bezæ, wh. if representing the original text wd. imply that not in Aramaic but in Hebrew did our Lord quote the psalm in question. This view is to some extent confirmed by the Ελωί wh. in WH. is found both in Mw. and Mk., a form that suggests Elohim rather than Elaha. That our Lord should give His disciples occasionally Aramaic surnames, wh. had the nature of "pet names" such as we find every day in families, does not prove that He used the language in wh. they were formed in ordinary conversation. It is admitted that Palestine was bi-lingual, and that the language within the home was most generally Aramaic. This is the state of matters in Wales and the Highlands of Scotland. Should one travel by railway in either of these places he will hear conversations between natives carried on not in Welsh or Gaelic but in English. The same thing may be noticed in Belgium. In such circumstances a kindly nickname wd. naturally be formed in the home-tongue, altho' for every other purpose English or French was employed. So too his arguments from certain place-names being in Aramaic (Gabbatha and Bethesda): these names might be, and prob. were, old, dating it might be before the Greek occupation. Aceldama is on a different footing. Assuming that the place was named from the purchase of the ground by the "price of blood," and from Judas' suicide on it, it was not an ancient name but given freshly. But it was connected with religious ideas, with horror against money tainted by treachery as was Judas' reward, and in regard to a place defiled by his suicide, so naturally the name wd. be in Aramaic. The shout of Hosanna, wh.—Aramaic as it is—proves that Hebrew was not the language of the multitude, does not prove that Aramaic was. It rather proves the contrary, for naturally the evangelist wd. have added le barch d'Daweed (Mw. 21.[9]), as these last words would be united in one act of hearing. The truth must be recognised that Hosanna had changed its meaning, and no longer meant "Save now," but had become merely an exclamation of congratulation, and so conveyed as little of the original meaning of the word as does Hallelujah when it occurs in a modern English hymn. The arguments from the fact that the Targum in Aramaic was still pronounced along with the Hebrew in reading the Law and the Prophets, merely proves the conservatism that exists in all nations, and most of all among the Jews, in regard to religion. A parallel is to be seen in Roman Catholic countries. The Bible was translated into Latin that it might be understood by those who cd. understand Latin but did not understand Greek, but it is continued to be read in Latin, after people have ceased to understand Latin, simply fm. conservatism. A singular side-evidence of this is to be found in the name "Onkelos," given to the Targum of the Law. The name is really "Aquila," the name of the translator of the slavishly accurate version of the Old Testament into Greek. This Targum of the Law was Onkelosi, as accurate as Aquila's Greek version—a proof that the Greek version was familiarly known. That this was the case a fact narrated by Jerome proves. He was anxious to get a copy of Aquila, but found great difficulty; at length he got one as a great favour fm. a synagogue in Galilee. Dr. Zahn's quotation fm. Eusebius showing that he declared Aramaic to be the mother tongue of the Syrians does not mean any more, as to the linguistic habits of the people, than the statement, equally true, as to the late Dr. Norman Macleod, that Gaelic was his mother tongue, which would not prove that he usually spoke in that tongue. Talmudic evidence is worthless, as the Talmud was not committed to writing till half a millennium after the events. The story of Gamaliel ordering the Targum of Job to be buried wd., if true, prove merely his objection to the Targum being committed to writing instead of being handed down orally. The Targum was committed to writing because the Aramaic version was liable to be forgotten, as the language had by the second century so nearly disappeared that it cd. no longer be left dependent on oral tradition.

We wd. not be held as maintaining that there are no arguments that can be advanced in favour of Aramaic being the most commonly used language. The principal are those that can be drawn fm. Josephus, some of wh. we have already considered.

There are, however, other arguments: the most important is the fact that tho' Josephus wrote his history first in Aramaic he translated it into Greek, and when he did so he got the assistance of friends. From this it has been argued that his knowledge of Greek was rudimentary. But a little thought will remove that idea. In regard to our own language there is a very considerable difference between literary English and the colloquial English wh. we speak and which we use in our ordinary correspondence. Still greater was the difference between the Greek wh. was spoken and familiarly written in Egypt and probably in Palestine, and the literary style of those who made Thucydides and Xenophon their models. When Dr. Livingstone returned from his first discoveries in Africa he got a literary friend to put his journals into literary form.

One incident that tells most strongly against the view I am inclined to adopt is the interview of Claudius Lysias with Paul (Ac. 21.[37, 38]), especially its opening sentence, "Canst thou speak Greek?" This is advanced by Pfannkuche. If it stood alone it wd. have great weight; it, however, is part of a considerable narrative. Immediately before he put his question to Paul, Lysias had demanded of the multitude who he was and what he had done, "and some cried one thing and some another among the multitude; and when he cd. not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle." Here it is clear the multitude understood the chiliarch's question and he understood the language of their answers, but the tumult hindered him fm. uniting all the conflicting statements into a comprehensible whole. Everything proves the captain of the garrison spoke Greek. It follows thus that his question applied merely to the individual in question—the Egyptian—who was known to be ignorant of Greek. It proves nothing as to the spread of the knowledge of Greek among the Jews.

Dr. Zahn admits the general prevalence of Greek among the inhabitants of cities, but thinks that the peasant class—those corresponding to the fellaḥīn of the present time—only knew Aramaic. But while we mt. admit the plausibility of this view, the question of the existence of a class, in any large numbers, in those days corresponding to the fellaḥin may require more proof than is available. The huge number of cities wh. Josephus asserts to have been in Galilee proves that a very large proportion of the cultivators of the soil were resident in cities. It was not unnatural that they shd. live in cities walled and fortified, as Palestine had been so often invaded in Greek times, and raided by robber tribes at other times, that the protection of cities wd. be sought. Simon the Cyrenian, when the soldiers compelled him to bear the cross, was coming in from (Mk. 15.[21]; Lk. 23.[16]) "the field" (ἀπ' ἀγροῦ). Many like him, while resident in cities, laboured in the fields. Thus it might seem likely that the fellaḥīn class was so small as to be negligible. Even they wd. have to master Greek to some extent, if only for the purposes of buying and selling. It is not unlikely that the prevalence of Greek wd. be greater in some portions of Palestine than in others. Galilee, as the region in wh. the Gentile element was prominent, wd. likely have a larger proportion of those who spoke Greek. Judea, where the most celebrated rabbins resided in our Lord's days, might be supposed to be more conservative of Jewish customs and language. It is to be noted that all examples wh. seem to imply the prevalence of Aramaic drawn fm. Josephus apply to Judea and Jerusalem. As our Lord's ministry was mainly in Galilee, this has little application to the present question ; while the prevalence of Greek in Galilee wd. imply that He spoke in Greek when He addressed the multitudes.

Fm. the number of Aramaic inscriptions found in Egypt it wd. seem not unlikely that Aramaic, like the modern Yiddish, was understood by Jews all over the world, hence Paul's introduction of Maranatha into an epistle directed to a Gentile church (1 Cor. 16.[22]) with the expectation that the force of the phrase wd. be understood.

We think it may be claimed that the balance of probability is decidedly in favour of Greek being the general medium of co versation between the people of the Holy Land while our Lord was in the world. While Aramaic was the language of the nursery and the home, in the street and the market-place that used was Greek. It is to be admitted that Prof. Marshall's interesting investigation as to the origin of the identities and differences between the Synoptists, and the probability of this being found in an Aramaic primitive document, has a certain weight in favour of the prevalence of Aramaic. It is certain that the explanations he suggests are at the least highly plausible : while against these explanations being correct is the fact that Luke as a Greek wd. be unlikely to understand Aramaic. Yet even if we granted Professor Marshall's hypothesis, this primitive Aramaic Gospel might exhibit the conservatism of the Jews, while, as the subject of the Gospel was of the highest religious value, it naturally wd. be, as not impossibly also was the Apocalypse, composed in Aramaic, if not in Hebrew. All this might be true and yet Greek be the generally spoken language. The question of the origin of the Gospels is now in another phase, wh. is elsewhere discussed. Irrespective of these questions, the common element might be handed fm. apostle to apostle, and evangelist to evangelist, as were the Aramaic Targums, although Greek might be the language in wh. it was composed, and the changes fm. the original deposit might be due to defective memory.

THE TEMPLE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

A

AARON (Heb. 'Aharōn), br. of Moses (Ex. 6.[20], P.; Nu. 26.[59]), three yrs. older (Ex. 7.[7], P.). A. seems to have acquired influence in his tribe; by Divine suggn. he came to meet Moses, and assembled the Elders of Isr. to confer with him (Ex. 4.[29], JE.). He became the associate and spokesman of his br. in their interviews with Pharaoh (Ex. 4.[14], JE.; 7.[1], P.). The Priesthood was fixed in his line (Ex. 28.[1], P.). While Moses was absent on the mountain, A. was intimidated into making the GOLDEN CALF (Ex. 32., JE.). Notwithstanding this, A. was not deprived of the P'hood. He was consecrated High Priest (Lv. 8.[1ff.]). A. united with Miriam agst. Moses (Nu. 12., JE.), when Moses was vindicated. The Reubenites, led by Dathan and Abiram, claimed the P'hood, prob. on the plea of primogeniture (Nu. 16., P.); Korah also objected to the lead among the Levites assumed by the sons of Amram. This rebellion was punished by the earth opening her mouth, and swallowing Dathan and Abiram and their followers. Korah and his company, when offering incense, were burnt up by the fire of God. The High P'hood of A. was ratified by the budding of his rod, while the rods representing the other tribes remained unchanged (Nu. 17., P.). This rod was preserved in the Holy of Holies before the Ark: later tradition asserted that it was placed, with the pot of manna, within the Ark.

A. married Elisheba, dr. of Amminadab, and had four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Ex. 6.[23], P.). The first two, offering strange fire on the altar, died before the Lord; consequently the P'hood descended in the lines of Eleazar and Ithamar. The High P'hood was in the line of Eleazar during the rule of the Judges: poss. in the person of Eli it passed into that of Ithamar: it returned to the line of Eleazar when Abiathar was dispossessed. Critical opinion is that Zadok was not an Aaronite. For this no proof is adduced. But see AHITUB.

ABADDON, the name given to the k. of the mystical army of locusts (Rv. 9.[11]), "the angel of the bottomless pit." The Gr. equivalent is Apollyōn. The Heb. term occurs thrice in Job, twice in Pr., and once in Ps., rendered by EV. "destruction." It is thrice associated with "Sheol," and once with "Death."

DAMASCUS. THE ABANA APPROACHING THE CITY FROM THE MOUNTAINS

ABANA or AMANA, one of "the rivers of Damascus" (2 K. 5.[12]), now el-Barada, the Gr. Chrisorrhoas. It is fed by the melting snows and springs of Anti-Lebanon. Draining the hollow S. of Zebedāny, it breaks E'ward through a charming gorge, Wādy Barada, on the S. bank of wh. tradition places the tomb of Abel. About five miles further down, the volume of water is more than doubled by the stream from 'Ain Fîjeh (Gr. pēgē), one of the most copious fountains in Syria. Then, turning to the SE., it follows the line of a deep, richly wooded vale, until, issuing from the mountains, it is tapped by many channels to irrigate the plain.

About half the ordinary volume of water is caught by an aqueduct higher up the valley, and led to the city along the face of the hill, the residue flowing citywards along the bed of the river. The A. forms the main water supply, and indeed makes poss. the life of Damascus. It gives fertility to the fields, fruitfulness to the orchards, and is lost at last in the marshy lakes E'ward.

ABARIM ('Abārīm), lit. "the parts beyond," i.e. beyond Jordan. Only once (Jr. 22.[20], AV. "passenger," RV. "Abarim") it appears without the article. It is usually connected with har or harê, "the mountain" or "mountains of Abarim" (Nu. 27.[12], &c.). In Nu. 21.[11], 33.[44], we have "Ije-Abarim" for Heb. 'Iyyê Ha'abārīm, lit. "the heaps" or "ruins of Abarim." But 'Iyyê may be the name of a city.

In Ek. 39.[11], perhaps we shd. read "in the valley of Abarim." A. seems to have been applied to the whole range E. of Jordan, as seen fm. the W.

ABBA, trltn. of stat. emph. of (Aram.) ab, "father." It was used by our Lord in his prayer in the Garden (Mk. 14.[36]). Paul employs it (Rm. 8.[15]; Gal. 4.[6]). It is always joined with ho patēr. It is addressed by children to their fr., never by servants to their master (cp. Gn. 22.[7], Psh. and Tg. O, with 2 K. 5.[13], Psh. and Tg. J.).

ABDON. (1) S. of Hillel, Ephraimite of Pirathon (Jg. 12.[13]). He had 40 sons, and 30 grandsons, who poss. were subordinate judges. He judged Isr. 8 yrs. (2) A Levite city in Asher (Jo. 21.[30]) = Abdah, E. of Achzib.

ABED-NEGO, the Bab. name of Azariah, Daniel's companion. It is put for Abed-nebo, to avoid using the name of a heathen deity (Dn. 1.[7]). See Daniel.

ABEL, "breath" or "vapour" (but cp. Asyr. aplu, "son"), second s. of Adam (Gn. 4.[2f.]). He was a shepherd, and because he offered to God a more acceptable sacrifice than that of his br. Cain, the latter slew him in a fit of jealousy.

A. ranks as the first martyr (Mw. 23.[35]), who, "death notwithstanding," speaketh still (He. 11.[4]): but "the blood of sprinkling" "appeals more mightily to God than did the blood of his martyred saint" (He. 12.[24]; see Davidson in loc.).

ABEL, "meadow." In 1 S. 6.[18], prob. = eben, "stone." (1) A. Beth-Maacha (2 S. 20.[14], &c.), usly. identd. with Abîl el-Qamḥ, "A. of Wheat," S. of Merj A'yun, and c. 6 miles W. of Baniâs, in the midst of fertile and well-watered land. It was captured by Benhadad (1 K. 15.[20]), and again by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 15.[29]). The vill. is perched on the mound covering the ancient fortress. (2) A-Ceramim, "A. of the vineyards," near Minnith in Moab (Jg. 11.[33]). (3) A-Maim = No. 1. (4) A-Meholah. "A. of the dance" (Jg. 7.[22]), the home of Elisha (1 K. 19.[16]), prob. the ruin near 'Aïn Helweh, c. 16 miles S. of Beisân. (5) A-Mizraim, "A. of the Egps.," or, if we read Êbel, "mourning of the Egps." (Gn. 50.[11]): not identd. (6) A-Shittim, "A. of acacias," in the plains of Moab. Over against Jericho, E. of Jordan, is the "Valley of Acacias," but no cert. identn. is yet poss.

ABI, ABIA, ABIAH. See Abijah.

ABIASAPH, "Father of Gathering" (Ex. 6.[24]; 1 Ch. 6.[23], Ebiasaph), head of one of the families of the Korhites.

ABIATHAR, "Father of Abundance," the only one of the sons of Ahimelech, the High Priest, who escaped the massacre at Nob. Escaping to Adullam with the sacred Ephod, he became David's priest. By firm friendship to A., David acknowledged the kindness of Ahimelech, which cost him his life. For his part A. continued faithful to David all his days. When Adonijah desired to secure the reversion of the kdm. A. followed him, and was dispossessed of the High P'hood by Solomon. A. was the last High Priest of the race of Ithamar (Ant. VIII. i. 3).

ABIEL, "my father is God," grandfr. of Saul and Abner (1 S. 9.[1], 14.[51]).

ABIEZER, "my father is help," eldest s. of Gilead (Nu. 26.[30], Jo. 17.[2], &c.). He, or the clan descended fm. him, appears to have migrated to the W. of Jordan and settled in Ophra. Gideon was his desct. The name was transferred to the district occupied by the clan (Jg. 8.[2]).

ABIGAIL (2 S. 3.[3], &c.; Heb. "Abigal"). (1) W. of Nabal, who, by her beauty and discretion, won the heart of David, the guerilla leader (1 S. 25.), and after Nabal's death became his w. She was his companion in adventure and peril (1 S. 27.[3], 30.[5-18]). When settled in Hebron, she bare him Chileab (2 S. 3.[3], LXX, Dalouia; 1 Ch. 3.[1], "Daniel"). (2) Dr. of Jesse (2 Ch. 2.[13-16]), or of Nahash (2 S. 17.[25]), sr. of Zeruiah, and also of David, if, as many critics suppose, "Nahash," in 2 S. 17., is a scribal error for "Jesse." She married Ithra the Ishmaelite, and became the mr. of Amasa.

ABIHAIL, "my father is might," w. of Rehoboam, dr. of Eliab, br. of David (2 Ch. 11.[18]). It is imposs. that A. cd. be the lit. dr. of Eliab, David's eldest br.; she prob. was a desct. in the third or fourth degree of descent.

ABIJAH, ABIJAM, "my fr. is Jah." (1) Dr. of Zechariah, mr. of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29.[1]), "Abi" in 2 K. 18.[2]. (2) S. of Rehoboam and Maacah the dr. of Absalom (2 Ch. 11.[20f.]). He reigned over two yrs. in Jrs., doing evil, but was preserved in the kdm. for David's sake (1 K. 14.[31], 15.[1ff.], "Abijam"). He waged war with Jeroboam, wh., accdg. to the Chronicler, culminated in the overwhelming defeat of the latter, A. taking cities fm. him (2 Ch. 13.).

There is no necessary discrepancy between this and the act. in K. A bad man posing as good is not very unusual. Jeroboam's defeat may only show that God can work with indifferent instruments. Baasha seems soon to have regained the captured towns (2 Ch. 13.[19], 16.[1]). Ephron is perhaps = Ephraim (Jn. 11.[54]; cp. 2 S. 13.[23]). What is further recorded of A. is not greatly to his credit. The rest has perished with the lost commentary of Iddo. (3) Second s. of Samuel (1 S. 8.[2]; 1 Ch. 6.[28], Abiah; RV. "Abijah"). (4) S. of Jeroboam I. who died in childhood, that he mt. be taken away "from the evil to come" (1 K. 14.[1, 13]). (5) A desct. of Eleazar, to whom the lot assigned the eighth course of the priests, of wh. Zechariah, the Baptist's fr., was a member (1 Ch. 24.[10]; Lk. 1.[5]). (6) Abiah, RV. "Abijah," s. of Becher (1 Ch. 7.[8]). (7) Abiah, RV. "Abijah," w. of Hezron, and mr. of the posthumous Asher (1 Ch. 2.[24]).

ABILENE, a tetrarchy lying between Chalcis and Damascus, with its capital at Abila (Lk. 3.[1]; Ant. XVIII. vi. 10, XIX. v. 1, XX. vii. 1; BJ. II. xi. 5). It prob. included the Anti-Lebanon and Mt. Hermon. Abila stood on the Chrisorrhoas—the Barada—c. 16 miles fm. Damascus. This corrspds. with anct. ruins at Sūq Wādy Barada, a vill. on the bank of the stream where the rich plain opens below the gorge.

The name Neby Habil, applied to the tomb on the S. height, is cert. derived fm. that of the city. The tetrarchy was prob. founded c. B.C. 4, when the inheritance of Herod the Gt. was divided. Agrippa I. was confirmed in possession of it when Caligula came to the throne in A.D. 37. After Agrippa's death in A.D. 44 it was administered by the Rms., until in A.D. 53 it was granted by Claudius to Agrippa II. It was finally merged in the province of Syria.

ABIMELECH, "my fr. is k." (1) S. of Gideon by a Shechemite concubine. Assisted by his Shechemite kinsfolk he declared himself k., and put to death all his brs. save JOTHAM, who escaped (Jg. 9.[1f.]). While the men of Shechem were engaged in the festivities of the coronation, Jotham appeared on the slope of Gerizim and addressed to the assembled people the parable of the trees choosing a k. We cannot tell the size of the kdm. of A., but it must have extended over a considerable portion of Pal. His reign was in some respects salutary. He is recognised as a defender of Isr. (Jg. 10.[1]). During the absence of A. the Shechemites rebelled and called in GAAL, a partisan warrior. A. returned, and having captured the city, wreaked his vengeance on the inhabitants. Thebez, a neighbouring town wh. had joined in the rebellion, was besieged by him. Having taken the town he was pressing the siege of the citadel when, on his approaching too near the door, a woman threw a piece of a millstone, wh. so injured him that he entreated his armour-bearer to thrust him through, that he mt. escape the ignominy of being slain by a woman. Thus died, assailing an obscure town, the first aspirant to the throne of Isr. (2) K. of Gerar, contemporary with ABRAHAM. (3) K. of Gerar, contemporary with ISAAC. A. may have been a title implying hereditary k'ship. This prob. explains the title of Ps. 34., where A. stands in place of ACHISH.

ABINADAB, "the fr. of liberality." (1) A Levite of Kiriath-Jearim, in whose house the Ark abode 20 yrs. (1 S. 7.[2]). He was fr. of Uzzah and Ahio. (2) Second s. of Jesse (1 S. 16.[8]). (3) S. of SAUL, slain on Mt. Gilboa (1 S. 31.[2]).

ABIRAM, "my fr. is high." See DATHAN.

ABISHAG, a very fair damsel fm. Shunem, brought to cherish k. David in the feebleness of old age (1 K. 1.). Later she was the object of an intrigue between Adonijah and Bathsheba, wh. proved fatal to that aspiring prince (1 K. 2.[13f.]). See BATHSHEBA.

ABISHAI, David's nephew, s. of Zeruiah (1 Ch. 2.^{16}). He appears as a man of great personal intrepidity, skill, and prowess in battle. He was ready for any perilous enterprise, going e.g. with David by night into the camp of Saul, to the very side of the sleeping k. (1 S. 26.$^{6f.}$). He shared in the victory over Edom in the Valley of Salt (1 Ch. 18.^{12}). He held high command in the campaign agst. the Ammonites (2 S. 10.$^{10, 14}$). He succoured David fm. Ishbi-Benob, slaying the giant (2 S. 21.$^{16f.}$). He was chief of the mighty three who brake through the host of the Phil., and drew water fm. the well of Bethlehem for David (2 S. 23.$^{16ff.}$). His slaughter of 300 men confirmed his claim to high rank among the heroes of David.

Withal he appears as something of the swashbuckler, with little in him of chivalry or generosity. He wd. have slain the sleeping Saul. He bears with Joab the guilt of Abner's murder (2 S. 3.^{30}). He wished instantly to slay Shimei (2 S. 16.$^{9f.}$), and later thought only of vengeance (2 S. 19.^{21}). He seems to have been privy to the murder of Amasa (2 S. 20^{10}, Ant. VII. xi. 7). Prob. he died before David: otherwise a person of his consequence wd. have been heard of in connection with Adonijah's revolt.

ABISHALOM = ABSALOM.

ABNER is said to be the cousin of Saul (1 S. 14.$^{50f.}$, where v.^{51} shd. evidently read " Kish the fr. of Saul, and Ner. the fr. of A., were sons of Abiel "). This is more likely than the act., given in 1 Ch. 8.$^{29, 33}$, 9.$^{35, 39}$, wh. makes him Saul's uncle (cp. Ant. VI. iv. 3, vi. 6). Accdg. to Jewish tradition the witch of Endor was his mr. Saul made him captain of the host (1 S. 14.^{50}, 17.^{55}), and after Saul's death he was the main support of Ishbosheth. A. seems to have had little pleasure in bloodshed, and to have slain unwillingly (2 S.2.$^{14, 22, 26}$). Ishbosheth deeply offended him by a suggn. of disloyalty. He went to Hebron, and undertook negotiations for uniting Isr. under the sceptre of David. He departed on his errand, but to the great sorrow and indignation of David he was treacherously recalled and murdered by Joab and Abishai, for the blood of Asahel whom A. had slain in battle (2 S. 3.$^{26, 27, 30}$).

A.'s death broke the spt. of Isr.'s resistance. Ishbosheth was murdered, and his head buried in A.'s tomb (2 S. 4.^{12}). It may be evidence of A.'s piety that "out of the spoil won in battles" he dedicated "to repair the house of the Lord" (1 Ch. 26.^{27}). A.'s s. Jaasiel is mentioned later, as over the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch. 27.^{21}).

ABOMINATION. (1) Tōʿabah, " an abhorrence." It was an A. to the Egps. to eat with the Hebs. (Gn. 43.^{32}) : Shepherds they held an A., as also sacrifice of animals sacred to them (Gn. 46.^{34}; Ex. 8.^{26}) ; evil practices were the " A. to the Lord " (Dt. 12.^{31}). (2) Piggūl, " fetid," sacrifices left till the third day (Lv. 7.^{18}). (3) Sheqetz, " unclean," the flesh of animals forbidden by the law to be eaten (Lv. 11.^{10}). (4) Shiqqūtz, " detestable," usly. of idols ; e.g. of Milcom (1 K. 11.^{5}).

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. This phrase occurs twice in the Gospels (Mw. 24.^{15}; Mk. 13.^{14}) ; three times in DANIEL (9.^{27}, 11.^{31}, 12.^{11}). The Gr. is bdelugma tōn erēmōseōn ; the Heb. shiqqutz mĕshomēm and shomēm. The refce. of the phrase in our Lord's mouth was to the presence of the Roman standards in the Temple. A. of D. occurs in 1 M. 1.^{54}, and there applies to the placing by order of Antiochus of the altar of Zeus on the Brazen Altar in the Court of the Temple. In Dn. the A. of D. is somewhat more difficult. RV. renders 9.^{27}, " upon the wing of abominations shall be one that maketh desolate " ; MT. is corrupt, as neither in LXX, nor Thd. of Gr. VV. ; nor in the Vlg., nor Vetus of Lat., is there any trace of kanaph, " wing." The text behind the words of our Lord cd. not have contained it, else the suitability of " wing " to Rm. "Eagles " wd. have necessitated a refce. to the word. Psh. has it, but makes it pl. The true rdg. is evidently qōdesh, answering to hieron of the two Gr. VV., the en topō hagiō of Mw., the hopou ou dei of Mk., sancto of the Vetus, and templo of the Vlg. The A. of D. in Dn. 11.^{31} and in 12.^{11} are echoes of 9.^{27} ; in Dn. 11.^{31} the refce. as in 1 M. 1.^{54}, is to the action of Epiphanes placing the altar of Zeus in the Temple : of the other passage no tenable interpretation has been suggd.

ABRAHAM is the most important fig. of antiquity. With him as the great ancestor of the Heb. race, the hist. of Isr. begins. Born in Ur of the Chaldees, the s. of Terah, an idolater (Jo. 24.^{2}), he set out with his fr., his w. Sarai, who was also his half sr. (Gn. 20.^{12}), and Lot his nephew, and settled for a time in Ḥaran, where Terah died (Gn. 11.$^{31ff.}$). Thence, at the call of God, he went into Canaan, taking his w. and nephew, with his household and property (Gn. 12.$^{1ff.}$). At Shechem A. first received the promise of the land. There he built an altar to the Lord : a second he built at Bethel, as he journeyed S. (Gn. 12.$^{7-9}$). Dearth in Can. drove A. to Egp., where, calling Sarai his sr., he brought her into grave danger. God protected her, and A. returned to Can. with the reproach of Pharaoh, whom he had deceived (Gn. 12.^{10}–13.^{1}).

Overcrowding of the pasturage by the greatly increased flocks of A. and Lot, led to continual bickerings between their respective herdsmen. At Bethel therefore, in the interest of peace, A. separated from Lot, generously permitting the latter to claim and occupy the rich lands in the Jordan Valley; and God's favour was marked by a repetition of the promise to him and to his seed. A. then moved to Hebron (Gn. 13.).

The cities in the Jordan Valley having rebelled against CHEDORLAOMER, he marched upon them with his subject princes, and, having overwhelmed their armies in the Vale of Siddim, sacked the cities, carrying off much plunder, and many prisoners, among whom was Lot. With a small force, augmented by his confederates, Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner, A. pursued the victors, surprised them in a night attack, utterly routed them, and rescued both booty and captives. On his return he was met by MELCHIZEDEK, k. of Salem, who blessed him, to whom as "priest of God Most High" he gave "a tenth of all." Fm. the k. of Sodom he wd. take nothing but the portion of his allies (Gn. 14.).

A., now an old man and childless, doubted the promise to his seed. God therefore renewed the promise, with foreshadowings of a vast posterity and a great hist., and confirmed it by a weird and impressive ceremonial (Gn. 15.).

Sarai, her hope crushed by multitude of years, adopted an expedient common in the country she had left (Laws of Ḥammurabi, Johns, 146), soon bitterly repented of, by wh. Hagar the Egyptian maid became the mr. of Ishmael (Gn. 16.$^{1ff.}$). A great future was promised to Ishmael, but only a s. of Sarai could inherit A.'s blessing. In his hundredth yr., God changed the name of Abram, "exalted father," to Abraham, wh. is explained to signify that he wd. be the fr. of many nations (Gn. 17.^{5}), and the rite of circumcision was prescribed "as a token of the covenant." When she was ninety years old Sarai's name was changed to Sarah, and she was assured of a s., whereat A., incredulous, laughed. This suggd. the s's. name, Isaac, fm. the Heb. verb "to laugh."

A. entertained "unawares" the angels who were going to the cities of the plain, and One greater than the angels, who reiterated the promise of a s. by Sarah, despite her unbelieving laughter. The angels set out for SODOM, and the Lord told A. of its impending destruction. Then followed A.'s memorable, tho' ineffectual intercession. Next morning, going up to the scene of the intercession, A. saw the smoke of the burning cities ascending like that of a mighty furnace (Gn. 19.$^{27f.}$).

At Gerar Sarah was delivered fm. a danger similar to that wh. had threatened her in Egp. (Gn. 20.), and at the appointed time her s. Isaac was born (Gn. 21.$^{1ff.}$). At her instance Ishmael and his mr. were driven away (Gn. 21.$^{9ff.}$). Abimelech, the Phil. k., desired an alliance with A., now a wealthy and powerful chief, and terms were arranged and sealed at Beersheba (Gn. 21.$^{22ff.}$).

While sojourning in the Phil. country, A.'s faith endured its sternest test by the command to slay in sacrifice his s. Isaac. The trial was borne triumphantly, and the occasion was used to discourage human sacrifice, showing that the spt. of loyal obedience and submission was alone acceptable to God (Gn. 22.).

When Sarah died, A. bought the Cave of Machpelah as a burying-place. His first possession in the land of promise was a grave (Gn. 23.).

Realising his approaching end, A. sent his servant to Haran, who brought Rebekah thence, fm. among his own people, as a w. for Isaac (Gn. 24.).

A second w. of A. was Keturah, by whom he had six sons (Gn. 25.$^{1ff.}$): to the sons of his concubines he gave gifts, and sent them E'wards away fm. Isaac, who shd. be his sole heir. At the age of 175 A. died, and was buried by Isaac and Ishmael in the Cave of Machpelah (Gn. 25.).

The familiar intercourse of God with A. gained him the name of "Friend of God," by wh. he is known in the E. to this day—Khalîl Ullah, or simply el-Khalîl, "The Friend" (2 Ch. 20.^{7}; Is. 41.^{8}; Js. 2.^{23}). His faith, wh. was "counted to him for righteousness" (Gn. 15.^{6}; Rm. 4.^{3}), by wh. he secured the blessing, became a perpetual theme of admiration (He. 11.$^{8ff.}$). Mere nat. descent from A. was popularly supposed to serve men heirs to his sptl. inheritance—an error wh. the Baptist, Jesus Christ, and His followers earnestly controverted (Mw. 3.^{9}; Lk. 3.^{8}; Jn. 8.$^{33f.}$; Rm. 9.^{7}). By faith the Gentiles are brought within range of the promise, and are blessed with faithful A. (Gal. 3.^{9}).

A. ranks not only as the great ancestor of many peoples, but as the "prophet" (Gn. 20.^{7}), through whom the revelation was begun; as the founder of that relg. wh. is to gather all nations within its scope. So closely is the revelation associated with A., that the Supreme Deity is never spoken of in Scrip. as the God of Adam, Enoch, or Noah, but only as the God of A. and his descts.

No success has attended the effort to assign the fig. of A. to the realm of mythology; while the theory wh. explains the incidents in his hist. as reflections of the movements and intercourse of peoples and tribes, although ingenious, is not convincing.

For the critical analysis of the relevant passages in Gn., supported by the majority of critics, see Driver, LOT.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM (Lk. 16.$^{22f.}$), in wh. to lie marks the bliss of Paradise, in contrast with the misery of Hades.

This fig. is taken fm. the custom of reclining at meals, where, if one leans back, his head will rest in the bosom of the one next him. Thus at the supper, the beloved disciple leans "on Jesus' breast." The most highly honoured guest was placed in this position next the host, the most intimate and friendly relation being thus indicated. The position of the Son relatively to the Father is so described. He is "in the bosom of the Father" (Jn. 1.^{18}). To the pious Isr. the reward of fidelity on earth was entrance into the society of A., Isaac, and Jacob (4 M. 13.^{15}; Mw. 8.^{12}).

For later developments and Lit., see Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 342ff.

ABRECH, trltn. of a Heb. word: EV. translates "bow the knee" (Gn. 41.^{43}). No quite satisfactory explanation has been suggd. EV. is perhaps as good as any (LXX, "herald," Psh. "father and ruler," Aq. "kneel").

ABSALOM, third s. of David, was of royal descent on both sides, his mr. being Maacah, dr. of the k. of Geshur (2 S. 3.^{3}). To avenge the outrage on his

sr. Tamar, he compassed the death of his br. Amnon, and took refuge fm. David's wrath with Talmai, his maternal grandfr. (2 S. 13.[20ff.]). But "the king's heart was toward A." This Joab observed, and by means of a wise woman of Tekoa, secured his recall, after three yrs. of exile (2 S. 14.[1ff.]). Two yrs., however, passed ere A. cd. bring about complete reconciliation with his fr. A. was truly a princely fig.: "in all Isr. there was none to be so much praised for his beauty" (1 S. 14.[25ff.]). His ambitions were equal to his appearance, and his abilities were not far short. He provided a bodyguard for himself (cp. Pisistratus, Herodotus i. 59); and prepared the way for a revolt by cunningly cultivating the goodwill of the people (1 S. 15.[1ff.]). After four yrs. he raised his standard at Hebron, the old capital of the kdm. At first his revolt was extraordinarily successful. Even David of the lion-heart, struck with fear, fled with such troops as he cd. muster to Mahanaim beyond Jordan. The adhesion of Ahithophel promised well for A. By his advice, on coming to Jrs., A. took possession of the royal harîm, thus making the breach with his fr. absolute. Ahithophel further counselled a swift descent upon the fugitive k. in his weariness and weakness; but Hushai, David's friend, who had joined A. in order to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel, drew such a picture of the old warrior k. at bay, that his plan of caution was adopted, and A.'s opportunity was lost. Tidings were sent to David, and Ahithophel, seeing his counsel ignored, and knowing doubtless that this meant the failure of A.'s enterprise, and ruin to all who favoured him, went home and hanged himself (2 S. 16., 17.).

A rally to David at Mahanaim enabled him to send a formidable force to meet A., whose army was routed in the Forest of Ephraim. A. himself, caught by the head in the branches of a terebinth, was slain by Joab, in spite of the k.'s order to "deal gently" with him. David's lament for his s. is one of the most pathetic in all hist. The body of A. was treated as that of a criminal (2 S. 18.).

A.'s sons evidently died before him, and so to keep his name in remembrance, he erected a pillar in the k.'s dale (2 S. 18.[18]), of wh. there is now no trace. The monument in the Kidron Valley is obviously of much more recent date, prob. of the Herodian period.

ACCAD ('Akkad), a city in N. Babylonia, prob. = Agada, near Sepharvaim (Sipparu), and absorbed by it. It is grouped with Babel, Erech, and Calneh (Gn. 10.[10]). Here reigned Sargon I., the first ruler of all Bab. A. united with Sumir in the titles of Asyr. and Bab. ks., is supposed to mean N. with S. Bab. The lang. in wh. the sacred texts of Asyr. and Bab. were originally written is called Accadian, the lang. of Accad. It is agglutinative.

ACCHO, RV. ACCO, a strong city on the seaboard of Asher (Jg. 1.[33]; BJ. II. x. 2), never conquered by Isr., the Ptolemais of 1 M. and NT.; St. Jean d'Acre, Accaron, and Acon of later days; poss. Ocina of Jth. 2.[28]; the mod. 'Akka. It stands on the N. point of the Bay of Acre, facing the promontory of Carmel in the S., under wh. lies the mod. town of Ḥaifa. A rich and fertile plain, watered by the Belus and the Kishon, stretches inland to the foot of the mountains of Galilee.

A. is a city of 10,000 to 12 000 inhabitants, mainly Moslems. The Governor controls the districts of Ḥaifa, Tiberias, and Safed. Recently that of Nazareth was detached, and placed under Jrs. The town is entered by a strong gateway in the S. The sea-wall is much broken, and the inner harbour has disappeared. The landward defence is a double rampart. The railway connecting the Ḥaurân with Ḥaifa and Damascus will diminish its grain trade; but oil fm. the olive groves of Galilee will still be a valuable export.

Fm. the days of its alliance with Tyre and Sidon until it fell into the hands of Rm., few cities have had a stormier career, or have passed through greater vicissitudes. Under the name of Ptolemais it appears for the last time in Scrip. as a place visited by the apostle Paul (Ac. 21.[7]).

ACELDAMA (RV. Akeldama). With the price of blood a field was bought by the traitor Judas for himself (Ac. 1.[18f.]), or by the chief priests, "to bury strangers in" (Mw. 27.[6f.]). In allusion to Zc. 11.[13], it is called "the potter's field" (Mw. 27.[7, 10]); and fm. that time Akeldama, "the field of blood." The translation is exact: the Aram. ḥaqēl demā cannot be otherwise rendered.* From the fourth cent. tradition has located this field S. of the lower part of the Vale of Hinnom. In the time of the Latin kdm. a large charnel-house was erected by the Hospitallers on the brim of the valley. This is still called sharmen = "charnel," or (by Christians) Hakeldama, Arb. Ḥaqq ed-Dam, "blood price." But the name shamā, wh. is the old French chandemar = champ dema, is attached to the sloping ground above the charnel-house, where, in fact, a field wd.

be located, rather than on the steep edge of the valley. If strangers were buried there it wd. hardly be in the luxurious rock-hewn sepulchres in the face of the declivity, among wh. was the tomb of the high priest Ananos (BJ. V. xii. 2), but in simple pit graves, like those of the lower class of the people.

G. H. DALMAN.

ACHAIA in the NT. signifies the Rm. province of that name. The anct. A. on the S. shore of the Gulf of Corinth was merged in Macedonia at its conquest in B.C. 146. The separate province was constituted in B.C. 27, including Peloponnesus, Thessaly, Ætolia, Acarnania, perhaps Epirus, with Eubœa, and certain islands, excepting the free cities. At first it was a senatorial province: under Tiberius it was again joined to Macedonia as an Imperial province. From the time of Claudius it was senatorial, under a proconsul, whose seat was in Corinth. Prob. c. A.D. 44. Thessaly was added to Macedonia, Epirus and Acarnania becoming a separate province. While "Greece" in Ac. 20.[2] clearly means A., genly. the whole of Greece must be taken as comprehended in "Macedonia and A.," so frequently mentioned together (Ac. 19.[21]; Rm. 15.[26]; 2 Cor. 9.[2]; 1 Th. 1.[8]).

As in most cities of importance, there were trading communities of Jews in Athens and Corinth (Ac. 17.[17], 18.[4ff.]).

ACHAN, s. of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 2.[7], Achar). Although everything in Jericho had been devoted, A. took 100 shekels of silver, a wedge of gold, and a Babylonish garment (see Macalister, Bible Side-lights, 121ff.). The repulse of Isr. before Ai led to investigation. By the lot A.'s guilt was discovered, and, with his family, he was stoned in the Valley of Achor (Jo. 6.[17f.], 7.[1f.]). The fate of A.'s children seems opposed to Dt. 24.[16]; but that refers to crimes against society: this is a sin against God. The punishment of children was only an intensification of the shame we attribute to relatives of criminals.

ACHISH, k. of Gath, to whom David twice fled fm. Saul. His first stay ended with his feigning madness, in consequence of learning that the servants of A. recognised him as slayer of Goliath (1 S. 21.[11ff.]). When the pursuit of Saul manifested itself as relentless, David again betook himself to A. (1 S. 27.[1]). Before the battle of Gilboa A. made David and his men his bodyguard; the Lords of the Phil. wd. not allow him to go into the battle (1 S. 29.[6f.]). It is unlikely that the A. to whom the servants of Shimei fled was the above; prob. his grandson (1 K. 2.[39]).

ACHMETHA (mod. Hamadân), the capital of the province of Media, where the records of the reign of Cyrus were kept. In A. was found the record of the decree of Cyrus in regard to the return of the Jews to their own land and the rebuilding of the Temple (Ez. 6.[2]). The Agbatane (Ecbatane), described by Herodotus, and ascribed to Deioces, is a different place.

ACHOR, 'ēmeq 'ākhōr, "Vale of Trouble" (Jo. 15.[7]; Is. 65.[10]; Ho. 2.[15]), on the boundary between Judah and Benj., the scene of Achan's execution (Jo. 7.[24ff.]). It is prob. Wādy Qelt, wh. opens on the plain to the W. of mod. Jericho.

ACHSAH, dr. of Caleb, w. of Othniel, who won her as the reward of taking Debir. At her request springs were added to her dowry, the dry Negeb (Jo. 15.[16ff.]; Jg. 1.[12ff.]; 1 Ch. 2.[49]).

ACHSHAPH, a royal city of the Can. (Jo. 11.[1], 12.[20]), on the border of Asher (Jo. 19.[25]). Khirbet el-Kesāf prob. represents the anct. town. It lies S. of Nahr el-Qāsimîyeh, with ruins dating fm. the 5th cent. A.D. The difficulties in the way of ident. with any site further S. seem to be insuperable.

ACHZIB. (1) A city in Judah named between Keilah and Mareshah (Jo. 15.[44]). It was near ADULLAM (Gn. 38.[5] = Chezib), and is mentioned in Mi. 1.[14]—Achzib = "a lie"—and in 1 Ch. 4.[22]. It is prob. 'Ain el-Kezbah, in Wādy es-Sunṭ. (2) A town on the boundary of Asher by the sea, of wh. the tribe did not dispossess the Can. (Jo. 19.[29]; Jg. 1.[31]). OEJ. places it 9 Rm. miles fm. Ptolemais, on the way to Tyre. This points definitely to ez-Zib, a wretched hamlet overlooking the sea.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, THE. This is the fifth bk. of the NT. Canon. It is an act. of the labours of St. Paul, to wh. chaps. 1.–12., recording the founding of the Church under the leadership of Peter, the breaking down of the separation between Jew and Gentile, and the preparation of St. Paul for his Mission, form the Introduction. These chaps. fall into two sections. The first, ending with chap. 5., recounts the Ascension, the election of Matthias, and the events of the day of Pentecost; the descent of the Holy Ghost, and Peter's sermon, when 3000 were converted. The healing of the lame man by Peter and John led to the Apostles' trial before the Sanhedrin, and so to a further opportunity of proclaiming the Gospel, when 5000 were converted. The whole section ends with Gamaliel's decision that the matter may be of God. The next section narrates the appointment of Deacons, the zeal of Stephen, his trial and execution, wh. Paul is introduced as superintending. The persecution thus begun scattered the brethren, some of whom preached the Gospel in Samaria. While journeying to Damascus to carry on the inquisition he had pursued in Jrs., Saul was met by Jesus, and being converted, he began to preach the faith he had sought to destroy. On his return to Jrs. the brethren received him with suspicion; and, to escape a conspiracy, he was hurried off to Tarsus. The division between Jew and Gentile was still further narrowed by the visit of Peter to Cornelius, and the Council at Jrs. wh. followed.

While God was leading Peter into wider views, and through him the disciples in Jrs., the matter came up in Antioch in another way. There men of Cyprus and Cyrene spoke to the Greeks, preaching the Lord Jesus. Their success led to the mission of Barnabas, who sympathised with the movement. He recognised in the new field thus opening, a sphere for wh. his friend was specially fitted, and went to Tarsus to seek Saul. The two friends were sent shortly after to bear a gift for the relief of the poor saints in Jrs.: a tribute of love to the mother Church. That Church was then suffering persecution: James had been slain; Peter was arrested, but was delivered by an angel. With the return of Barnabas and Saul to Antioch, taking with them John Mark, the Introduction ends. For the nar. that follows, see PAUL. Parts of Paul's life are treated in great detail: others are passed over in silence. The writer wd. naturally give ampler space to the things of wh. he claimed to be an eye-witness: want of information may explain the blanks. The nar. ends without recording Paul's death. Perhaps the writer designed a third treatise: if written, it has not been preserved.

The Text of A. has come to us in five great Uncials, ℵABCD, and the Codex Laudianus (E), and several Cursives: of VV., Vlg., and Psh., besides Heraclean Syr. and Old Lat., Codex Bezae presents many peculiar rdgs., of wh. no quite satisfactory solution has been offered.

A. was not early, or much quoted, but Papias knew it; he refers to Philip the Deacon and his drs. (Ac. 21.^{9}), and to Justus Barsabas (Ac. 1.^{23}). Eusebius does not report him as quoting A. Irenæus, Tertullian, Hyppolytus, and Clement of Alexandria quote frequently. There are echoes of A. to be found in Ignatius, Polycarp, and others.

The author of the third Gospel is universally admitted to be the writer of A. The style is identical. Some half cent. ago Zeller hinted a doubt, but no critic has yet followed his suggn. Unwavering tradition identifies the author with Luke, the companion of St. Paul. Acceptance of this wd. practically settle the questions of date and historicity.

The unity of A. has been impugned: it is alleged that a writer of the 1st or 2nd decade of the 2nd cent. found an itinerary of St. Paul's Missionary Journeys, and added to these various legendary incidents. Agst. this we must set the unity of style and of plan; and consider the relation of the speeches, the "we" passages, and the itineraries to the whole. Classical authors habitually composed speeches, expressing not what was actually said, but what they thought might suitably have been said. In these cases the authors' own style prevails throughout the speeches. In A. this is not so. Tertullus does not speak like James, nor either of them like Paul. The speeches are poss. condensed in some instances fm. notes taken at the time, and in others, fm. oral reports of those who had been present. But while the speeches differ in style fm. each other and fm. the author, the "we" passages, the itineraries, and the rest of the book are identical in style. The writer prob. used authorities, written or oral, as he did in the Gospel. Alford (NT. vol. ii.) points out that in chaps. 17.^{16}–18.^{5}, where Paul is left alone, there are phrases foreign to Luke's style, consonant with that of Paul. The incident in chap. 8. may have been supplied by Philip; the gen. hist. of the foundation of the Church by Peter, James, or John Mark; and so with the rest. There is no good reason to doubt the unity of A.

The questions of date and authorship are closely related. If, as tradition asserts, Luke was the author, A. cannot be later than the last quarter of the 1st cent. Some who regard A. as written, in part at least, by a companion of St. Paul, have suggd. other names, e.g. Silas and Timothy; but there are conclusive reasons why none of these cd. have written the "we" passages: cp. 16.$^{16\text{-}18}$, 20.$^{5,\,6}$. Harnack has recently shown the high probability that the writer was a physician, as we know Luke was (Col. 4.^{14}). Accdg. to A., he accompanies Paul to Rm., and there we find him in Col. 4.[14], 2 Tm. 4.[11], and Phm.[23]. The accuracy in details points to the hand of a contemporary. The writer knows, e.g., the varying titles borne by the magistrates in different cities: strategi in Philippi, and politarchæ in Thessalonica: in Roman Asia there are functionaries called Asiarchs: the city of Ephesus glories in the title of neokoros to Artemis: Gallio is proconsul in Corinth when Paul is there. This exact kge. is in striking contrast with the wild confusion of the Clementines. Mistakes in such matters are easily made. Sir G. O. Trevelyan, writing in Macmillan, spoke of "Aldermen" in Scottish towns, where "Bailies" were intended. Sir William M. Ramsay has also shown the author's accurate kge. of geographical details.

The alleged diffcs. between A. and the Pauline Epp. is made an objn. to the Lucan authorship. The autobiographic notes in Gal. and 1 and 2 Cor. do not fit easily into the scheme of the Apostle's life shown in A. But the diffc. of purpose explains why Luke did not include the events alluded to by Paul in his Epp. The Pauline Epp. were early collected, and a falsarius, whatever he left out, wd. cert. have noted the events vouched for by the Apostle himself.

Again, it is objected that the teaching of Paul in A. differs fm. that in the Epp. But the discourses in A. are addressed to unbelievers, the Epp. to believers; natly. the teaching differs. A falsarius, with the Pauline Epp. before him, wd. have been tempted to make the discourses centos fm. the Epp., as was done by the author of the Epistle to the Laodicæans.

As to the purpose of A., Baur maintained that it was intended to be an eirenicon between the school of Paul and that of the older Apostles; thus, he says, Peter is made to speak the lang. of Paul, and Paul's attitude to the Judaisers appears much more conciliatory than it really was. Regarding the first point, it is necessary to note that the resemblance between 1 P. and the Pauline Epp. is very great. As to the second, Paul's attitude towards the Judaisers who traduced himself and tried to sap his work, is natly. difft. fm. that towards the Apostles, who were willing, he tells us in Gal., to acknowledge his Mission to the Gentiles.

Further, there is said to be an artificial symmetry between the miracles attributed to Paul and those ascribed to Peter. But, if the writer had wished to institute a parallel between these two apostles, he wd. surely have made it more obvious. It wd. not have been left to a professor in the 19th cent. to make the discovery. It is much more natl. to take A. as an act. of the work of Christ among the Gentiles, carried on by Paul, introduced by a nar. of the foundation of the Church, and the preparation for its spread beyond the limits of Judaism.

The alleged resemblances between Jos. and A. have been taken to prove that the author of A. must have read Jos. The resemblances are slight, and are more than counterbalanced by diffcs. Of course some critics, as Overbeck, reject the miraculous as incredible. But miracles are incredible only on the assumption that the miraculous is proved to be impossible.

ADADAH, 'ad'adah (Jo. 15.[22]). Prob. we should read 'ar'arah, answering to Aroer (1 S. 30.[28]), now 'Ar'ara, S.E. of Beersheba.

ADAM, a city in the Jordan Valley (Jo. 3.[16]), prob. situated at Tell ed-Dāmieh, near the mouth of the Jabbok. Moore (Judges, p. 212) suggests that in 1 K. 7.[46] we should read במעברה (ה)אדמה instead of the meaningless במעבה, and render "at the crossing (ford) of Adamah" = A. of Jo. 3.[16]. The bridge built by Sultan Bibars is a ruin; the ford is still in constant use.

ADAM, the name of the first man (Gn. 5.[1], P. 'ādām). The word also denotes "mankind" (2.[7]). The name is connected with 'adāmāh, "ground," of the dust of wh. man is formed. He is placed in a garden prepared for him, to dress it. He names all creatures as they pass before him. He is companionless until God forms Eve to be his w. At the suggn. of the serpent, the two disobey the command: they eat of "the tree of the kge. of good and evil," and are expelled fm. Eden, under sentence of death. Subsequently Cain, Abel, and Seth are born to them. Having begot "sons and drs.," A. dies at the age of 930 yrs.

Accdg. to LXX, A. was 230 yrs. of age when Seth was born. There are several myths of the origin of man: see Creation. There are also traces of a story of the Fall in cert. mythologies, most clearly in the Zenda-Vesta. In singular illustration of the Bible story, Darwin asserted on scientific grounds that man must have been originally unisexual. None the less wd. he be created by God fm. the dust of the ground, that a million generations of inferior creatures intervened between the dust and the man.

ADAM, BOOKS OF. (1) A Christian Apocalypse found in four recensions—Ethiopic, Syr., Gr., and Lat. (2) Testament of A. in Syr. (3) The sacred bk. of the Mandæans, wh., however, has little resemblance to the preceding. The "Apoc. of A." and the "Test. of A." seem to have been founded on a Jewish Midrash of wh. there are traces in the Tlm. In the Qabbala, many of the elements of wh. are pre-Christian, although its present form is mediæval, Adam Qadmon is an important factor. The Apostle Paul may have a reference to this (1 Cor. 15.[45f.]). But the analogue to A. Qadmon is Paul's "second A."

ADAMAH (Jo. 19.[36]) is located with some cert. at 'Admah, c. 10 miles N. of Beisân, on the high land W. of the Jordan Valley.

ADAMANT, Heb. shâmîr. In eight of the eleven cases where this word occurs it is trd. "brier"; in the three remaining cases it evidently means a mineral of extreme hardness. In two instances, Ek. 3.^{9} and Zc. 7.^{12}, it is trd. A. In Jr. 17.^{1} it is trd. "diamond," but as the Jews did not know the diamond the substance intended is likely some form of corundum.

ADAMI-NEKEB (Jo. 19.^{33}), on the N.W. boundary of Naphtali. Accdg. to LXX, two places are intended. Adami may be identd. with ed-Dāmieh on the heights S.W. of Tiberias. See Nekeb.

Adder—Cerastes

only in Ps. 140.^{3}, "adders' poison is under their lips," prob. the dark brown viper is meant; the second is prob. the cerastes; the word only occurs in "Jacob's Blessing," Gn. 49.^{17}.

ADINO. See Jashobeam.

ADMAH, one of the cities invoIved in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 10.^{19}, 14.$^{2, 8}$; Dt. 29.^{23}; Ho. 11.^{8}).

ADONIBEZEK, "Lord of Bezek," a Can. chief conquered by Judah (Jg. 1.$^{4-7}$). Having captured him, they cut off his thumbs and great toes. He confessed having treated seventy kings in like manner. This is a round number, meaning "many"; the Oriental has no idea of numerical accuracy.

ADONIJAH, fourth s. of David, born at Hebron, his mr. being Haggith (2 S. 3.^{4}; 1 Ch. 3.^{2}). As David's oldest surviving s., when that monarch's life was nearing its close, he sought to secure for himself succession to the throne. Assisted by Joab and Abiathar, and accompanied by a numerous retinue, among whom were royal princes, he made a great feast at En Rogel, preparing to assume forthwith the regal office. Nathan and Bathsheba, to whose s. Solomon the succession had been promised, informed the k. David at once commanded that Solomon shd. be anointed and proclaimed, and shd. take his seat upon the throne. The royal guard remained by the k., and saw his orders executed amid such popular acclamations of joy that "the earth rent with the sound of them." A.'s company scattered in terror when the news reached them, and he fled for refuge to the altar. His life was spared for the time (1 K. 1.). An intrigue in wh. he sought, with the help of Bathsheba, to obtain the hand of Abishag, natly., owing to her relations with the old k., roused suspicion that he was trying to revive his claim to the throne; and, at the command of Solomon, Benaiah put him to death (1 K. 2.$^{12ff.}$).

ADONIRAM = ADORAM, was over the tribute under David (2 S. 20.^{24}), and Solomon (1 K. 4.^{6}). He was stoned by the Isrs. at Shechem (1 K. 12.^{18}).

ADONIZEDEK, "Lord of Righteousness," k. of Jrs. He headed a confederacy agst. Joshua. Defeated at the battle of Bethhoron, he fled with his confederates to a cave at Makkedah, whence he was brought out and killed (Jo. 10.$^{1-26}$). If, as seems prob. fm. the Tell Amarna tablets (vi. 32.), Tzedeq was a Phœnician deity, A. wd. mean "Tezdeq is my Lord."

ADOPTION. The word υἱοθεσία is used by Paul alone (Rm. 8.$^{15, 23}$, 9.^{4}; Gal. 4.^{5}; Eph. 1.^{5}), to indicate the relation into wh. God's people are brought to Him. Among the Rms., to whose practice Paul seems to refer, there were two forms of A. (1) If he were his own master (sui juris), a man cd. pass into the family of another only with consent of the people assembled in Comitia Curiata, by whom he was relieved of the obligation to perform the rites of his former Gens, or Familia, and bound to observe those of the new. (2) If he were still In potestate Patris, under the authority of his fr., since in Rm. law the fr. was regarded as strictly the owner of his s., the transfer was effected by a formal sale and purchase, to wh. the term mancipatio was applied.

A s. legally adopted stood, in the eye of the law, in the same relation, in every respect, to the fr. by whom he was adopted, as a s. begotten in lawful marriage.

There was nothing corrspdg. to this in Isr., although such informal A. as that of Esther by Mordecai may have been usual. The levirate law was intended to prevent a man being left without heirs.

ADORAIM, a fortress built by Rehoboam in Judah (1 Ch. 11.^{9}). Trypho came to A. "in Idumæa" (1 M. 13.^{20}; Ant. XIII. vi. 5). It was reduced by Hyrcanus, and restored by Gabinius (Ant. XIII. ix. 1; BJ. I. viii. 4). It is now represented by the vill. of Dūra, W. of Hebron.

ADORATION, the expression of the emotions caused by the contemplation of Deity. In words A. became Hymns and Prayers; many examples of both are found in the Psalms. A. is expressed in attitude, standing (2 Ch. 20.^{5}); sitting (2 S. 7.^{18}); spreading out the hands (1 K. 8.^{22}; Ez. 9.^{5}); kneeling (Dn. 6.^{10}); falling on the face (Lev. 9.^{24}).

ADRAMMELECH. (1) A god worshipped with

ANAMMELECH by the colonists fm. Sepharvaim (2 K. 17.[31]). They seem to be identl. with the Bab. deities Adar and Anu. The former of these is identd. with Hadad. In Shalmaneser's inscrip. Benhadad becomes Benidri. (2) A s. of Sennacherib, and one of his murderers (2 K. 19.[37]). See ANAMMELECH.

ADRAMYTTIUM is of Biblical interest only because of the ship in wh. Paul made his memorable journey to Rome (Ac. 27.[1ff.]). The town lay at the head of the gulf of that name, on the shore of Mysia, over agst. Lesbos. In Rm. days it was a great commercial centre, and also for a time an assize town. The mod. vill., Edremîd, is further inland.

ADRIA (Ac. 27.[27]). This sea took its name from Adria (or Atria), a town near the mouth of the river Po. The name at first applied only to the adjacent waters, but gradually its significance extended until its boundaries were marked by the shores of Italy, Sicily, and Malta on the W., and the shores of Greece on the E. (Strabo, by index, Bohn). Fm. Crete to Malta, therefore, the course of St. Paul's vessel lay entirely within " the sea of A."

ADULLAM, a royal city of the Can. (Jo. 12.[15]), in the low land occupied by Judah, near to Jarmuth, Socoh, and Mareshah (Gn. 38.[1ff.]; Jo. 15.[35]; Mi. 1.[15]). A. was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[7]), and occupied by the returning exiles (Ne. 11.[30]). A. is identd. with 'Îd el-Ma, " Feast of Water," or 'Îd el-Mîyeh, " Feast of the Hundred," a ruin c. 8 miles N.W. of Beit Jibrîn.

The Cave of Adullam (1 S. 22.[1], &c.), doubtless applied par excellence to that cave among those in the neighbouring valley in which David took shelter.

ADULTERY, breach of the marriage vow. To the Heb., with his ideas of the importance of descent, A. was only committed when the woman was a w. The ordeal of " bitter water" (Nu. 5.[14ff.]) served to mitigate the fierceness of jealousy. The penalty of A. was death by stoning. No infliction of the penalty is recorded; this does not prove that it never was inflicted; the hist. of any mod. nation, condensed as severely as that of Isr. in the Bible, wd. have no room to tell of the execution of criminals. It had, however, sunk into disuse before the coming of Christ (Jn. 8.[1f.]). Isr. was regarded as married to the Lord (Jr. 31.[32]): any following after other gods was treated as A. (Jr. 3.[8]).

ADUMMIM, THE ASCENT of (RV.), on the boundary between Judah and Benj. (Jo. 15.[7], 18.[17]), " over agst." Gilgal, and on the S. side of " the torrent." This points clearly to Tal'at ed-Dum, " the ascent of blood," on the road fm. Jericho to Jrs. on the S. side of the ravine of Wādy Qelt. The name doubtless comes from the ruddy-coloured marl showing on the slope.

ADVOCATE. See COMFORTER.

AENEAS, a man in Lydda, bed-rid from palsy for 8 yrs., healed by Peter (Ac. 9.[33f.]).

AENON, a place " where there was much water," " near to Salim," W. of Jordan (Jn. 3.[23, 26]). OEJ. places it 8 Rm. miles S. of Beisân, near Salim and the Jordan. A group of seven springs close to Umm el-'Amdân, ed-Deir, and Tell er-Ridgha, on the last of wh. is the tomb of Sheikh Salim, seems to meet all the requirements of the nar. The difficulties in the way of identn. with the springs in Wādy Fār'ah seem insuperable.

AGABUS, a Judæan Christian, a prophet; he foretold a drought (Ac. 11.[28]) and Paul's imprisonment (Ac. 21.[10]). In the latter case the prophecy was acted, like that of Isaiah (20.[2]), and Jeremiah (27.[2]).

AGAG, poss. the title of Amalekite ks. (Nu. 24.[7]). A., defeated, and spared by Saul contrary to divine direction, was hewn in pieces by Samuel (1 S. 15.).

AGAGITE, applied to Haman, whom the Jews believed to be descended fm. Agag (Est. 3.[1], &c.; Ant. XI. vi. 5).

AGATE, in AV. trs. two Heb. terms, shebo and kadkod. It is doubtful whether either is really the stone we mean by the agate. The second of the Heb. terms RV. trs. " rubies." Delitzsch idents. shebo with the Asyr. subu, wh. seems to have resembled our diamond.

AGE. Scrip. represents human life as gradually shortening. Fm. Adam to Noah men's ages range fm. 969 to 777 yrs., Enoch at his translation being 365 yrs. old. Fm. Shem to Terah, 600 to 205. The Patriarchs lived over 100 yrs., Isaac reaching 180. At a later period 70 is regarded as the normal length of life.

In OT. old age is represented as the token of God's favour, and as the reward of virtue (Gn. 25.[8]; Ex. 20.[12]), while an early death marks God's displeasure (Ps. 102.[23]; Is. 65.[20]). This may act. for the respect wh. to this day is paid to the man of many yrs. in the E. (Lv. 19.[32]; Jb. 15.[10]). " The hoary head is a crown of glory " (Pr. 16.[31]).

Mere seniority carries with it many rights and privileges, the elder br., e.g., exercising no little authority over his juniors. The "elders" were powerful in Isr., and were regarded as repositories of wisdom (1 K. 12.[6-8]). The name "elder," applied to the holder of a particular office in the Christian Church, leaves no room for doubt as to the class fm. whom officials were originally chosen. The same is true of the Sheikh ("elder") of an Arab tribe to-day. As strife and war lead to the cutting off of men in their prime, the continuance of old men in a community is a token of prevailing peace.

AGRICULTURE. Scrip. represents cultivation of the soil as the first of human occupations (Gn.

PLOUGHING ON THE PLAIN OF SHARON

2.[15], 4.[2]). In the Nile Valley A. flourished at a very early period; and in Pal., before Isr.'s time, it appears to have been largely pursued. The lowlands at least were tilled in anct. times, and the system of terraces is very old. Isaac is the first of the Patriarchs identd. with A. (Gn. 26.[12]). The change fm. nomadic to settled life compelled Isr. to become tillers of the earth when they took possession of Pal. This assumption underlies their law. The land belonged to J". (Lv. 25.[23]). Isr. held and cultivated it on His terms. A. was thus closely associated with relg.

Pal. differed fm. Egp. with its fertilising river, in that it depended almost entirely on the rainfall.

It was recognised that the land must lie fallow at stated intervals (Ex. 23.[10]), and later, this was secured by the Sabbath law (Lv. 25.). Dung was used as manure (2 K. 9.[37], &c.). The unit of measurement was the amount ploughed by a yoke of oxen in a day (1 S. 14.[14]; cp. Arb. faddān). Boundaries were marked by stones or stone heaps. Shifting these was a serious crime (Dt. 19.[14]; Ho. 5.[10]).

A. was most prosperous in Rm. times, owing to the security enjoyed, and the excellent provision made for watering.

As an occupation taught by God Himself (Is. 28.[26]), A. was followed by all, even by men of good family (1 S. 11.[5]), and much of the land on both sides of the Jordan bears evidences of anct. cultivation, although now reduced to simple pasture land.

When the first rains softened the ground, hard baked by the summer heat, ploughing began. The plough made but a shallow furrow (see PLOUGH). Sowing followed shortly if weather were favourable. Occasionally to-day barley is sown as early as Nov., but it may be delayed till the end of Jan. Wheat is sown immediately afterwards. The seed mt. be scattered thinly broadcast, or dropped carefully into the furrows (Is. 28.[25]). Sometimes it was sown first, and then ploughed or trampled down. The ploughed land was levelled with an implement not described (Is. 28.[24]; Ho. 10.[11]), made perhaps of a stout board, or cylinder of stone. To-day a bush often serves as harrow.

Two kinds of seed mt. not be sown together (Lv. 19.[19]; Dt. 22.[9]). This is part of the gen. restriction agst. mingling of diverse kinds. Ingenious plans were devised for laying out the fields, so that space mt. be saved, and yet a margin left between the difft. crops.

Barley harvest begins in the Jordan Valley about

TREADING OUT AND WINNOWING GRAIN (Egyptian)

The great streams and springs lie too low to be available for irrigation beyond a very limited range. Artificial means were thus necessary to preserve the water, and to utilise it for field and garden.

The main crops were wheat and barley, but spelt, beans, lentils, millet, and flax were also grown.

the end of March, and is gen. in April. Wheat harvest comes some three or four weeks later. The main dangers to be feared during the intervening months are mildew, if the weather be dull and damp; the destructive power of the E. wind; locusts and robbers (Dt. 28.[22]; 2 Ch. 6.[28]; Am. 4.[9]).

In the mountains crops are genly. light, but in the valleys and plains, especially in the Ḥaurân, the yield is splendid, at times from 60 to 100-fold.

Harvest, wh. lasted about seven weeks, is pictured as a time of great joy (Is. 9.[3]; Ps. 4.[7]). The grain is cut with shearing hooks, and carried on the backs of animals—anctly. also in carts (Am. 2.[13])—to the threshing-floor, in a position as exposed as poss., near the vill. There it is trampled by unmuzzled animals (Dt. 25.[4], &c.), or crushed under the threshing board, wh. is made of stout planks, about 5 ft. by 4 ft., with rough stones set in its under surface. In anct. times—as still in Egp.—the threshing waggon was also used. It was a strong oblong frame, into wh. were fitted parallel rollers; round these were fixed sharp circular blades of iron. This was drawn over the grain in the same way as the "board." Both were used for the torture of prisoners (2 S. 12.[31]; 1 Ch. 20.[3]; cp. Is. 41.[15]); but see Harrow.

Ploughing and Sowing (Egyptian)

The grain having been separated and the straw crushed into small pieces (tibn), the whole was cast into the air by means of a wooden fork and shovel (fan), when the wind carried away the chaff, and the grain fell at the worker's feet (Ps. 1.[4]). The best of the chaff is now preserved for fodder, the refuse being burned. Fire on a threshing-floor, where everything is tinder-dry, burns with a fierce flame (Mw. 3.[12]).

Small quantities are threshed with a stick or flail (Ru. 2.[17]; Jg. 6.[11]). Threshing lasts roughly till the beginning of the vintage. The grain remaining when the tax—paid in kind—has been taken, and any sales effected, is usly. stored in great cistern-like receptacles. See Barn.

AGRIPPA. See Herodian Family.

AGUR, s. of Jakeh, a sage otherwise unknown, to whom Pr. 30. is attributed. The word massa, wh. AV. renders "prophecy," RV. takes as a place name. The place is not known. Poss. A. is not a proper name, but descriptive. It mt. mean "collector."

AHAB. (1) S. and successor of Omri, reigned in Samaria 22 yrs. (1 K. 16.[29]). Despite the hard judgment passed upon him as "one that did evil in the sight of the Lord, above all that were before him," the nars. indicate much good as well as evil in the char. and life of A.

A. married Jezebel, dr. of Ethbaal, k. of Tyre, who may be truly described as his evil genius. Under her influence he built a temple in Samaria for Phœnician Baal, and set up the Ashera, with full establishment of idolatrous priests, temple-attendants, &c. (1 K. 16.[31ff.]). A. must have acquiesced in Jezebel's attempt to stamp out the worship of J″., by the destruction of His prophets. Yet he seems to have connived at the concealment of 100 of them by Obadiah (1 K. 18.[3f.]). He approved of the trial proposed by Elijah, poss. in the hope that J″. wd. vindicate Himself, and cause Jezebel to renounce her purpose (1 K. 18.[17]). The hope was vain (1 K. 19.[1]). See Elijah.

The Syrians under Benhadad, or Hadadezer, are suddenly introduced as besieging Samaria, poss. at the end of a campaign of wh. we have no record. A. was ready to surrender, but intolerable terms were proposed, and, cheered by the word of a prophet, the besieged attacked, and utterly routed the enemy (1 K. 20.[1ff.]). Next year the Syrians returned with a strong force, confident of victory if only they cd. meet Isr. in the plains, thinking J″. to be a "God of the Hills." A. met them as they desired and inflicted upon them overwhelming defeat, on the flat land E. of Aphek. He took Benhadad prisoner, and was denounced by a prophet for sparing him alive. By a treaty then arranged Benhadad was to restore the cities taken fm. Isr. by his fr., and to grant cert. privileges to Isr. in Damascus.

The dastardly legal murder of Naboth, prompted by Jezebel, was sincerely repented of (1 K. 21.). From the inscrs. it appears that A. fought along with Benhadad—Hadadezer—and others agst. Assyria at Qarqar, contributing 2000 chariots and 10,000 men, when the Asyr. claim that the allies were defeated (COT.[2] i. 183ff.). Moab was held in subjection during his reign (2 K. 1.[1]), and he met his death in a campaign agst. Syria for the recovery of Ramoth Gilead (1 K. 22.).

A brave and capable soldier, and a patriotic k., he was too much under the influence of his tigerish w.; yet was he not wholly given over to the worship of Baal (2 K. 10.[18]). The later Jews place him among those who have no share in the world to come.

(2) A false prophet denounced by Jeremiah (29.[21f.]), burned by the k. of Bab.

AHASUERUS. (1) K. of Persia (Ez. 4.[6]), supposed by some to be Cambyses, but there is no evidence that he ever bore this name: Xerxes may be the k. intended. (2) The husband of Esther. Although in Est. Ad. he is called Artaxerxes, it seems almost cert. that the k. intended is Xerxes. The notes of time correspond : the feast in his third yr. coincides with his return fm. the Egpn. expedition, and his seventh yr. wd. just give sufficient time to carry out the arrangements wh. resulted in the elevation of Esther, after his return fm. the disastrous invasion of Greece. In char. also he agrees with the Xerxes of Herodotus. (3) The fr. of Darius the Mede (Dn. 9.[1]).

AHAVA, a stream or canal beside wh. Ezra assembled the Jews willing to return to Palestine (Ez. 8.[15]) ; there appears to have been a town of the same name on its banks. No cert. identn. has been reached.

AHAZ, s. and successor of Jotham, k. of Judah. The name is shortened from Jehoahaz. Asyr. inscrs. give it as Jahuchazi (COT.[2] 257ff.). A. began to reign in his 20th yr. (2 K. 16.[2]). This shd. prob. be corrected with LXX et al. in 2 Ch. 28.[1], to 25th yr. Otherwise his s. Hezekiah wd. seem to have been born in his 11th yr. He reigned 16 yrs. But the chronology of this reign presents difficulties wh. cannot at present be cleared up.

A. was a weak and capricious prince (Is. 3.[12], 7.[2ff.]). He favoured heathen idolatries, and made his own s. "pass through fire" (2 K. 16.[3]). The "chariots of the sun" and the "altars on the roof of the chamber of A." were prob. introduced by this monarch (2 K. 23.[11f.]). Rejecting the counsel of Isaiah (Is. 7.f.), with part of the temple treasures A. purchased the aid of Tiglath-pileser of Asyr., who subdued Damascus and took possession of the E. territory of Isr. But when his enemies were rendered powerless, A. himself had to render homage to the conqueror in Damascus (2 K. 16.[10]). The hist. is written in Ch. fm. another point of view, with many diffcs. in detail.

AHAZIAH. (1) S. of Ahab and Jezebel, k. of Isr. Under him Moab rebelled against Isr. Suffering fm. a severe accident, he sent to Ekron to inquire of Baalzebub as to his fate. His messengers were intercepted by Elijah, who rebuked the idolatrous mission, and announced the near death of the k. For A.'s relations with the prophet, see ELIJAH. He reigned for over a year (1 K. 22.[51ff.]; 2 K. 1.). (2) S. of Jehoram and Athaliah, k. of Judah (2 K. 8.[24ff.]). He is called Jehoahaz in 2 Ch. 21.[17], &c., where the elements of the name are simply transposed, and Azariah in 2 Ch. 22.[6], wh. is prob. an error for Ahaziah. A. went with his uncle, Joram of Isr., to war with Hazael of Syria, at Ramoth Gilead. Joram being wounded, they returned, Joram to Jezreel and apparently A. to Jrs. A. went down to Jezreel to visit Joram. Having seen his uncle slain by Jehu, he fled, but was wounded, and died at Megiddo. He was carried to Jrs., and "buried with his frs." (2 K. 9.[1ff.]).

The Chronicler's act. is in many respects irreconcilable with the foregoing (2 Ch. 21.[17], 22.[1ff.]).

AHIAH, RV. AHIJAH, s. of Ahitub, grandson of Eli (1 S. 14.[3]), "priest of the Lord in Shiloh." He went with Saul agst. the Phil., clad in priestly attire (1 S. 14.[3, 18]). He was prob. identl. with Ahimelech, who succoured David at Nob (1 S. 21.[1ff.]). Doeg the Edomite saw and reported to Saul what A. had done. This brought destruction upon the priests and upon the whole community at Nob, Abiathar alone of the house of A. making good his escape (1 S. 22.[9ff.]).

AHIJAH, the Shilonite prophet who, by the fig. of the torn garment, foretells to Jeroboam the disruption of the kdm., and the falling away of the ten tribes to him (1 K. 11.[29]). Long afterwards, answering the appeal of Jeroboam's w., he announced the approaching death of his s. Abijah, and the destruction of his house (1 K. 14.[1ff.]). The record of "the acts of Solomon," "in the prophecy of A. the Shilonite" (2 Ch. 9.[29]), unhappily has perished.

Men of the same name are mentioned in 1 K. 4.[3], 15.[27]—the fr. of Baasha, k. of Isr.—1 Ch. 2.[25], 8.[7], 11.[36], 26.[20] ; Ne. 10.[26].

AHIKAM, s. of Shaphan and fr. of Gedaliah, was sent with other three to inquire at HULDAH the prophetess regarding the "bk. of the law" found in the Temple (2 K. 22.[12]). He succoured the prophet Jeremiah when threatened with death at the hands of the people (Jr. 26.[24]).

AHIMAAZ, "my br. is wrath." (1) S. of Zadok, a notable runner in his day, who acted as Hushai's messenger, along with Abiathar, informing David of Absalom's plans, and once at least encountered grave peril. He outran the Cushite in carrying to David news of Absalom's defeat (2 S. 15., 17., 18.). (2) Fr. of Saul's w. Ahinoam (1 S. 14.[50]). (3) One of Solomon's 12 officers, whose station was in Naphtali, who provided victual for the k., &c. His rank may be inferred fm. the fact that he married the k.'s dr. (1 K. 4.[15]).

AHIMELECH. (1) = AHIAH. (2) A Hittite follower of David (1 S. 26.[6]).

AHINOAM, "my br. is pleasantness." (1) W. of Saul, dr. of Ahimaaz. (2) A. of Jezreel, w. of David, who accompanied him in his wanderings, and was mr. of Amnon, his firstborn (1 S. 25.[43], 27.[3ff.]; 2 S. 3.[2]).

AHIO, s. of Abinadab and br. of Uzzah, who perished for touching the Ark (2 S. 6.[3]). Two Benjamites also bear this name, sons of Beriah and of Jehiel respectively (1 Ch. 8.[14, 31]). LXX takes all these as common nouns, translating "brother" and "brothers." As the words are consonantally the same, poss. A. shd. not be taken as a proper name.

AHITHOPHEL, "my br. is folly," an extremely able but unprincipled counsellor of David, who took the part of Absalom in his rebellion (2 S. 15.[12, 31ff.], 16.[15ff.], 17.).

Absalom followed his advice in the matter of the royal harim, making absolute the breach with David. But his further counsel of instant and strenuous pursuit was discarded in favour of Hushai's. A., seeing the one chance of success thrown away, went home to Giloh and hanged himself.

A. would appear to have been the grandfr. of Bathsheba. It has been suggd. that displeasure with David's conduct in relation to her may have caused his alienation.

AHITUB, "br. is goodness." (1) S. of Phinehas, grandson of Eli, and fr. of Ahiah, or Ahimelech (1 S. 14.[3]). (2) Fr. (2 S. 8.[17]; 1 Ch. 18.[16]) or grandfr. (1 Ch. 9.[11]; Ne. 11.[11]) of Zadok the priest. Poss. 2 S. 8.[17] shd. read "Zadok and Abiathar, the s. of Ahimelech, the s. of A." The name also occurs in 1 Ch. 6.[11f.]; 1 Es. 8.[2]; 2 Es. 1.[1]; Jth. 8.[1].

AHLAB, a city of Asher (Jg. 1.[31]), poss. on the site of Gush Halab, the Gischala of Jos., Vit. 10.; BJ. IV. ii. 1ff., the mod. el-Jish, cp. Relandi Palæstina, p. 812f.

AHOLAH, AHOLIBAH. See OHOLAH, OHOLIBAH.

AHOLIBAMAH, RV. OHOLIBAMAH, dr. of Anah, of Hivite descent, w. of Esau (Gn. 36.[2]).

AI, "a heap" or "ruin" (Gn. 12.[8], 13.[3], AV. Hai; Jo. 7.[2, 5], &c.; Ne. 11.[31], Aija; Is. 10.[28], Aiath; in Jr. 49.[3] read "Ar"), was taken by Isr. and reduced to a heap. It appears as inhabited after the exile (Ez. 2.[28]; Ne. 7.[32]). A. lay beside Beth Aven, on the E. side of Bethel (Jo. 7.[2]). Valleys on the N. and W. made it easy of defence. The site prob. corrspds. with that of Khirbet Haiyān, near et-Tell, fully 2 miles E. of Bethel, on the road to Jericho.

AIJALON, AJALON, "place of deer" (Jo. 10.[12], &c.). (1) A town assigned to Dan, but not possessed by them (Jo. 19.[42]; Jg. 1.[35]). It was fortified by Rehoboam, and later was taken by the Phil. (2 Ch. 11.[10], 28.[18]). The name Aialuna occurs in the Tell el Amarna letters. It is identd. with Yālo, on the Jrs. road, about 2 Rm. miles fm. Emmaus Nicopolis (OEJ.) and 14 miles fm. Jrs. (2) A. in Zebulun (Jg. 12.[12]) is not identd.

AIN, "eye" or "spring," is the first part of many place names in Scrip. (1) Near the E. border of Isr., W. of Riblah (Nu. 34.[11]), poss. el-'Ain, near 'Ain el-'Aṣy, the source of the Orontes. (2) A town assigned to Judah (Jo. 15.[32]), and again to Simeon (Jo. 19.[7]), where, instead of Ain and Rimmon, we shd. prob. read "En Rimmon." This may be identd. with Umm er-Ramāmīn, N. of Beersheba, near wh. is Bîr Khuēlfa, a copious spring with considerable ruins.

AIR. The atmosphere was supposed to be the abode of evil spirits; hence Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2.[2]). Poss. this is connected with the fact that in Heb., ruaḥ, "spirit," also meant "wind," a connection present also in Gr. The Zoroastrian idea was that tempests came fm. Angro-Mangyas—Ahriman, the personified principle of evil.

AKRABBIM, ASCENT OF, "ascent of scorpions," or "mountain path" (Guthe), mentioned on the S. border of Isr. (Nu. 34.[4]; Jo. 15.[3]), and on the border of the Amorites (Jg. 1.[36]), is prob. the ascent by Wādy el-Fiqra, whence the passes Naqb eṣ-Sufā, Naqb el-Yemen, and Naqb el-Gharb, open towards Pal. to the SW. of the Dead Sea.

ALABASTER, a translucent limestone, of fine texture, used for making vases in wh. unguents were kept (Mw. 26.[7]; Mk. 14.[3]; Lk. 7.[37]).

ALABASTER VASE (Assyrian)

ALAMMELECH, RV. ALLAMMELECH, a place in Asher (Jo. 19.[26]). Perhaps the name lingers in Wādy el-Melek, a tributary of the Kishon, near Ḥaifa.

ALEXANDER. (1) THE GREAT, s. and successor of Philip, k. of Macedon; born B.C. 356. When he was 20 he mounted the throne on the assassination of his fr.; within a yr. he had conquered Illyria and Greece, and was elected to the leadership in the war agst. Persia. In the following yr., B.C. 334, he crossed the Hellespont with an army of 34,000 men, and, winning the battle of the Granicus, placed all Asia Minor under his feet. After a time spent in gathering the fruits of his victory, in B.C. 333, he encountered, at Issus, Darius, who had placed himself at the head of an army of something like half a million. Darius and his force were scattered like chaff. A. did not pursue Darius but turned S. to the conquest of Egp. and Syria. These conquests accomplished, he now marched agst. Darius, who had assembled a yet huger army than that wh. had been overthrown at Issus. The armies met at Arbela, when again the Persian host fled. From this A. carried his arms to Samarkand in Central Asia and to the banks of the Sutlej in India. As his troops wd. follow no further he returned to Bab. and was endeavouring to organise his huge empire when he was struck with fever, and died at the early age of 33, after a reign of 13 yrs. No military conqueror ever left so deep an impress on the hist. of the world as did A. The whole of S.W. Asia was Hellenised; philosophers fm. beyond the Euphrates taught in the schools of Athens. See DANIEL. (2) S. of Simon of Cyrene (Mk. 15.[21]). (3) Poss. the Alabarch of the Alexandrian Jews, br. of Philo, associated with the high priest (Ac. 4.[6]). (4) A prominent Jew in Ephesus, put forward by the Jews as their apologist (Ac. 19.[33]). (5) Prob. a Jewish Christian who, with Hymenæus, had fallen into error (1 Tm. 1.[20]). (6) A coppersmith (metal-worker) who opposed Paul, to the deep resentment of the latter (2 Tm. 4.[14, 15]). It is poss., but hardly prob., that the last three refcs. are to the same man.

ALEXANDRIA, the largest Hellenic city in the Roman Empire. It was founded by Alexander the Great, 332 B.C., on the strip of land wh. separates the lake Mareotis fm. the Mediterranean. It had a large population of various nationalities. Diod. Siculus (XVII. 52) declares that it "excels all other cities in population, having thirty myriads of free citizens." The Jewish colony was very large and influential; it had its own magistrates, an Alabarch, and a Senate. Josephus claims that this Jewish colony was founded by Alex. himself; it was certly. greatly increased by Ptolemy Soter. A. was the centre of Hellenic thought and learning, and the Jewish colony became thoroughly Hellenised. It was for their benefit that the Septuagint translation was made. Fm. the works of Philo we learn the extent to wh. the Jews of A. were influenced by the "wisdom of the Greeks." It was fm. his Alexandrian culture that Apollos gained such influence over the Corinthian believers. A. was the chief business city in the Roman Empire. Ships of Alexandria were constantly engaged conveying grain to Rome; so the ship in wh. Paul suffered shipwreck was a ship of A., as also that by wh. he was conveyed fm. Malta to Italy.

A. was reduced to insignificance during the middle ages, but was restored to importance by Mehemet Aly, who made the Mahmoudiyeh canal, to unite it with the Nile. Its population now is nearly 400,000.

Alexandrians. One of the classes that disputed with Stephen (Ac. 6.^{9}). "Synagogue" in this passage prob. means "community," as the number of A. resident in Jrs. was prob. too great to be accommodated in one Synagogue. In Safed in Galilee the Jewish community is divided into several "congregations," each having its own officials, and possessing more or fewer Synagogues accdg. to their numbers. These are named after the nationalities fm. wh. they have come. A similar arrangement prob. held in Jrs. in the days of the Apostles.

ALEXANDRIA

ALGUM (2 Ch. 2.^{8}, 9.^{10}) or ALMUG (1 K. 10.^{11}), trees. The terms clearly indicate the same tree. It was brought fm. Ophir, and also fm. Lebanon. Dr. Post (HDB. s.v.) points out that the same name in different districts mt. signify difft. trees. But, lacking definite kge. of where Ophir was, and what tree is meant, we have no reason to think it cd. not grow in both districts. Many idents. have been suggd., the most genly. favoured being with red sandal wood. No cert. decision is poss.

ALLEGORY, a prolonged parable. A parable is an incident, whereas an A. is a hist. Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" is a classic example of an A. St. Paul regards patriarchal hist. as an A. (Gal. 4.^{24}).

ALLEMETH, AV. ALEMETH (1 Ch. 6.^{60}; Jo. 21.^{18}, Almon). A city assigned to the sons of Aaron in Benjamin. It is identd. with 'Almît, N. of Anathoth.

ALMODAD, s. of Joktan (Gn. 10.[26]; 1 Ch. 1.[20]). Prob. an Arb. tribe, district, or town is intended, but no identn. is poss. at present.

ALMOND, shâqêdh, "waker," "so called because of all trees it is the first to awake fm. the sleep of winter" (Ges., Lex.). The tree is mentioned in Ec. 12.[5]; Jr. 1.[11]; and Gn. 30.[37]; in the last case the name is lūz (AV. wrongly "hazel"), the name (lauz) used in Arb. for tree and fruit. The fruit is referred to in Gn. 43.[11], &c.

The A. blossoms early in Jan. The flowers are almost pure white, slightly tinged with pink. It is a most beautiful feature in the landscape, heralding the coming spring. The fruit begins to form in Feb., and in March the foliage is complete. "The almond tree shall flourish," compares the white hair of age to the blossoms on the yet leafless A. tree (Ec. 12.[5]). The delicate tint of pink is not apparent on a gen. view, so the objn. of Ges. (Heb. Lex. s.v.) falls to the ground.

The A., Amygdalus communis, order Rosaceæ, sub-order Amygdaleæ, is indigenous in Pal. The trees range fm. 12 to 15 ft. in height, with irregular branches. The leaves are long, ovate, serrate, acute. The flowers, wh. come before the leaves, are set in pairs, the blossom being over an inch wide. In April and May the fruit, a firm green pod, fm. 2 to 3 in. long, and about ¾ in. thick, is largely eaten. Soon, however, the shell hardens, the succulent covering dries round it, and the kernel matures. The A. is esteemed a great dainty in the E., and is used in preparing many popular dishes.

Four varieties of A. are found wild on the mountains, both E. and W. of Jordan. They do not attain the size of the cultivated A., and their fruit is small and bitter.

The A. does not seem to have been found in anct. Egp. (Gn. 43.[11]). The beauty of its blossoms was early appreciated by emancipated Isr., and the cups for the golden candlestick were modelled on its flowers (Ex. 25.[32]).

ALMSGIVING. To sympathise with the unfortunate, to relieve poverty and distress, was regarded as a duty in Isr. (Dt. 15.[7ff.]), and A. was a distinguishing mark of the righteous man (Ps. 112.[9]; Lk. 19.[8]). So closely were A. and righteousness associated in the people's mind, that the one word tzĕdāqa came to be used for both. It is just poss. that the sense of A. is present in Pr. 10.[2], as in Dn. 4.[27]. Certainly in To. 4.[7ff.], where A. "delivers fm. death," and Sr. 3.[30], where A. "makes atonement for sins," A. and righteousness are identd.

Jesus Christ takes it for granted that a righteous man, or one who desires to be thought so, will do alms (Mw. 6.[1ff.]). All He does is to warn agst. improper motives. He expects His followers to be mindful of the poor (Lk. 11.[41], 12.[33]). Peter and John acknowledged the claim of the unfortunate man at the temple gate for help (Ac. 3.[6]); one of the first acts of the infant Church was to arrange for the assistance of the needy (Ac. 4.[32ff.], 6.[1ff.]); the A. of Cornelius attests his high char. (Ac. 9.[36], &c.); and throughout NT., A. is regarded as evidence of the right Christian disposition (Mw. 10.[8]; Lk. 6.[30]; Ac. 24.[17]; Js. 2.[6], &c.). "It is more blessed to give than to receive," said Jesus; and His own deeds (Mw. 14.[15ff.]; Mk. 8.[1ff.], &c.) may be taken as illustrating the spt., at least, wh. shd. characterise His followers.

The usage in the E. to this day tends to ident. A. with righteousness. The word Sadaqah means "alms given to the poor for the sake of God." Beggars whose ranks are perpetually recruited by the victims of disease and misfortune, appeal for help ever in the name of God. No one ever refuses directly. If a man have nothing to bestow, or have not the will, he will piously respond, "God will give to you." The gen. recognition of the duty to relieve the needy is embodied in the Arb. proverb, "He who has a loaf is debtor to him who has none." Among the religious a reputation for liberality in A. is greatly coveted. But "Oriental benevolence has no thought of attacking the cause of poverty. . . . A. is a current act. with God" (Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, p. 145f.).

ALOES. The A. of Scrip. must be distinguished fm. the A. of mod. medicine, to wh. they are in no way related. In four places where they are mentioned ('ahâlîm, Pr. 7.[17]; 'ahâlōth, Ps. 45.[8], SS. 4.[14]; ἀλόη, Jn. 19.[39]), a fragrant substance is intended, employed to give a pleasant perfume to the clothes, the bed, &c., and mingled with the spices in wh. the dead were wrapped. There is no certy. as to whence it was derived. Abdullah ibn Sina—Avicenna—an Arb. physician, born A.D. 986, says it was obtained fm. the tree known to the Arabs as 'ud, wh. is identd. with Aquilaria Agallochia, a native of N. India, wh. supplies the wood-A. of commerce. The aromatic qualities of the wood, it appears, are set free only in the process of decay; therefore to secure the perfume it is often buried for a time.

There is no evidence that this tree, wh. in its native conditions attains splendid dimensions, ever grew in Pal.; although it is poss. that it once flourished in the Jordan Valley. The context in Nu. 24.[6] makes it imposs. to read 'Ohâlîm, "tents" (as LXX), but what trees Balaam alludes to we cannot be sure. The same name does not always mean the same tree in difft. countries. He may have intended some tree of luxuriant growth, familiar to him in Mesopotamia. But even this was not necessary, as he refers to the cedar, wh., although well known, had prob. never been seen either by Balaam or those whom he addressed.

ALPHA and OMEGA, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, taken to signify "the first and the last" (Rv. 1.[8], 21.[6], 22.[13]), the idea also expressed in Is. 44.[6]. The Heb. equivalent is "Aleph and Tau."

ALPHAEUS. (1) Fr. of Matthew (Levi). (2) Fr. of James the Less, the apostle. Whether he is to be identd. with Cleopas or Clopas has been much debated. See CLEOPAS, CLOPAS.

ALTAR, mostly Heb. mizbēăḥ, "place of sacrifice," Gr. thusiastērion (madbaḥ, Ez. 7.[17], Aram.; har'el, RV. "upper altar," Ek. 43.[15]; 'arī'ēl, Qri 'arī'ēl, RV. "altar hearth." Shulḥān is = mizbēăḥ in Ek. 41.[22], Ml. 1.[7], and obviously also in Ek. 44.[16]. Bāmāh in Jr. 7.[31] (lit. "high place," LXX bōmos) is prob. = A. Lebēnīm in Is. 65.[3] shd. be rendered with RV. "upon bricks." Mizbēăḥ (Gn. 33.[20]) shd. prob. read matztzēbāh. Bōmos (Ac. 17.[25]) is an A. to a heathen deity: cp. 1 M. 1.[59]).

The polytheism of the anct. Semites associated a deity with every obj. and place of importance, and offerings were made to the god where he dwelt, in stream or well, on hill top or tree. Then it came to be believed that the deity wd. enter a structure or stone set up for him, and this was regarded as the residence of the god—Beth-el (Gn. 28.^{18}). At first the PILLAR must have served as A., the blood of the victim or oil of offering being poured or smeared over it (see SACRIFICE). The A., as distinguished fm. the pillar—matztzēbāh—arose, perhaps, to meet the necessity for a hearth, when men felt that not the blood only, but also the flesh of the victim, shd. be offered to the deity in sacrifice.

The JE. nars. record the building of many A.s in many places, and the offering of sacrifices thereon, by the first frs. of the race and other distinguished servants of J″.: e.g. Gn. 8.^{20}, 12.^{7}, 22.^{9}, 26.^{25}, 35.^{7}, Ex. 17.^{15}. This seems expressly authorised by Ex. 20.^{24}: "In every place where I record My name, I will come unto thee and bless thee." It was a common practice up to the reign of Josiah (Jo. 8.^{30}; Dt. 27.^{6}; Jg. 6.^{24}; 1 S. 7.^{17}, &c.). P., on the other hand, recognises only one A., the place of wh. is in the nation's central sanctuary. Other existing A.s are regarded as merely commemorative monuments (Jo. 22.$^{10ff.}$).

The A. mt. be a single sacrificial stone (Jg. 6.^{20}, 9.^{5}, &c.). Genly. it was an erection of unhewn stones (Ex. 20.^{25}; Dt. 27.^{5}; 1 K. 18.$^{30f.}$), or a mound of earth (Ex. 20.^{24}). It shd. not be so high as to prevent one standing on the ground from handling the offerings. In later times importance was attached to more artistic bldg. of the A. (2 K. 16.^{10}). The prescription of unhewn stones (Dt. 27.^{5}; Jo. 8.^{31}) may be due to the influence of the primitive idea, that the deity dwelt in the stone, and that his wrath mt. be incurred by breaking it. The action of Judas regarding the polluted A. (1 M. 4.^{46}, cp. Tlm. Middoth, 1, 6) illustrates the reverence in wh. the A. was held.

The flight of a fugitive to a temple meant an appeal to the deity there worshipped for hospitality and protection. He natly. went to the A., as the spot par excellence where the god and his worshippers met.* God's A. was an asylum for one who slew another by accident, but not for the deliberate murderer (Ex. 21.$^{13f.}$). The horns of the A., evidently reckoned peculiarly holy (Lv. 4.^{7,18}), to wh. Adonijah and Joab clung, were projections at the corners, the origin and use of wh. are now unknown. Stade suggests that they are a reminiscence of the time when J″. was worshipped under the form of a young bull. This, however, is a mere guess.

AMALEK, AMALEKITES. A nation of predatory nomads occupying the territory—the Negeb—extending fm. the S. of Pal. to Mt. Sinai, the triangle between the two arms of the Red Sea. The earliest notice of them we have is in Gn. 14.^{7}, where we are told that Chedorlaomer inflicted on them a disastrous defeat. When Isr. came out of Egypt they encountered A. at Rephidim, and, led by Joshua, defeated them. The report of the spies (Nu. 13.^{29}) implies that when they traversed the land A. possessed the S. of what was afterwards the territory of Judah. The Song of Deborah (Jg. 5.^{14}) seems to indicate that A. were allies of Sisera, and took advantage of his oppression of Galilee to carry their raids as far N. as the territory of Ephraim. The Mt. of the A. in wh. Abdon was buried prob. commemorated that raid and the destruction of A. there. On act. of their treacherous attack on Isr. near Sinai, by Divine command perpetual war was proclaimed against A. They seem to have lived by robbery, so the continued national existence of A. was a menace to civilisation. As anointed k. of Isr.

* So the suppliant went to the hearth of the human benefactor whose aid he sought (C. Nepos, Them. II. 8).

Saul was commissioned to destroy A. and made a campaign agst. them (1 S. 15.$^{2ff.}$). Despite the harrowing they had endured fm. Saul, while he was engaged with the Phil. they made a raid and captured Ziklag, carrying away the wives and families of David and his troop (1 S. 30.$^{1ff.}$). He pursued them and annihilated the band. An A. came to David after the battle of Gilboa claiming to have killed Saul. After this A. disappears from hist.

Prof. Cheyne says (EB. s.v. Jerahmeel): "Amalek, the name is unintelligible; the centre of the Amalekites must have been near to the Jerahmeelites. To admit the identn. of Amalek and Jerahmeel is in accordance with similar idents., and throws bright light on many passages." This is hardly an argument.

AMARIAH. (1) Fr. of Ahitub (1 Ch. 6.^{7}). (2) A High Priest in the time of Solomon (1 Ch. 6.^{11}), poss. the same as the foregoing. (3) A Levite, desct. of Kohath (1 Ch. 23.^{19}, &c.). (4) A High Priest in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 19.^{11}). (5) A Levite who, in the time of Hezekiah, received and distributed among his brethren the free-will offerings (2 Ch. 31.^{15}). (6) One of those who married strange wives (Ez. 10.^{42}). (7) A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.^{3}, &c.). (8) One of the descts. of Perez, s. of Judah, who dwelt in Jrs. after the exile (Ne. 11.^{4}). (9) An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zp. 1.^{1}).

AMASA, "burden." (1) S. of the Ishmaelite Ithra and Abigail, sr. of David. He commanded Absalom's army (2 S. 17.^{25}). After his defeat by Joab he submitted to David and was appointed commander-in-chief, displacing Joab (2 S. 19.^{13}). Joab treacherously slew him at "the great stone of Gideon" (2 S. 20.$^{9ff.}$). (2) An Ephraimite (2 Ch. 28.^{12}).

AMAZIAH, s. and successor of Jehoash, k. of Judah, in the beginning of the 8th cent. B.C. He avenged his fr.'s murder (2 K. 14.^{5}; 2 Ch. 25.^{3}). He marched agst. the Edomites, exciting the anger of Ephraim, accdg. to the Chronicler, by rejecting their offer of help, and gained a great victory in the Valley of Salt. He captured Sela, or Petra (?), and took away much spoil. Puffed up by his success, he challenged Jehoahaz, k. of Isr., to battle. Despite that monarch's desire to put him off, enraged poss. by the contemptuous parable of the thistle and the cedar, A. persisted, met Jehoahaz at Bethshemesh, and was overwhelmingly defeated. The conqueror took Jrs., broke down part of the wall, and carried away much plunder. A conspiracy was formed agst. A. and he was slain at Lachish, whither he had fled, having reigned perhaps 29 years.

AMBER, a fossil resin (Ek. 1.$^{4, 27}$, 8.^{2}). RVm. gives "electrum" (gold alloyed with silver), prob. correctly, for Heb. hashmal. LXX renders "electron," a word wh. may mean either the resin or the metal.

AMETHYST, the ninth gem on the High Priest's breast-plate (Ex. 28.^{19}), the twelfth foundation of the New Jrs. (Rv. 21.^{20}). It is a purple-coloured quartz crystal, and was believed to possess the power of preventing drunkenness—hence the name in Gr.

AMMON, AMMONITES, bĕnê ʿAmmôn, "sons of A.," a people whose land lay between the Jabbok and the Arnon, E. of Jordan. The Amorites under Sihon had driven the A. back fm. the Jordan, fm. 20 to 30 miles, and made Heshbon the capital of the conquered territory (Jg. 11.$^{12ff.}$). In former times the whole Ammonite land had been held by the giant Zamzummim, to wh. race prob. Og belonged (Dt. 2.^{20}, 3.^{11}).

Whether the act. given of their origin (Gn. 19.^{38}) be taken as literal hist., or as a myth wrought under the influence of the hostility of later days, their descent with Isr. fm. one parent stock is ackged.; and this is confirmed by the forms of their personal and place names wh. are preserved to us.

The strong positions behind wh. they retired secured the A. agst. further encroachment by the Amorites; and when Isr. came, by divine direction, they left the A. untouched (Nu. 21.^{24}; Dt. 2.$^{19, 37}$).

The A. appear as enemies of Isr. in Jg. 3.$^{13ff.}$, 10.$^{7ff.}$, and are overthrown by Jephthah (11.^{33}). Saul defeated Nahash, the A. k., and frustrated his attempt to take Jabesh Gilead (1 S. 11.). Nahash became a friend of David; but his s. Hanun shamefully entreated the messengers sent by David to condole with him on his fr.'s death. David and Joab defeated the A.; after a long siege their capital, Rabbath A., was taken, and on its inhabitants terrible vengeance was inflicted (2 S. 10.$^{1ff.}$, 11.^{1}, 12.$^{26ff.}$). Solomon built a high place for Milcom, the god of the A. (1 K. 11.$^{5, 35}$). 2 Ch. 20. gives an act. of an uprising of A. and other foes agst. Judah in the days of Jehoshaphat, when, excited by mutual suspicions, the enemy turned agst. each other, to their utter destruction, Judah being a mere spectator of the battle. Tribute was paid by A. to Uzziah (2 Ch. 26.^{8}) and also to Jotham (2 Ch. 27.^{5}).

For their unspeakable cruelty, and their malicious joy in Isr.'s misfortunes, the prophets heap reproach and threatening upon them (Jr. 9.^{26}, 25.^{21}, 27.^{3}; Ek. 21.$^{28ff.}$, 25.$^{2ff.}$; Am. 1.^{13}; Zp. 2.^{8}). Along with the Chaldeans and others, the A. cppressed Judah in the time of Jehoiakim (2 K. 24.^{2}). In later days Baalis, k. of A., envious prob. of the prosperity of Judah under Gedaliah, sent Ishmael, a scion of Judah's royal house, to assassinate that unsuspicious governor (2 K. 25.$^{22ff.}$; Jr. 40.^{14}, 41.$^{1ff.}$). The A. furnished fresh evidence of their enmity to Judah in the days of Nehsmiah (Ne. 4.$^{7ff.}$). They had not changed in the days of Judas Maccabæus, who subjected them to humiliating defeat (1 M. 5.$^{1ff.}$). Fm. B.C. 64 until A.D. 150 the A. rank as considerable in number; but fm. the 3rd cent. they are heard of no more.

For the relg. of the A., see Molech, Milcom.

AMNON. (1) Eldest s. of David and Ahinoam (2 S. 3.^{2}). In revenge of his outrage upon his half sr., Tamar, he was slain by her br. Absalom (2 S. 13.). Absalom calls him Amīnon (2 S. 13.^{20}, Heb.), poss.

a diminutive used in contempt; or it may be a scribal error. (2) S. of Shimon (1 Ch. 4.[20]).

AMON. (1) S. of Manasseh and Meshullemeth (2 K. 21.[19]; 2 Ch. 33.[21]), k. of Judah c. 643–642. All that is known with certy. of him is that he followed the idolatries of his fr., and even exceeded them. He was slain by conspirators among his own servants, and buried in his tomb in the garden of Uzza. His murder, however, was avenged by the people of the land, wh. seems to show that, in spite of his religious declension, he had won the regard of the common people. The succession was secured for his s. Josiah. (2) A governor of Samaria (1 K. 22.[26]; 2 Ch. 18.[25]). (3) One of the "children of Solomon's servants" (Ne. 7.[59] = Ami, Ez. 2.[57]).

AMORITES. The name mt. poss. mean "the people of the summits," or "highlanders," but this is not cert. It is not applied to any single people in Scrip. In 2 S. 21.[2] A. stands for Cans. genly. The Hivites are A. (Gn. 34.[2], cp. 48.[22], &c.); so are the Jebusites (Jo. 15.[63], &c., cp. 10.[5f]), and the Hittites (Gn. 23., cp. 14.[13]). Again, these peoples seem to be distinct (Nu. 13.[29]), "the Jebusites, and the Hittites, and the A. dwell in the mountains." Og and Sihon are both A. ks. (Dt. 31.[4]). Og ruled in Bashan, while the A. under Sihon thrust the AMMONITES E'ward fm. the Jordan, and held a breadth of fm. 20 to 30 miles of the land between the three rivers, Arnon, Jordan, and Jabbok. In early times the A. possessed territory S.W. of the Dead Sea (Gn. 14.[7]; Dt. 1.[7, 44]).

The A. are mentioned in Bab., Asyr., and Egpn. inscrs. As early as B.C. 3800 Pal. and Syria were called "the land of the A." by the Bab., and on the Egpn. monuments of the 15th cent. this name is applied to N. Pal. There are several refcs. to the A. in the Tell el Amarna tablets; but the information we at present possess leaves us greatly in the dark regarding both the people and their hist.

AMOS, the third of the Minor Prophets in the Heb., the second in LXX, was a herdsman of TEKOA. Fm. the word used for "herdsman" it is inferred that he tended a special breed of sheep. He seems to have had an orchard of sycamores, a kind of coarse fig. As Tekoa was on a height, the orchard was prob. in one of the wadies leading down to the Dead Sea. He is summoned to his office without any preliminary training in the prophetic schools, and sent to prophesy agst. the N. Kdm., esp. agst. Bethel. He is one of the earliest of the literary prophets. A.'s activity was during the reign of Jeroboam II. (790–759).

The bk. may be divided into three sections: (1) A series of denunciations (chaps. 1. and 2.) of difft. countries for specific crimes, ending with Judah and Isr. The symmetrical arrangement of these denunciations gives the section something of the solemnity of a sentence of doom. (2) An address to Isr., rebuking their idolatry at Bethel and Gilgal, denouncing their hypocrisy, luxury, and oppression of their brethren (3.–6.). This section is full of striking passages, e.g. 6.[4-13], in wh. there is a delicate refrain. (3) A succession of visions wh. formed parabolic occasions for prophetic discourse.

The text of A. is fairly correct; the diffcs. between LXX and MT. are unimportant, and are all due to similarities of letters in sound or appearance, e.g. Raiphan (Remphan, Ac. 7.[42]) and Chiun. The confusion may be at once explained by refc. to the plate of Alphabets in Jw. Enc. i. 449. Some critics—Cheyne, Marti—assert that there are interpolations; but their conclusions are deduced solely fm. their ideas of the scope and limitations of the prophet, and are therefore valueless.

The style of A. is accurate and rhythmic: the illustrations are drawn mainly fm. pastoral and agricultural life.

The authenticity of A. has rarely been denied. Havet's arguments practically amount to this: the state of society revealed by the prophecy wd. suit the days of John Hyrcanus, therefore it was written then. It may be enough to say it wd. also suit France in the days of Napoleon III.

A.'s refcs. to the Pentateuch are of importance. Their reality is admitted to some extent by Dr. Driver (SDB. s.v.). He restricts them, however, (1) to the Law of Holiness, so far as ceremonial is concerned, and hints (2) that the histl. refcs. may be due to tradition. As to (1) the directions for the offering of the "sacrifice of thanksgiving," tōdāh, are found in Lv. 7.[12-15], part of P. The denunciations of the falsity of the worship at Bethel (4.[4]), imply a kge. of the Deuteronomic Law on the part, not only of the prophet, but also of his audience. The word ḥōq, rendered "commandment" (2.[4]), is a favourite term with the Deuteronomist, esp. connected with shāmar, "to keep." As regards (2) the word hāpak, used in refc. to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, it has the sense "to overthrow" very rarely, except in relation to these cities. A. uses it here, although in all other cases he takes it in its more usual significance, "to turn." This implies a written source. We have only given a selection of instances wh., in their cumulative effect, make it morally cert. that A. had the Pentateuch nearly complete. Of course, as Dr. Driver says, the evidence is not demonstrative; but histl. evidence never can be.

The relation of A. to Joel is interesting. Two striking phrases they have in common: "The Lord shall roar out of Zion, and utter His voice from Jrs." (Am. 1.[2]; Jl. 3.[16]); "The mountains shall drop with new wine" (Am. 9.[13]; Jl. 3.[18]). In each case the phrase is peculiar. Both prophets refer to the "day of the Lord," but to difft. aspects. Wh. is the earlier we shall discuss under JOEL.

Messrs. Day and Chapin, in the Amer. Jour. of Sem. Lang., Jan. 1902, maintain that the prophecy of A. is post-Exilic, (1) Because it is a unity, and many passages are regarded as late by Cheyne, Taylor, and G. A. Smith. If the correctness of these critical decisions is denied, this argument falls to the ground. It is for these critics to show how they escape D. and C.'s argument from homogeneity of style and unity of structure. (2) Because it is too sublime to be pre-Exilic. But in many Lits. the earliest writings are the most sublime. Homer is not denied sublimity, nor Dante. If it is denied that Job and Joel are post-Exilic, this argument also falls to the ground. (3) Because the lang. is late. As the writers deny that the Song of Deborah is early, and point out no bk. or portion of a bk. wh. they consider early, one suspects that they regard all Heb. Lit. as post-Exilic. But perhaps their argument is intended to be a reductio ad absurdum.

AMPHIPOLIS, a city of Macedonia, on the E. side of the Strymon. A loop of the river almost surrounds the city; hence the name, Amphi-polis. Founded as a colony by the Athenians in B.C. 436, it was captured by Brasidas, B.C. 424. In an attack led by Cleon for its recovery, both Cleon and Brasidas perished. Here, after the battle of Pydna,

COIN OF AMPHIPOLIS

Paulus Æmilius declared the Macedonians free. Paul visited A. on his second Missionary Journey (Ac. 17.[1]), another Paulus, declaring a nobler freedom. The mod. vill. Neochori occupies the anct. site.

AMPLIAS (AV.), AMPLIATUS (RV.), is saluted by Paul as "my beloved in the Lord" (Rm. 16.[8]). The name occurs in the Catacomb of Domitilla; poss. this A. is buried there.

AMRAM. (1) S. (descendant) of Kohath, s. of Levi (Ex. 6.[18-20]), married his fr.'s sr. (kinswoman) Jochebed. He was fr. of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses, and poss. headman of his tribe. (2) S. of Dishan (1 Ch. 1.[41], RV. "Hamran"; Gn. 36.[26], "Hemdan"). Amramites, a branch of the Levite family of Kohath, who traced their descent from Amram.

AMRAPHEL (Gn. 14.[1f.]), k. of Shinar, confederate with CHEDARLAOMER, ARIOCH, and TIDAL. A. has been identd. with Ḥammurabi, the sixth monarch of a dyn. reigning in Bab. A series of tablets deciphered by Dr. Pinches appears to prove these ks. to have been contemporaries. A. had been subject to Arioch (Eri-aku, otherwise Rim-Sin), who was an Elamite vassal k. of Ellasar (Larsa), but established his own dominion by the overthrow of the Elamite power and proclaimed himself "k. of the four regions, k. of Shumir and Accad." His revolt agst. the Elamites was prob. synchronous with the overthrow of Chedarlaomer by Abraham at Damascus.

Interest in A. has been increased by the discovery at Persepolis of "a block of black diorite about 2.25 metres high, tapering from 1.90 to 1.65 in circumference" (Johns, Bab. and Asyr. Cont., p. 14), inscribed with the Code of Ḥammurabi. A portion of the writing has been obliterated, but nine-tenths of it have been preserved amounting to 3600 lines. A collection of letters to and from A. have also been found. All these things unite to make A. the best known potentate in that Millennium.

DIORITE BLOCK CONTAINING THE LAWS OF HAMMURABI (AMRAPHEL)
From A. Jeremias' Das A.T. im Lichte des Alten Orients[2]

AMULETS (Is. 3.[20], RV.) are objs. carried or worn about the person to protect the bearer fm. evil. Thus, among the Arabs a blue bead strung on the hair of a boy, or knotted in the mane or tail of a horse, is thought a sure protection agst. the malign influence of the "evil eye" (Mw. 20.[15]). A bone fm. the vertebræ of a wolf, worn on a string round the neck, is a cert. safeguard agst. consumption.

The word leḥāshim (Is. 3.[20]) is derived fm. lāḥash, wh. means "enchantments," and also "the objs. by wh. enchantments are averted." Jahn (Bib. Arch., par. 131) thinks these were figs. of serpents carried in the hand by Heb. women, as Arab women, before Mohammad, wore golden serpents between their breasts.

AMULET
From A. Jeremias' Das A.T. im Lichte des Alten Orients[2]

Benzinger (HA., p. 436) thinks that jewelry had, in the earliest times, a religious significance as amulets (Ex. 11.[2f.]; Ho. 2.[13]; cp. Gn. 24.[47], 35.[4]). Poss. on this act. Gideon asked for the golden rings taken as spoil fm. the Midianites (Jg. 8.[24]). There also we find crescents with chains upon the camels' necks, as well as crescents and pendants worn by the ks. (RV.).

Phylacteries may have been sanctioned to take the place and discourage the use of A. (Dt. 6.[8], 11.[18]), while the ornamentation on the High Priest's robe, pomegranates and bells (Ex. 28.[33], &c.), may have been originally in the nat. of amulets (Benzinger, HA., p. 428). With these we may compare the mod. Arb. tilasm and hijab, words fm. the Qor'an, or mystical sentences written on paper, sewn up in cloth or leather, and worn on the person. Of the same nat. seem to have been the famous Ephesian Spells (Ac. 19.[19]), "small slips of parchment in silk bags, on wh. were written strange cabalistic words, of little or lost meaning . . . prob. a survival of the old Phrygian cultus of the powers of Nature."

The Jews were strong believers in A., and the Rabbis thought it worth while to give directions for their use, for both animals and men (Shabbath, f. 53. 1, 61. 1, 2; Gittin, f. 67. 2). Their use among the heathen was widespread. Even the Christians at times used the Gospels in this way (Jerome on Mw. 4.[24]). The council of Laodicea forbade their use.

To this day protection is sought by means of A. in the E., for cattle and other property, e.g. a house. A rough representation of a hand, in white or in red, is a frequent sight on the walls, esp. of new houses.

ANAB, a city of the Anakim taken by Joshua (11.[21]) in the Judean hill country (15.[20]). It is the mod. 'Anāb, S.W. of Hebron.

ANAHARATH, a city in Issachar (Jo. 19.[19]), prob. the mod. En-Na'urah, S.E. of Jebel ed-Duḥy, the so-called Little Hermon.

ANAK, the ancestor of the ANAKIM (Dt. 2.[10]). Prob. really a common noun, "necklace" (SS. 4.[9]), or even "neck" (cp. Arb. 'unq, "neck," 'anaqa, "to embrace"). If this is so the name benê 'Anaq really meant "sons of the Neck," i.e. "giants." They are also called descendants of ARBA (Jo. 15.[13], 21.[11]). The term A. in Nu. 13.[33] is merely explanatory of "Nephîlim." They inhabited HEBRON, wh. was called KIRIATH-ARBA. Three leaders of the Benê 'Anaq, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, were driven out by CALEB (Jo. 15.[14]). After this they disappear from hist.

ANAMMELECH, "Anu is prince" (Schrader, COT.[2] i. 276), a god of the Sepharvaim (2 K. 17.[31]). The rites of worship are the same as those of Molech, with whom perhaps the writer of K. meant to ident. the Bab. Anu, god of the sky (Barnes, HDB. s.v.). See ADRAMMELECH.

ANANIAH. (1) Fr. of Maaseiah, grandfr. of Azariah (Ne. 3.[23]). (2) A town occupied by Benjamites after the exile, identd. with Beit Ḥanîna, c. 4 miles N. of Jrs.

ANANIAS (Hananiah, "J". is gracious."). (1) A member of the primitive Church in Jrs., who, having sold a piece of land, conspired with his w. SAPPHIRA to gain repute for generosity (see ALMSGIVING) by deceiving the brethren. On being exposed he fell down dead; a like fate overtaking his w. (Ac. 5.[1-11]). (2) The Damascene Christian who baptized Saul (Ac. 9.[10-17]); while a Christian, apparently yet a devout Jew (22.[12]). (3) High Priest, s. of Nedebæus, president of the Sanhedrin at the trial of Paul (Ac. 23.[2ff.]). When Paul had only begun his defence, A. commanded to smite him on the mouth. He was one of Paul's accusers before Felix.

His elevation to the High P'hood was due to the influence of Herod of Chalcis. He consistently supported the Herodian policy of submission to Rome. His s. Eleazar belonged to the fanatical party, and refusing, as governor of the Temple, to offer the customary sacrifice for the emperor, he precipitated the conflict. When the uproar began, A. hid himself, but the fanatical mob found and put him to death. In the Tlm. A. is called Johanan (John), and is charged with gluttony and extortion.

ANATHOTH. (1) A Levite town in Benjamin (Jo. 21.[18]), now 'Anāta, 2¼ miles N.E. of Jrs., a small hamlet with remains of anct. bldgs. It was the home of Abiathar (1 K. 2.[26]) and other men of note, but it owes its fame to Jeremiah, its greatest s. (Jr. 1.[1]). It commands an extensive view over the uplands to the N., and across the wilderness towards the Dead Sea. It is exposed to the full blast of the burning E. wind. (2) A s. of the Benjamite Becher (1 Ch. 7.[8]).

ANDREW, Gr. Andreas, br. of Simon Peter, s. of Jonas, born in Bethsaida of Galilee, resided with Peter in Capernaum (Jn. 1.[40f.], 12.[20ff.]; Mk. 1.[21, 29]). He was a disciple of John the Baptist, and along with another was the first to follow Jesus (Jn. 1.[35ff.]), to whom also he brought his br. Simon. Jesus called him with Peter to discipleship, fm. his work as a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee (Mw. 4.[18ff.]; Mk. 1.[16ff.]), and his name appears in the lists of the Twelve. What is related of him in Jn. 6., where he tells of the lad with the fishes, and in Jn. 12., where he brings the Greeks to Jesus, may betoken the practical char. of the man. Nothing further is recorded of A. in Scrip. Origen (Euseb. HE. iii. 1) says that he laboured in Scythia. Hence he is the patron saint of Russia. Accdg. to the Acta, A. et Matthiæ (Tischendorf, Acta Apocrypha), he was sent to the Anthropophagi. He is said to have preached also in Amasea, Sinope, Nicæa, Nicomedia, Bysantium, Thrace, Macedonia and Achaia, and to have been martyred in this last province at Patræ (Miracula Andreæ). An alleged statue of him was long shown at Sinope, and the marble seat in wh. he taught.

The tradition that A. died by crucifixion is best supported, altho' the Egpn. Acts of A. add stoning. The X-shaped cross, called by his name, is associated with him only by very late tradition.

It is said that Artemius took the relics of A. from Patræ to Constantinople in 357 or 358. From Constantinople they were conveyed to Amalfi in 1210. Part of his cross is enclosed in one of the piers supporting the dome of St. Peter's in Rm.

St. Rule, an Eastern monk, is said to have brought the arm of A. to Scotland c. A.D. 369, and buried it at St. Andrews, where he founded a church, the tower of wh. still stands, bearing his name, St. Rule, or Regulus.

For traditions, see Acta Sanctorum for Oct. 17.

For Lit. see Lipsius, Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, i. 543ff.

ANDRONICUS, saluted along with Junias by Paul (Rm. 16.^{7}) as his "kinsmen," "fellow-prisoners"; they are declared to be "of note among the APOSTLES"; the interesting biographical fact is added that they were Christians before the Apostle himself.

As the word used for "fellow-prisoner" is not Paul's usual word, it has been suggd. that it ought to be taken in a metaphorical sense; there seems, however, no valid ground for this. What Lightfoot suggs. in regard to ARISTARCHUS may apply to A.

ANEM, a town in Issacher (1 Ch. 6.^{73}), prob. identl. with En-Gannim (Jo. 21.^{29}), the mod. Jenīn.

ANER. (1) Br. of Mamre and Eschol, Amorite chiefs in alliance with Abraham, at Hebron (Gn. 14.$^{13, 24}$). (2) A town in Manasseh W. of the Jordan (1 Ch. 6.^{70}), wh. Guthe suggs. may be an error for Ta'nâk, TAANACH (Jo. 21.^{25}).

ANGELS. In OT. and NT. alike, the existence of beings between God and man is assumed. The term designating these is, in both Heb. and Gr., a word that denotes a "messenger" (Gn. 32.^{3}; Js. 2.^{25}, &c.). Appearances of A. are frequent in the Pentateuch, but restricted to J. and E. In most instances "the A. of God," or "of the Lord," is named, but in cert. cases several are mentioned, e.g. Gn. 19.^{1}, 32.^{1}. The word does not occur in Jo., but the "Captain of the Host of the Lord" may be taken as = "the A. of the Lord" in Gn., Ex., and Nu. In Jg. A. appear in the call of Gideon, and the promise of Samson's birth to Manoah. In the histl. bks. A. are referred to in connection with the appearance at the threshing-floor of Araunah, the deeds of Elijah, and the destruction of Sennacherib. To these may be added the "horses and chariots of fire," protecting Elisha (2 K. 6.^{17}). In Jb. A. appear in the prologue as "Sons of God" (1.^{6}), identd. by parallelism with the "Morning Stars," who sing together at the Creation (38.^{7}). Altho' wiser than men, God charges them with "folly." There are many refcs. to A. in the Psalms not only under that name, but also as "the Mighty" (Ēlīm, 29.^{1}), and "Sons of the Mighty" (89.^{6}). A. are not prominent in the prophetic writings till we come to Zc.

The doctrine of A. is considerably developed in the NT. An A. announces the conception of Jesus to Mary (Lk. 1.^{26}) and Joseph (Mw. 1.^{20}). At His birth a band of A. appeared to the shepherds (Lk. 2.$^{9f.}$). After His temptation A. ministered to Him; an A. strengthened Him in Gethsemane. At His resurrection A. greeted the women who came to embalm His body (Jn. 20.^{12}). An A. rolled away the stone fm. the door of the Sepulchre (Mw. 28.^{2}). At His ascension "two men in white apparel," presumably A., sent the apostles back to Jrs. (Ac. 1.$^{10f.}$). An A. released the apostles fm. prison (Ac. 5.^{19}). An A. appeared to Cornelius (Ac. 10.^{3}, &c.), loosed the chains of Peter (Ac. 12.$^{7f.}$), and announced to Paul the safety of his fellow-passengers (Ac. 27.^{23}). In several cases Paul mentions A. in his epistles. The "Principalities and Powers in Heavenly places" (Eph. 3.^{10}) are A., and the terms imply that there is in some sense a hierarchy. This idea has been elaborated by Dionysius the Areopagite. There are notices of A. in the epistles of Peter and Jude. The latter is esp. interesting, because it takes for granted the fall of cert. of the A. The bk. of Rv. is necessarily the principal source of our kge. about the A. The word A. appears in Rv. nearly as often as it does in all the rest of the NT.

A. are also called "gods" (Ps. 138.^{1}), "holy ones" (Dn. 4.^{17}), and "watchers" (Dn. 4.^{13}). Related to A., altho' distinct from them, are CHERUBIM and SERAPHIM. In their intercourse with men, A. assume a human form, usly. that of white-robed young men of dazzling beauty. We may note the weakness of contemporary art, wh. can attain angelic beauty only by making A. women.

Their name indicates their function: A. are primarily God's messengers. He sends A. to support His people (Ps. 91.^{11}); to guard them (Ps. 34.^{7}; Dn. 6.^{22}); to call them to duty, as Gideon (Jg. 6.$^{12f.}$); to convey a promise, e.g. the birth of Samson (Jg. 13.^{3}), of John (Lk. 1.$^{11f.}$), and of our Lord (Lk. 1.$^{26f.}$); to warn (Mw. 2.^{13}); to rebuke (Jg. 2^{1}). To the enemies of God's people their function is punitive: A. chase them (Ps. 35.^{5}), destroy them, as Sennacherib (Is. 37.^{36}). A. have charge over individuals (Mw. 18.^{10}), as princes they have authority over the nations (Dn. 10.$^{20f.}$), they have charge over churches (Rv. 1.^{20}), and they have the care of the objs. of Nat., e.g. of the waters (Rv. 16.^{5}). In our Lord's parables A. fulfil important functions in the progress of the divine kdm.; they watch over that progress (Mw. 13.^{27}); at the end they separate the wicked fm. the righteous (Mw. 13.$^{41. 49}$). They attend the Divine Majesty (Ps. 68.^{17}, a difft. word here), they praise God (Ps. 103.^{20}).

Two names of A. have come down to us; Michael (Dn. 10.^{13}; Ju.^{9}; Rv. 12.^{7}) and Gabriel (Dn. 8.^{16}; Lk. 1.$^{19, 26}$). In the apocryphal bk. of Tobit, Raphael is added. The Enoch bks. have many more names of A., including the three just mentioned. It is to be presumed that the Archangel of 1 Th. 4.^{16} is Michael. The Tlm. also presents us with an elaborate Angelology. It has been suggd. that there is a connection between the Zoroastrian Amhaspands and Jewish Angelology, and that "the Seven Spirits of God" go back to the same source. If this be so, it is singular that the Priestly Document, alleged by Critics to have originated in the Persian period, shd. have no mention of A.

Notwithstanding their prominence in Scrip. it can hardly be denied that men have ceased to believe in A. Perhaps the abounding materialism is the nemesis of our want of faith. That there should be an order of beings between God and men is inherently prob. That God, who carries out His providential designs to a great extent by means of finite, intelligent agents, wearing material bodies, i.e. human beings, shd. use other intelligences to carry out the plan of the Universe, is in accordance with analogy. What we know phenomenally as the Laws of Nature may be the outcome of the steady will of some lofty angelic Intelligence.

ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES (Rv. 2., 3.). (1) It has been maintained, e.g. by Trench, that the A. were bishops. It is true that in less than half a cent. after Rv. was written, the monarchical constitution evolved made the bishops so powerful in their respective churches that they were responsible for everything done. But (a) there is no instance of a bishop being called an A. of a Church; (b) the episcopate was prob. not then instituted; (c) elsewhere in Rv. A. are always sptl. beings. (2) Some, e.g. Ebrard, hold that the A. were messengers sent by the Churches to receive the Apostle's counsels. The epistles were doubtless conveyed by messengers; but in each case they are addressed "to the A." The dative, τῷ ἀγγέλῳ, does not natly. mean "for the A.," i.e. for him to carry to the Church that had sent him. The usage of Rv. is also agst. this view. (3) Some, e.g. Milligan, prefer to regard A. as a personification of the Church addressed. This mt. suit in some respects, but again the usage of the bk. is agst. it. In Rv. a church is personified, not as an A., but as a woman (cp. chap. 12.). (4) Others, e.g. Alford, give A. the meaning it commonly bears in Scrip. This is favoured by the analogy of the rest of Rv., and by the identn. of the Stars with the A. (Rv. 1.^{20}), found also elsewhere (Jb. 38.^{7}, cp. 4.^{18}, 15.^{15}, Rv. 9.^{1}). It agrees with the angelic functions noted above (Rv. 16.^{5}; Dn. 10.^{14}; Mw. 18.^{10}; Ac. 12.^{15}). It is nat. that there shd. be A. of the Churches. It is no objn. to say that the A. are blamed: this accords with Jb. 4.^{18}. As finite beings, A. are limited in kge., wisdom, and power. Whatever the relationship between a guardian A. and the obj. of his guardianship, blame may be quite legitimate. A teacher is blamed for backward scholars.

On the whole the last-mentioned view seems best to meet all the requirements.

ANIM (Jo. 15.^{50}), a town in the Judean highlands, mentioned with Eshtemoh, prob. corrspds. to the double ruin of Ghuwein, W. of Eshtemoh, c. 12 miles S. of Hebron; cp. OEJ. s.v. Anab and Estemoe.

ANISE (Mw. 23.^{23}), RVm. "dill," Gr. Anēthon = Anethum Graveolens. It is the common Dill, Tlm. Shabath, Arb. Shibith, of wh. (Maaseroth, c. iv. 5) the fruit, leaves, and stem are "subject to tithe." It is found both wild and under cultivation in Pal. It is much appreciated as a condiment, and in many forms of illness it is valued as a medicine.

ANKLE CHAINS (Is. 3.^{20}, RV.), light chains attached to the ankles, to produce a measured and graceful step.

ANKLETS (Is. 3.^{18}) were wrought frequently of the precious metals, in the form of bracelets, and worn on the ankles. In walking they made a pleasing, tinkling sound.

ANNA, a prophetess, dr. of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher, in Jrs., at the time of our Lord's birth (Lk. 2.^{36}), poss. an Essene, age 84, talked of Jesus to other Essenes, i.e. "them that were looking for the redemption of Isr." (Thomson, Books that Influenced our Lord and His Apostles, pp. 75–122).

ANNAS, ANANUS (Jos.), s. of Seth, was High Priest from A.D. 6 to A.D. 15, and had afterwards the unique privilege of seeing his five sons and his s.-in-law raised to that office (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1–2; XX. ix. 1; Jn. 18.^{13}). It was held also by a grandson. A. was a man of enormous wealth, and enjoyed great influence with the Rms. His house derived large revenues from what the rabbinical writers called "the booths of the sons of Hanan." These Edersheim idents. with the temple market, and the four shops on the Mt. of Olives, where money mt. be changed into money of the sanctuary, where pigeons and other requisites for sacrificial purposes cd. be obtained (LTJ. i. pp. 376ff.; ii. 547). Great profits were made off these sales; and in exchanging, the unsophisticated countrymen were shamefully defrauded. We can understand A.'s animus agst. Jesus, if it was his money-making traffic that was pointed at in the description of the temple as "a den of robbers" (Mw. 21.^{13}).

A. is called High Priest, when Caiaphas held the office (Jn. 18.^{19}), and again as H. Pt. he is mentioned in Ac. 4.^{6}. From Jos., however, we learn that one who had attained that dignity ever afterwards retained the title. The leading men in the high priestly families seem also to have borne the name. The nearest parallel to Lk. 3.^{2}, where A. and Caiaphas are conjoined in the H. P'hood, is in Jos. BJ. II. xii. 6, where he speaks of "Jonathan and Ananias the H. Pts." (τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς 'I. και 'A.), Ananias being in office, but Jonathan being named first, perhaps as the older man.

Considering his position and influence, there is nothing extraordinary in Jesus being informally examined by A. before being sent to the H. P. (Jn. 18.$^{13ff.}$). Lk. leaves room for this examination (22.$^{54ff.}$), while Mw. and Mk. omit it altogether, apparently transferring to the morning events of the night.

ANOINTING. Among the Hebs., as among the Grs. and Rms., the limbs were rubbed with oil after washing, to preserve the skin soft, esp. in the hot dry air of summer. In S. Arabia the Arabs rub oil over the whole body, believing that it strengthens the body and protects them agst. the heat of the sun (Niebuhr, Beschreibung von Arabien, p. 131). On festive occasions the Hebs. anointed themselves (Am. 6.^{6}; 2 Ch. 28.^{15}; Ps. 23.^{5}; cf. Lk. 7.^{47}). Its omission was a sign of mourning (2 S. 14.^{2}, 12.^{20}). It was applied to the hair of the head, to the beard (Ps. 133.^{2}), and the whole frame (Ek. 16.^{9}, &c.). To anoint a man's feet was a mark of special honour (Lk. 7.^{46}; Jn. 12.^{3}). Pure olive oil was commonly used (Ps. 92.^{10}; Dt. 28.^{40}; Mi. 6.^{15}, &c.). Very early the oil was mingled with various fragrant perfumes. The mingling was done by female slaves (1 S. 8.^{13}) or perfumers (Ex. 30.^{35}; Ne. 3.^{8}, RVm., &c.). Oil of spikenard came to be regarded as the most precious ointment (SS. 1.^{12}; Mk. 14.$^{3ff.}$).

ANOINTING A GUEST

Ks. were designated by anointing (1 S. 10.^{1}, 16.^{13}; 1 K. 19.^{15}), and A. also marked their assumption of office (2 S. 2.^{4}, 5.^{3}; 2 K. 11.^{12}, 23.^{30}, &c.), altho' this is not recorded of all. It has been suggd. that A. meant consecration to the P'hood, wh. in anct. times was combined with the kship. (Benzinger, H.A., p. 307). The custom of A. ks. on their ascending the throne was widespread in anct. times, and persists to this day as part of coronation ritual.

All the priests seem to have shared in the priestly A. (Ex. 28.^{41}, 30.$^{22ff.}$; Lv. 7.^{35}, 10.^{7}; Nu. 3.^{3}), but the H. P. alone is called "the anointed priest" (Lv. 4.[3, 5, 16], &c.). The reason for this may be found in the fact that the H. P. was anointed after being robed, and again sprinkled with oil after the sacrifice; while the other priests participated only in the sprinkling (Lv. 8.[12, 30]). A specially mingled oil was reserved for this purpose alone (Ex. 30.[33]).

The consecration of stone pillar or Matztzēbah, prevalent among other peoples, we find also in Scrip. (Gn. 28.[18], 35.[14]). The Tabernacle and its furniture, and the altar after the sin-offering, were consecrated with oil (Ex. 30.[26], 40.[10]; Lv. 8.[11]; Ex. 29.[36]).

In relation to the prophets A. seems to have had only a metaphorical significance (1 K. 19.[16, 19]; cp. 1 Ch. 16.[22]; Ps. 105.[15]). Any one selected by God for special work is spoken of as "anointed." So Cyrus (Is. 45.[1]), the nation of Isr. (Ps. 84.[9], &c.), and the Servant of the Lord (Is. 61.[1]; cp. Lk. 4.[18]). "The Anointed" or "The Messiah" came to be the title of the promised and expected Deliverer (Jn. 1.[41], &c.). So the chosen of God in the NT. are His anointed (1 Cor. 1.[21]; 1 Jn. 2.[20, 27]).

The practice of oiling the shield before battle is alluded to in 2 S. 1.[21], RV., and Is. 21.[5].

Oil was used as a healing agent (Mk. 6.[13]; Js. 5.[14]), also mingled with wine (Lk. 10.[34]), and so it becomes a fig. of the pardoning and cleansing grace of God (Is. 1.[6]; Ek. 16.[9]; Rv. 3.[18]).

Ointments were applied to the dead in preparation for burial (Mk. 16.[1]; Lk. 23.[56]; Jn. 19.[40]; cp. Jn. 12.[7]).

ANT, a gregarious family of hymenopterous insects, of wh. several species are found in Pal. The industry (Pr. 6.[6]) and foresight (Pr. 30.[25]) of the A. are proverbial. Sir John Lubbock—now Lord Avebury—in his bk. on "Ants, Bees, and Wasps," gives many striking illustrations of the A.'s wisdom and industry. It used to be thought a mistake to speak of the A. as gathering grain: that it does so is now beyond doubt.

ANTICHRIST. As the shadow follows the sunlight, so the idea of A. accompanies that of the Christ. When it appears in the NT. it is clear that the writers refer to an idea familiar to those whom they address; A. is part of the heritage Christianity took over fm. Judaism. Even among the Jews we cannot trace the origin of the idea; it certainly appears in Apocalyptic Lit., but not early; and in the Targums, but still later. In Tg. J. to Is. 11.[4] the last clause is rendered, "by the breath of his lips he shall destroy 'Armīlōs the wicked." Here Armīlōs = Romulus, i.e. Rome. The idea seems to be drawn on the one side fm. the 11th horn of Dn. 7., and the little branch horn of Dn. 8.; and on the other fm. Belial, as in the frequent phrase "s. of Belial."

In the LXX this is never given as a proper name, it is always interpreted as "sin," "lawlessness," phrases that agree in thought with those of St. Paul in 2 Th. 2.[3].

In Rv. the influence of Dn. is much more obvious. In his Epp. the apostle John applies the term to false teachers. If we take in connection with 2 Th. 2.[3]; Eph. 2.[2], "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience," we see that Paul and John are really at one. A. was a spiritual potence who expressed himself in wicked persons: he was a person, but a spirit. The two apostles differ in this: while Paul regards the Imperial Power of Rome as that wh. kept the spiritual potence of evil in restraint, John in Rv. treats the Roman Imperial system as the appearance in history of the power of A. It may be that in the evolution of the idea of A. the educative influence of Persian Mazdeism may be traced, but the germ is to be found in BELIAL. In Apocalyptic we find Beliar is the name given to the spirit that opposes God, as in the Ascension of Isaiah; so St. Paul asks, "What agreement hath Christ with Beliar?" (WH.).

During the Middle Ages the imagination of Jew and Gentile commentators was exercised on the subject of A.; the latter endeavoured to twist the name of Mohammed so that the letters when reckoned as numbers wd. amount to 666; the former dwelt on the marvels "Armillus" wd. do. With the Reformation the question assumed a new aspect; Protestant divines saw A. in Papal Rome, and Papists declared Luther to be the "Man of Sin." In more recent times some have held the Napoleons, 1st and 3rd, to be A. The solution is to be sought in a more spiritual region; the Spirit of Evil, whose influence is manifested in political ambition, in lawlessness, in evil generally, all is A. All evil, moral, physical, and political, is to be destroyed by "the breath of the lips" of the returning Son of Man, as the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" smote on the feet the image of worldly empires, and not only destroyed, but took its place and filled the earth. It may be that the process is going on already; all spread of Christian principles, all removal of evils in the physical frame or the body politic, is the "Lord destroying" A. with the brightness of His coming. Although in the Ascension of Isaiah Beliar is identified with Nero, and though the trend of Critical opinion is to follow this identification with regard to the "Man of Sin," holding the restraining force to be Claudius, we feel it is making prophecy of too private an interpretation. The resolution of 666 into Neron Qesar involves several difficulties that cannot easily be removed, e.g. it wd. be meaningless to give Nero seven heads and ten horns.

ANTIOCH. (1) A city on the Orontes—the modern el-'Asi—in the wide and fertile plain between Mt. Casius and Mt. Amanus, c. 120 stadia fm.

the river's mouth. It was founded in B.C. 300 by Seleucus Nikator, and called Antiocheia fm. his fr. Antiochus. The city prospered and was enlarged by Antiochus the Gt., and by A. Epiphanes. The population was formed of Greeks, Syrians, and Jews. These last had a governor of their own. In one of their synagogues were placed the spoils taken fm. the Temple by Epiphanes, his successor having restored them to the Jews. The community numbered many proselytes, of whom was Nicolas (Ac. 6.[5]). A. was the centre of Hellenism in Syria, although its mingled population, fickle and fanatical, could not properly be called Gr. An uprising of its people agst. Demetrius II., in favour of Trypho, was put down by the assistance of Jonathan Maccabæus and 3000 Jewish soldiers; but afterwards the city passed to the youthful Antiochus and his general Trypho. It was captured in B.C. 83 by the Armenian k. Tigranes, whom Pompey vanquished in turn, making the city free. Under the Rms. it became the capital of the province of Syria and of the E. Under the Cæsars it attained its greatest prosperity. The rights of the Jews, recorded on tablets of bronze, were respected by the Rms. To Herod the Gt. the city owed its splendid pillared street. Accdg. to a late writer, Titus set up over the gates the cherubim taken fm. the Temple. Close by was the grove of Daphne, a sanctuary of Apollo. In population A. ranked after Rm. and Alexandria. The city was noted for its love of Art and Lit., its love of pleasure, its profligacy, and its satirical bitterness.

A. soon became a centre for both Jew and Gentile followers of Jesus (Ac. 11.[19]), and here they were first called Christians (Ac. 11.[26]). On his first and second missionary journeys, St. Paul set out fm. and returned to A. (Ac. 13.[1ff.], 14.[26ff.], 15.[40f.], 18.[22]). Here also took place the dispute between Paul and Peter as to the relation of Gentile Christians to the Mosaic law (Ac. 15.; Gal. 2.[11ff.]). A. played an important part in the early days of Christianity, and continued to be the chief city in Syria as long as it was controlled from the W. With the coming of the Arabs the dominion passed to Damascus; and now it is represented by a poor town of some 6000 inhabitants called Anṭākiyeh.

(2) Pisidian A. was "a city of Phrygia towards Pisidia" (Strabo, xii. 569, 577), prob. also founded by Seleucus Nikator. Built by men fm. Magnesia on the Mæander, the Rms. declared it free in B.C. 190. Augustus raised it to the status of a colonia with Latin rights, under the name of Cæsareia Antiocheia, when it served, along with other colonies, in the region of wh. it was the centre, to overawe and restrain the barbarous Pisidians in the Taurus Mts. It possessed a Jewish synagogue, preached in by Paul on his first missionary journey (Ac. 13.[14ff.]). The consideration and influence enjoyed by women in Phrygia is illustrated in ver. 50. The ruins of A. lie 2 miles E. fm. Yalowatch, on the skirts of the long ridge called Sultan-Dagh, in a strong position, c. 3600 ft. above sea-level, overlooking a large and fertile plain, wh. stretches away S.E. to the Limnai (Lake of Egerdir), and is drained by the river Anthies.

APOLLONIA, a town passed through by St. Paul (Ac. 17.[1]), in the district of Mygdonia, c. 30 miles fm. Amphipolis, and 38 fm. Thessalonica. It lay on the Via Egnatia, near Lake Bolbe. The name poss. survives in the mod. Pollina.

APOLLOS, contraction for Apollonius, a Jew of Alexandria, a disciple of John the Baptist. A. came to Ephesus and was brought to the kge. of Jesus by Aquila and Priscilla. From Ephesus he went to Corinth. Some ascribe to him the Ep. to the Hebs. Not impossibly the points of resemblance between the adventures of Apollonius of Tyana and of Paul may be due to the fact that one of Paul's companions was known to have borne that name.

APOSTLE. The word apostolos means prop. one sent and commissioned for special work. Jesus is thus the A. of God (He. 3.[1]; cp. Lk. 4.[43]; Jn. 17.[18]), and cert. brethren are As. of the churches (2 Cor. 8.[23], RVm.; Php. 2.[25]). Our use of the term is confined to those sent and commissioned by our Lord for particular service. In this sense it is first used of the Twelve whom He sent to preach, &c. (Mw. 10.[2]; cp. Lk. 6.[13]; Mk. 6.[30]). The Twelve seem to have thought the Apostolate limited to that number (Ac. 1.[25ff.]), and proceeded to fill the vacancy left by Judas Iscariot. Subsequent events proved that no such limitations existed. Paul and Barnabas (Ac. 14.[14]), James the Lord's br. (Gal. 1.[19]; 1 Cor. 15.[7]), Andronicus and Junias (Rm. 16.[7]), and prob. Silas, so long the companion of Paul, were As.

It was required of an A. that he shd. have seen the Lord, and be able to bear testimony as an eye-witness to His resurrection (Lk. 24.[48]; Ac. 1.[8], [22]; 1 Cor. 9.[1]). All those mentioned above may very well have possessed this qualification. The A. received his commission directly from the Lord Himself (1 Cor. 12.[28]; Gal. 1.[15, 17]; Eph. 4.[11]), and he was authenticated, not by any human authority, but by the "signs of an A." (2 Cor. 12.[12]), and by his success in gaining converts (1 Cor. 9.[2]).

The A. was sent as Christ's ambassador, to preach, to bear witness, and to make disciples of all nations (1 Cor. 1.[17]; 2 Cor. 5.[20]; Eph. 6.[20]; Lk. 24.[48]; Mw. 28.[19]). But while it was agreed that Paul and Barnabas shd. "go unto the Gentiles"—Paul calls himself "the A. of the Gentiles" (Rm. 11.[13])—and to Peter "the gospel of the circumcision" was committed (Gal. 2.[7-9]), no special territories seem to have been allotted to the various members of the band.

The relations of the A. to the churches he founded, as counsellor, superintendent, and authoritative interpreter of truth and morals, are well illustrated in the letters written by Paul to the congregations originated by him.

APOTHECARY shd. in all cases be read with RV. "perfumer." The refc. is always to spices and mixing of perfumes (2 Ch. 16.[14]; Ex. 30.[25, 35], 37.[29]; Ec. 10.[1]; Ne. 3.[8]).

APPII FORUM, a place 43 miles fm. Rome on the Appian Way. Rm. Christians met Paul at A. F. (Ac. 17.[28]). Horace (Sat. I. 5) mentions it as filled with sailors. Ruins near Treponti are supposed to represent A. F. As the head of a canal, A. F. was a centre of trade; hence it was called the Forum or Market of Appius.

APPLE, APPLE TREE. It is enough to say that the apple of the Bible is just the apple. All attempts to ident. it with the apricot, the quince, the orange, and the citron are futile. The tree grows to a good size, and affords pleasant shade (SS. 2.[3], 8.[5]). The fruit is sweet to the taste, and is much appreciated for its smell, esp. by the sick, who find it most reviving (SS. 2.[3], 7.[8]). The very name survives in the mod. tuffâḥ (Heb. tappuaḥ). Thus also Tiffâḥ is the Arb. name of Beth Tappuaḥ (Jo. 15.[33]). Dr. Post suggs. (HDB.) that the "pictures of silver" may be the baskets of filigree work in wh. the oriental silversmiths excel.

AQUILA and PRISCILLA, a Jew of Pontus and his w., who had settled in Rome, but left when the Jews were expelled by Claudius (Ac. 18.[2]). They were in Corinth when Paul arrived, and made their acquaintance. They were of the same trade as himself, so he lived with them. Both names are Rm., so it may be regarded as prob. that they possessed the citizenship of Rome. Tho' it is not cert., it appears likely fm. the nar. that they were Christians when Paul met them. A. and P. left Corinth with Paul, accompanying him as far as Ephesus, where they took up their abode (Ac. 18.[19]). Apollos was instructed by A. and P. (Ac. 18.[24]). They are saluted by Paul (Rm. 16.[3]). From this it has been deduced that they had returned to Rome; but some have thought that the Epistle to the Rms. was, from Rome, sent on to Ephesus, and that chap. 16. was added; that A. and P. were therefore still in Ephesus; a view that is made more prob. by the fact that they are saluted in 2 Tim. 4.[19]. It is to be noted that in this passage P. is called Prisca. What befell them afterwards is not recorded.

AR, a city on the S. side of the Arnon, the mod. Wâdy Môjib (Nu. 21.[15]; Dt. 2.[9]), the same as Ar Moab (Nu. 21.[28]; Is. 15.[1]), prob. also 'Ir Moab (Nu. 22.[36]), to be identd. with "the city that is in the valley" (Dt. 2.[36], &c.). It lay on the border between Moab and the Amorites in early times, and Isr. in later days. It may perhaps be identd. with the ruin noted by Burckhardt, wh. stands in a piece of "pasture land" below the confluence of the Môjib with the Lejjun.

ARAB, a city near Dumah in the Judean uplands (Jo. 15.[52]). It may be er Rabîyeh, a ruin near Dômeh.

ARABAH, Heb. ha'arābāh, "the Arabah": AV. so renders only once (Jo. 18.[18]); elsewhere "plain": but so RV. uniformly, where the great hollow of the Jordan Valley, fm. the Sea of Galilee S'wards, and its continuation to the Gulf of Akabah, or any part of it, is referred to (Dt. 1.[1], 4.[49]; Jo. 11.[2], &c.). In the pl. EV. translate "plains"—see PLAIN. The plains of Moab ('arābōth) are clearly the Steppes E. of Jordan, corrspdg. to the "plains of Jericho" on the W. Both are included in the A. For the A. N. of the Dead Sea (Sea of the A., Dt. 4.[49]; Jo. 12.[3]), see JORDAN, JORDAN VALLEY.

About 10 miles S. of the Dead Sea a line of white cliffs, composed of sand, gravel, and marl, crosses the valley fm. N.W. to S.E., forming the limit of the Ghōr. From this line S'wards stretches the hollow known as el-'Arabah to-day. It gradually rises for about 60 miles, when the floor of the valley is c. 700 ft. above the level of the Red Sea, and c. 2000 ft. above the Dead Sea. It then descends to the shore at Akabah, a distance of some 45 miles. In its S. reaches it forms "the wilderness of Zin" (Nu. 34.[3]). It well justifies its name, 'arābāh, "Desert Steppe." At its N. end the A. is c. 10 miles wide. It narrows to about ½ mile nearly opposite Jebel Haroun; fm. that point to Akabah it averages about 5 miles. The undulating surface is formed of loose gravel, stones, sand, and stretches of mud. It is torn by water-courses that come down fm. either side, converging on Wādy el-Jaib, by wh. all the contributions fm. the adjoining mountains are carried N. to the Dead Sea. Here and there a (shrub ghada) or acacia may be seen; green patches around the springs, e.g. at 'Ain el-Waibeh on the W., and 'Ain Abu Wairedeh, or Buwairedeh, on the E.; and in parts of the water-courses, willows, tamarisks, reeds, and stunted palms. Up to the level of the Red Sea, some 25 miles S. of the Dead Sea, we are clearly traversing an old sea-bottom, the worn terraces of marl, &c., and other deposits, showing the height to wh. at one time the waters of the Dead Sea must have risen. The A. is bounded on the W. by the deeply furrowed edge of the great limestone uplands of et-Tîh, the Wilderness of Paran; and on the E. by the naked crags of Edom, wh., worn into strange fantastic forms, guard the gorges by wh. the highlands may be approached.

Twice the Isr. seem to have passed through the A.: first, when they journeyed to Kadesh Barnea, and second, when they had to go S'ward as far as Wādy el-Ithem, to find a way by wh. they mt. go round the land of Edom (Nu. 20.[21], 21.[4]; Dt. 2.[8]).

ARABIA, ARABIAN. A. is the name of the great peninsula wh. is bounded on the W. by the Red Sea, on the S. by the Indian Ocean, on the E. by the Persian Gulf, and on the N. by Syria and Pal. This vast country of sand and desert hills, dotted with infrequent oases, with a great fertile tract in the S., loomed large and vague before the minds of the Scrip. writers.

Among the names of Arabian families given in the lists (Gn. 10., 25.), Sheba and Dedan are familiar. Hazarmaveth survives in the mod. Hadramaut. The location of Havilah and Ophir is still in dispute. No cert. trace of Joktan, who plays such an important part (Gn. 10.[26]), is now to be found. Even to Jeremiah (6.[20]) and Joel (3.[8]), Sheba, a great and powerful kdm., is known dimly as "a far country," "a nation far off"; and to the evangelists, it is still "in the ends of the earth" (Mw. 12.[42], Lk. 11.[31]).

In Is. 13.[20], and Jr. 3.[2], Arabian appears as a gen. designation of dwellers in waste places.

Arabian, as the name of those who lived in the great peninsula, occurs only in 2 Ch. 21.[16], "the Arabians wh. are beside the Ethiopians," who seem to have dwelt in the S. This, however, may be intended to denote the S. Arabians as distinguished from the N. Arabians (Socin, KB. s.v.), a distinction recognised in the genealogies, the Ishmaelites (Gn. 25.[12ff.], P.) being the N. Arabians, as agst. the S. Arabians, the children of Joktan (Gn. 10.[25ff.]), whose great ancestor was Eber. As the genealogical tables stand—e.g. cert. tribes, as Sheba and Dedan, appearing as "sons" of Cush and also of Keturah—it is imposs. to construct fm. them an ethnological chart.

Ishmael came in later times to be "associated vaguely with A. in gen." (Ant. I. xii. 2): Mohammed was supposed to have been descended fm. him, through Kedar, and his tomb is still shown at Mecca.*

The ks. of 'Ereb (RV., mingled peoples) are mentioned in 1 K. 10.[15] and Jr. 25.[24], with the ks. of A. The same name occurs in Is. 21.[13] (EV. Arabia). These are the tribes in the Syrian desert and N. Arabia, elsewhere called Kedar, and Children of the E. In the Cuneiform Inscrs. Arabians appear with Kedar and the Nabatæans, as a N. Arabian people. Herodotus (III. 5) relates that the Persians, proposing to invade Egypt, on the advice of Phanes of Halicarnassus, obtained permission from the k. of the Arabians to pass through his territories. He mentions Ienysus, a seaport not identd., and the Arabians held the coast as far as Lake Serbonis and Mt. Casius. Their territory adjoined that of the "Syrians"—see ARAM. They are therefore a N. Arabian people, who seem to have made some advance in civilisation since they were under the rule of a k.

In Ne. 2.[19], 4.[7], 6.[1], we find the Arabians in league with the enemies of the Jews. These are prob. to be identd. with the Nabatæans, who at a later date played a considerable part in the hist. of the country (1 M. 11.[17-39], 2 M. 5.[8]). When Ptolemy defeated Alexander Balas the latter fled into A., where the Nabatæan prince, Zabdiel, beheaded him, and sent his head to Ptolemy (1 M. 11.[17]). One, Eimalcuei, EV. Simalcue (Syr. and Jos. Malchus, Vlg. Emalchuel), reared Antiochus, the s. of Alexander (1 M. 11.[39]). Aretas—Arb. Haritha—(2 M. 5.[8]) was k.—tyrannos—of the Nabatæans. In Græco-Rm. times they were a powerful people to the S. and E. of Pal., Petra being their capital. During the last decades of the 19th cent. many inscrs. were discovered, and deciphered, wh. cast much light on their hist. (For Lit. see Schürer, HJP. I. ii. p. 345f., esp. Gutschmid, Verzeichniss der Nabatäischen Könige, in Euting's Nabatäische Inschriften aus Arabien; Hommel's sketch in Hilprecht's Explorations in Bible Lands.)

* "In medieval Jewish writers 'the lang. of Ishmael,' or 'of Kedar,' means Arabic. In the OT., however, it is to be observed, Ishmael is hardly at all connected with what we call A.: the Arabian peninsula is peopled by the Joktanidae (descts. of Joktan, s. of Abraham's sixth ancestor Eber, and consequently much less closely connected with Isr.), Gn. 10.[26–30]: the Ishmaelites are limited to cert. specified tribes, living almost entirely on the N. or N.W. of these" (Driver, Genesis, p. 244).

We first hear of the Nabatæans in 312 B.C., in connection with the attack upon them by Athenæus, the general of king Antigonus I.—an attack at first successful, but ending in utter and inglorious rout. Whether of Aramæan extraction, as some hold, or of Arabian stock, and identical with Nebaioth, as others contend, they were at this time "uncivilised nomads." Gradually, however, they advanced, and in the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. they had become a power to be reckoned with. These are the Arabians of Jos. and the Maccabees. Their territory is the A. of the NT.; and possibly the Arabians of Ac. 2.[11] may have been Jewish settlers in their country. Accdg. to Jos. (Ant. XVIII. v. 1), Aretas, k. of the Arabians, inflicted signal defeat upon Herod Antipas, in revenge for the insult put upon him by the latter, who divorced his dr. to make way for Herodias. The battle was fought in the yr. 37 A.D., about wh. time Paul escaped fm. the ethnarch of Aretas in Damascus, and went into A. See Aretas, Paul. The Arabian authority—i.e. the Nabatæan—appears then to have extended fm. Damascus, prob. granted to the k. by the Emperor Gaius, to the shores of the Red Sea, including the Sinaitic Peninsula (Ac. 9.[23], 2 Cor. 11.[33], Gal. 1.[17], 4.[25]). The last is heard of the Nabatæans in 106 A.D., when the governor of Syria, Cornelius Palma, converted "A. belonging to Petra" into a Rm. province.

Isr. was necessarily brought into close relations with the N. Arabians by reason of their neighbourhood, and with the S. Arabians by means of commerce; this, however, not directly, but through the N. Arabians who were the great carriers. This prob. acts. for the vagueness of Heb. kge. regarding S. Arabian peoples.

Among the articles of commerce received from S. A., incense was the most important (Ek. 27.[22]). This is a gum secured fm. a particular tree, by slits made in the bark. The industry has been pursued fm. anct. times in a small district on the S. coast, with the old city Dafar as its centre. Sprenger (Geog. 299) thinks the incense trade lay at the foundation of anct. commerce, such vast quantities of it were used in connection with the religious ceremonies of those days; and Prof. Margoliouth (HDB. i. 134) notes the interesting fact that "the verb 'arab' and its derivatives are used in Heb. to signify commerce." It was natural that this prolific source of Sabæan wealth shd. be strictly controlled and guarded. Precious stones and gold are mentioned as articles of commerce (Ek. 27.[22]), and as gifts brought by the queen of Sheba to Solomon. If Havilah was in A., as seems prob., it had early a reputation for the excellence of its gold (Gn. 2.[11]). Ophir (Gn. 10.[29]), another rich gold-producing district, is also claimed for A. Gold must have been exported in considerable quantities, if Parvaim, whence came the gold with wh. Solomon "garnished" the house of the Lord, be identl., as seems prob., with the Arabian Sak el-Farwain. "Bright iron," accdg. to some anct. versions (RVm.), "from Uzal" (Ek. 27.[19]), indicates a trade, wh. Doughty thinks mt. still be profitably pursued in some parts of A. San'a, wh. is commonly identd. with Uzal, still produces steel wh. is greatly valued. Dedan furnished "precious cloths for riding," and Kedar, the wealth of the nomads "in lambs and rams and goats." Exports of "bales of blue and embroidered work," and "chests of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar," attest the progress made in Arts and Manufactures.

ARAD, the city of a Can. k. in the Negeb (Nu. 21.[1], 33.[40]), smitten by Joshua (12.[14]). The Kenites settled S. of the city (Jg. 1.[16]). It is identd. with Tell 'Arād, a ruined site on a large rounded hill 16 miles S. of Hebron.

ARAM. (1) S. of Shem. (2) S. of Kemuel, grandson of Nahor. (3) A nation whose territory stretched fm. the "Great Sea" to the Tigris, and fm. the Taurus mountains and Armenia to Pal., Babylonia, and Arabia. The W. part of this stretch was at first occupied by the HITTITES. When they come into the Bible nar. the Arameans form a number of independent states. The oldest of these, Aram-Naharaim, "A. of the two rivers," rendered MESOPOTAMIA in EV., with A.-N. in the marg. CHUSHAN RISHATHAIM, k. of A.-Naharaim, ruled Isr. 8 yrs. (Jg. 3.[8-10]). A.-N. is also called Padan-A., "the field of A." (Gn. 25.[20]). This was the province between the Euphrates and the Tigris. A.-Zobah lay N. of Damascus and E. of Hamath (1 S. 14.[47]). A.-Beth Rehob in the same region was hired by AMMON to help them agst. David (2 S. 10.[6]). The same applies to A.-Maacah. Between these last was DAMASCUS, the most important of the divisions of A., and that which came most in contact with Isr.; it gradually absorbed the great mass of A., but was conquered by the Assyrians under Tiglath-Pileser (2 K. 16.[9]). For Aramean Language see SYRIAC.

ARARAT, in the OT., is the name of a country corrspdg. in part to the later Armenia. In the Asyr. Inscrs. it appears as Urardhu, or Urartu. The N. boundary of the kdm. was the Araxes, although it never seems to have included the mountains now called A. The Asyr. cuneiform characters came into use in A. in the 9th cent. B.C., the syllabary being considerably modified. In the Vannic texts the name is given as Biainas, or Bianas, wh. is represented by the mod. Van. For an act. of A., and what is known of its hist., &c., see Sayce, "The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Van," in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1882, 1893, 1894.

The Ark of Noah is said to have rested on the mountains of Ararat (Gn. 8.[4]). Adrammelech and Sharezer, the murderers of Sennacherib, fled "to the land of A." (2 K. 19.[37]; Is. 37.[38], RV.; in the latter passage LXX εἰς Ἀρμενίαν; AV. in both "Armenia,"), with wh. Asyr. was then at war, the Asyrn. leader being Esarhaddon. A. is named along with Minni and Ashkenaz (Jr. 51.[27]). Minni, Mana in the Vannic Inscrs., and Ashkenaz, prob. the Asyr. Ashguza, lay to the E. of A.

All the traditions with one consent place the resting-place of the Ark in this region. The great height of the Armenian plateau, rising from 6000 to 7000 ft. above sea level, natly. appealed to the dwellers in the wide plains as the district where the great ship must first touch ground. There is, however, no agreement as to the exact spot.

Berosus the Chaldæan (Ant. I. iii. 6) said that there was still some part of this ship—the ark of Xisuthrus—"at the mountain of the Kordyæans," and that the people took away bits of the pitch to use as amulets. The Chaldæan records call it the "mountain of Nazir," wh. may be identl. with the peak of Rowandez, S. of Lake Urumiyah. Nicolaus of Damascus (Jos. loc. cit.) places it on a mountain called Baris, the Lubar of the Book of Jubilees (v.), wh. is identd. with Jebel Judi, S. of Lake Van. Here the Kurds say traces of the Ark are still to be seen.

The mod. A. is the most conspicuous feature of the landscape to the far N. It rises 17,000 ft. above the level of the sea: it is called in Turkish Aghri Dagh, "the Painful Mountain"; and in Persian Koh-i-Nuh, "the Mountain of Noah." Arghuri, a vill. built on the slope of the mountain, destroyed by earthquake and avalanche in July 1840, was reputed the place where Noah planted his vineyard; while Nachitjevan, in the plain of Araxes, was said to be the patriarch's burying-place.

ARAUNAH, the Jebusite owner of a threshing-floor on Mt. Moriah, chosen as the spot where David shd. build his altar, after the plague was stayed (2 S. 24.[18]; 1 Ch. 21.[18]), called in Ch. Ornan. He sold the ground and his oxen to David for 50 shekels of silver (2 S. 24.[24]); accdg. to the Chronicler the price was 600 shekels of gold (1 Ch. 21.[25]).

ARCHELAUS. See Herodian Family.

ARCHEVITES, inhabitants of Erech (Gn. 10.[10]) placed as colonists in the territory of the Ten Tribes by the Assyrians (Ez. 4.[9]).

ARCHIPPUS, a Christian saluted by Paul (Phm.[2]) as "our fellow-soldier," supposed by Lightfoot to be s. of Philemon. Tradition makes A. Bishop of Laodicæa in succession to Epaphroditus.

ARCTURUS. AV. thus renders Heb. 'ash, 'aish (Jb. 9.[9], 38.[32]), following the Vlg.; LXX gives Hesperon; Luther "wagen" = "the plough"; RV. "the Bear," wh. seems to be correct.

AREOPAGUS, a low hill, rising fm. the Agora of Athens to the W. of the Acropolis. Myth declared A. to be so named, because Mars (Ares) was there tried for homicide. A. afterwards applied to the supreme court of Athens in regard to homicide, sacrilege, and cognate crimes, wh. sat here. Under the Rms. the power of A. was extended to embrace the functions of a Town Council and a University Senate. During this period A. seems to have sat at least for preliminary investigations, not on the hill, but in the Stoa Basileios. In the nar. (Ac. 17.), although individual members of the court were present, e.g. Dionysius, there does not seem to have been a judicial investigation. In order to hear Paul give a statement at length of his opinions, the philosophers adjourned, if not to the easily accessible eminence of A., at least to the Stoa Basileios where the court ordinarily sat. The courtesy with wh. he is questioned and the informal conclusion of the proceedings point to this.

Antipas (Herod). It is supposed that Caligula granted Damascus to A., and that Claudius confirmed the grant, as there are no Damascus coins of either of those Emperors, altho' there are those of Augustus, Tiberius, Nero, and later emperors. During the time immediately succeeding Paul's conversion A. held Damascus by an Ethnarch. See Arabia.

ARGOB, named with Arieh (2 K. 15.[25]). The passage is genly. understood to mean that these were guards of Pekahiah, surprised and slain along with their master by Pekah and his fellow conspirators.

ARGOB, a district in Bashan, or Bashan itself—for the name is used as the equivalent of Bashan in Dt. 3.[13]—in wh. there were threescore fenced cities "with high walls, gates, and bars, beside the unwalled towns—country towns—a great many" (Dt. 3.[4], 6.[13]; 1 K. 4.[13]), called "the A." (Dt. 3.[13]). It was conquered by "Jair, the s. of Manasseh," and was assigned as territory to his tribe. From Dt. 3.[14] we may perhaps infer that it bordered upon Geshur and Ma'acah. In the present state of kge. it is imposs. with cert. to ident. the district.

Gesenius trs. 'Argob, "a heap of stones," deriving it fm. the root rāgāb = rāgam. This derivation is precarious. It cannot be proved that rāgāb = rāgam. In Jb. 21.[33], 38.[38], regeb seems to mean "clod." Perhaps therefore we shd. take A., not as "stony," but "arable land." This wd. rule out El-Lejā', a tract wh. otherwise mt. claim consideration. A. appears to have been a clearly defined district. Khebel, wh. invariably precedes the name, is first "a cord," then "a measuring line," then "the measured area," such as a tribal portion. There is no district in the country the boundaries of wh. are so distinctly marked as those of El-Lejā', "the refuge." It lies to the N.E. of the Ḥaurân, N.W. of Jebel ed-Druze, and is composed of lava, wh. has flowed fm. the volcanic hills E. and S. Its average height above the surrounding plains is over 20 ft. A savage and forbidding wilderness it is to-day; although there are stretches of rich land, and many traces of anct. cultivation within the rocky barriers. (For description see Ewing, Arab and Druze at Home, 26ff.) Viewed fm. a distant height it looks like a dark island resting on a sea of emerald. The names of seventy-one ruined sites in El-Lejā' were collected by Ewing (PEFQ., 1895, pp. 366ff.). It corresponds to the Trachonitis of Jos. and the NT. The whole district, including the Ḥaurān, and the slopes of the mountain—Jebel Ḥaurân, or Jebel ed-Druze—is remarkable for the char. and quantity of the remains of anct. towns and cities. Most of these are prob. not older than the beginning of our era. Those of the Gr. and Rm. period are easily distinguished; but it seems prob. that many of them rest upon much more anct. sites, where the spade of the excavator may yet reveal not a little of surpassing interest.

ARIEL. (1) "Chief man" (Ez. 8.[16]). (2) RV., name of a Moabite whose two sons were slain by Benaiah. The name occurs in Moabite Stone, line 12, of a place. May the men slain by Benaiah not have belonged to that town? (3) Name for Jerusalem (Is. 29.) (4) Name for ALTAR (Ek. 43.[16], harel).

ARIMATHEA, the home of Joseph who took the Saviour's body fm. the cross, and laid it in his own tomb (Mw. 27.[57]; Mk. 15.[43]; Lk. 23.[50]; Jn. 19.[38]), not cert. identd; prob. = RAMAH (1 S. 1.[19]).

ARIOCH. (1) K. of Ellasar, confederate with Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.[1]). The Tablets show us Eriaku, k. of Larsa. Later A. was overthrown by Ḥammurabi (AMRAPHEL). (2) Captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard (Dan. 2.[14]).

ARISTARCHUS, a Jew of Thessalonica (Ac. 24.[4], 27.[2]), a friend of St. Paul, who accompanied him fm. Troas to Jrs., and thence to Rome, where he remained (Col. 4.[10]). Paul calls him his "fellow prisoner," but there is no hint of his accusation. He may have immured himself to be near his friend. (Cp. Lightfoot on Col. 4.[10].)

ARISTOBULUS, an inhabitant of Rome (or perhaps Ephesus), cert. of whose household are saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.[10]). A. does not appear to have been a Christian or he also wd. have been saluted. It has been suggd. by Bishop Lightfoot (Ph., p. 174) that A. was a grandson of Herod, a man of great wealth, and intimate with Claudius; he thinks it prob. that A. by this time was dead, but that his household kept together, poss. being bequeathed to the emperor.

ARK, NOAH'S. See FLOOD.

ARK (Ex. 25.[10], &c.), A. of the Testimony (Ex. 25.[22], &c.), A. of the Covenant of the Lord (Nu. 10.[33], &c.), A. of the Covenant (Jo. 3.[6], &c.), A. of the Covenant of God (Jg. 20.[27], &c.), A. of God (1 S. 3.[3], &c.), A. of the God of Isr. (1 S. 5.[7], &c.), A. of the Lord God (1 K. 2.[26]). These names are frequently interchanged.

The A. is represented as a chest $2\frac{1}{2}$ cubits in length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth and depth (Ex. 25.[10]). Made of acacia wood accdg. to God's direction, within and without it was overlaid with gold. A rim or moulding of gold ran round the top; four rings of the same metal were put "in the four feet thereof," two on each side. Two staves of acacia wood, overlaid with gold, were put through the rings "to bear the A. withal." The staves were never withdrawn.

The two tables of stone on wh. were the "ten words"—i.e. the "Testimony" (Ex. 25.[16]), or the "Covenant" (1 K. 8.[1], &c.)—were placed within. In later times it was believed that a pot of manna and Aaron's rod that budded were also in the A. (He. 9.[4]). But the OT. knows nothing of this. The pot of manna and Aaron's rod were laid up "before the Testimony" (Ex. 16.[34]; Nu. 17.[10]). 2 Ch. 5.[10] says "there was nothing in the A. save the two tables wh. Moses put there at Horeb." Over the A. was placed a covering of pure gold, kappōreth, from kāphar, "to cover," in the sense of covering, or expiating sin; therefore, EV. "Mercy Seat." At either end of this and of one piece with it, stood a cherub. These looked towards the mercy seat, and their outspread wings covered it (but cp. 1 K. 6.[27], 8.[6]). Between the cherubim is the place where the presence of God is manifested (Ex. 25.[22], 1 S. 4.[4]). On the day of Atonement the incense cloud was made to cover the mercy seat, and on it was sprinkled the blood of the sacrifices (Lv. 16.[13ff.]).

That the A. was originally the sanctuary of a tribe wh. united with Isr. in the desert, and that it contained a fetish stone, is a theory that rests upon nothing but ingenious speculation. For discussion of this and similar ideas, see Benzinger, HA. index.

Fm. the first the A. was an obj. of special reverence to all Isr. Its resting-place in the tent of meeting is sufficient evidence of its truly national char. By its movements those of the camp were regulated (Nu. 10.[33ff.]). It has been inferred fm. this passage that the A. was thought of as moving spontaneously, but in view of the arrangements for bearing the A. (Dt. 10.[8], &c.), the inference is unwarranted. The cloud was the guide of those who bore the A.

The importance of the A. is illustrated by the part it played at the passage of the Jordan, at the capture of Jericho, and at the memorable scene in the Valley of Shechem (Jo. 3., 6., 8.[30ff.]). The A. remained in the camp at Gilgal during the war of conquest. Then it was moved to Bethel (Jg. 2.[1ff.]), or, as the true text seems to be, to Bochim, prob. near Bethel (Moore, Judges, in loc.). It is next found in Shiloh (1 S. 3.[3]; cp. Jo. 18.[1]), whence it was taken to war agst. the Phil. It was captured, but such evils fell upon the Phil. in its presence that it was returned with gifts, on a new cart drawn by kine, to the great stone at Beth-Shemesh, whence it was taken to Kiriath Jearim, to the house of Abinadab, where it remained for a long time (1 S. 5., 6., 7.[1f.]). Owing to the disaster to Uzzah (2 S. 6.[6ff.]; 1 Ch. 13.[9]), the A. was left for a time in the house of Obededom. Blessing rested on the house, and three months later the A. was transported to Jrs. with great rejoicing, and placed in the tent wh. David had pitched for it. From the tent it was moved to its place in the Holy of Holies, in Solomon's temple, under the wings of the cherubim (1 K. 8.[6]). The temple was rifled by Shishak, k. of Egp. (1 K. 14.[25ff.]), but the A. is not mentioned among his spoil. Fm. 2 Ch. 35.[3] it appears that away fm. its place in the temple the A. could rest only on the shoulders of the Levites. The command to restore it to the house, may point to its having been displaced by Manasseh (2 Ch. 33.[7]), when he introduced his idol. It may have continued till the city and temple were destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (Jr. 3.[16, 17]; 2 Esd. 10.[22]). The tale of Jeremiah concealing the A., &c., in the side of Mt. Pisgah (2 M. 2.[4]), is destitute of support. The A. disappears fm. hist. In the second temple one point of inferiority to the first was that it contained no A.

What was done "before the A." was regarded as done in the presence of God. Thus after the defeat at Ai, Joshua rent his clothes and fell on his face before the A., and communed with J″. (Jo. 7.[6ff.]; see also the sacrifice (2 S. 6.[13]), and dancing before the A. (ver. 13). The A. was cert. regarded as in some sense the dwelling of God, so that the presence of the A. secured His (Nu. 10.[35f.]). It is carried into battle for the encouragement of Isr., and the Phil. hearing this are afraid, saying, "God is come into the camp" (1 S. 4.[3ff.]). It is found in the field at Rabbah (2 S. 11.[11]). When David fled fm. Absalom the priests carried out the A. with them, cert. as a pledge of God's presence; and only at the k.'s command was it restored to its place. David had attained to a clearer vision of the relation of God to his people (2 S. 15.[23ff.]). See also TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

(4) Tzinnāh, "large shield," borne by shield-bearer (1 S. 17.[7]). (5) Māgēn, "small shield" (Jg. 5.[8]). (6) Shelet, supposed to be a kind of shield (2 S. 8.[7]).

EGYPTIAN WITH LARGE SHIELD

ARMOUR-BEARER, one who bare a large shield (tzinnah), who also seems to have carried additional spears. Fm. the Asyr. marbles he appears to have been ready to despatch those whom his master had wounded. Jonathan's A. seems to have been also a gallant warrior (1 S. 14.[7], &c.).

ARMOURY. (1) 'Ōtzār, fig. (Jr. 50.[25]), elsewhere, "storehouse" or "treasury" (1 K. 7.[51]; Ne. 10.[39], &c.). (2) Nesheq (Ne. 3.[19]). This is identd. with Solomon's "house of the forest of ARMS. See WEAPONS.

ARMY. When Isr. journeyed through the wilderness they were organised as an A. in wh. each tribe formed a brigade and each family a battalion. There is no trace at this time of any distinction of arms, as spearmen, archers, or slingers. In the war against Benjamin (Jg. 20.[16]) we learn that there were among the Benjamites 700 left-handed slingers that were singled out as marksmen; implying that there were a considerable corps who were neither marksmen nor left-handed. The defeat of Saul at Gilboa appears to have been mainly due to the weakness of the Hebrew army in archery, a weakness that DAVID set himself to remove (2 S. 1.[18]). Later, after his conquest of Hadarezer, David introduced a limited number of chariots into the armies of Isr. (2 S. 8.[4]). The fact that both Asyr. and Egp. had cavalry renders it not improb. that Isr. had this arm also. Before the days of Saul the armies of Isr. were undisciplined hordes; the inhabitants of difft. vills. wd. prob. fight, each under their own headman; but otherwise there does not seem to have been any cohesion. Saul gathered three thousand men to be the nucleus of a standing army (1 S. 13.[2]). After the defeat of the Phil. at Ephes-

Archers and Shield-Bearer (Assyrian)

dammim this standing army was increased; David got the command of a thousand men (1 S. 18.[13]). Under David the standing army was increased much more. If we presume that all his regulars were faithful, then we may estimate their numbers by the fact that Ahithophel demanded twelve thousand men when he wd. pursue after them. A levy en masse was resorted to in actual warfare when a large proportion of the male inhabitants joined the standards. After the revolt of the Ten Tribes, although the N. Kdm. developed most, we have more particulars in regard to the S. Jehoshaphat appears to have done a great deal for the military organisation of Judah (2 Ch. 17.[13-19]). We have on the monuments many illustrations of the armies of Egp. and Asyr. on wh. the armies of Isr. were to a large extent modelled.

Egyptian Horseman

In NT. times Rome is the authority in military affairs. The Rm. unit was the Legion; it was raised under Augustus to its nominal complement of 6100 men; it was divided into 10 cohorts and 60 centuries. With cavalry and allies, a Legion really amounted to nearly 10,000 men. Over each century was a centurion.

ARNON, now Wādy el-Mōjib, E. of the Dead Sea. It formed the boundary between Moab on the S., and the Amorites under Sihon on the N. (Nu. 21.[13], &c.). It became the S. boundary of Isr. E. of the Jordan (Jo. 12.[1], &c.). It is formed by the junction of two streams c. 13 miles E. of the Dead Sea, Seil es-Saʻideh fm. the S., and Wādy Enkeileh fm. the E. It flows W'ward along the bottom of a deep gorge, and nearly 3 miles E. of the Dead Sea it is joined by the waters of Wādy Weleh fm. the N.W. These streams drain a wide tract of country W. of the Ḥajj road.

The "fords of A." are mentioned by Isaiah (16.[2]). A city may be intended in Jr. 48.[20]. Mesha says on the Moabite Stone that he made the "high way in A." and built Aroer. Remains of a Rm. road are found on either slope of the valley, traces of the bridge in the stream, ruins called Maḥaṭṭet el-Ḥajj, "Station of the Pilgrimage," on the S. bank, and ʻAqrabā on the N., the ruin of ʻArāʻir, or ʻArʻar = Aroer, lying further to the E. The Valleys (AV.) or Brooks (RV.) of A. are no doubt the Wadies contributory to the main stream (Nu. 21.[14]).

AROER, Heb. ʻArōʻer. (1) A city on the N. bank of the Arnon, identd. with the modern ʻArāʻir, or ʻArʻar. Taken by Sihon fm. the Ammonites, it passed into the hands of Isr. (Dt. 2.[36], 3.[12], 4.[48]; Jo. 12.[2], 13.[9, 16]; Jg. 11.[26]; 2 S. 24.[5], where H. P. Smith (Samuel) reads "fm. A. and fm. the city that is in the midst of the Wady"). This seems to be the city named in Nu. 32.[34], wh., although it lay on the S. border of the territory of Reuben, is said to have been built by Gad. Hazael pressed S. to A. in his victorious march (2 K. 10.[33]). Mesha (Moabite Stone Inscr.) claims to have built—poss. "fortified"—it, so it must have been again in the power of Moab (cp. Jr. 48.[19]). The old Rm. road descends into the Valley about an hour W. of Khirbet ʻArāʻir.

ARTAXERXES, ʼArtachshashta, "Great King." (1) A Persian monarch who, induced by the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin, hindered the building of the Temple (Ezra 4.[7-24]), supposed by some to be Pseudo-Smerdis, known by another name; by others he is identd. with (2), because there is no trace in cuneiform inscrs. of Persian monarchs having two names.

The text of Ezra as we have it clearly implies that A. reigned before Darius Hystaspis, and third after Cyrus—the precise position occupied by Smerdis the Magian. The want of epigraphic evidence that Persian monarchs had double names proves nothing: we shd. not have known from inscrs. that the successor of Tiberius was called Caligula, or that the s. of Severus was called Caracalla. We know that the prince in question had two names: Herodotus calls him Smerdis (Aeschyl. Pers. 770, Mardos), but Ctesias, Tanyoxarces; and Xenophon, Tanaoxares. If the latter was the real throne name of the usurper, it was nat. for a Jewish scribe to change the little known Tanyoxarces into the well-known A.; such a suggn. implies less change than the idea that the transaction referred to took place under (2). In the hist. of "Jossippon ben Gorion" Epiphanes is called "Espasianos" (Vespasian).

(2) S. of Xerxes called Longimanus. NEHEMIAH was cup-bearer to A. (Ne. 1.[11]), and permitted by A. (2.[6]) he went to Judea to act as Governor. A. reigned from B.C. 465–B.C. 425. EZRA petitioned A. for leave to go to Pal. and for assistance (Ez. 7.[6]), his petition was granted, and the authorities in the province "beyond the River" were ordered to supply his needs to "100 talents of silver, 100 measures of wheat, 100 bottles of wine, and 100 bottles of oil" (Ez. 7.[22]). From classical authorities he appears to have been one of the best of the Persian monarchs.

ARVAD, a small island off the Syrian coast, c. 30 miles N. of Tripoli, held by the Phœnicians; the modern Arwād. The Arvadites were skilful sailors and brave soldiers (Gn. 10.[18]; 1 Ch. 1.[16]; Ek. 27.[8, 11]). In B.C. 1100 Tiglath-pileser I. took the city. At a later date Ashurnazirpal availed himself of their seamanship (COT.[2] i. 173). Strabo (XVI. ii. 30) says that the city on the island was founded by men who fled from Sidon in B.C. 761; but it is really of much earlier date. Water supply was obtained fm. the mainland; but springs of fresh water in the sea were resorted to in war-time. It was the centre of successful commercial enterprise, wh. passed, however, in later times, to its colony on the mainland, Antaradus, the mod. Ṭarṭus.

ASA, s. and successor of Abijah, k. of Judah, c. B.C. 918–877. In 1 K. 15.[11ff.] we have an act. of A.'s zeal in cleansing the land fm. idolatry, in wh. he did not even spare his mr. The hostile action of Baasha, k. of Isr., in fortifying Ramah agst. A. led him to secure the help of Benhadad of Syr., at the cost of the gold and silver treasures in the temple and in the palace. This ally quickly reduced Baasha to inactivity; whereupon A., with the materials collected by Baasha, protected his frontier by fortifying Geba and Mizpah. The "pit" made by A. from fear of Baasha, may have been a reservoir for provision agst. a siege (Jr. 41.[9]). "In the time of his old age" he suffered fm. what was prob. gout. The Chronicler (2 Ch. 14., 15.) goes into much more detail. The important additions he makes are: the assembling of an army of 580,000 men; A.'s victorious war with Zerah the Ethiopian; the conference with Oded as to his work of reform; the covenant made with the Lord; the condemnation by Hanani of the alliance with Syria, and the punishment of the prophet; the statement that A. in his sickness "sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians." He was buried in the City of David, with costly and splendid ceremonies.

The diffcs. in chronology between the two nars. are not here discussed, as no satisfactory explanation of these is at present poss.

ASAHEL. (1) The youngest s. of Zeruiah, br. of Joab and Abishai, distinguished by fleetness of foot (2 S. 2.[18]). He was one of David's heroes, and commander of a division. He fell by the hand of Abner, whom he rashly persisted in pursuing (2 S. 23.[24]; 1 Ch. 27.[7]; 2 S. 2.[23]). (2) A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat. (3) A collector of tithes under Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31.[13]). (4) A priest in the time of Ezra (Ez. 10.[15]).

ASAPH, a Levite, s. of Berechiah, one of those set by David over the service of song (1 Ch. 6.[31, 39], 16.[5]), called a "seer" (2 Ch. 29.[30]). Twelve of the Psalms—50, 73–83—are ascribed to A. The "Brethren of A." were a guild of singers: the "Psalms of A." were really those that were the property of this guild. At the same time they might have been originally composed by A., and modified to meet new necessities, as is the case with mod. hymns, and also, it may be noted, with mod. Arabic poems. Joah (2 K. 18.[18]) and Mattaniah (Ne. 11.[17]) were descts. of A.

ASENATH, w. of Joseph, dr. of Potipherah, priest of On. There is an interesting story of Asenath among the later Pseudepigrapha. Fabricius, Codex Pseudep. VT.

ASH (Is. 44.[14]), RV. "fir tree." The AV. translators seem to have been misled by the superficial resemblance between Heb. ōren, and Latin ornus, "the ash." They are in no way related, and the A. is not found in Pal. It is imposs. to say with cert. what tree is meant. The most prob. suggn. is that the pine is intended (LXX), and of the three species found in Pal., the maritime, or stone pine, best meets the conditions. It is planted: witness the groves planted to stay the indrift of the sand along the coast. It is nourished by the rain; it is never watered by irrigation. It yields a fine firm resinous wood, wh. may be easily carved into an image, and it is in great demand as fuel. It will not bear transplanting, it is true (Celsius, Hierob. i. 193), but "planting" means only the planting of the seed in suitable soil. The tree is called by the Arabs Ṣanaubar.

ASHAN, prob. = COR-ASHAN. It is in Judah (Jo. 15.[42]), is given to the priests (Jo. 19.[7]; 1 Ch. 6.[59]), and is described as belonging to Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[32]): unidentd.

ASHDOD, or AZOTUS, a strong city of the Phil.: the name seems to signify "fortress." It is now Esdūd, fully 20 miles S. of Jaffa, and c. 3 miles fm. the coast line (Jo. 13.[3]). It was formerly occupied by ANAKIM (Jo. 11.[22]). Assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jo. 15.[47]), it seems never to have been possessed by them (1 S. 5.[1], &c.). Uzziah's conquest (2 Ch. 26.[6]) seems to have been but temporary (Am. 1.[8]). It was taken by the Tartan—the general—of the Asyr. Sargon, c. B.C. 711 (Is. 20.[1]), and by the Egyptians under Psammitichus after a siege of 29 yrs. (Herod. II. 157), c. B.C. 630. Perhaps Jeremiah refers to this in the phrase "the remnant of A." (25.[20]). Its inhabitants appear as hostile to the Jews under Nehemiah (4.[7], 13.[23, 24]). A. was overthrown by Jonathan (1 M. 10.[84]), and added to the province of Syr. by Ptolemy. A. was declared free by Pompey, B.C. 63 (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7), and rebuilt by Gabinius (Ant. XIV. v. 3). On the death of Herod it fell to his sr. Salome (Ant. XVII. viii. 1), and A.D. 10, to the Empress Livia (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2; BJ. II. ix. 1). The only mention of A. in NT. is in connection with the preaching of Philip (Ac. 8.[40]).

ASHER, "happy." Eighth s. of Jacob; his mr. was Zlipah. A. had four sons and one dr. (Gn. 35.[26], 46.[17]). In the blessings of Jacob he is promised good fortune (Gn. 49.[20], J.; Dt. 33.[24]). Numbering 41,500 adult males on leaving Egp., A. numbered 53,400 in the plains of Moab (Nu. 1.[41], 26.[47], P.). A. was placed between Dan and Naphtali, N. of the tabernacle. Sethur represented A. among the spies (Nu. 13.[13]). Influenced prob. by profitable relations with Phœnician neighbours, A. never took many of the cities assigned to him (Jg. 1.[31]). Later he is reproached for unpatriotic inaction (Jg. 5.[17f.]), and his name is not found in David's list of chief rulers (1 Ch. 27.[16, 22]). No hero arose from A. Some from A. humbled themselves, and came to Jrs., at the call of Hezekiah. Anna (Lk. 2.[36ff.]) belonged to A.

The towns allotted to A. are not all identd., and little more than a guess at the boundaries is poss. (Jo. 19.[24ff.]; Jg. 1.[31, 32]; cp. Jo. 17.[10f.]). Nahr ez-Zerqa may have formed the S. boundary, and the E. border may have run N'wards at a distance of 8 to 10 miles fm. the coast. Fm. about opposite Tyre it seems to have swept E'ward, including most of Belâd Beshâra, and Belâd esh-Shuqîf, returning to the sea near Sidon (see Ant. V. i. 22). Orange and olive still grow to perfection in glen and slope, while rich crops are reaped fm. the plains. (2) An unidentd. town on the border of Ephraim and Manasseh (Jo. 17.[7]).

ASHERAH. See GROVE.

ASHES. (1) Heb. 'êpher, Gr. spodos. The word is used fig. for what is transient and worthless (Gn. 18.[27]). "Proverbs of A." (Jb. 13.[12], Heb.) are vain speeches. To wear sackcloth and sprinkle the person with A. is throughout Scrip. a common sign of grief, of humiliation, or of penitence (2 S. 13.[19]; Est. 4.[1], &c.). To lie or sit (Est. 4.[3]; Jb. 2.[8]) or wallow (L. 3.[16]) in A. marks profounder intensity of feeling. See further RED HEIFER, SACRIFICE. (2) The word deshen is used (Lv. 1.[16], 6.[10], &c., P.) for the A. on the altar when the burnt offering is consumed; but it is = êpher in Jr. 31.[40]. (3) Pîah (Ex. 9.[8, 10]), RVm. prob. correctly "soot." (4) 'Aphêr (1 K. 20.[38-41]) shd. be rendered with RV. "headband."

ASHIMA, a deity of the Hamathites (2 K. 17.[30]), otherwise unknown.

ASHKELON, a city of the Phil. close on the sea coast, c. 12 miles N. of Gaza, now 'Asqalân (Jo. 13.[3]; Jg. 1.[18]). If it was taken by Judah, it passed again to the Phil. (Jg. 14.[19]; 1 S. 6.[17]). Accdg. to Herodotus (I. 105), it contained the oldest temple of Astarte, or Aphrodite Urania, wh. was pillaged by the Scythians. It passed under the power of Egp., and then of Bab. It submitted to Jonathan (1 M. 10.[86]). As the birthplace of Herod it was greatly adorned by him (BJ. I. xxi. 11). It was given to Salome by Augustus (BJ. II. vi. 3). Later it was burned by the Jews. At the outbreak of the war the Jews attacked it, but were twice beaten off by its Rm. defenders (BJ. III. ii. 1ff.). It played a considerable part in the hist. of the Crusades. The existing ruins date fm. these times. The anct. harbour has disappeared, and great inroads have been made by the sand, alike upon the bldgs. and the once flourishing gardens.

ASHKENAZ, s. of Gomer, grandson of JAPHET (Gn. 10.[3]). The Jews imagine the Germans descended fm. A., hence German-speaking Jews are called "Ashkenazim."

ASHNAH. (1) A town in the Shephelah between ZORAH and ZANOAH (Jo. 15.[33]). (2) A town between Iphtah and Nezib (Jo. 15.[43]), not identd.

ASHPENAZ (DANIEL).

ASHTAROTH. See ASHTORETH.

ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM, a site of great antiquity, where the Rephaim were defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.[5]). It corrspds. with the "Carnaim" or "Carnion" of the Maccabees, where it is described as a city of great strength, and extremely difficult of access. It fell, however, before Judas. The temple of Atargatis, in wh. the inhabitants had taken refuge, was destroyed, and 25,000 were slain. OEJ. distinguishes two sites with similar names. One of these is cert. Tell 'Ashterâ, 2 miles S. of el-Merkez, a hill once strongly fortified, about 80 ft. high. It cd. never, however, have answered the description of A.-K. given above. Tell el-Ash'ary, c. 4½ miles further S., while nothing can be inferred fm. the superficial resemblance of the name, wh. is radically different, standing on a tongue of land between the gorge of the Yarmuk and a great cleft with a waterfall at the top, protected behind by a triple wall, must have been a position of enormous strength and difficulty of access. El-Mezêrîb, a once strongly fortified city, on an island in the midst of a small lake, on the great Ḥajj road, has also been suggd. But any hope of cert. identn. now lies in excavation.

ASHTORETH, the female counterpart of BAAL in the Phœnician Pantheon; she is the great nature-goddess, the giver of fruitfulness. As Baal was the Sun in one of his aspects, so A. was the Moon, the Queen of the Stars. In this aspect she has the crescent as one of her attributes. Most frequently in the statues of A. she appears as a naked female, sometimes nursing a child. She was the goddess of sexual passion, hence was worshipped with rites licentious and impure. The name indicates some affinity with the Bab. goddess Istar, but A. has not the mythologic importance of Istar. The temples of A. were numerous, and her name forms a frequent element in Phœnician personal names. A. frequently appears in the plural as ASHTAROTH, and is then generally associated with BAALIM. (Rawlinson, Phœnicia.)

ASHURITES, a tribe over wh. ISHBOSHETH ruled (2 S. 2.[9]). As no such tribe is known it is supposed that we shd. read "Asherites." LXX reads Thaseiri; a rdg. due to the resemblance between aleph and tau in Samaritan script.

ASIA, in the NT., invariably means, not the Continent, but the Rm. province of that name, with its capital at Ephesus. It was formed when in B.C. 133 Attalus, k. of Pergamum, bequeathed his kdm. to the Rms. It included the W. part of Asia Minor, Mysia, Lydia, Caria, part of Phrygia, with the coast towns, the Troad, and the adjoining islands. The seat of government at first was Pergamos. It soon passed to Ephesus; but Pergamos and Smyrna were both rivals for the title "First of Asia." It was a Senatorial province under a proconsul, hence Gr. anthupatos (Ac. 19.[38]). To win this rich and prosperous province seems to have been the purpose of Paul and Barnabas in devoting the first missionary journey to its great cities. This seems to have been Paul's aim in the second journey until hindered by the Spirit. But his opportunity came during his long residence in Ephesus, when he met with people from all parts of the province (Ac. 19.[10]). In Apoc. A. has the older and wider significance.

ASIARCH (Ac. 19.[31], AV. "chief of Asia," RV. "chief officers of Asia"). Little is known with cert. regarding these officials. An A. is mentioned by Strabo (xiv. 649) in B.C. 50. The office may have existed fm. the formation of the province of Asia. Some think they were elected annually; others, every four years. They seem to have had to do with the assemblies for the worship of Rm. and the emperors. They presided at the festivities and games in the great provincial cities, and prob. defrayed the expense of the spectacles, as did the Rm. ædiles. It cd. therefore be held only by men of wealth; and as a sacred character attached to the office—they are sometimes called "high priests"—they were men of influence. They seem to have retained the title after they had retired fm. office.

ASNAPPER (Ez. 4.[10]), prob. Asshurbanipal, s. of Esar-haddon, k. of Nineveh fm. B.C. 668 to 626.

ASNAPPER

During A.'s long reign Elam was conquered and Egp. held in subjection; but the Asyr. Empire was being exhausted, and old age had weakened the monarch himself; hence by the end of his reign there are signs of decay. A. has earned the gratitude of succeeding generations by the Library he collected, and the copies of anct. Bab. writings he caused to be made. A.'s connection with sacred hist. is due to the colonists he sent into the N. Kdm.

ASP, a species of poisonous snake (Heb. pethen), identd. by Tristram with Egpn. cobra. The Heb. word occurs six times in Scrip.; four times it is rendered A., twice "adder."

ASS, the most commonly used beast of burden in the nearer East, alike in anct. and mod. times. Its gentle step commends it to the rider; while it carries stones fm. the quarry, sheaves fm. the field, or sea-borne commodities inland fm. the harbours. In Heb. the sexes are distinguished—ḥămōr, the male, and āthōn, the she-ass. The prophet of Judah who came to rebuke Jeroboam rode on the first (1 K. 13.[23]), and Balaam on the second (Nu. 22.[22]). "A young ass" is 'ayir (Zc. 9.[9]). There are two breeds of A. common in Pal.—a small black or dark-brown A. and a large white one. There seem to have been both breeds in anct. times. Civil rulers are distinguished as "Ye that ride upon white asses" (Jg. 5.[10]); to a certain extent this is still the case.

The intelligence of the A. is depended on in the East: in a long string of camels there are a number of small black donkeys dividing the camels into groups of four or five. They are provided for the riding of the drivers, who are, however, usly. walking together at the extreme rear, while the donkeys are left to act as guides. The A. is depicted in Egpn. and Asyr. monuments along with captives not infrequently fm. Syria. The wild A. has two names in the OT., pere and 'ărōd; there are two wild species found in the neighbourhood of Pal., but there is no cert. that the words represent difft. kinds; or, if they do, wh. of the two either represents. In the Asyr. monuments they are depicted as objs. of chase.

ASSEMBLY, AV. renders both 'ēdāh and qāhāl by A.; RV. restricts A. to the latter. Qāhāl is a meeting of the community regularly convened for business, as distinguished from the community in its more gen. aspect; hence LXX usly. render by ekklēsia—except in Gn., Ex., Nu., Pr., and Ek. For fuller discussion see CONGREGATION. The other Heb. words rendered A. do not call for treatment. In the NT., only in Ac. 19. has ekklēsia, referring to the citizens of Ephesus, something of its classical significance, i.e. the citizens of a Hellenic city convened for legislative or administrative purposes. Elsewhere EV. invariably render "church." Panēguris (He. 12.[23]) is primarily an assembly of a whole nation. Sunagōgē is the technical term for Jewish places of worship apart fm. the temple. In the NT. it is only once (Js. 2.[2]) used of an "assembly" of Jewish Christians.

ASSOS, the mod. Behram, c. 20 miles E. of Cape Lectum, on the shore over agst. Lesbos. The acropolis was built on a height that sloped up fm. the shore, and the remains show it to have been a strong position. A. seems to have been architecturally an exceptionally fine city; while the sculptures found in the temple of Athena are of singular value—now distributed between Paris, Constantinople, and Boston, U.S.A. A harbour constructed by means of a mole gave hospitality to the ships of merchantmen, while a Rm. road connected A. with Troas and the coast towns beyond. This road, cutting straight across the promontory, was much shorter than the voyage round Cape Lectum (Ac. 20.[13]).

ASSHUR, ASSYRIA. See BABYLONIA.

ASTROLOGERS, ASTROLOGY, ASTRONOMY. Astrologers professed to tell the future fm. the relative position of the stars. A long treatise on Astrology in several recensions has come down to us fm. the reign of Sargon I. Closely connected with Astrology is Astronomy: indeed the former may be regarded as a deduction fm. the latter; without some sort of Astronomy, Astrology wd. have been imposs. The Astrologers of Bab. cd. predict eclipses with some accuracy. They were regarded as ministers of idolatry, and are denounced by Isaiah (47.[13]) as haberē shamayīm, "dividers of the heaven," hōzīm b'kokabīm, "star-gazers," and mōdi'īm lehodashīm, "monthly prognosticators." Fm. the Babn. and Egpn. kge. of Astronomy, the Hebs. cd. not escape some tincture of the science; but their acquaintance with it seems to have been scanty. Almost all we know of the Heb. names of the constellations is drawn fm. the semi-foreign Bk. of Job. There we find Mazzārōth, "the signs of the Zodiac" (38.[32]), 'ash, or 'ayīsh, "the Great Bear" (9.[9], 38.[32], AV. "Arcturus"). Orion is kesīl (9.[9], 38.[32]; Am. 5.[8]); the Pleiades, kīmah (Jb. 9.[9]; Am. 5.[8]). Some think Draco is indicated by naḥash bariaḥ, "the crooked serpent" (Jb. 26.[13]). When the Babs. began their observation of the heavens, the star "Alpha Draconis" was prob. the pole-star. "The Chambers of the South," ḥadrey teymān (9.[9]), are the Southern Constellations. Natly. the sun is prominent in the mind of the Hebs. The progress of the sun through the signs of the Zodiac had been noticed (Ps. 19.[6]). The phases of the moon were observed, but "New Moon" was announced on observation, never by calculation. The planets (mazzālōth, 2 K. 23.[5], poss. another form of mazzārōth, "signs of the Zodiac") received worship. Saturn is "Chiun" (Am. 5.[26]), and Venus is haylayl ben shoḥar, "Lucifer, s. of the morning" (Is. 14.[12]). Fm. this we may infer that all the planets were named. In the Bk. of Enoch there are some interesting, if crude, astronomical hypotheses to explain the varying length of the day. In Daniel, 'ashshāphīm (1.[20], &c.) are those who use enchantments, rather than Astrologers. These are more prob. represented by the Asyr. word ḥarṭumīm, derived fm. ḥarutu, "a staff." Nebuchadnezzar's irritation at the delay in interpreting his dream was due to fear lest the auspicious time shd. change—a proof that he was dominated by Astrological ideas.

ATAD, a place associated with the great mourning of Joseph and his brethren, on their way to Hebron with the body of Jacob (Gn. 50.[10f.]), apparently E. of Jordan, but not identd.

ATAROTH. (1) A town near Dibon, E. of Jordan (Nu. 32.[3, 34]), identd. with Khirbet 'Attârûs, c. 7 miles N.W. of Dhībân. (2) A town on the S. boundary of Ephraim (Jo. 16.[2]), also A.-Addar (ver. 5), the mod. Ed-Dârîyeh, 12½ miles N.W. of Jrs. (3) A town also on the S. border of Ephraim E'ward, unidentd. (4) In 1 Ch. 2.[54] prob. a family is meant (RV. Atroth beth Joab).

ATHALIA, dr. of Ahab, called also dr. of Omri, her grandfr. (2 K. 8.$^{18-26}$; 2 Ch. 22.^{2}), w. of Jehoram, k. of Judah (2 Ch. 21.^{6}). She introduced the Phœnician Baal-worship, and secured the breaking up of "the house of God," and the dedication of its furniture to Baalim (2 Ch. 24.^{7}). Her s. Ahaziah having been slain, she grasped at power, and had the seed royal destroyed, Joash alone being saved alive by his aunt. For six years she exercised the royal power. Then Jehoiada, the High Priest, made an arrangement with the officers of the soldiers, and of the guard, to have Joash brought forth and proclaimed k. The use of "the spears and shields that had been k. David's," wh. were given to the captains over hundreds, was doubtless intended to make a popular impression. Joash was brought into the temple, crowned, received "the Testimony" or law, and hailed k. with great rejoicing. The noise brought A., who only then learned what was on foot. Her shouts of treason awakened no response. Apprehended, and hurried beyond the precincts, she was forthwith slain.

The Chronicler gives the crowning of Joash as the result of a popular movement, while none but Levites are permitted to enter the house of the Lord: this in accordance with the sanctity of the place, wh. mt. not be profaned by the feet of heathen mercenaries, such as the Carites (2 K. 11.; 2 Ch. 22., 23.).

(2) A Benjamite, s. of Jeroham (1 Ch. 8.^{26}). (3) S. of Jeshaiah, returned fm. Bab. with Ezra (8.^{7}).

ATHENS stood c. 3 miles fm. the coast, in the Attic plain. It was the centre of civilisation, of Art, and Letters in anct. Greece, and the mother city of the great empire of former days (see Dict. of Gr. and Rm. Geog.). In NT. times it was in the Rm. province of Achaia. It was treated with special favour by the Rms., and enjoyed many immunities. The Piræus was and continues to be the port of A., but the anct. walls connecting it with the harbour were already in ruins. The most striking feature of the city was the Acropolis, a hill, the platform of wh. was occupied by "one vast composition of architecture and sculpture, dedicated to the national glory, and to the worship of the gods." Among the triumphs of Art, masterpieces fm. the hands of Praxiteles and Phidias were still to be seen; and also the statue of Pericles, to whom the Acropolis owed its glory. To the W. lies the lower height of the Areopagus, called "Mars' Hill," fm. the Temple of Mars wh. stood upon it. S. of the Areopagus was the Agora, a spacious square, surrounded by splendid bldgs., and adorned with noble sculptures, recalling the great events in the hist. of A. This had been "the centre of a glorious public life, when the orators and statesmen, the poets and artists of Greece, found there all the incentives of their noble enthusiasm, and it still continued to be the meeting-place of philosophers, of idlers, of conversation, and of business, when A. could only be proud of the recollections of the past." Here Paul met the philosophers with whom he spoke of Jesus and the resurrection (Ac. 17.^{18}). The eagerness of the Athenians to hear new things was a matter of old standing (Demosthenes, Phil. i. 10), while their "over-religiousness" is well attested. Jos. calls them "the most religious of the Grs." (Contra Ap. ii. 12). On every hand were altars and temples of the gods. The Athenians seem to have sought to win favour fm. every known god, while altars "of unknown gods," agnōstōn theōn, are mentioned by Pausanias (I. i. 4) and Philostratus (Vit. Apoll. vi. 2). There seems to have been ground for the satirical saying that it was "easier to find a god than a man in A." (Petronius Arbiter, Sat. c. 17). No trace of the anct. synagogue has been found, but the inscrs. on cert. anct. tombstones attest the presence of a community of Jews.

ATONEMENT, THE DAY OF, called in later Jewish lit. "the day," or "the great day," fell on the 10th day of the 7th month. It is referred to in Ac. 27.^{9} as "the fast." Directions as to the day and its appropriate ritual are given mainly in Lv. 16., 23.$^{26-32}$. With these must be taken Ex. 30.^{10}, Lv. 25.^{9}, Nu. 29.$^{7-11}$, He. 9.^{7}. Fm. these we gather that fm. the evening of the 9th till the evening of the 10th day was "an holy convocation." The people were commanded to "afflict their souls," i.e. to observe a strict fast, abstaining fm. all food and drink. No one should do any kind of work. The penalty for breach of these requirements was to be "cut off fm. among the people." A special burnt offering "for a sweet savour" was made, a young bullock, a ram, and seven he-lambs, all without blemish, with their meal offerings; and one he-goat for a sin offering.

The great business of the day was laid upon the High Priest. He took a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering for himself; and for the people, two he-goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt offering. Taking off his ordinary clothes, he washed, and put on the holy garments of linen. Thus arrayed he presented the bullock for the sin offering, making A. for himself and his house. Then setting the two goats before the Lord, at the door of the tent of meeting, he cast lots upon them, one for the Lord, and one for Azazel. That wh. fell to the Lord he offered as a sin offering. The other he set alive before the Lord, and made A. for him; thus apparently fitting him to carry away into the wilderness the people's sins. He then killed the bullock to make A. for himself and his house. Taking a censer with coals off the altar, and sweet incense in his hand, he went within the veil, cast the incense on the burning coals, causing a fragrant cloud to envelop the mercy-seat. Then he sprinkled with his finger the blood of the bullock on the E. side of the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat, seven times. This done, he went out and killed the goat for the sin offering for the people, and carrying of its blood within the veil, sprinkled as before, making A. thus for the Holy of Holies. In like manner A. was made for the tent of meeting, because of the uncleanness of the Children of Isr., by sprinkling the blood of the sin offering on the altar of incense; the H. Pt. being alone in the tent during the whole ceremony. Issuing from the tent he then made A. for the altar of burnt offering, putting of the blood of bullock and goat on the horns, and sprinkling seven times with his finger upon the altar.

The H. Pt. then took the live goat, laid his hands on its head, confessed over it the iniquities of the Children of Isr., their transgressions and their sins, and sent it away into the wilderness by the hand of one who stood ready, that it mt. bear their iniquities into a land of separation, whence there cd. be no returning. Entering again the tent of meeting, the H. Pt. laid aside the linen clothes, assumed his ordinary garments, and, coming out, offered the burnt offering, making A. for himself and for the people. The fat of the sin offering was burnt on the altar. The other parts of the sin offerings, their flesh, &c., were carried without the camp and consumed by fire. The man who performed this duty, and he who led away the goat for AZAZEL, washed their clothes, bathed themselves, and then returned to the camp.

The trumpets of Jubilee, proclaiming liberty, &c., were ordered to be blown on this day.

Many mod. scholars believe that this legislation belongs to a late date; that it is post-exilic. They rely upon such points as these: absolute silence as to its observance in pre-exilic times; such phrases as "afflict your souls," which occur elsewhere only in late Lit.; the fixing of particular days in the year for fasting, and the highly elaborate ritual, are taken as indicating a time cert. subsequent to the exile. Questions concerning the day of A. must be considered in connection with the system to which it belongs. When the date of what is called the Priestly Code is satisfactorily settled, the smaller problem will also be solved.

Particulars as to the observance of the day of A. in later times are found in the Mishnic tractate Yōmā, Ant. III. x. 3, and Philo, περὶ τῆς ἑβδομῆς καὶ τῶν ἑορτῶν (ed. Mangey, ii. 296). In order to guard agst. pollution, the H. Pt. was secluded for seven days before in a special chamber, away fm. his own house. He entered the Holy of Holies four times. The prayer he used before killing the sin offering is specified, and directions given for the sprinkling, additions being made to those in Lv. The two goats were to be as like each other as possible. On the neck of that wh. fell to Azazel, a piece of scarlet cloth was tied. The H. Pt's. prayer over it is given. When the sins of the people had thus been laid on it, some of the nobles of Jrs. went with it outside the city, and one man led it into the wilderness, where he hurled it over a precipice. See AZAZEL, SCAPE-GOAT.

It is to be noted that the sins to be atoned for were such as mt. be attributed to human frailty, apart from deliberate purpose of evil. Those who were unable to go up to the temple were held to participate in the solemnities, if they observed the directions as to work and fasting.

As Jesus Christ is compared and contrasted with the H. Pt. (He. 9.), it is proper to observe that in this, the supreme function of his office, the H. Pt. acted as the representative of the people. But his ministry only prefigured that of Jesus Christ; it made nothing perfect. With the blood of beasts he entered but once a year into the Holy of Holies. Jesus by His own blood entered once for all into the presence of God. He makes an abiding purification for His people, who, no longer standing afar off, have free access perpetually to their God and King.

ATROTH, RV. ATROTH-SHOPHAN (Nu. 32.^{35}), a town built by the Children of Gad, near Aroer and Jazer, not yet identd. AV. reads "Atroth, Shophan," as two names.

ATTALIA, a seaport on the coast of Pamphylia, near the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, and c. 15 miles fm. Perga. It was built by Attalus II. (B.C. 159–138). It is now Adalia. Steamers cast anchor outside the harbour, wh. can now be used only by smaller craft. The place was visited by Paul on his first missionary journey (Ac. 14.^{25}).

AUGURY. See DIVINATION.

AUGUSTUS, great-nephew and adopted s. of Julius Cæsar; b. B.C. 63, d. A.D. 14. After the murder of his uncle (B.C. 44), A. with consummate duplicity hoodwinked Cicero and the Republicans; and, having secured an army as against Antony, united with him and Lepidus to form the 2nd Triumvirate. Lepidus was soon thrown aside; Antony having been defeated at Actium, B.C. 31, A. reigned for 44 yrs. sole emperor. During this period our Lord was born. See Jesus Christ.

AUGUSTUS BAND, THE, of wh. Julius, to whom the charge of Paul was committed, was a centurion, was prob. a name for the Prætorian Cohorts, as the Imperial Guards were called. Tacitus (Hist. II. 92) mentions a Julius who was a centurion of the Prætorians, appointed one of their prefects. This wd. explain the influence Paul seems to have had among the Prætorians, "those of Cæsar's household." In Ac. 27.[1] the RV. rendering is not quite accurate; it is not "the Augustan band" but "an Augustan band," implying that this cohort was one of several. These cohorts cannot be called A. as being composed of inhabitants of Samaria, although it was named by Herod Sebaste, "the Augustan"; the words used wd. have been difft.

AVA, prop. AVVA, a place whence people were brought to occupy Samaria, after Isr. had been carried away by the k. of Asyr. (2 K. 17.[24]).

AVEN. (1) The plain, Heb. beq'ah, of A. (Am. 1.[5], RV. "valley") is prob. the great hollow between the Lebanons, wh. is still known as el-Biqāʿ = Coele Syria. The sun worship at Baalbekk may act. for the Aven = idolatry. (2) A contraction of Beth Aven (Ho. 10.[8], cp. 4.[15]) = Bethel. (3) Applied in contempt, by a slight change in the name, to the great city of On, or Heliopolis, in Egp. (Ek. 30.[17]).

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See Kin, Next of.

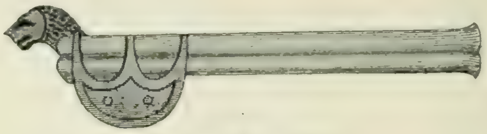
AVIM, AVITES, prop. with RV. Avvim, Avvites. (1) The idolatrous people of Avva (2 K. 17.[31]). (2) A people prob. of the original inhabitants in S.W. Pal. (Dt. 2.[23]), whom the invading Phil. "destroyed." The survivors fm. this destruction seem to have been absorbed by the conquerors: at least along with them they escaped a new "destruction" at the hands of Joshua (Jo. 13.[3]).

Egyptian Axes

AX, or AXE, in EV. trs. seven Heb. words. (1) Garzen (Dt. 19.[5], 20.[19]; 1 K. 6.[7]; Is. 10.[15]). It was used to fell timber, with a head of iron that mt. "slip from the helve." (2) Hereb, "knife" (Jo. 5.[2]), "razor" (Ek. 5.[1]), or "tool" for stone dressing (Ex. 20.[25]). This last is prob. intended in Ek. 26.[9]. It is usly. rendered "sword." (3) Kashshîl (Ps. 74.[6], RV. "hatchet"). (4) Magzêrâh (2 S. 12.[31]). (5) Mĕgērâh (1 Ch. 20.[3]), shd. prob. read Magzêrâh. (6) Maʿatzâd (Jr. 10.[3]; Is. 44.[12], AVm. and RV.). (7) Qardôm (Jg. 9.[48]; 1 S. 13.[20, 21]; Ps. 74.[5]; Jr. 46.[22]), used in cutting wood. In NT. A. trs. ἀξίνη (Mw. 3.[10]; Lk. 3.[9]).



Egyptian Battle-Axe

AZARIAH, "whom Jah helps." (1) S. of Amaziah, k. of Judah = Uzziah. (2) S. of Hilkiah, fr. of Seraiah (1 Ch. 6.[13], 9.[11]; Ez. 7.[1]). (3) S. of Oded, who met Asa returning fm. the conquest of the Ethiopians, and exhorted him to that reform of relg. by wh. his reign was distinguished (2 Ch. 15.). (4) S. of Jehoram = Ahaziah (2 Ch. 22.[6]). (5) The H. Pt. who prevented Uzziah fm. burning incense on the altar (2 Ch. 26.[17, 20]), although Solomon had done the same—incident omitted by the Chronicler—without rebuke (1 K. 9.[25]). (6) The fr. of Joel (2 Ch. 29.[12]). (7) A H. Pt. in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31.[10, 13]). He was also "ruler of the house of God," wh. may be = "captain of the temple" (Ac. 4.[1], 5.[24, 26]). (8) S. of Hoshaiah (Jr. 43.[2]), one of the men who opposed Jeremiah, and carried him with the remnant of the people into Egp. (9) One of the Heb. youths, called in Bab. Abednego (Dn. 1.[6, 7, 11, 19], 2.[17]).

A. was a popular name: cp. 1 K. 4.[2, 5]; 1 Ch. 2.[8, 38, 39], 6.[9, 10, 36]; 2 Ch. 21.[2], 23.[1], 28.[12], 29.[12]; Ez. 7.[1, 3]; Ne. 3.[23, 24], 7.[7], 8.[7], 10.[2], 12.[33].

AZAZEL (SCAPE-GOAT). This trltn. is adopted by the RV. in prefce. to "Scape-goat" of the AV. See Scape-Goat.

AZEKAH, whither Joshua pursued the Can. fm. the battle of Beth Horon (Jo. 10.[10f.]), was assigned to Judah (Jo. 15.[35]). It was near the Vale of Elah (1 S. 17.[1f.]). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch. 11.[9]; cp. Jr. 34.[7]). It is named between Lachish and Zorah. It was occupied by the Jews after the captivity (Ne. 11.[30]). While the district in wh. it lay is thus well indicated, the site is not yet identd.

AZMAVETH (Ez. 2.[24] = Beth Azmaveth, Ne. 7.[28]). It is mentioned with Anathoth among the towns occupied by the Jews after the captivity, and is identd. with Himzeh, between ʿAnâta and Jebʿa. Several men bore this name (2 S. 23.[31]; 1 Ch. 8.[36], 12.[3]).

BAAL, pl. BAALIM, the supreme male deity of the Shemites; prob. originally bisexual—the progr[illegible] of anthropomorphism nathly. involving the ascription of sex. B. means "Lord," "possessor"; therefore B. is an attributive, not a proper name. At first B. and Jehovah were identd., hence Saul and David had sons whose names had B. as a constitutive element (1 Chr. 8.[33], 9.[39], 14.[7]). Gradually it was recognised that the connotation was so difft. that it was simpler to regard them as difft. beings. One point of diffce. was that B. was worshipped by images, while J″. was not. The attributive character of B. is confirmed by the fact that it always has the article. It occurs 52 times in the sing., and 16 times in pl. In the same passage, and in refce. to the same obj., sometimes first the one is used and then the other (cp. Jg. 2.[11, 13]; 1 K. 18.[18, 19]). Here appears a phenomenon akin to what we meet in Romanist countries; the "Virgins" are individualised by the localities where they are worshipped. While in one sense they are all difft., with difft. attributes; in another they are one. Sometimes the distinction of sex was understood without diffce. of name, as indicated in LXX by fem. art., Jr. 2.[23]. However, ASHTORETH was usually assumed to be the fem. of B. In Canaan these were identd. with the sun and the moon respectively. This was a purely local identn., as the Bab. Bel is the same deity, but has apparently no connection with the sun. B. seems to have meant deity in his governmental relation to his worshippers. The local Baalim do not show any solar connection. B.-Zebub, "god of flies" (this prob. shd. be read Zebul, "a house," i.e. "the sky"). B.-Berith, worshipped in Shechem, Jg. 9.[4]. B-Peor, lord of Peor. While originally B. worship was degenerate Jahvism, it was difft. when JEZEBEL introduced the worship of the B. of the Sidonians, with his bloody and obscene rites; hence it was so fiercely combated by ELIJAH.

BAAL (1 Ch. 4.[33]), prob. = BAALOTH-BEER.

BAALAH. (1) = Kirjath-Jearim (Jo. 15.[9]; 1 Ch. 13.[6]). (2) (Jo. 15.[29]) = BALAH (19.[3]), BILHAH (1 Ch. 4.[29]). (3) MOUNT B. (Jo. 15.[11]), lying between Ekron and Jabneel.

BAALATH, in Dan (Jo. 19.[44]), poss. = B. (1 K. 9.[18]; 2 Ch. 8.[6]), named by Jos. (Ant. VIII. vi. 1), with Beth-horon, as not far fm. Gezer.

BAALATH-BEER, or RAMAH of the SOUTH (Jo. 19.[8], RV.), BAAL (1 Ch. 4.[33]), a hill S. or S.E. of Beersheba, poss. marked by the white-domed sanctuary, Ḳubbet el-Baul, S. of Tell el-Milḥ.

BAAL-BERITH. See BAAL.

BAAL-GAD, "Baal of Fortune" or "Destiny," N.W. of Hermon in the plain (Jo. 11.[17], &c.). It marked the N. limit of Joshua's conquest. It is to be distinguished fm. B.-Hermon. Conder thinks it may be 'Ain Jedeideh.

BAAL-HAMON, LXX Beelamōn (SS. 8.[11]). This may be = Belamōn (Jth. 8.[3]), in wh. case it was near Dothan, and is perhaps to be identd. with Ibleam—Bel-'ameh, c. ½ mile S. of Jenîn.

BAAL-HAZOR, the property of Absalom, where Amnon was murdered. It was "beside" Ephraim, and is prob. ident. with Tell 'Asûr, c. 5 miles N. of Bethel (2 S. 23.[23]).

BAAL-HERMON. "Mount of B.-H." stands in Jg. 3.[3] for "B.-Gad under Mt. Hermon" in Jo. 13.[5]. But some place E. of Jordan is indicated in 1 Ch. 5.[23], where the Baal of Hermon was worshipped. This may be ident. with Bâniâs, but there is no cert.

BAALIS, k. of the Ammonites. See GEDALIAH (Jr. 40.[14]).

BAAL-MEON, a town fortified ("built") by Reuben, its name being changed (Nu. 32.[38]), the Beon of v. 3. As Beth B.-M. Moses assigned it to Reuben (Jo. 13.[17]). It was taken and fortified by Mesha (Moabite Stone Inscr.), and is named by Ek. as a city of Moab. Jeremiah calls it Beth Meon (48.[23]). OEJ. places it near the hot springs (Callirrhoë in the Wâdy Zerqā Ma'în), 9 Rm. miles fm. Heshbon = the modern Khirbet Ma'în. Accdg. to Euseb. it was the home of the prophet Elisha.

BAAL-PEOR, "the Baal of Mt. Peor." See BAAL and PEOR (Dt. 4.[3]; Nu. 25.[3]; Ps. 106.[28]).

BAAL-PERAZIM, a place of worship in the plain of Rephaim, near Jrs., where David defeated the Phil. (2 S. 5.[20]; 1 Ch. 14.[11]). Mt. Perazim in Is. 28.[21] prob. refers to this place.

BAAL-SHALISHAH (2 K. 4.[42]), a seat of Baal worship in the "land of Shalishah," wh. lay between Mt. Ephraim and the land of Shaalim (1 S. 9.[4]): poss. Kefr Thilth (PEFM. II. 285, 298f.).

BAAL-ZEBUB, Gr. Baalmuian (2 K. 1.[2], &c.), "the Baal of flies," worshipped at Ekron. See BAAL, BEELZEBUB.

BAAL-ZEPHON, the Egpn. deity, Baali Sapuna, after whom a place was called (Ex. 14.[2, 9]; Nu. 33.[7], P.), near the spot where Isr. crossed the Red Sea. Nothing is now known either of the place or of the kind of worship there practised. A town Sapuna is mentioned in the Tell Amarna tablets—No. 174, ed. Winckler (KB.).

BAANAH. (1) A Benjamite who, along with his br. Rechab, murdered Ishbosheth, and was executed and disgraced by David's orders (2 S. 4.[5f.]). (2) Fr. of Heleb (2 S. 23.[29]; 1 Ch. 11.[30]). (3) One who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[2], &c.).

BAASHA, s. of Ahijah of Issachar, prob. of humble birth (1 K. 16.[2]). Having murdered Nadab at Gibbethon, and destroyed the whole house of Jeroboam I., he assumed the monarchy, and reigned in Tirza 24 yrs. For his wars with Judah and the combination agst. him with Syrria, see ASA. He did evil, and destruction was denounced agst. his house, as it had been agst. that of Jeroboam I. (1 K. 16.[1f.]).

BABEL, BABYLON, the most famous city of antiquity, capital of BABYLONIA. The act. of the foundation of B., Gn. 11., relates to early movements of the population exhibited in a mythic form. It is prob. that the city of the tradition was a yet older city, wh. was destroyed. The Asyr. name Babilu, "the Gate of God," was transformed into Babel to be a mnemonic of "the confusion of tongues." Various causes led to the Temple there becoming the most important shrine in Bab. The obj. of every kinglet who aimed at extending his sway over all Bab., the point toward wh. every external conqueror directed his efforts, was the possession of Bab. It was here that Ḥammurabi (AMRAPHEL) fixed his capital. During the Asyr. supremacy B. had its own k., and this independence was the occasion of many rebellions agst. the k. of Asshur. In order to avert this Tiglath-pileser, Sargon, Esarhaddon, and Ashur-bani-pal assumed the title of k. of B. and made it twin capital with Nineveh. Sennacherib was so enraged by its rebellions that he destroyed it; his s. and successor rebuilt it. It owed its greatest splendour to Nebuchadnezzar. In Herodotus and Ktesias we have elaborate descriptions of the walls and bldgs of B. These two acts. differ in the circumference of B. by 14 miles; as, however, there were two walls, one may be the circumference of the outer, the other of the inner. It was surrendered to Cyrus by treachery in the 17th yr. of Nabonidus. It continued a place of importance into the Gr. period. It is now represented by mounds and masses of brickwork on the E. bank of the Euphrates. These mounds occupy much less extent than that assigned to B. by the classical historians. Oppert has given a map of the city on classic scale, and includes within the walls Birs Nimroud, wh. is usually identd. with Borsippa. The mounds above referred to represent the Palace of Nebuchadnezzar, the Temple of Bel, and the Hanging Gardens. The bricks brought from B. are all stamped with the name of Nebuchadnezzar.

BABEL, TOWER OF. Each of the primitive cities of Babylonia had a special temple erected to the God there principally worshipped, and of this temple the ruler (patesi) was priest. Fm. the ruins and representations on Asyr. bas-reliefs, we learn that these shrines were built first on a mound, and then in successive stages, each occupying much less room than that below it. The temple of Bel-Marduk in Babylon was of this char.

As there were older cities than Bab., it is poss. that the tradition was transferred to it fm. one of them. The LXX version of Is. 10.[9] preserves the tradition that it was Calneh where the "Tower" was built. Hommel (HBD.) hints a prefce. for Kish, a city only known to us by the monuments. The "Confusion of Tongues" gathers into dramatic unity the providential process by wh. God prevented the setting up of a premature civilisation.

BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA. These two powers represent one movement in Civilisation, Religion, Literature, and Art, as much as do Britain and America. Their political methods, their religious ideas, and objs. of worship are the same: this is true also of their ideals of Lit. and Art. In Lang. and Writing they are practically one. As their hists. further interlace, it will be advantageous to consider them together under the heads of Political History, Civilisation, Religion, Lang. and Lit., and Art.

BABYLONIAN KING.
From Hommel's Babylonien und Assyrien

I. History.—The earliest monarch who cd. in any degree claim to rule over B. was Sargon I., the fr. of Naram-sin.

The date of the latter is fixed by an inscr. of Nabu-nahid wh. declares that he ruled 3200 yrs. after Naramsin. As the date of Nabu-nahid may be taken as B.C. 550, this wd. make the date of Sargon approximately B.C. 3800. We do not know the data wh. led Nabu-nahid to fix the interval, nor the precise length of the earliest Babylonian yr., but after all deductions we can scarcely place Sargon later than B.C. 3000. There are the names of isolated sovereigns of an apparently earlier date; but we know neither the length of their reigns nor the extent of their kdms. The connected hist. of B. begins with Sargon I. Before his time B. was occupied by small towns with parochial territories, ruled over each by its own patesi. With Sargon of Agade began the first definite attempt to unite B. under one sceptre.

After the dyn. of Agade had fallen, that of Shipurla came into prominence under Gudea. The next dyn. had their capital in Ur. This dyn. built much, as proved by the number of bricks that are found with their names. The Dyn. of Ur seems to have been overthrown by an incursion of Elamites who held the supreme power in Bab. for a couple of cents. The effect on Bab. of the Elamite rule was like that of the Gallic invasion of Italy on Rome—it removed all likely opponents to its supremacy. With Ḥammurabi (AMRAPHEL), the 6th of a, till then, inconspicuous dyn. of rulers, Bab. rose to Imperial dignity. He wrested the power fm. the Elamites. It may be that the defeat wh. Abraham inflicted on the Elamite monarch, Kudur-Lagamar (Chedarlaomer), paved the way for the supremacy of Ḥammurabi (Ge. 14.15). We may place the end of his dyn. about B.C. 2100.

The overthrow of this dyn., if not caused by a Cassite invasion, at least synchronises with it. These Kashshu seem to have come fm. the mountainous region at the head waters of the Tigris. Simultaneous with the Cassite rule were the beginnings of Asyr. Colonists, refugees fm. the Cassite invaders, made their way northward fm. the alluvial plain and founded cities in the region afterwards called A.

This fact is concisely chronicled (Gn. 10.11), "Out of that land (Shinar=Sumer) went forth Asshur and builded Nineveh, the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city." In the RV. "Nimrod" is the nominative; he is said to have gone "into Assyria." Marduk is now identified with Nimrod. The cities of A. were soon combined under the rule of one monarch and, conscious of their strength, early began to interfere in the affairs of B. Between Asshuruballit, k. of A., and Burnaburyas II., k. of B. (B.C. 1350), there was first rivalry, wh. was healed by the marriage of the heir of the k. of B. to the dr. of the k. of A.; on a revolution in wh. the s. of this union was assassinated, Asshuruballit invaded B. and set his great-grandson, Kurigalzu II., on the throne of his father. Half a century later, under the rule of Shalmaneser I., A. began her career of conquest. His campaigns were mainly W. of the Euphrates, so he did not intervene in the affairs of B., but his s., Tikulti-ninib, ruled over A. and B. With the murder of Tikul-ninib, A. sank into temporary insignificance, while under the rule of Marduk-billidin I. (Merodach-baladan) there was a resuscitation of the power of B.; but this was limited by the incursions and conquests of the Elamites. About B.C. 1135 arose Nebuchadnezzar I., who carried his arms to the shores of the Mediterranean. Though he had a conflict with A. in wh. he claims victory, he made no permanent conquests in the N.

A. in turn revived under Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100). His conquests in the N. and W. led Marduk-nadin-akhi, k. of B., to invade A., when he was defeated. Tiglath-pileser followed up his advantage by conquering B., and capturing the city. He left Marduk-nadin-akhi the vassal kingship. Tiglath-pileser carried his arms victoriously into Elam. After his death A. sinks for a time into obscurity. This is no doubt owing to some extent to paucity of records; but prob. also it was due to great racial movements putting the more settled communities on the defensive.

It is poss. that at this time occurred the intrusion of the Kaldi from Arabia into B., who—if we take the rendering of AV.—were assigned cities by the Asyrs. and amalgamated with the people of B.

Again A. revived when Tiglath-pileser II. came to the throne. This restoration of the Empire was carried on by his successors, till it culminated in the reigns of Asshur-nazir-pal and Shalmaneser II.

The latter, in carrying on his conquests to the W., encountered the Syr. confederacy under Ben-idri (BENHADAD) of Damascus and AHAB of ISRAEL in the battle of Qarqar. Shalmaneser claims the victory, but the fact that the campaign had to be renewed again and again gives his alleged victory the appearance of a defeat. At length when Isr. and Syr. were weakened by mutual conflicts he captured Damascus and received the submission of Benhadad the s. of HAZAEL; JEHU also brought tribute.

Shalmaneser intervened in the affairs of B., at the call of Marduk-nadin-shum, whom he maintained on the throne as his vassal. After the death of Shalmaneser (B.C. 825) a period of decadence set in. It is true that victorious campaigns are recorded in the annals, but the limits of the Empire are receding.

During this period arose the brief empire of JEROBOAM II.; an empire only poss. during a time when Egp. and Asyr. were weak.

In 745 Tiglath-pileser III. ascended the throne and restored the prestige of A. He appears to have been a usurper, as he does not claim a royal ancestry. He conquered and assumed the title of sarru Babil, k. of B. He overthrew Rezin, k. of Syr., and conquered Galilee; he reduced Isr. to the position of a vassal state under HOSHEA. AHAZ of Judah declared himself the vassal of A. to be protected agst. PEKAH and REZIN. On his death Hoshea rebelled agst. his s. and successor, Shalmaneser IV. (called Ululai, as k. of B.), who marched into Pal. and laid siege to Samaria. During the siege he died, and was succeeded by Sargon II., who captured Samaria and deported all the leading inhabitants. Sargon was one of the greatest sovereigns of A., and extended the Empire in all directions. In a campaign in Cilicia the Yavna (the Greeks) were encountered and defeated by him. By his Tartan (generalissimo) he appears to have conquered the Phil. (Isa. 20.1). He received the submission of Hezekiah, the result, it wd. seem, of a difft. campaign fm. that agst. the Phil. (Isa. 10.26-32). Fm. the throne-name he chose it wd. appear that Sargon claimed an ancestry wh.

linked him to the anct. k. of B. of the same name. Certainly this dyn. occupy themselves much more with the affairs of B. than those wh. preceded them; in fact Babylon and Nineveh were twin capitals of the Empire under some of these monarchs. Various efforts were made to conciliate the people of the Southern Kdm.; Sargon stayed occasionally in Bab. The efforts of the Sargonids at the pacification of B. were hindered by Marduk-billidin (Merodach Baladan) II., k. of Bit-Jakin, who had secured the throne between the death of Pul (Tiglath-pileser) and the accession of Sargon. Sargon, after a time, placed a younger s. as k. On the accession of Sennacherib Marduk-billidin appeared, and the deposed k. was murdered. Sennacherib, after repeated attempts at satisfying its inhabitants, determined to treat Bab. as Frederick Barbarossa endeavoured to treat Milan; he decreed its utter desolation. Whether as taking advantage of these difficulties in B., or as ally of Marduk-billidin, Hezekiah withheld his tribute; Sennacherib, in marching agst. Tirhakah (Taharqa), determined to bring Hezekiah again into subjn., captured the majority of the cities of Judah and compelled Hezekiah to pay a large ransom (2 K. 18.[14]). Hearing of the advance agst. him of Tirhakah, Sennacherib determined to take Jrs., feeling a hostile fortress a danger to his communications, but pestilence swept away the greater part of his army (Is. 37.[36]; 2 K. 19.[35]).

Herodotus relates this event fm. an Egpn. standpoint: Herod. calls Sennacherib k. of the Arabians.

On his return to B., Sennacherib had to face a coalition of Elam with B. After several vicissitudes he was finally successful and appointed his s., Esarhaddon, viceroy in B. Sennacherib was assassinated by two of his sons, and Esarhaddon ascended the throne. Prob. during his viceroyalty Esarhaddon rebuilt Bab. Manasseh of Judah, whom he reckons one of his vassals, when he threatened rebellion, was carried to Bab., not Nineveh. Esarhaddon conquered Egp. and split it up into kdms. It was Esarhaddon who sent the heathen colonists into the Northern Kdm. of Isr. (Ez. 4.[2]). He was succeeded by his s. Asshur-banipal (Asnapper); he confirmed the power of A. in Egp. and completed the conquest of Elam. In the course of his long reign the Empire of A. gained its widest extent. On his death a period of rapid decadence set in; his sons, Asshur-itil-ila, and Sinshar-iskun (Saracus), were unable to maintain the Empire. The circumstances of the fall of Nineveh can only be vaguely guessed. The numerous campaigns of the warlike Sargonids had no doubt exhausted A.; there may have been incursions of nomads fm. the Altaic steppes; there cert. was the rebellion of Egp. under Necho; the setting up of an independent B. under Nabopollasar; and the alliance of the latter with Media. If we cd. disentangle the prose fm. the poetry in the prophecies of Nahum we mt. form some idea of the occurrence. Nineveh, unlike its rival Bab., utterly disappeared within a comparatively short time after the fall of A.

The fall of A. was the occasion of the rise of the last Babylonian Empire. Nabopollasar assumed the headship of the Asyr. Empire, and his s. Nebuchadnezzar encountered Necho at Carchemish, and defeated him. Necho had endeavoured to secure Pal. and Syr. as the Egpn. share of the fallen Empire, but his hopes were destroyed by this disaster. The young conqueror followed up his success by pursuing the Egpn. army to the boundary of their own country, and securing the allegiance of the recent vassals of Egp., who had formerly been all vassals of A. While engaged on this, he received news of his father's death. Leaving the heavy troops and the long line of captives to follow the usual caravan route through Syr., he crossed the desert with the light troops alone, and secured the throne agst. any usurper. Unlike his Asyr. predecessors, the inscrs. of Nebuchadnezzar do not record his military expeditions so much as the temples, by the erection of wh. he honoured the gods. Fm. the influence he had on the fortunes of the Jews, he is prominent in Scrip., but the Empire of Nebuchadnezzar was much less than that of A.; the North and East were the share of the fallen Empire appropriated by the Medes.

In his pursuit after Necho, Nebuchadnezzar had by a sharp siege compelled Necho's vassal Jehoiakim to submit to him, surrender a part of his treasure as ransom, and give hostages. For 3 yrs. he was faithful to his new suzerain, but in the 4th yr. he rebelled. Poss. he may have been seduced by promises of Egpn. aid; or Nebuchadnezzar may have been occupied in war at a distant part of his Empire. It was 3 yrs. before Nebuchadnezzar came agst. the rebellious vassals. By this time Jehoiakim was dead, and his throne was occupied by his s. Jehoiachin, a youth. Nebuchadnezzar put his uncle Zedekiah on the throne. He also rebelled, after he had reigned about 8 yrs. Tho' Jerusalem resisted obstinately, it was at length taken and demolished.

During his long reign of 43 yrs. Nebuchadnezzar practically rebuilt Bab. He was succeeded by his s., Evil-merodach, who was assassinated by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar, after a reign of 2 yrs. Neriglissar reigned 4 yrs. and was succeeded by his s., Labosoarchod (Labashi-Marduk), a mere child, who after a nominal reign of 9 months, was put out of the way, and a Bab. noble, Nabunahid, was put on the throne. So the race of the Chaldean conqueror came to an end; himself, his s. and his grandson had occupied the throne, as prophesied by Jeremiah (27.[7]). Although he was not of the family of Nebuchadnezzar, he may have married into it.

The reign of Nabunahid was characterised by an endeavour to centralise the worship of the Empire by bringing to Bab. the statues of the various local deities; his efforts do not seem to have been countenanced by the priesthood. The beginning of his rule was vigorous, and appeared likely to be prosperous, as the threatening power of the Medes was broken by the successful revolt of Cyrus, the k. of the vassal state of Anshan. Nabunahid reigned 16 yrs; during at least five of these he was in some way incapacitated; the annals tell us that "the k. was in Tema"; certain of the functions of royalty were therefore in abeyance, and others were performed by the "king's son," Belshazzar, who seems to have possessed warlike energy and skill, as the annals always declare him to have been with the "rabuti" on various points of the frontier. In B.C. 536 Cyrus, having conquered Lydia, turned his arms agst. B., poss. by invitation of the priesthood. By treachery Bab. was surrendered to his general Gobryas. So ended the Assyro-Babylonian Empire. It ought to be noted that, to the Jews, the Persian Empire was a continuation of that of Asy.; even Darius Hystaspis is called "the k. of Assyria" (Ez. 6.[22]).

II. Civilisation of Babylonia and Assyria.—We have a very considerable amount of information as to life and manners in B. and A. In the age of Ḥammurabi, rather more than two thousand yrs. before Christ, we have the Code of that monarch, and further, a collection of letters fm. and to him. We are thus in a position to estimate to some extent the degree to wh. society had become organised in B. by the beginning of the second millennium B.C. For a later date, there are gathered in the difft. Museums of Europe and America, collections of contract tablets, i.e. clay tablets on wh. are recorded mercantile transactions of various kinds. These are of widely difft. dates, but are fullest about the end of the Sargonid period, and the last Empire of B. In a state of barbarism the individual has to do everything for himself; the only complexity is what is involved in the constitution of the family. As society grows in civilisation the individual becomes a more and more specialised organ, in an organism ever widening and always becoming more complex. In some aspects society was more complex in B. than among ourselves. There were four grades of legal status; crimes had a difft. heinousness accdg. to the status of the criminal, in relation to the victim of the crime. There were Patricians, Plebeians, Serfs, and Slaves. Each of these had certain rights as agst. the others. In the family there was equal complexity; there were four classes of children—legitimate children, the progeny of legalised concubinage, natural children, and children by adoption. Besides the priests of various grades and various deities, there were female votaries connected with difft. shrines. There is some difficulty as to these votaries; they may be married, but it is assumed that the marriage relation is merely nominal; yet arrangements are made in the Code of Ḥammurabi for the sons of these votaries. Whether such a person was the s. of the votary's nominal husband by her maid, accdg. to an arrangement regularly entered into, or whether there was some such custom in regard to votaries as that narrated by Herodotus (I. 196), does not seem clear. In business and commerce, if relations were not as complicated as among ourselves, there were commission agents, partnerships, rents, leases, and, latterly at any rate, banks. Such various and extensive mercantile undertakings implied ample means of intercommunication. The two great rivers wd. early suggest to the inhabitants of B. the advantage of waterways; this led to the making and preservation of canals, wh. were also useful for irrigation. If roads were not made with the solidity and mathematical accuracy of the Romans, still trade routes were kept open. Large caravans regularly conveyed goods fm. the shores of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, if not also fm. India. The staple occupation was agriculture, and the presence of the great rivers led to canals for irrigation. All this implies an efficient administration of justice; tribunals on the whole fairly impartial, and a police fairly effective. Save in the matter of relg. there is truth in what Dr. Johns says (Bab. and Ass. Laws, viii.): "A right thinking citizen of a modern city wd. prob. feel more at home in Anct. Bab. than in Mediæval Europe."

Such a state of civilisation cd. not be attained at once; but as we have no records we can only conjecture the line of progress followed. We see traces that immediately before the period of wh. we have distinct kge. B. was covered with small walled towns, the inhabitants of wh. cultivated the territory in their immediate vicinity. In the centre of each there was a ziggurat, or tower, built in lessening stages; this served at once as a temple and a fortress. The rule was in the hands of the patesi or local priest. There was all the civilisation open to a vill. community, but that alone; there wd. be carpenters, smiths, &c., all the trades that cd. be supported in a small community. Any undertaking that implied the combination of several communities was imposs. Certain cities began to attain a leadership, and their rulers assumed the title of king. More extensive works cd. now be undertaken; canals for irrigation and dykes to limit the inundations, due to the annual swelling of the Tigris and the Euphrates; these structures required perpetual care, watchfulness, and repair; and the incidence of the burden of this cd. only be settled by a central authority. By the times of Ḥammurabi the central authority was thoroughly established. Each town had its patesi; prob. a hereditary office. The soul of civilisation, that without wh. all co-operation wd. be imposs., is the administration of justice. The Code of Ḥammurabi exhibits the function of the judge as so fully understood that no definition of his functions, or statement of the mode of his appointment, is thought necessary. The cities retained a good deal of independence each under its own k. or patesi; and the judge appears to have had the elders of the city as his assessors in any trial.

The fundamental industry being agriculture, tenure and tenancy of land occupied a prominent place in the legislation of B. In the sale of land there were not only documents, but also careful plans. Serfs were sold along with the land when the portion sold was at all extensive, sometimes in the case of a large estate a city is mentioned as part of the subj. sold, though gen. the number of inhabitants indicates that it was rather a hamlet. The fundamental measure was the U or double cubit = a yard; 12 of these squared was the GAR, and 1806 of these was a GAN = 53 acres. Land was also measured by the amount of grain required to sow it The boundaries of fields were marked by boundary stones, many of wh. have come down to us.

As has been already mentioned, the inhabitants of B. and A., esp. the former, were greatly occupied with commerce; of every sale of any importance a record was made: apparently not only was a copy kept by each of the principals, but a third clay tablet was deposited in the village temple. This early suggd. a medium of exchange. The unit of value was the GUR of corn; it was soon found that the precious metals formed a better medium, so we find the silver shekel as the unit of value = a GUR; gold was to silver as 12 to 1. Although there are no specimens of coins even from the latest Empire of B., yet their "sealed money"—whether it meant bars of silver stamped, or small bags sealed as containing a given amount—served very much the same purpose. When Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah the price he paid was said to be "current money of the merchant." All following on this we have rent of land, leases, hiring of labourers, debts and interest. Although slavery by its nat. implies a lengthened hist. in wh. the custom arose and crystallised, yet we find it existing in the most primitive forms of culture: our most anct. records do not show us a time when it was not. Slaves in B. had certain clearly defined rights wh. made them less of mere chattels than were the negroes in America; they cd. acquire property, engage in trade, and be principals in contracts with freemen. Serfs were on a higher plane than slaves; although they cultivated plots of their master's ground, they often possessed land and stock of their own. Between these classes were the married slaves who had a house of their own. Fathers often sold their children, "it was a sure provision for life for a child, to sell him as a slave to a family in good position" (Johns, B. & A. L., p. 173).

More closely connected with the very foundation of society is the constitution of the family. Marriage in B. had primitively been by purchase: as in the case of Abraham with Isaac, the father arranged the union. The normal condition was monogamy, but in cert. cases, noticeably in the case of a female votary, who was a wife merely in name, she was expected to act as Sarah did, and send her maid to the couch of her husband in her stead. Barrenness or disease on the part of the wife seem to have implied the same relationship. A man sometimes married two sisters at the same time, tho' this was rare. That a slave girl shd. be the concubine of her master is regarded as the prob. state of matters; she had a different legal status if she had borne her master children. Children mt. be adopted; indeed a cert. claim on the family inheritance mt. be grounded on the fact that a child had been brought up in it; his foster father cd. not send him away penniless. The patria potestas is strongly maintained; if a son struck his father his hands were to be cut off (C. of H.). Cert. trades had careful regulations made for them; doctors esp., then house-builders and boat-builders; shepherds, farmers, and boatmen were also regulated. It is assumed that the property of the father is, on his decease, to be equally divided among all his sons; there seems no trace of primogeniture giving any advantage as it did among the Jews (Deu. 21.[17]). The number of letters and contracts that have come down to us, many of them signed by the actual scribe, show the important place in the life of B. filled by the scribe. It may be observed that several of these are women.

As Science can only be pursued under a stable government, the state of Science is an indirect evidence of the civilisation of a community. The enactments in the Code of Ḥammurabi in regard to physicians, imply considerable proficiency in some of the simpler forms of surgery. It was, however, mainly in ASTRONOMY that B. taught the world. The Babylonians had fixed the length of the yr., the signs of the Zodiac, the phases of the moon, and the principal planets. On their return fm. B. the Jews adopted the Calendar of B., and the names of the months. See YEAR.

III. Religion of Babylonia and Assyria.—We have seen that the primary name of the principal ruler of a city was patesi; whether or not "priesthood" was involved in name is not cert., but in practice he was the High Priest of the local shrine. These pyramidal ziggurats were the most prominent objs. in the flat plain of B. So far as can be ascertained there was only one deity worshipped in each small city. Sometimes the deity was simply called Bel, "Lord of," of a given place, e.g. Nippur; who, we find, is also called En-lil. Others become identd.

with powers of Nat.; thus, the god of Sippar was Shamash, "The Sun God," and the god of Ur was Sin, "The Moon God." Some of the names seem to be attributive, although it is difficult to decide, from the occasional ambiguity of the signs. That the natl. obj. was regarded, not as the god but as his symbol, may be proved by a scene on a "Sun-god tablet" in wh. the deity is represented sitting in his shrine, while a fig. lets the sun down with ropes. If each vill. began intending to worship the one supreme God, but soon was led to give prominence to cert. attributes, or to associate Him with cert. natl. objs. as His symbols, we can easily understand the growing differentiation. It wd. soon appear that the difft. names and attributes represented difft. beings; the analogy of this process we have seen in Roman Catholic countries with regard to the "Virgins" of difft. places (see above). The ascription of sex might follow fm. grammatical or attributive reasons. When, possibly owing to assaults by marauders fm. the mountains or the desert, the separatist tendency was superseded by one wh. led to combination, the relation of the deities to each other had to be taken into account. The need of a unifying Theogony led to the composition of the sacred Epics by some unknown poet or poets, who performed for B. what Hesiod did for Greece. The attribution of sex suggd. marriage and progeny. This in turn suggd. a Cosmogony in wh. the gods themselves had a beginning. The ages of the respective gods seem to have been to some extent fixed by the relative date at wh. the city in wh. their temple was, attained prominence. Further from physical or metaphysical reasons, cert. beings were looked upon as more primitive; thus Chaos, personified as the Dragon Tiamat, is looked upon as existing before the gods—a view wh. we find also in Hesiod. Such a beginning shows the influence of philosophic reflection rather than free mythologic imagination, and therefore represents the end, not the beginning, of the evolution of theologic thought. Apsu is assigned to Tiamat as consort; then follows the birth of the gods. There are traces of a yet earlier theorising as to the gods. Accdg. to it, at the head of all things was a Triad or Trinity, consisting of Anu, Bel, and Ea, the deities respectively of Heaven, Earth, and Sea. At a later period female counterparts are assigned to these as wives, but these are colourless creations. Beneath these is a lower Triad of heavenly bodies—Shamash, the sun god; Sin, the moon god; and Ramman, the god of the atmosphere. Then comes Marduk, the s. of Ea, who becomes later identd. with Bel, and is regarded by Nebuchadnezzar as the supreme Deity. This identn. is made the easier that Bel primarily meant "Lord." Along with Marduk is his s. Nabu (Nebo), prob., as Marduk was a sun-god, originally the planet Mercury, latterly the god of wisdom. Nergal is also a prominent deity, the god of battle, pestilence, and of the dead. The relg. of B., although so markedly polytheistic, may have sprung fm. monotheism, and certly. shows tendencies back to monotheism. Many of the hymns of B. mt., if J". were to replace Marduk, be used by a pious Heb. At the same time the actual worship of the people, it is almost cert., wd. be the crassest idolatry.

IV. Language of Babylonia and Assyria.—In the actual evolution of a lang. the spoken necessarily precedes the written; words are first spoken, and then after a time comes the thought of recording the words so uttered. When one learns the living lang. of a civilised people, the words spoken and written are learned almost simultaneously. In the case of the recovery of the lang. of Anct. Bab.

and Asyr., the discovery of the significance of the strange chars. cut on the face of the rock at Behistun, preceded by a considerable length of time the successful trn. of these into their vocal equivalents. The problem was complicated by the fact that the lang. of the earlier inhabitants of Bab., who invented the cuneiform script., greatly diffd. fm. that of Nineveh and Bab. in the days of the Sargonids and Nebuchadnezzar, hence the same chars. had widely difft. sounds.

The story of the decipherment of the cuneiform inscrs. is one of fascinating interest, but too long to be narrated here: suffice it to say the accurate copies made by Carsten Niebuhr, the brilliant conclusions drawn fm. a painstaking study of these by Grotefend, and the verification, and to a slight extent the correction of these by the skill, perseverance, and daring of Rawlinson supplemented by the labours of others, have opened to modern times the volumes of Babylonian and Assyrian hist., that had been shut for more than two millennia. Further discoveries and decipherments revealed the fact, that the writing of the time of the Sargonids and Achaemenids, was a late form at once of spelling and script. The relation in wh. these stand to each other may be compared to that of the Old English Black Letter to mod. type. Only in the earliest form, that in wh. the code of Ḥammurabi was inscribed, is there any trace of the hieroglyphic origin of this form of writing; and even in it the instances are few where this is obvious. The form of the chars. in this earliest script suggs. that the inscr. was scratched on a hard surface. Some of the bricks fm. Mugheir have been stamped by a stamp in relief; this was prob. moulded on an excised inscr. made on stone. When clay became the ordinary writing material the incisions were made by a fine blunt metal chisel, the end pressure of wh. made the wedge-shaped mark whence this script is called cuneiform.

DEVELOPMENT OF CUNEIFORM SCRIPT

(Title of the King: lit. "King of the Four Regions" = All Babylonia)

It was early guessed that each char. represented a syllable, and it was also soon recognised that, as in Egpn., determinatives marked off the meaning of the substantives, e.g. when a word meant the name of a god it was preceded by the sign , when it meant a country by . The difficulty of analysing the structure of the recovered lang. was increased by the number of syllabic signs—over 400. Many of these represent widely differing sounds; and further, not a few instances are found in wh. the same sound is represented by difft. chars., e.g. the name Eri-aku (ARIOCH) may be also read Rim-Sin. Gradually, however, the grammatical forms were ascertained, when it was found that the later Babylonio-Assyrian tongue was Semitic. The verb is nearly as elaborate as the Arabic; it has twelve conjugations, arranged in three classes, and three tenses. The pronouns are essentially the same as in other Semitic langs. The discovery of the extensive library of Asshur-bani-pal, and afterwards of other collections of bks., enables us to speak of a Babylonian and Assyrian Lit. The earliest literary form that langs. assume is poetry. Asyrn. is no exception to this gen. law; its Lit. proper consists almost entirely of sacred Epics, hymns to the gods, and penitential psalms. Prose, as a literary vehicle, seems never to have been attained; their hists. are baldly annalistic. Weber (Babylon. Lit.) maintains that there was an elaborate and strictly maintained system of versification. It seems to have been founded on relations of thought rather than of sound, as is the case with the poetry of the Hebs. For the Epics of Creation and the Deluge, see CREATION, FLOOD. The lang. of the Babylonian penitential psalms suggs. to the reader the Heb. Psalter. See PSALMS.

While we have above devoted ourselves mainly to the Semitic tongue in use in the monuments of the Asyr. Empire, there was an earlier lang. called provisionally, sometimes Accadian, sometimes Sumerian, the precise relationships of wh. are difficult to fix. In this the sacred books seem to have been written, and were trd. into the later Semitic tongue. In the library of Asshur-bani-pal numerous syllabaries were found giving the equivalents in the more recent lang. of the words and phrases of the more anct. Another change had taken place before the days of the Sargonids. Aram. appears to have superseded Asyrn. as the spoken lang. of the people. A number of weights were found in the palace of Sargon, having on the one side the denomination of the weight accompanied by the names and titles of Sargon in Asyrn., while on the other we have in Aram. merely the weight in shekels; the one side was the formal and legal, the other was that meant for ordinary use. Our coins present a similar phenomenon; on the one side we have the k.'s titles in Latin, on the other the denomination of the coin in English. The numerous contract-tablets that have been preserved give us another proof of this; while the contract proper is in the Bab.-Asyrn. char. and lang., the docket on the wrapper is very frequently in Aram., a practice wh. implies that those searching the records mt. be presumed to be more intimate with Aram. than with Assyrian (Winckler, Gesch. Bab. and Asyr., p. 179).

V. Art in Babylonia and Assyria. Although in Architecture the Solomonic Temple drew largely fm. Egp., in the details there seems to be evidence of Asyrn. influence. The cherubim, name and form, appear to have come fm. B.; the belt of alternate cherubim and palm-trees has a decidedly Asyrn. feeling. Springing up in a wide, alluvial plain, in wh. clay was plentiful and quarries inaccessible, the bldgs. erected were masses of brickwork. At first these bricks wd. be merely sun-dried, then wd. be learned the effect of fire in making clay almost as hard and durable as stone. Such a material did not lend itself to pillars or lintels; the Ziggurat, with its successive stories each smaller than that beneath it, was the architectural form that suited best the circumstances of B. At the same time clay was a substance that suggd. modelling. When the Art of B. passed into A., where slabs of soft gypsum were easily accessible, modelling in clay became sculpture. As the people of A. were essentially a warlike race, whose favourite amusement was the chase, their Art glorified force rather than power. This led to the prefce. for bas-relief over free statues. Prob. the soft gypsum would have crumbled had the artist of those winged, human-headed bulls, now in the British Museum, cut away the lower part of the slab, and left the weight of the body to rest unassisted on the legs. This sculpturesque tendency weakened the influence of the Art of B. and A. on the Israelitish people. In B. the bas-reliefs were often on glazed and coloured brick, as may be seen in the Louvre.

BABYLON IN NEW TESTAMENT. (1) In the Apc. (e.g. Rv. 17.) it is Rome that is intended, as appears fm. these facts: (a) It is a city (v. 18[a]); (b) built on seven hills (v. 9); (c) of great wealth and immorality (v. 2); (d) having imperial power (v. 18[b]); only Rome united these characteristics in the days of John. (2) In 1 P. 5.[13] there is more reason for discussion. Most Protestant Comm. since Calvin maintain that the lit. B. is meant. In favour of this is the fact that in all other Epp. places referred to are lit. places, not symbols. All Romanist Comm. and some Protestant hold that Rome is intended here; in favour of this is the Apocalyptic use; the universal tradition that Peter was in Rome, a tradition that is confirmed by the presence with the writer of Mark (1 P. 5.[13]), whom we know to have been summoned to Rome by the Apostle Paul (2 Tm. 4.[11]). The alleged impossibility of there being a Christian Church in B. is founded on the story related by Jos. (Ant. XVIII. ix. 5–9), that the Jews in B. were all massacred or expelled; many of the statements in this story seem scarcely worthy of credit. Jewish tradition always represents the Jewish community of B. as being both large and prosperous. It is difficult to decide, but the usage of the Apostle John, and the early tradition of Peter's presence in Rome, seem to throw the balance in favour of the Romanist view.

BABYLONISH GARMENT (Jo. 7.[21]). While the robes of Ninevite ks. show no indication that they were embroidered, in the portraits of Bab. ks. we see evidences of elaborate embroidery; prob. such was the robe that Achan coveted and took.

BACA, THE VALLEY OF (Ps. 84.[6]). All anct. VV. render "the vale of weeping." The word bākā occurs only here in the sing. The pl. (2 S. 5.[23]; 1 Ch. 14.[14]) EV. render "mulberry trees"; RVm. more prob. "balsam trees." The drops of balm may have suggd. the fall of tears (Heb. bĕkī, "weeping"). It shd. poss. be taken as a fig. of speech. If any real vale is intended, it cannot now be identd.

BADGER SKINS, as coverings of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25.[5]; Nu. 4.[6]). A mistrn.; prob. the skin of some species of seal is meant.

BAG. (1) Ḥarîṭîm, used only in pl., the B. in wh. Gehazi received silver fm. Naaman (2 K. 5.[23]). In Is. 3.[22] AV. renders "crisping pins," RV. "satchels." (2) Kīṣ, in wh. the travelling merchant carries his weights (Dt. 25.[13]; Pr. 16.[11]; Mi. 6.[11]); also used for "purse" (Pr. 1.[14]; Is. 46.[6]). (3) Kĕlī, denoting genly. "utensil," "clothing," "tool," &c. In Is. 17.[40 49], it is clearly the shepherd's bag. In such a B. prob. the "little lad" (Jn. 6.[9]) carried his provisions; the "scrip" or "wallet" (RV.), wh. the Apostles were to do without (Mw. 10.[10], &c.). (4) Tzerōr, fm. the idea of "compressing" or "tying together." The "bundle" of money (Gn. 42.[35]) shd. prob. be B., or "purse" (cp. Jb. 14.[17], Hag. 1.[6]). The corrspdg. verb is used of binding up the contributions for the restoration of the Temple (2 K. 12.[10]). (5) Balantion (Lk. 12.[33]) is a purse. (6) Glōssokomon = glōssokomeion, prop. a case for the mouthpiece of an instrument; prob. a portable cash-box (Jn. 12.[6]). (7) Zōnē (Mw. 10.[9], &c.) refers to the pouch in the girdle, wh. is commonly used as a safe purse in the East.

BAHURIM, in Benjamin, the home of Shimei (1 K. 2.[8]), lay on the road followed by David in his flight fm. Absalom, over the crest of Olivet (2 S. 15.[30], 16.[1]), and down the N.E. slopes to Jericho. B. prob. was near Wādy Fāra, wh. may be "the brook of water" of 2 S. 17.[20]. At B. Abner dismissed Paltiel, sending his w. Michal to David (2 S. 3.[16]). Here David's messengers were hidden in a well (2 S. 17.[15-20]). B. was the home of Azmaveth, one of David's heroes (2 S. 23.[31]; 1 Ch. 11.[33]).

BAJITH, RV. BAYITH, "a house," &c. It is used only once as a proper name (Is. 15.[2]). RVm. here gives "the Temple"; it may be = Beth-Bamoth, "the house of the high places" of the Moabite Stone Inscr. Like the Arb. bayt, the word has many meanings: house, tent, palace, temple, dwelling-place, family, race, are some of them. It appears often as part of place names, e.g. Beth-El.

BAKING. See Bread, Oven.

BALAAM (Bil'am), s. of Beor (Bosor, 2 P. 2.[15]), fm. Pethor (Pitru), soothsayer and prophet of God, brought by Balak to curse Isr. (Nu. 22–24, 31). B. first refused, then on being asked a second time consented. On his way occurred the incident of the ass seeing the Angel of J″. and warning him.

To understand B. we must bear in mind that prophecy by Divine Inspiration and soothsaying were not yet discriminated. While B. recognised that no curse, unless it expressed the Divine sentence, wd. harm Isr., he believed that if Isr. cd. be tempted to sin agst. J''. He mt. be enraged to destroy them. He hoped to be able to circumvent God and gain the reward promised by Balak (Mi. 6.[5]; Jg. 11.[25]; Rev. 2.[14]). He was slain in the defeat of Midian (Nu. 31.[8]).

BALAH stands in Jo. 19.[2] for Bilhah in 1 Ch. 4.[29]. It was assigned to Simeon, and is prob. = Baalah in Judah (Jo. 15.[29]). It is not identd.

BALAK, s. of Zippor, k. of Moab, summoned Balaam; otherwise unknown.

BALANCE. The common word is môznayim, a dual, referring to the two scales. Qâneh (Is. 46.[6]), "reed" or "stalk," is prob. = zugon (Rv. 6.[5]), denoting the beam of the B. Peles (Pr. 16.[11], LXX ropē, AV. "weight," RV. "balance"; Is. 40.[12], LXX stathmos, EV. "scales") may be the beam or tongue of the B.

Balance (Ancient Egyptian)

The beam, tapering towards the ends, was suspended by a ring or cord passed through a hole in the middle, or tied round it: the scales were hung by cords fm. the ends. A "tongue" projected downwards at right angles fm. the centre of the beam. A plummet suspended fm. the same point enabled one to see when the tongue was perpendicular, and so the B. even.

It was easy to falsify the B. by slightly shifting the central adjustment, or in steadying the plummet, to incline it to one side. Values were measured by weight (Gn. 23.[16]; Ex. 22.[17]—"pay," lit. "weigh"—38.[24f.], &c.). The merchant's weights, originally stones, were carried in a bag. See Weights. "Weighing in the B." is a fig. expression for the testing of char. (Jb. 31.[6]; Dn. 5.[27]).

BALDNESS was regarded as a misfortune, if not as a disgrace, among anct. peoples. Herodotus (iii. 12) says it was very unusual in old Egp.; and mod. research confirms his observation. He thought their practice of shaving gave strength to the hair. B. was one of the disasters that befel the soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar in the long siege of Tyre (Ek. 29.[18]), owing poss. to unwonted diet and conditions.

B. caused by leprosy or ringworm, and therefore unclean, is carefully distinguished fm. nat. B. (Lv. 13.), wh. involved no ceremonial disabilities. But, unusual as B. was, and to this day is, in Pal., a cert. suspicion attached to it, and to be called "baldhead" was deep indignity (2 K. 2.[23]). Held thus in reproach, B. became the symbol of wretchedness and misery (Is. 3.[24]; Jr. 47.[5], &c.). Artificial B. was prohibited (Lv. 21.[5]), referring to the idolatrous rites of neighbouring peoples. But the Nazirite cut off his hair on completing his vow (Nu. 6.[18]; Ac. 18.[18], &c.). Well-set hair was a point of manly beauty (Is. 3.[24]). Its cutting off was a sign of mourning (Jr. 16.[6]; Ek. 27.[31]; Mi. 1.[16]), the custom herein diffg. fm. that of the Egpns. (Gn. 41.[14]). See Hair.

BALM. It is not cert. what substance is intended by the Heb. tzori, trd. "balm" by EV. (Gn. 37.[25]). Fm. its association with Gilead in Jr. 8.[22], 46.[11], it has been regarded as the product of some tree growing in Gilead, in repute as a medicine. The mastic has been suggd. This tree grows in Pal., and in the Greek islands, but not E. of the Jordan. Tristram curiously says it is "specially abundant in the woods of Gilead." He seems to have confused it with Arb. ḍaru, the terebinth. The mod. monks ident. B. with the Zuqqum. Gum made fm. the fruit, wh. is like the olive, is valued as a salve, and is largely sold to pilgrims. But in Pal. it is confined to the Jordan Valley. Prob. the B. of Scrip. was the product of the Mecca balsam, Arb. balasân, the Balsamodendron Gileadense, a native of S. Arabia. This is the tree, a root of wh., accdg. to Jewish tradition, having been brought to Solomon by the Queen of Sheba, was cultivated, and flourished greatly in the plains of Jericho (Ant. VIII. vi. 6). It was plentiful in the days of Herod the Gt. (Ant. XV. iv. 2; Pliny, N. H. XVI. xxii.). The tree has now totally disappeared fm. these parts. The gum was exuded through incisions made in the bark, and was for long a valued article of commerce.

BAMAH, "High Place"; in Ek. 20.[29] only, as a proper name. Contempt and scorn are expressed by some play upon the word B., but no satisfactory explanation has yet been offered.

BAMOTH, a place where Isr. halted on their way fm. the Arnon, between NAHALIEL and PISGAH (Nu. 21.^{19}), and near Kirjath-Huzoth. It is prob. ident. with B.-BAAL (Jo. 13.^{17}), and may be the Beth-B. fortified by Mesha (Moab. St. Inscr. l. 27). Guthe suggs. the height of Jebel 'Aṭṭârûs.

BANISHMENT. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

BANNER (ENSIGN STANDARD), a pole with some device upon it, used in Egpn. and Asyrn. armies. It is used figly. in Scrip. (SS. 2.^{4}; Ps. 60.^{4}, &c.).

BANQUET. EV. have tried to preserve the meanings of mishteh (lit. "a drinking") accdg. as it seems to indicate eating and drinking, or drinking only or chiefly. In the former case they render "feast," in the latter "banquet" (cp. Gn. 19.^{3} with Est. 5.^{4}, &c.). Banqueting-house (SS. 2.^{4}) is lit. "house of wine"; and banqueting (1 P. 4.^{3}) is "drinking," Gr. potos. The name mishteh shows that drinking was a prominent feature of old time feasts. See FEASTS. The guests were entertained by musicians and dancers.

BAPTISM, BAPTIZE. The initiatory rite of the Christian Church: it was appointed by our Lord in the Apostolic Commission (Mw. 28.^{19}), and used as such by the Apostles (Ac. 2.^{41}). Before this the Apostles had administered B. (Jn. 4.^{2}). It is not introduced as a new thing by our Lord; it is assumed as a rite having a cert. if indefinite refce. to the coming Messiah; hence John the Baptist is challenged why he baptizes, if he is neither the Messiah nor His prophetic forerunner. B. was the initiatory rite among the Essenes (WAITERS FOR THE REDEMPTION), and also was continually practised by them (BJ. II. viii. 7). It was no novelty to give bodily cleansing a sptl. meaning, e.g. the symbolical washings of the Levitical law, the interpretation of wh. was given when Ezekiel said, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you and ye shall be clean; fm. all your filthiness and fm. all your idols will I cleanse you" (Ek. 36.^{25}). If we may trust Talmudic tradition, some form of baptismal washing formed part of the ritual for the reception of a Gentile proselyte into the Jewish community. The special significance attached to this part of the ritual is worthy of notice. "The bathing in the water is to constitute a new birth, wherefore the ger ('stranger') is like a child just born" (Yeb. 48b, J. E. II. 500, cp. Jn. 3.^{5}). "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the Kdm. of God."

The Greek terms used, the verb βαπτίζω, and the nouns βάπτισμα and βαπτισμός, have an evolution worthy of consideration. The verb occurs four times in LXX, twice in the canonical books: 2 K. 5.^{14}, of Naaman; Is. 21.^{4}, symbolically of iniquity overwhelming one; twice in the Apcr.; Jth. 12.^{7} of ceremonial washing, Sr. 34. (31.)^{25} of ceremonial cleansing after contact with a dead body. The verb originally meant "to dip"; it was changed in two opposite directions; on the one hand it was intensified to mean "to overwhelm" (see Diod. Sic. XV. 80, Polyb. I. li. 6; VIII. viii. 4; so also Jos. BJ. IV. iii. 3). In Is. 21.^{4} the verb has this force, "iniquity overwhelms me." At the same time it is softened to simple sprinkling in Sr. 34. (31.)^{25}. The received trn. of this verse does not bring out its precise meaning; it ought to be rendered "He that is baptized fm. a corpse—cleansed by sprinkling fm. contact with a corpse—if he touch it again, what profit is his washing?" i.e. the washing that accdg. to Nu. 19.$^{11-21}$ followed the cleansing sprinkling. Having had the "water of separation" sprinkled upon him, and thus the uncleanness due to his contact with a corpse having been removed, if a man again touch a corpse, his going on to "bathe himself in clean water" wd. be valueless. Only in this way can we preserve the force of the contrast between βαπτιζόμενος and λουτρῷ; a distinction wh. we find in the LXX of Nu. 19.^{19}. The passage in Jth. really confirms this. (1) However reckless the writer of that romance may be he seems to have known something of Pal., and cd. not fail to know that in the hill country between the plain of Esdraelon and Jerusalem there is no "fountain" (πηγή) large enough for a woman to immerse herself in it. (2) No writer cd. mean to represent a general so mad with love that he wd. allow even the obj. of his affection to contaminate by bathing in it one of the fountains "by" (really "in") the camp. (3) The purification of the Jews did not mean "immersion" but "affusion." Before leaving this we note the fact that when βαπτίζω means "overwhelm" it is totally divorced fm. all idea of submergence in a flood, as may be seen in the passage cited fm. Jos. In that passage the historian declares that the influx into Jrs. of the fanatics from the country districts ultimately destroyed (ἐβάπτισαν) the city. The nouns are not found in the LXX : the NT. usage is that βάπτισμα is used of the Christian rite (Rm. 6.[4]) of the B. of John (Mk. 1.[4]), and metaphorically of calamities (Mw. 20.[22]; Mk. 10.[38]). The use of βαπτισμός is more gen.; it is doubtful if it is ever used of Christian B.; it is used of the Jewish ceremonial washings.

It is difficult to fix precisely the significance of the B. of John. That it was not equivalent to the B. of Christ is clear fm. Ac. 18.[25], 19.[3]. Yet if we press Jn. 4.[2], the Apostles must either have been themselves unbaptized, or had only received the B. of John. John's B. was a B. of repentance in the expectation of the coming of the Messiah, in whom they should believe (Ac. 19.[4]); and it is significant of the unrest that pervaded the Isr. of the dispersion in the time of our Lord, that a doctrine so vague shd. have disciples in Alexandria and Ephesus. The B. administered by the Apostles before Christ's resurrection must have had many points of analogy with that of John.

Those who administered the Sacrament of Christian B. seem genly. to have been Church officials, as the Apostles and Philip. Yet Ananias, who baptized Paul, does not appear to have held any office. On the other hand the Apostle Paul does not regard "baptizing" as among his highest duties (1 Cor. 1.[14]); he left it to the Church officials whom he had already ordained. When B. assumed something of a magical meaning, and the rite itself was regarded as necessary to salvation, any believer was held, in cases of emergency, to be able to administer it effectually.

In the earliest days as at present in our Foreign Mission Stations, the great mass of those baptized were adults. That there is no record of the B. of infants is of even less value than the argumentum e silentio is ordinarily. Fm. the analogy of our Modern Missions we see how much more importance is given to the B. of an adult convert than to the B. of an infant of parents already Christian. Fm. the way in wh. the then world, Jew and Gentile alike, with the exception of a few philosophers, regarded the child as merged in the family, and the family summed up in its head, there wd. have been need of a positive enactment to have prevented the rise of the belief wh. lies at the root of infant B. and wd. natly. have produced it. The fact that again and again whole households are baptized, in the light of what we just adverted to, renders the conclusion prob. that there were children baptized in some of these cases. This view is strengthened when we recall the fact that Paul in Col. 2.[11, 12], shows that he regards circumcision as superseded by B.; that circumcision was administered to infants wd. seem to have made it incumbent on Paul to warn believers agst. falling into the nat. mistake of thinking that B., like circumcision, was applicable to the children of the faithful. If faith is necessary to B., it is necessary to holiness, yet the Apostle Paúl declares those children to be holy only one of whose parents was a believer (1 Cor. 7.[14]). The meaning of our Lord's declaration when He took the little children into His arms and blessed them, that "of such is the Kdm. of Heaven," does not seem to be exhausted when it is regarded as a statement of the spt. that ought to animate His followers. The testimony of Christian antiquity is, when properly understood, to the same effect. Of great value is the testimony of Tertullian, as he personally thought it hazardous. Could he have maintained with any show of probability that infant baptism was an innovation, he cert. wd. have done so, with all the vigour of his fiery rhetoric. Origen declares infant baptism to be a practice received fm. the Apostles. Other testimony mt. be brought forward, but what we have advanced may suffice. The undeniable rarity of any notice in the first Christian centuries of men of mark in the Church having been baptized in infancy, may be explained partly by the fact above alluded to, that the whole Church was a mission to the heathen, so converts were more noticed than those who had grown up in the faith, who wd. necessarily be few. Another influence was at work wh. tended to increase this rarity, the idea that there was a very special heinousness in sins committed after baptism; this led many, as the Emperor Constantine, to delay baptism till death. A similar practice obtains among the Scotch Highlanders in regard to Communion. It was the nat. result of such a view that infant baptisms would tend to diminish.

The mode in wh. B. was administered is not by any means so clear as some wd. have us believe. Although the balance of opinion is in favour of immersion, there are a number of difficulties in the way of accepting it. If we take the cases of B. recorded, while there are none that necessitate total immersion, there are several in wh. it seems almost imposs. to imagine this as the mode followed. The first and most obvious case is the B. of the "three thousand," followed by that of the "five thousand" in Jrs. after the dry season had begun; in a city whose whole water supply was derived fm. cisterns. The case of the Ethiopian eunuch: on the way S. from Hebron to Gaza, there wd. only be shallow pools where springs bubbled up; nowhere a fountain like that at Tell el-Ḳāḏy in wh. a grown man cd. be immersed. It seems, to say the least, extremely unlikely that there wd. be a plunge bath in the house of the Philippian jailer. As will be seen in the article BATHE the ancts. rarely bathed by plunging into water ; it was more frequently by affusion : one bathed by pouring water on oneself, or having it poured over one by an attendant. Another thing wh. may be advanced is the way B., e.g. that of our Lord, is represented in anct. pictures. He is shown standing up to the knees in water, while John pours the water on His head (see Didache 7). It is a mistaken idea that St. Paul's comparison of B. to burial implies any external resemblance between the processes. Jewish burial in Pal. was in caves nat. or artificial, in wh. there were either shelves or short, small tunnels ; in either case there was no resemblance to immersion. In the Catacombs we see that the Christian ideas of BURIAL were akin to the Jewish. The real ground of the fig. lay in the fact that βαπτίζω had, besides its ceremonial meaning, the signification of " utter destruction." By B. the past sinful life is utterly destroyed, and the believer is born to a new life. It is a misrepresentation to call the common mode in wh. B. is administered " sprinkling " ; it is really " affusion " attenuated to a symbol ; just as in the " Lord's Supper " a full meal, the principal meal of the day, becomes merely a crumb of bread and a sip of wine. One sacrament has become merely symbolic, without diminishing its sptl. validity : may it not be so also with the other ? (Clem. F. Rogers, Baptism and Christian Archæology, Oxford, 1903).

Unquestionably in the early Church B. was regarded as equivalent to Regeneration (REGENERATION). The various aspects of this will be discussed below ; meantime we note again that, in the admission of the heathen proselyte to the Jewish Church, B. was the symbol of birth. Our Lord's words as recorded in Jn. 3.[5], " Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the Kdm. of God," gave a certain plausibility to the view above indicated ; the refce. in our Lord's statement is really to the Jewish proselyte B., but transferred to the Christian ; the proselyte entered by faith into the Commonwealth of Isr., so by faith only cd. he enter the holier Commonwealth, the Kdm. of God. The words of the Apostle Paul in Tt. 3.[5], " He saved us by the washing of regeneration," seem to support the same idea. The Apostle's refce. is not to the physical ordinance, but to the sptl. change of wh. it is the symbol.

The Significance of B.—On the human side B. is really a vow of consecration to the service of God. In the case of adult B. the vow is taken by the person baptized himself ; in the case of children, by their parents. The ordinance has a divine side ; it is given by God to believers, administered by the Church. The Protestant doctrine may be stated in the words of Turrettin, " B. is a sacrament in wh., by the external sprinkling and cleansing, there is declared and sealed to believers their internal absolution, alike the remission of sins and sanctification through the blood and Spirit of Christ." It is assumed in this that in the case of infants the faith of the parents is taken for that of the children. The Anglican doctrine is that " B. is actual internal purification " (Plummer, HDB.). " B. is called ' washing of regeneration,' not because it symbolises it, but because it effects it " (ib.).

" B. with the Holy Ghost and with fire " is declared by John the Baptist to be the characteristic of the B. of Him whose forerunner he was (Lk. 3.[16]). Symbolically this was fulfilled at Pentecost ; actually throughout the whole hist. of the Church has been manifested this B. of the Holy Spirit, this endowment with the fire of zeal. " B. of blood " is an ecclesiastical phrase to denote martyrdom. It was an axiom of the Anct. Church that the B. of blood superseded the necessity for the B. with water.

Another matter that has to be considered, though briefly, is the presence of " sponsors," or to use the ordinary Anglican terminology, " godfathers and godmothers " at B. Originally, as we learn from the term (Apost. Const. viii. 32), the sponsor testified to the char. of the candidate for B. These sponsors were usly. the deacons. In regard to infants the office appears to have been instituted in times of persecution in case the parents mt. fall victims.

B. for the Dead (1 Cor. 15.[29]).—There have been many attempts to give an explanation of this passage wh. shall meet all difficulties ; none has been quite successful. If, without cataloguing the various opinions, we investigate the matter for ourselves, the first thing that meets us is the fact that the Apostle assumes a practice to be extant, a practice wh. must have quickly fallen into disuse, as the Gr. fathers do not know it as Christian. We learn fm. Lightfoot on this passage, that in the case of one dying in ceremonial uncleanness, another on his account underwent the cleansing rites. The reference here is prob. to this. Such ceremonial purification wd. be meaningless if there were no resurrection. The Apostle's appeal to the practice no more implies an approval of it than our Lord's question to the Pharisees (Mw. 12.[27]), " By whom do your children cast them out," implies approval of their methods of exorcism. There was a large Jewish community in Corinth, and among the Christians a considerable Judaising element ; such a practice wd. be perfectly well known when the Apostle was writing and mt. have been imitated by the Judaisers. Within half a cent. the breach between the Jews and the Christians became absolute ; hence Chrysostom and the other Gr. fathers mt. well be ignorant of it. The Marcionite practice of baptizing a living believer for one who died as a catechumen, may have arisen fm. this passage.

BARABBAS is the Gr. form of Aram. Bar-Abba =" s. of the Teacher." B. was imprisoned for insurrection made in the city and for murder (Lk. 23.19ff.). John calls him a "robber," and this agrees with the char. Jos. gives to the revolutionaries of that time (BJ. IV. iii. 4). When Pilate offered, accdg. to custom, to release to the Jews a prisoner at the Feast, they vociferously preferred this murderer and robber to Jesus. It is poss. that the two who were crucified with Jesus were associates of B. in the insurrection (Mk. 15.7). In Mw. 27.16-17, cert. cursives, the Armenian V., and copies of the Jrs. Syriac, give to B. also the name of Jesus. This is prob. due to a scribal error.

BARAK, "lightning" (cp. Carthaginian Barca), s. of Abinoam of Kedesh-naphtali, also in Jg. 5.15, connected with Issachar, was roused by Deborah (Jg. 4.6), and poss. by his own suffering (5.12), to assemble the N. tribes agst. the Can. oppressors of Isr. His forces gathered on Mt. Tabor, Deborah being with him. During a fierce storm that beat in the faces of the enemy, he swept down and practically annihilated the army of Sisera, in the soft soil of Esdraelon, along the banks of the Kishon. He is named joint author of the song of triumph composed on the occasion (Jg. 5.1).

BARBARIAN. The Greeks divided mankind into Gr. and B., i.e. speakers of Gr. and speakers of other tongues. In this sense the inhabitants of Malta are called B. (Ac. 28.4). So in 1 Cor. 14.11, a B. is one who speaks an unknown lang. The convention was accepted as implying no reproach. Paul (Rm. 1.14) and Philo (Life of Moses, 5) class Jews as B. The Romans at first acquiesced in the custom, but discarded it as other ideas became associated with the word. The Greeks, however, called them B. till the end of the E. Empire.

BAR-JESUS. See ELYMAS.

BARLEY is extensively grown in Pal. It is the staple food for horses. B. and wheat meal mingled form a not uncommon article of diet (2 Ch. 2.10). Only the very poor use B. meal alone (Jg. 7.13; Jn. 6.9, 13). The use of B. meal for the jealousy offering (Nu. 5.15), and of B. to purchase the adulteress (Ho. 3.2), may indicate a cert. contempt for the persons concerned. For sowing, &c., see AGRICULTURE.

BARN. See GARNER.

BARNABAS ("s. of consolation" or "exhortation," Ac. 4.36), otherwise Joses, a Levite of Cyprus. Eusebius (HE. I. 12) says B. was one of the "Seventy." B. introduced the newly converted PAUL to the Apostles at Jrs. (Ac. 9.27); later he induced Paul to leave Tarsus, whither he had retired, and come to Antioch (Ac. 11.25). They went as deputies fm. Antioch to Jrs. (Ac. 11.30, 12.25). Soon after their return, set apart by the Church, they started on a missionary journey to Cyprus and Asia Minor (Ac. 13.2–14.20). When they had completed this they were sent again to Jrs. to consult the Apostles as to status of the Gentile converts (Ac. 14.26–15.22). On their return to Antioch Paul proposed that they shd. revisit the churches they had founded, but as B. wished to take John Mark, his nephew, whom Paul cd. not depend on, they separated. With the exception of a passing refce. in 1 Cor. 9.6, B. disappears fm. NT. Tradition says he was martyred in Cyprus, whither he departed with his nephew after leaving Paul; they show his grave not far fm. the ruins of Salamis. Other traditions take him to Milan, Rome, and Alexandria. To him among others is attributed the "Epistle to the Hebrews." The anct. writing called the "Epistle of Barnabas" is universally regarded as pseudonymous.

BARTHOLOMEW, "s. of Tolmai," i.e. "of Ptolemy." John omits B. fm. his list of Apostles, and gives Nathanael in his place Nathanael does not appear in the Synoptics, wh. always name Philip and B. together. In John's record Philip brings Nath. to Jesus. B. is therefore prob. = Nath. There are traditions of B. preaching in Armenia, and also in India, where he was tortured by flaying; but we have no sure kge. of his life.

BARTIMÆUS (Mk. 10.46), "s. of Timæus," the blind man healed by our Lord after leaving Jericho. Luke (18.35ff.) mentions also one man, but places the miracle before entering the city. Matthew speaks of two, but agrees with Mark as to the place. B. may be named because he was the more energetic and insistent, and acted as spokesman. For discussion of the variations in the nars. see Trench, Miracles.

BARUCH, s. of Neriah. The friend of Jeremiah (Jr. 32.12), and his amanuensis (36.4); he read the prophecy before JEHOIAKIM, and shared with Jeremiah the risk of imprisonment (v. 26). Accdg. to Jos. (Ant. X. ix. 1), B. was in the end imprisoned with his friend and was released at the capture of Jrs. by Nebuchadnezzar. After the murder of Gedaliah, B. was accused of having suborned Jeremiah to prophesy agst. the remnant of Judah going down to Egp. The after hist. of B. is unknown. For "The Prophecy of Baruch," see BARUCH, APOCRYPHA.

There is an Apc. that claims B.'s name. It was found in a Syriac trn. by Ceriani in the Ambrosian Library, Milan, and published by him in 1866; its prob. date is B.C. 59. Another work of a later date appeared entitled "The Rest of Baruch"; it prob. was composed in the 2nd cent.

BARZILLAI, "of iron," a rich man of Rogelim in Gilead, who succoured David with great generosity when fleeing fm. Absalom (2 S. 17.27), and conducted him back over Jordan when the rebellion was crushed. He excused himself, on the ground of old age, fm. going with the k. to begin a new life in the city, but committed his s. Chimcham to David's favour (2 S. 19.31ff.). David commended the children of B. to the kindness of Solomon (1 K. 2.7); but his descts. seem later to have fallen on evil days (Ez. 2.61ff.).

BASHAN, often with the article in Heb. hab-bashan, "the B." It corrspds. in meaning prob. with el-Bataniyeh, "wheat land," applied to a district N. of Jebel ed-Druze. While it has a narrower significance, B. seems to have denoted genly. the land E. of Jordan, stretching fm. the border of Gilead to the roots of Hermon. The boundaries are given in some detail, but with our present kge. we cannot certly. follow them. Geshur and Maacath seem to be given as the W. border of B. (Jo. 12.[4ff.], 13.[11ff.]), but if Golan (Dt. 4.[43]) were in the district that bears its name to-day—the Jaulān—B. must have reached to the brink of the Jordan Valley. This is the boundary indicated in Dt. 4.[47]. In favour of this is Dr. G. A. Smith's attractive suggn. that Dan was at Bāniās, on the slope of the mountain, wh., if true, gives an intelligible sense to the saying, "Dan . . . leapeth forth fm. B." (Dt. 33.[22]). Again, the Mt. or Mts. of B. (Ps. 68.[15, 16]) can hardly be Mt. Hermon, wh. is never certly. ascribed to B. "Mt." or "Mts. of protuberances" or "humps," mt. well describe the uplands of el-Jaulān, as seen fm. the heights of Naphtali, the many great mounds that mark extinct volcanoes giving a "humpy" appearance to the high plateau. On the other hand "Mt. of God" does not so aptly apply to these wide uplands. The only alternative seems to be to agree with Wetzstein (Das batanäische Giebelgeberge, 1884; KB. s.v.), and recognise the Mt. of B. in Jebel ed-Druze, with its humplike summits.

If B. lay E. of Geshur and Maacath, then these unconquered peoples lit. "dwelt in the midst of Isr." (Jo. 13.[13]).

The desert S. of Bozrah, and the N. border of Gilead, formed the S. boundary of B. It reached E. to Salecah, the mod. Salkhad, on the ridge of Jebel ed-Druze; and prob. included lands to the N. corrspdg. to the mod. Hauran. Its chief cities seem to have been Ashtaroth, Edrei, Golan, and Salecah; but it was strong in fenced cities: under the numerous ruins that stud the country the remains of these anct. strongholds may yet be found.

It was ruled by the giant Og, but his empire ended with the victory of Isr. at Edrei (Jo. 13.[11f.], &c.). It was the scene of the mighty deeds of the warrior Jair (Dt. 3.[14], &c.). It was allotted to the half tribe of Manasseh (Jo. 13.[30], 17.[1], &c.). It was conquered by Hazael the Syrian (2 K. 10.[33]), but recovered by Jeroboam II. (2 K. 14.[25]). In later times it passed into the hands of the Nabatæans: then it became part of the dominion of Herod the Gt., and was ruled in succession by Herod, Philip, and Agrippa II.

The lion long since finally disappeared, but the leopard, nimr, is still met with at times (Dt. 33.[22]; SS. 4.[8]). The rams of B., but notably the cattle, were famous, and are taken to represent blatant and brutal strength (Ps. 22.[12]; Ek. 39.[18]; Am. 4.[1]). B. is frequently named with Carmel, as excellent pasture land, but nothing is said of its crops, wh. are such an important feature to-day. The reddish brown soil, disintegrated lava fm. the surrounding craters, yields abundantly, esp. in en-Nuqrah, "the hollow." On the E. slopes the oak, esteemed for oars by Tyrian sailors (Ek. 27.[6]), still flourishes.

(3) Dūdh, used for carrying genly. (Jr. 24.[1]), prob. like that used in Pal. now, not unlike that in wh. carpenters with us carry their tools. (4) Kophinus (NT.), used with refce. to fragments taken up after the feeding of the 5000 (Mt. 14.[20]; Mk. 6.[43]; Lk. 9.[17]). (5) Spuris, the ordinary provision B. used in refce. to the feeding the 4000 (Mt. 15.[37]; Mk. 8.[8]); in Ac. 9.[25], the means of Paul's escape; in 2 Col. 11.[33] sargan is the word. In Am. 8.[1, 2], klūbh is used for a fruit B., but this word in Jr. 5.[27] is "a bird-cage."

BASON in the OT. represents several Heb. words, prob. names of difft. forms or sizes of the same utensil. Although a great many metal and pottery vessels have come down to us, there is no means of fixing special names. B. (aggānōth) were used by Moses in making the Covenant (Ex. 24.[6]). Hiram made B. (mizrāqōth) "of brass" (1 K. 7.[45]), "a hundred B. (mizrāqīm) of gold" for Solomon (2 Ch. 4.[8]). The same word is used (Am. 6.[6]) of drinking vessels, but trd. "Bowls." Our Lord used a B. (νιπτήρ) in wh. to wash the disciples' feet (Jn. 13.[5]).

BAT (Heb. 'atalleph, supposed by Ges. to mean "night-flier"). It is the only class of mammals endowed with the power of flying; hence regarded by the ancts. as a bird (Aristoph. Aves, 1564; Plin. H.N. 10.[61]). In Lv. 11.[19], Dt. 14.[18], the B. is reckoned a bird, and unclean. The B. is used as the symbol of utter desolation (Is. 2.[20]), "A man will cast his idols to the moles and to the bats." In Lv. and Dt. Luther renders "schwalbe," but without any justification; in Is. he trs. "fliedermaus." There are several species of B. in Pal.; it is very common.

BATH, BATHE (Heb. rāḥatz). Although to B. is a luxury in such a climate as that of Pal., it may be doubted whether we have in Scrip. any instance of an Isr. bathing for any but ceremonial reasons, or for the sake of cleanliness. It is prob. that the Isr. bathed by affusion as did the Egyptians. In Greece the practice appears to have been for a person to dash water over himself fm. a large basin. Fm. Jn. 13.[10] it may be deduced that the custom of washing the whole body daily was common. The Essenes looked upon this daily B. as a religious act. See Waiters for the Redemption.

BATH-RABBIM. See Heshbon.

BATHSHEBA (1 Ch. 3.[5], Bathshua), dr. of Eliam (2 S. 11.[3]), or of Ammiel (1 Ch. 3.[5]), prob. granddr. of Ahithophel (2 S. 23.[34]), w. of Uriah the Hittite, one of David's warriors. She appears to have been a woman shrewd, ambitious, and unscrupulous. Prob. discontented with her lowly station, in her husband's absence at the siege of Rabbah she sought successfully to ensnare the k., and became his mistress. It was easy to frustrate David's design in bringing Uriah home. If she did not sugg. the scheme, when that soldier returned to the front bearing his own death sentence, we may be sure it had the good wishes of his faithless w. The k's. chivalry cd. not leave her to the fate of an adulteress, so she became his w. Having gained a footing in the palace, she rapidly acquired a powerful influence over the monarch, and secured the succession to the throne for her own s., Solomon, excluding older sons by other wives. Adonijah's rash enterprise was almost fatal to her hopes; but with the help of Nathan, she proved equal to the occasion. She must have known the necessary consequence to Adonijah of his request for Abishag. She encouraged his suit, and so furnished Solomon with a pretext to remove a dangerous rival. We may perhaps trace to her influence, while Solomon was still a youth, the fate of Joab and Shimei.

B. disappears suddenly from hist. Had her s. grown weary of her masterful ways?

Some think that Ahithophel turned agst. David because of his granddr's. betrayal. It is not likely. An oriental wd. not be too nice about the manner of his kinswoman's advancement.

BATTERING-RAM (Heb. kar, "ram"). The principal engine for beating down the walls of a fortress in anct. days. It consisted of a long, heavy beam of wood, latterly headed with iron. Those that worked the B. were protected by a roof; sometimes working in the basement of a Tower moved to the walls on wheels. Battering-rams were used by the Asyrs. (Ek. 4.[2], 21.[22]).

BATTLE. An action in War in wh. the main part of the opposing armies were engaged. There does not seem to have been any manœuvring in the B. of OT. times. The opposing forces, drawn up in line of battle, after a discharge of arrows and javelins, advanced against each other and fought man to man; panic seems usly. to have decided the result. Ambushes seem the nearest approach to manœuvres used.

BATTLE-AXE, BATTLE-BOW. See Weapons.

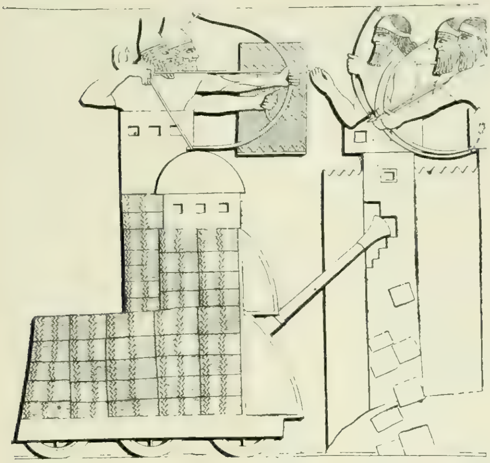
BATTLEMENT (Heb. ma'aqeh), a parapet ordained to be erected round the edge of the flat roof of a House to prevent one accidentally falling off

(Dt. 22.[8]). B. was also a part of the fortification of a wall (nĕṭīshōth, Jr. 5.[10]). Ges. renders here "tendrils," RV. "branches."



BATTERING-RAM

BAY (Heb. amutzīm), a COLOUR, reddish brown (Zc. 6.[3, 7]), ascribed to horses.

BAY TREE (Ps. 37.[35], AV.) is a mistrn. RV. gives correctly "tree in its native soil." If, however, some green and spreading tree was in the Psalmist's mind, the sweet bay, Laurus nobilis, a beautiful evergreen, growing plentifully on Carmel and Gilead, wd. be no unfamiliar sight.

BDELLIUM, bedōlaḥ (Gn. 2.[12], LXX, anthrax; Nu. 11.[7], LXX, krustallos), a product of the land of Havilah, to wh. manna was likened, and therefore, as Driver remarks, a well-known substance. Some think it a precious stone, others the pearl. Remembering how the ancts. valued aromatic gums, we need not hesitate to ident. B. with the Gr. bdella or bdellion, the Lat. bedellium, a transparent, yellowish, wax-like substance exuded by a tree found in Arabia, Bab., India, &c.; the best coming from Arabia. Bedōlaḥ is poss. a foreign word (KB.). For authorities see Driver, Genesis, on 2.[12].

BEAM. The trn. of eight Heb. words in EV.; two of these are connected with WEAVING; 'ereg, trd. also "shuttle," manor, "the cross-piece of the frame of a loom." In six cases B. means various portions of the carpentry of a HOUSE. In Mt. 7.[3], Lk. 6.[41], δοκός means a B. of wood, though the word may apply to stone (Diod. Sic. II. 36, δ. λίθιναι).

BEANS (Heb. pōl = Arb. fūl) have been cultivated in Pal. fm. anct. times. Flowering in Jan., they are reaped in May. They fig. among the provisions given by Barzillai to David (2 S. 17.[28]). With the poor they are a frequent dish. When ground they are sometimes mingled with the meal of wh. the bread is baked (Ek. 4.[9]).

BEAR (dōbh). The Syrian B. is now restricted, so far as Syria is concerned, to the Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon. It is sometimes, though rarely, carnivorous; when it has tasted blood it becomes a terror to the shepherds fm. the havoc it works. In OT. times it seems to have been found in every part of W. Pal.

BEARD. The Egyptians shaved the face (Gn. 41.[14]), but wore artificial beards. The Jews allowed the hair to grow long on chin and upper lip. Cert. idolatrous cuttings of the hair were forbidden (Lv. 19.[27]). Only disease justified shaving (Lv. 14.[9]). To neglect the beard is a sign of grief (2 S. 19.[24]). To pluck or cut the B. is a great indignity (Is. 50.[6]; 2 S. 10.[8]). Only a madman wd. defile it (1 S. 21.[13]). The beardless meet scant respect in the East. Men swear by the B., and the suppliant seeks to touch the B. of one fm. whom he begs.

BEATING. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

BEAST. The trn. of three Heb. words in the OT. and three Gr. in the NT. Of the OT. words ḥay, "life," is any creature having life; behēmāh, primarily "an animal of the ox tribe," then extended to mean "any quadruped"; bîr occurs only in Ps. 78.[48] out of the Pent., and means "cattle." Of the NT. words zōon is the most gen., in Rv. (RV. "living creatures"), of the "four" round the throne (see REVELATION); the second, thērion, "wild beast," in Rv., of the representative of Antichrist; ktēnos, "an animal as an article of property," e.g. "a beast of burden."

BECHER. (1) S. of Benjamin (Gn. 46.[21]). (2) S. of Ephraim (1 Ch. 7.[20], Bered). Lord A. Harvey idents. those two; he thinks that as the slaughter of the Ephraimites (1 Ch. 7.[21]) had rendered it necessary that the drs. of Ephraim shd. seek husbands in other tribes, B. shd. be regarded as the s.-in-law of Ephraim and the s. of Benjamin.

BED, BED-CHAMBER. The sleeping arrangements of the Hebs. were very simple. It was not their custom to undress, and as among their successors in Pal. to-day, a mattress stuffed with cotton, hair, or even straw, spread on a rush mat on the floor, served as a bed for the great majority. The covering in winter was a quilt, but in warmer weather a special covering cd. be dispensed with. The pillow was a cushion stuffed like the mattress. It was therefore easy to carry a man on his bed, and also for a man to carry his bed (1 S. 19.[15]; Lk. 5.[18ff.]). The dīwān or raised platform round three sides of the room, two to three feet wide, and covered with cushions, used as a sofa in the daytime, is often slept upon. This is prob. true also of anct. times. Occasionally the dīwān is built of stones and mortar, but it is often just a frame of wood wh. can be moved at will. Among the better classes much time is spent in ornamenting this frame, and in embroidering the covers of mattresses and cushions. The common people have no separate bed-chamber. The living room serves all purposes. In summer the Bs. are spread on the roof, or in the court. Many who sleep outside have only the outer hair cloak for a wrap, and a stone for a pillow. But fm. of old, in bldgs. of any pretensions, the sleeping apartments have been as private as poss. (Ex. 8.[3]; 2 K. 6.[12], &c.). "Bedstead" appears only once in EV. (Dt. 3.[11]), but the meaning is uncert. Bedsteads, however, are figd. on the Egpn. and Bab. monuments, so we may infer that they were not unknown to the Hebs.

BEDAN. (1) A judge (1 S. 12.[11]) not named in Jg. LXX and Psh. take it as an error for Barak, a view now commonly accepted. The Rabbis sugg. "Ben Dan" = Samson. (2) S. of Ulam (1 Ch. 7.[17]).

BEE (Heb. dĕbôrâh, Arb. naḥal), a common hymenopterous insect frequent in Pal. The B. of Pal. (apis fasciata) is smaller than the ordinary hive-bee, lighter in colour, and its sting is not so strong. Now the B. is found in Pal. not only wild but also domesticated; but in Bible times there is no trace of anything but the wild bee. The nat. of its flowers, so many of them being honey-bearing, and the abundant limestone rocks with their frequent caves, make Pal. a country peculiarly suited to the B.; hence honey was a staple export (Ek. 27.[17]). Like all inhabitants of the nearer East the Isrs. delighted in sweets; hence to declare anything "sweeter than honey" is to call it supremely pleasant (Ps. 19.[10]). It appears to have been eaten alone (Pr. 24.[13]); at the same time it seems always to have been wild honey that was thought of (Ps. 81.[16]).

The fierce way in which the B. swarms out agst. any intruder was the characteristic most noted (Ps. 118.[12]). As the result of the B. not being domesticated the feature of B. life most prominent to Western nations, its diligence, does not seem to have been observed by the Isrs. That a swarm of Bs. should settle in the carcase of a lion does not seem extraordinary to any one who has seen how quickly in Pal. even the carcase of a camel is reduced to a dry skeleton.

BEELZEBUB (Mw. 10.[25], &c.). Although RV. retains this spelling, relegating with AV. "Beelzebul" to the margin, the latter is certly. correct. He appears as the "prince of devils." He was clearly a familiar fig. in the popular angelology of the time. Some think he is the old god of Ekron (2 K. 1.[2]), the latter part of his name transformed in contempt, so that he becomes "god of the dunghill." Of this there is no proof, and everything about him is wrapped in obscurity. See Baal-Zebub.

BEER. (1) A place where Isr. halted N. of Arnon, and the digging of a well was enshrined in one of the oldest Heb. songs (Nu. 21.[16ff.]). It may be = Beer-Elim. The Targumists make this the 1st appearance of the water that followed the people in their desert wanderings (cp. 1 Cor. 10.[4]). It was given for Miriam's sake, because she had guarded the infant Moses. At her death it disappeared, and thenceforward had always to be summoned by special act; e.g. smiting the rock at Kadesh, and digging here. "Miriam's well" was finally located in the Sea of Galilee, and is now shown between the city and the baths (see Driver, Expositor, vol. ix. 1889, 15ff.). (2) The town to wh. Jotham fled (Jg. 9.[21]), not identd.

BEER-ELIM, "Well of the mighty," on the border of Moab, prob. = Beer (1).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI, "Well of the Living One who sees me" (Gn. 16.[14], &c.), where God arrested Hagar in her flight fm. Sarah, and Isaac sojourned in later days; on the way to Shur. It may be the mod. 'Ain Muweileh, c. 50 miles S. of Beersheba (see PEFQ. 1871, 21f.; Driver, Genesis, in loc.).

BEERÔTH, one of the cities the inhabitants of wh. deceived Joshua (9.[17]), in Benjamin (18.[25]). The murderers of Ishbosheth were Beerothites (2 S. 4.[2]). The name appears in Ez. 2.[25], Ne. 7.[29]. It is prob. el-Bîreh, the first night's resting-place of caravans going N. fm. Jrs.; the traditional place where Jesus was missed (Lk. 2.[43]).

BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN, a halting place of Isr. in the desert, not identd., prob. on the border of Seir or Edom (Dt. 10.[6]; Nu. 33.[31]).

BEERSHEBA, the modern Bîr es Saba', "Well of the Seven" (Gn. 21.[31]), or "of Swearing" (26.[33]). The two explanations are prob. the same, for the Heb. verb "to swear" means really "to pledge oneself in some way by seven sacred things" (cp. Herodotus, iii. 8; Robertson Smith, RS.[2], 181f.). Driver (Genesis on 21.[31]) concludes that the refce. is to the seven wells.

B. lies fully 27 miles S.W. of Hebron. Two large wells are on the N. bank of Wâdy es-Saba', one of them 12½ ft. in diameter, and between 40 and 50 ft. deep, to the surface of the water. It is locally connected with Abraham. In the bed of the valley, at some distance from these, are five less important wells. Although now desolate, the ruins around prove it to have been once a populous district. The place has associations with Abraham (Gn. 21.[22f]), Isaac (26.[25f.]), and Jacob (28., 46.[1]). As the most important outpost to the S., it came to be spoken of as the S. limit of Isr. ("Dan. to B."). It is mentioned in connection with Samuel's sons (1 S. 8.[2]), Joab's census (2 S. 24.[7]; 1 Ch. 21.[2]), and Elijah's journey to Sinai (1 K. 19.[3]). It was the birthplace of Zibia, mr. of Joash (2 K. 12.[1]; 2 Ch. 24.[1]). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[30]). Amos refers to some heathen ritual connected with B. (5.[5], 8.[14]).

BEESHTERAH. See Ashtaroth.

BEETLE (Heb. ḥargol, Lv. 11.[22], "the leaper"). It is one of the insects that may be eaten; the creatures it is associated with, and the char. by wh. they are to be recognised, prove B. to be a mistrn.

RV. "cricket" is better. Though B. are numerous in Pal., none of them progress by leaping.

BEHEADING. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

BEHEMOTH (in form pl. of Heb. behēmāh; Ges. says it represents the Egpn. p-ehe-môout, "the ox of the river"). An animal described poetically in Jb. 40.[15-24], the hippopotamus, a pachyderm, restricted to African rivers. Described incorrectly by Herod. ii. 71. In the Jewish Haggada B. occupies a secondary place to LEVIATHAN, but shares with it the distinction of supplying fm. its flesh, food for the Saints at the Messianic feast. These two great beasts are to kill each other. They are referred to in Apc. Bar. 29, as reserved as food for the Saints, in the days of the Messiah.

BEHEMOTH (Egyptians Hunting)

BEKAH, half a shekel (Ex. 38.[26]). See MONEY.

BEL. The original gen. name for deity, latterly identd. with Marduk (BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA).

BELA. (1) = ZOAR. (2) S. of Beor (to be distinguished from BALAK, s. of Beor), who reigned over Moab in Dinhabah (Gn. 36.[32]), a city E. of Jordan, not identd. (see PEFQ. 1902, 10ff.). (3) S. of Benjamin (Gn. 46.[21], &c.). (4) A Reubenite, s. of AZAZ (1 Ch. 5.[8f.]).

BELIAL (Bĕlîya'al), means primarily "worthlessness," usually connected with "man of," or "s. of" (1 S. 25.[25]; Jg. 19.[22]). In the OT. B. is not a proper name, only appellative. In the NT. it becomes a personal name in the changed form of Beliar; this change is due to rough Syr. pronunciation; later, as Syr. had transferred ἀήρ from Gr., the second element in the name was supposed to mean "air," and it is rendered the "Lord of the Air" (Eph. 2.[2]). In Apocalyptic Lit. = SATAN, e.g. Asc. Is.

BELL. In OT. only on High Priest's robe (Ex. 28.[33]). In Zc. 14.[20] the word shd. be rendered with LXX "Bridles."

BELLOWS, once only mentioned in Scrip. in connection with the smelting of lead (Jr. 6.[29]). These prob. resembled the B. figured in Wilkinson's AE. II. 312; a leather bag fitted into a wooden frame, with a pipe, metal-tipped, to carry the wind to the fire. A man stood with one under each foot, pressing them down alternately, pulling up the exhausted skin with a string held in the hand.

BELSHAZZAR. Accdg. to Dn. 5.[30] the last k. of Babylon; he claims Nebuchadnezzar as his fr. (Dn. 5.[13]); in Baruch he is declared associated with Nebuchadnezzar on his throne (Ba. 1.[12]). Accdg. to MT., B. makes a great "feast for a thousand of his lords," in the course of wh. a writing appears on the wall wh. is interpreted to mean his overthrow, "that night was B., k. of the Chaldeans, slain." The act. in LXX (Chigi) differs fm. MT. in many points, most markedly in not asserting that B. died the night of the feast. It was thought at one time that B. was unhistorical; Berosus did not mention B., but declared the last k. of Babylon to have been Nabunahid. The device adopted by Jos. to maintain the historical existence of B. was to ident. him with Nabunahid; others (Niebuhr) held B. to be another name of EVIL-MERODACH. It has been found, however, that B. was the name of the eldest s. of Nabunahid, and that fm. the 7th to the 11th yrs. of his fr.'s reign he had to fulfil the functions of kingship. That Nebuchadnezzar is called the fr. of B. is paralleled by Shalmaneser's calling Jehu the s. of Omri. B. appears to have been a gallant soldier; so long as he held the reins Cyrus did not invade Babylonia. There is nobility in his treatment of Daniel wh. is apt to be forgotten; although Daniel had interpreted the writing on the wall to mean judgment on him, he did not because of this, bate one jot of the reward he had promised. Dr. Pinches (SDB.) computes that he wd. be 57 yrs. of age at his death.

BELTESHAZZAR. The Bab. name of Daniel accdg. to MT. All the more anct. VV., i.e. LXX, Theod., Pesh., Vulg., have the same trltn. of B. and Belshazzar. The motive that led the Scribes to change Moses (Moshe) into Manasseh, in Jg. 18.[30], has induced them to insert " ṭ," to make a diffce. between the name of the prophet and that of the k. All arguments agst. the authenticity of Dn. based on Dn. 4.[8], MT., are worthless.

BENAIAH. (1) S. of Jehoiada of Kabzeel in Judah, one of David's mighty men, whose deeds are recorded in 2 S. 23.[20ff.] He was "captain of the guard." He remained faithful in Adonijah's rebellion, and assisted at the coronation of Solomon. By his hand Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei were executed (1 K. 2.[25, 29ff., 46]). (2) B. of Pirathon (2 S. 23.[30]; 1 Ch. 11.[31]). Men of this name are mentioned (1 Ch. 15.[18, 24]; 2 Ch. 20.[14], 31.[13], &c.).

BEN-AMMI, s. of Lot's younger dr., and ancestor of the Ammonites (Gn. 19.[38]). The LXX and Vlg. insert "Ammon," making B. "the s. of my people," a phrase explanatory of the name; this is evidently an afterthought. Delitzsch explains Ammon as a patronymic fm. B. While the kindred people of Moab are always named simply by the name of their ancestor, the Ammonites are genly. called "bĕnē Ammon."

BENE BERAK (Jo. 19.[45]), a town in Dan E. of Jaffa, now Ibn Ibrâq.

BENEFACTOR, Gr. Euergetês, the title distinguishing Ptolemy III. and Ptolemy IX., ks. of Egp., B.C. 247–222 and B.C. 147–117 respectively.

BENHADAD, the name of three of the ks. of Damascus (Syria). In Asyrn. B. appears as Bar-Hadad (Sayce, HBD.). B. means, "s. of the god Hadad." (1) s. of Tab-Rimmon, ally of Asa (1 K. 15.[18]). (2) S. and successor of (1). He warred with Ahab, besieged Samaria unsuccessfully, and was decisively defeated at Aphek (1 K. 20). In the Asyrn. annals he is called Dad-Idri, and heads a great confederacy agst. Shalmaneser II.; Shalmaneser claims to have defeated B. and his allies at Qarqar. He is prob. the k. of Syria referred to in 2 K. 5., 6., 7., 8.; murdered by Hazael (2 K. 8.[15]). (3) S. and successor of Hazael (2 K. 13.[3, 25]).

BENJAMIN, at whose birth his mr. Rachel died, was called by her Benoni, "s. of my sorrow." Such a name mt. seem to bode evil, so Jacob called him B., "s. of my right hand." He was Jacob's youngest s., and figs. almost as the pet of his fr. and brs. In all the transactions concerning B. in Egp., these latter show up in an attractive light, very gratifying to Joseph (Gn. 42., 45.). B. was then, however, no mere child. Joseph is represented as about 40, and in Gn. 46.[21, 26], B. himself is the fr. of a family when they go down to Egp.

In the wilderness B. numbered 35,400 men of war (Nu. 1.[37]); in the plains of Moab 45,600 (Nu. 26.[41]). The position of the tribe on the march was with Ephraim and Manasseh, W. of the tent of meeting (Nu. 2.[18ff.]). Palti represented B. among the spies, and the "prince" of B. at the division of the land was Elidad, s. of Chislon (Nu. 13.[9], 34.[21]).

The boundaries of B.'s territory were: on the E. the Jordan; the N. fm. Jordan across the plain, up the mountain by way of Ai and Bethel, and down to Bethhoron the lower; the W. fm. Bethhoron to Kirjath-Jearim, and the S. fm. K.-J. to the N. shore of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, including Jrs. (Jo. 18.[11ff.], P.). "The goodness of the land" on act. of wh., accdg. to Jos. (διὰ τὴν τῆς γῆς ἀρετήν, Ant. V. i. 22), the portion was so small, applied mainly to the part in the plains of Jericho. B. thus guarded the approaches to the highlands; that by way of Ai fm. the E., and the longer and easier ascents from the W., notably that scene of glorious conflicts, by Ajalon and Bethhoron; while he sat astride the path connecting N. and S. As was nat. in the circumstances, B. produced brave and skilful soldiers, esp. archers and slingers. They seem also to have cultivated the use of both hands, wh. gave them great advantage in battle (1 Ch. 8.[40], 12.[2]; Jg. 20.[16], &c.). The left-handed Ehud was the second deliverer judge (Jg. 3.[15]).

A terrible story is told of B. in Jg. 20–21. It is not free from difficulties, but clearly reflects some horrible crime, and fearful vengeance. The first k., popularly elected, was Saul the Benjamite. His tribe shared his hostility to David, as shown by the conduct of Shimei and Sheba (2 S. 16.[5], 19.[20]). At the disruption of the kdm., Jrs. had become the capital of the Davidic house, and the S. portion of B. natly. amalgamated with Judah. Bethel, however, was in the hands of Jeroboam, and belonged finally to the N. kdm. We may suppose therefore that some part of the tribe, how great we cannot say, joined in the revolt fm. Rehoboam.

The second of the judges and the first of the ks. were Benjamites. But the glory of his career who fell on Gilboa, was eclipsed by that of another Saul, who also claimed descent from B., to whose enterprise the Gentile world owes, under God, the blessings of the gospel.

BEOR, "torch" or "burning." (1) Fr. of Bela, k. of Edom (Gn. 36.[32]; 1 Ch. 1.[43]). (2) Fr. of Balaam (Nu. 22.[5], &c.).

BERACHAH, RV. BERACAH, "blessing." (1) A Benjamite who went to David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[3]). (2) The scene of Jehoshaphat's thanksgiving for victory (2 Ch. 20.[26]) = Breikut, W. of Tekoa.

BEREA, RV. BEROEA. (1) A town in Macedonia, to wh. Paul went when driven fm. Thessalonica (Ac. 17.[10ff.]), c. 50 miles S.W. of the latter town. The Jewish community there is well spoken of. The town preserves its anct. name, Verria or Veria, and is still a place of some importance. Sopater, a companion of Paul, was a native of B. (2) = Aleppo, see Apocrypha. (3) (1 M. 9.[4]) = Beeroth.

BERED (Gn. 16.[14]), accdg. to the Targumists = Khalaṣa, called by Ptolemy Elusa, ident. with Khalaṣah, c. 15 miles S. of Beersheba.

BERI, a desct. of Asher (1 Ch. 7.[36]). Berites (Heb. Bĕrīm), poss. the clan descended fm. B. (2 S. 20.[14]). The passage in wh. Bs. are mentioned is corrupt.

It is an account of Sheba, s. of Bichri, and his rebellion;

EV. render "And he" (JOAB or Sheba) "went through all the tribes of Isr. unto ABEL and BETH-MAACAH" (here it is clear fm. v.[15]: cp. 1 K. 15.[20]: that we ought to read Abel-Beth-Maacah) "and all the B. (LXX χαῤῥί, Psh. qerîm, Vlg. viri electi, reading bâhûrîm); Driver (Sam. p. 264) suggs. Bikrim, "the clansmen of Sheba the s. of Bichri," a rdg. wh. necessitates a change of punctuation; Lord A. Harvey (Speaker's Commentary) wd. tr. BERIAH. (1) S. of ASHER (Gn. 46.[17]). (2) S. of EPHRAIM, born after the death of his brs. "Ezer and Elead, whom the men of GATH that were born in the land slew because they came down to take away their cattle" (1 Ch. 7.[21]), who received his name fm. this calamity (v. 23). He was the ancestor of JOSHUA (v. 27).

It is difficult to determine the nat. or date of the affair wh. led to the death of the brs. of B.; they may have been slain in Goshen opposing a raid of the AVIM; or they may have fallen in a raid agst. Gath. Either of these wd. assume that the event occurred during the residence of Isr. in Egp. Another theory is that we have here to do, not with persons, but with clans; and that the slaughter in question took place after the conquest of the land. Accdg. to this view, the begetting of B. was the adoption into Ephraim of a portion of the Asherite clan of B. Though it is plausible, the statements as to birth of B. are too personal, and the descent of Joshua fm. him is mentioned in too matter of fact a way for this theory to be prob.

BERNICE, BERENICE, dr. of AGRIPPA I. and Cypros, dr. of Phasael. A girl of 16, she escaped with difficulty fm. the riot on the death of her fr. (Ac. 12.[23]; Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1). She was already married to her uncle Herod of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons. On his death, while in the bloom of her beauty, in her 21st yr., she came to reside with her br. Agrippa II., who had succeeded his uncle, her h., as k. of Chalcis. In order to put a stop to scandalous charges of incest with her br., she married Polemo, k. of Pontus. Polemo, enamoured of the wealth if not of the beauty of B., consented to be circumcised. She soon left Polemo and returned to her br. at Cæsarea Philippi. It was during this second residence with Agrippa that she accompanied him in his visit of courtesy to Festus at Cæsarea Stratonis (Ac. 25.[13]), the Roman capital of the province of Judea; and so was present at the examination of PAUL. Though much his senior she so fascinated Titus, that but for the opposition of the Roman public he wd. have married her. She endeavoured in vain to protect the Jews fm. the cruelties of Florus; with no more success she strove to dissuade the Jews from making war agst. the Romans. The date of her death is not known precisely.

BEROTHAH (Ek. 47.[16]), probably = BEROTHAI (2 S. 8.[8]), wh. in 1 Ch. 18.[8] is called Cun. It lay between Damascus and Hamath. An echo of the old name is poss. heard in Wādy Brissa, in the Lebanon, not far from Kadesh on the Orontes.

BETHABARA, RV. BETHANY (Jn. 1.[28]). Origen preferred the former rdg., although nearly all the copies to wh. he had access had the latter. No Bethany E. of the Jordan has been found. Conder (PEFM. II. 39ff.) locates B. at the ford of 'Abārah, on the Jordan, above the mouth of Nahr Jalūd, near Beisān. This satisfies all the requirements of the nar. BETH-AVEN, "House of Idolatry" or "Nothingness," in Benjamin, between Bethel and Michmash, near Ai (Jo. 7.[2], 18.[12]; 1 S. 13.[5]). Hosea seems to apply this name in mockery and contempt to Bethel (4.[15], &c.).

supply of water, but the uplands around are bleak and stony. Here Abraham built an altar (Gn. 12.^{8}). On a point to the E. commanding an extensive view, including the plains of Jericho, prob. Abraham parted with Lot (Gn. 13). To Jacob's visit and experience B. owed its name (Gn. 28.$^{10ff.}$). "The place" may mean the spot where Abraham sacrificed (cp. Arb. maqām). The name at first applied to the stone set up and anointed (Gn. 28.^{22}), but natly. soon attached to the place consecrated by the divinity residing in the Pillar. The sanctuary overshadowed in importance the neighbouring town of Luz, to wh. finally its name was given. Jacob visited B. again on his return from Padan Aram (Gn. 35.$^{3ff.}$: for critical analysis and discussion, see Driver, LOT. and Genesis).

When Isr. came B. had a k. (Jo. 12.^{16}). It was allotted to Benjamin (Jo. 18.^{22}), but not occupied; and later it was captured by Ephraim (Jg. 1.^{22}; 1 Ch. 7.^{28}). The headquarters of Isr. were moved fm. Gilgal to B., and for a time the Ark rested here (Jg. 20.^{18}, LXX), and B. became a place of sacrifice (1 S. 10.^{3}). Near B. was the home of Deborah (Jg. 4.^{5}). It was one of the towns in Samuel's circuit (1 S. 7.^{16}). Here Jeroboam set up the golden calf, intending the shrine and ritual to rival those of Jrs. It was the residence of the priests of the high places, and the most important sanctuary in the N. kdm. (1 K. 12.$^{29ff.}$; Am. 7.^{13}). Fitly enough it was here that Jeroboam heard the prophet's denunciation of doom (1 K. 13.$^{1ff.}$). It was captured by Abijah, k. of Judah (2 Ch. 13.^{19}). For the prophetic attitude to B., see Jr. 48.^{13}, Am. 3.^{14}, &c. Beth Aven is the name it deserves. Despite the idolatry, however, a school of the prophets flourished here (2 K. 2.$^{2f.}$), and near by, bears avenged the insult to Elisha (2 K. 2.^{23}). The priest who taught the people imported by Asyr. resided here (2 K. 17.$^{28ff.}$). As the Samaritans place B. on Mt. Gerizim, Conder thinks the priest may have lived there (Tent Work, 251). It was occupied after the Exile (Ez. 2.^{28}, &c.), fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.^{50}), and disappears fm. hist. with its capture by Vespasian (BJ. IV. ix. 9). BETHESDA. "There is in Jrs. by the sheep gate a pool, wh. is called in Heb. Bethesda, having five porches" (Jn. 5.^{2}). We shd. read, "There are in Jrs. at the sheep-pool, wh. is called in Heb. Bezatha (or Bethzatha), five porches." Bethesda wd. be Aram. for bēth-ḥesdā, "place of compassion": Bezatha mt. be the well-known name of a quarter of Jrs. N. of the Sanctuary (see Jerusalem). The pool of this quarter wd. then be intended. But the writer may have understood the word as Aram. bēth sēthā, "place of the sheep."

The pool was prob. square, with a porch on each side, and a causeway dividing the pool into two parts, with a fifth porch in the middle. So Cyrill of Jrs. understood it. In his time the pool was shown, under the name of the Twin-pools, in the NE. quarter of Jrs., not far from the position of the old sheep gate. Part of this double pool was found again in 1888, near the present Church of St. Anne.

The Gospel gives no clear indication as to the position of the pool; nothing, therefore, can be said agst. this old identn. Only in later times was Birket Isra'īn, the large pool on the northern boundary of the present sanctuary, taken for Bethesda. It prob. belongs to Roman Jrs. G. H. DALMAN.

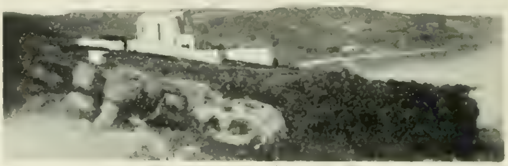
Fm. el-Jib (Gibeon), 6 miles N. of Jrs., there is an ascent of 6 miles to B.-H. the upper, on the highest point of a ridge, down wh. there is a rough descent of c. 4 miles, past B.-H. the lower, towards the plain. They command the most important approach fm. Sharon to the central uplands. They were therefore repeatedly fortified (1 Ch. 7.24; 1 K. 9.17; 2 Ch. 8.5; 1 M. 9.50; Jth. 4.4, 5). Down these rugged steeps were driven in rout the Amorites (Jo. 10.10), the Syrians under Seron, and again under Nicanor (1 M. 3.13ff., 7.39ff.), and the Romans under Cestius Gallus (BJ. BETHSAIDA. (1) A town in Lower Gaulonitis



Bethsaida of Galilee (?)

(Ant. XVIII. ii. 1, &c.), near the shore of the Sea of Galilee, adorned by Philip, and called Julias, in honour of the Emperor's dr. It is mentioned in Lk. 9.^{10}, prob. also in Mk. 8.^{22}. Schumacher, the best authority for this district, draws attention to the good road connecting el-'Araj on the shore, with et-Tell, fully a mile inland, on higher ground (The Jaulān, p. 246), and asks if el-'Araj mt. not be the fishing village, and et-Tell the princely residence—a suggn. which Sanday attributes to Guthe (SSG. 48 n.). He inclines, however, to ident. B. with el-Mes'adīyeh, fully a mile and a half E. of the mouth of the Jordan. (2) B. of Galilee (Jn. 12.^{21}), the home of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (Jn. 1.^{44}), poss. also of James and John. It is referred to in Mk. 6.$^{35ff.}$ No site bearing this name has been discovered, and the early pilgrims say nothing of it. But in the lapse of cents. a prob. insignificant vill. mt. disappear—it may have been but the "fisher town" of Capernaum—while the name, like that of Salim, mt. wander to a neighbouring shrine. In Sheikh 'Aly eṣ-Ṣaiyādīn, "Sheikh 'Aly of the

Bethsaida of Galilee (Colony at et-Ṭābigha)

Fishermen," on the rocky side of Tell 'Areimeh, E. of Khān Minyeh, there is prob. an echo of the anct. name. B. may yet be found either at eṭ-Ṭābigha, or at Khān Minyeh itself, if Capernaum be finally identd. with Tell Ḥūm (or Talḥūm, as Macalister suggs.).

Some have tried to prove that B. of Galilee was in Gaulonitis, and was in fact ident. with B. Julias (Guthe, KB. s.v.; G. A. Smith, HJHL., 459; Sanday, SSG. and DCG., s.v. CAPERNAUM). The argument seems to be that Jos. places Gamala, a fortress midway down the E. shore of the Sea of Galilee, now in Gaulonitis, and again in Galilee. If this was the usage of the time, the Evangelist mt. quite legitimately describe Julias, wh. lay between Gamala and the Jordan, on the very border of the province, as "B. of Galilee."

The passages cited fm. Jos. really tell the other way. Judas is spoken of as a "Gaulonite" of Gamala (Ant. XVIII. i. 1), while elsewhere he is called a "Galilean." But it is not unusual to describe a man as belonging to the district most closely identd. with his life, even if he were not born there. There is nothing to support the theory here.

Jos. was placed in command of the two Galilees, and Gamala was added to his jurisdiction (BJ. II. xx. 4). If Gamala had been in Galilee, there wd. have been no need to specify it separately. But, to make the matter certain, the following paragraph says that "in Gaulonitis he fortified Seleucia, and Sogane and Gamala." It wd. have been imposs. in any case, fm. the special arrangements made in view of war, to infer that, at an earlier date, B. Julias was in Galilee, even if Philip had not given such convincing proof that it belonged to his tetrarchy.

The boundaries of Galilee are specified in BJ. III. iii. 1. There, obviously, the Sea is reckoned to Galilee, and the districts adjoining it to the E. are named, Gaulonitis among them.

natural use in the circumstances—can hardly shake the inference fm. the uniform usage in NT.

Further, there is no suggn. that the disciples had been driven out of their course, when they found themselves over agst. "the land of Gennesaret" (Mk. 6.[53]). This wd. have implied a wind from the E. But if their course was from point to point along the E. and NE. shore, an E. wind wd. not have distressed them, and certly. cd. never have blown them out to sea. It is clear that they were rowing agst. contrary winds. The time occupied—from evening till the fourth watch—some 8 or 9 hours, wd. be absurd if their objective were B. Julias. But toiling in the teeth of a storm from the W., such as one often sees to-day, it is quite intelligible. This points definitely to a site for B. of Galilee near or in the Plain of Gennesaret.

It is to be remembered also that in the time of Christ, B. Julias was one of those centres of Greek influence, wh. He is never known to have entered. It is therefore unlikely that He wd. send His disciples thither.

The "scene of the miracle" on the E. of the Lake is of course not fixed with any definiteness. An inference based on the assumption that it is known is therefore futile (Sanday, DCG., s.v. Capernaum, end of par. 4). Even if the two Bs. were only 3 or 4 miles apart, they belonged to difft. jurisdictions. When we remember how frequently names are repeated in Pal., we need not wonder if "Fisher Home" appeared twice, in each case marking a good fishing ground. There are two Ṣafeds in Galilee to-day.

BETH-SHAN : CITADEL MOUND

Finally, Gamala is described as a part of Lower Gaulonitis, when Vespasian advanced to besiege it (BJ. IV. i. 1). The testimony of Jos. is perfectly clear. Gamala, although joined to his command, was never regarded as being in Galilee. The proof of the theory therefore, as far as it rests on Jos., entirely breaks down.

It is nothing to the purpose to cite Ptolemæus (A.D. 140) to the effect that Julias was in Galilee (Dr. Furrer, quoted by Sanday, SSG. 95), since among other changes in the interval, Julias was definitely attached to Galilee in A.D. 84 (Smith, HJHL. 459 n.).

Dr. Sanday thinks that the words in Mk. 6.[45] have been too strictly interpreted. He reminds us that the Gospel "was prob. written at Rome and that its author was a native of Jrs., not of Galilee. We cannot be surprised if his lang. on topographical points lacks precision." But is it not just in this Gospel that we shd. expect precision on such points, if it embodies the recollections of Peter? He was not likely to convey wrong impressions of the scenes of his boyhood and young manhood, or of the sea wh. he knew so well.

With all respect for the judgment of the scholars named, it is difficult to believe that εἰς τὸ πέραν cd. ever have been used of a point a little way along the shore, with no distinct bay (Guthe) to cross. πέραν has a sufficiently definite meaning, "the other side" of river or of lake. In no other case in NT. cd. it well be rendered as these scholars suggest. As Dr. Sanday courteously implies that those who oppose his view have invented a second B. to support their own, it may not be out of place to ask if this interpretation wd. ever have been heard of, but for the somewhat shaky theory it is brought to buttress. The Phil. held it after Saul's defeat on Gilboa, and here exposed the bodies of himself and his sons (1 S. 31.[7ff.]). Here Jonathan eluded the snares of Trypho (1 M. 12.[40]). It was called Scythopolis by the Greeks. After a chequered hist. it was rebuilt by Gabinius (Ant. XIV. v. 3), and was the only city in the Decapolis W. of Jordan (BJ. III. ix. 7). BEULAH ("married," of the woman), applied to Pal. (Is. 62.[4-5]), to wh. God turns again "with a love as strong and deep as the first love of a bridal pair" (Delitzsch, ad loc.).

BEZALEEL, the principal architect of the Tabernacle in the wilderness, and the principal artificer under whose superintendence the various articles used in the Tabernacle worship were made, and the structure itself erected. In Ex. 31.[2] we are told that God called him to the work. He was the s. of Uri the s. of Hur, of the tribe of Judah.

BEZEK. (1) In Judah (Jg. 1.[5]), prob. Bezkah, W. of Jrs. (2) Where Saul assembled his army (1 S. 11.[8]), prob. Khirbet Ibzīk, c. 14 miles NE. of Nāblus.

BEZER, a city of refuge in Reuben, in the Mishōr, or tableland E. of Jordan (Dt. 4.[43]; Jo. 20.[8], &c.), poss. ident. with Bozrah.

BIBLE. See Scripture.

BIER. See Burial.

BILDAD, one of Job's three friends. He is called a Shuhite—a term that implies that he was a desct. of Abraham through Shuah his s. by Keturah. In the LXX, tyrannus, "'ruler' of the Saucheans." In the dialogue he speaks after Eliphaz and before Zophar; in char., too, his speeches are intermediate between the polished eloquence of the first of the interlocutors, and the blunt coarseness of the third.

BILEAM = IBLEAM (1 Ch. 6.[70]; Jo. 17.[11], &c.), a Levite city in Manasseh = Bel'āmeh, ½ mile S. of Jenīn.

BILHAH. (1) Rachel's slave, mr. of Dan and Naphtali (Gn. 29.[29], &c.). (2) A city in Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[29]) = Baalah (Jo. 15.[29]), Balah (Jo. 19.[3]), and Baalath (Jo. 19.[44]), unidentd.

BIRD, and FOWLS, stand for three words in OT., 'ōph, "a flying creature," 'ayiṭ, "a bird of prey," tzippor, "a twittering bird"; and for two in the NT., peteinon, "a flying creature," and orneon, "a ravening bird." In our Lord's parable of the Sower Bs. represent evil (so Rv. 18.[2]; Jr. 5.[27]). Bs. are also the symbol of transitoriness (Ho. 9.[11]). Though song-Bs. are not a prominent feature of the E., yet the song of the B. is a sign of spring (SS. 2.[12]). Fowls were supposed to be specially endowed with wisdom (Jb. 28.[21]).

BIRTH. Childbirth seems to have been easy among the Hebs., as it still is among Oriental women, esp. the Arb. (Ex. 1.[19]). The "birth stool" (RV.), on wh. the mr. sat in labour, is still occasionally in use, but the common attitude is kneeling on the knees. Midwives were in attendance. The child was washed, salted, and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ek. 16.[4]), a custom wh. still prevails. An Eastern friend once hinted to the present writer the opinion that Europeans have a peculiar odour, because they are not salted in infancy! In early times the mr. suckled her children (Gn. 21.[7]), but in later days resort was had to nurses, esp. by the better classes (2 S. 4.[4]; 2 K. 11.[2], &c.). In NT. times the name was given to boys at circumcision on the 8th day (Lk. 1.[59], 2.[21]). In earlier times there is no trace of this custom, the name being given at birth by mr. or fr. (Gn. 16.[15], 29.[32], &c.). The birth of a s. rendered the mr. unclean for 40 days, that of a dr. for 80 days. Similar provisions existed among other nations, e.g. among the Greeks (HA. 147ff.).

BIRTHDAY. The ks. of Egp. were accustomed to celebrate Bs. with feasts (Gn. 40.[20]). Fm. Jb. 1.[4] we gather that the practice was common. The customs of Persians and Greeks are alluded to in Herod. i. 133, 2 M. 6.[7], Jos. Ant. II. v. 3. And in NT. (Mw. 14.[6]; Mk. 6.[21]), Herod Antipas makes a feast for his lords on his B.

BIRTHRIGHT. See Family.

BIRZAVITH, RV. BIRZAITH, a town in Asher (1 Ch. 7.[31]), poss. = Bīr ez-Zeit, near Tyre.

BISHOP represents the Gr. episkopos, "overseer," the title of the officials sent by Athens to superintend the affairs of her subject allies. As ekklēsia, the Gr. word trd. Church, means primarily the assembly of the citizens of a Gr. Republic for the transaction of business, and the council that prepared business for this Assembly was a Gerusia, the members of wh. were called "presbyters" or "elders"; it is a seductive idea that there was fm. the beginning an Episkopos, representing the Church universal, or, in stricter analogy with Hellenic notions, the Church at Jrs. As a matter of fact it seems cert. that at first Bs. and Elders or Presbyters were identl. (1) The same persons are called "elders" and "bishops" (Ac. 20., cp. vv. 17–28, and Tt. 1., cp. vv. 5–7). (2) "Bishops" and "elders" are never united in the same clause as if they filled different offices, as Bs. and deacons are (Php. 1.[1]). (3) "Elders" are exhorted to exercise the functions of a "bishop," episkopein. The same identy. of Bs. with Elders is implied in Clem. Rom. XLII. and XLIV. In the Epist. of Ignatius first does the B. appear separate from the eldership, though here the B. is pastor of one congregation (ekklēsia); the Elders are compared to a "garland" (stephanos) round him; so Apost. Const. II.

From this the evolution of the diocesan Bishop was easy and natural. The times of persecution and heresy which followed called for a monarchical constitution in the separate churches. For this development the Church may have had apostolic authority.

BIT, BRIDLE, Heb. resen, metheg; EV. render both words "bridle"; once only (Ps. 32.[9]) metheg is trd. "bit." Resen is clearly the Arb. rasan, "halter"; while metheg prob. corrspds. to lijām, "bit." Mahsōm (Ps. 39.[1]) shd. be "muzzle." Chalinos (Js. 3.[3]) is a bit or curb.

BITHIAH, an Egpn. princess (1 Ch. 4.[18]), w. of Mered. She is distinguished fm. another w. called "the Jewess," and may have been a convert. Her name signifies "dr." or "worshipper of J″."

BITHYNIA, a district in the NW. corner of Asia Minor, named fm. the Thracian immigrants, the Bithynians. It was left to the Rms. by Nicomedes III., B.C. 74. It was joined with Pontus in a single province, wh. Augustus made Senatorial, B.C. 64. It was not visited by Paul (Ac. 16.[7]). There were Jews in B. (1 P. 1.[1]), and the younger Pliny gives to the Emperor Trajan an act. of the Christians there (Ep. ad Traj. 96, 97).

BITTER HERBS. The eating of a salad of B. H. with the lamb and unleavened bread (Ex. 12.[8]; Nu. 9.[11]) was in line with immemorial practice in the East. The watercress, the pepper-grass, the endive are plentiful and genly. used. They were prescribed, doubtless, because they cd. be swiftly procured.

BITTER WATER. The ordeal of jealousy (Nu. 5.[11-31]). Holy water was taken by the priest, and dust from the floor of the Tabernacle was strewed on it; then the woman suspected of adultery was made to drink it, calling down curses on herself, if guilty. If she had been unfaithful, disease of a loathsome kind fell upon her; if innocent, she bore children. This ordeal was really a protection of the innocent agst. the insane jealousy of the Oriental.

BITTERN (Heb. qippod), AV.; RV. trs. "porcupine." There is considerable difficulty in deciding between these two renderings. In favour of AV. are: (1) the habits attributed to the B., e.g. frequenting marshes (Is. 14.[23]), "lodging in the upper lintels" of desolate houses (Zp. 2.[14]); (2) it is associated in Is. 34.[11] and in Zp. 2.[14] with qa'ath, "cormorant," wh. is certly. a bird; (3) Aq. trs. "pelican" and Thd. "swan." In favour of RV. are: (1) the apparent meaning of the word fm. its etymology; (2) the fact that the corrspdg. word in Aram. and Arb. means "porcupine," or "hedgehog"; (3) the LXX and the Vlg. both tr. by words meaning "hedgehog"; (4) the Psh. and the Tg. tr. by the etymological equivalent in Aram., wh. means "porcupine" or "hedgehog." On the whole we prefer the RV., as the descriptions of the habits of the B. in the poetical passages quoted are slightly ambiguous, while the etymological evidence is strong and unambiguous.

BLEMISH. (1) Bodily defects wh. rendered an Aaronite incapable of fulfilling the priest's office (Lv. 21.[17-21]). (2) Defects in animals wh. made them unfit for sacrifice (Lv. 22.[20-25]). Accdg. to the Talmudists the PRIEST mt. suffer fm. fifty specified Bs.; the animal fm. seventy-three.

BLESSING and CURSING. (1) Effective; divine B. or C., thus God blessed "the house of Obed-Edom" (2 S. 6.[11]); on the other hand God declared CAIN cursed (Gn. 4.[11]). (2) Indirect; prayer or imprecation. In the East, the efficiency of B. or C. for good or ill is universally believed in. There poss. was an element of this in JACOB's eagerness to gain his father's B., and his dread lest, his deception being discovered, his father shd. curse him (Gn. 27.[10, 13]). So with MICAH (Jg. 17.[1-3]), and BALAK, and BALAAM (Nu. 22.[6]), B. and C. were to be put on Mts. Gerizim and Ebal respectively (Dt. 11.[26-27]). The priests were to bless the children of Isr. (Nu. 6.[23-27]): this was done after the morning and evening sacrifices. (3) Declarative; blessing God (Gn. 14.[20]; Ne. 8.[6]; Dn. 2.[19]). It shd. be noted that in Jb. 2.[9], where AV. has "Curse God and die," the word used is barak, "bless"; RV. gives the idea "renounce"; the lit. rendering wd. be "bless," the meaning being "take good-bye of."

BLINDING. See CRIMES AND PENALTIES.

BLINDNESS. See DISEASES.

BLOOD is identd. with "the life" (Lv. 17.[11]), hence its sacredness in the eyes of the Isr. This idea appears to have been held beyond the limits of Isr., as the dependent idea of sacrificial ATONEMENT is so widely spread. Further, fm. this flowed the idea that blood wantonly shed, even that of a beast, brought a curse (Lv. 17.[4]); the guilt of murder lay in the shedding of "man's blood" (Gn. 9.[6]). Bloodguiltiness (lit. "bloods"), murder (cp. Gn. 9.[5], 42.[22]; Pr. 28.[17]). The attempt to use Ek. 3.[18] to soften the meaning of Ps. 51.[14] seems as absurd as it wd. be to make "murder" mean merely "hate" in Lk. 23.[19], because in 1 Jn. 3.[15] it is said, "Whosoever hateth his br. is a murderer." Fm. this also followed the prohibition of B. as an article of Food (Lv. 7.[26], 17.[13]). The Blood of Christ = His Atoning work (Mw. 26.[28]); this is prominent in the Epp. (Eph. 2.[13]; 1 P. 1.[19]; 1 Jn. 1.[7]; Rv. 1.[5]). Blood, Avenger of (gōēl). Shd. a person be killed, it was the duty of the eldest in the clan to take vengeance by slaying the slayer, whether the death were the result of accident or intention. It was to limit this that the Cities of Refuge were instituted. The thought of the East has changed in regard to manslaughter: it is no longer the horror of the shedding of blood that is prominent; it is the loss of the fighting strength of the clan; hence, to equalise matters, a man of the clan to wh. the slayer belonged must be killed, whoever it is. Monetary compensation to some extent implies the same idea. The anct. Gr. idea is more in accordance with the Jewish, e.g. the case of Adrastus (Herod. I. 35).

BLOOD, ISSUE OF; BLOODY FLUX. See Diseases.

BLUE. See Colour.

BOANERGES, the name given by our Lord to the sons of Zebedee and explained to mean "Sons of Thunder" (Mk. 3.[17]). This title may have been given to James and John because of their vehement zeal which led them to desire to call down "fire fm. heaven" on those Samaritans who refused to receive their Master (Lk. 9.[55]). There has been a difficulty as to the precise Aram. words that this term represents, but in the Sinaitic Palimpsest (Lewis), B. appears as Beni-Ragshi without any explanation following, proving that the word was intelligible to Palestinians; the diffce. in the vowel may be due to an attempt to represent the broader pronunciation of Galilee. רֶגֶשׁ, properly "tumult," mt. have "thunder" as a secondary meaning, altho' no other example survives.

BOAR (Heb. ḥazir, Arb. khansīr), occurs only in Ps. 80.[13] of the wild animal; the Heb. word is found other six times, but always apparently of the domestic swine. The wild boar is still fairly common, esp. in the thickets near the Jordan.

BOAT. See Ship.

BOAZ, a pillar standing in front of Solomon's Temple, prob. as obelisks in front of Egpn. temples. It has the same name as the ancestor of Solomon, but whether it was so named because of him is not cert.

BOAZ, a wealthy land-owner in Bethlehem, the benefactor, and then the h. of Ruth (Ru. 2ff.), an ancestor of David, and so of Christ (Ru. 4.[17]; Mw. 1.[5]; Lk. 3.[32]).

BODY. No word in early times stands for the complete bodily organism, altho' various members are named. "Flesh" in Scrip. indicates the material or bodily part of man. Bottē ḥomer, "houses of clay" (Jb. 4.[19]), may mean "clay huts," but perhaps more natly., the dwellings of the human spt., i.e. "bodies," corrspdg. to 2 Cor. 5.[1]. Geshem (Dn. 3.[27], 4.[30]), and nidneh, lit. "sheath" (Dn. 7.[15]), are used for the body. In NT. sōma stands for the complete body as distinguished fm. the spt., each being regarded as an essential constituent in the nat. of man (Laidlaw, HDB., s.v.).

BOILS. See Diseases.

BOLLED. "The flax was bolled," RV. "was in bloom," i.e. about the latter half of Feb. (Ex. 9.[31]).

BOLSTER (1 S. 19.[13], &c.), invariably in RV. "head."

BOND, BONDAGE, BONDMAN, BOND-MAID, BOND-SERVANT, BOND-WOMAN, BOND-SERVICE. Although slavery cannot be an absolutely primitive condition, yet as far back as records carry us we find the institution in existence. It prob. originated in the victors sparing the children of an otherwise exterminated tribe; the sparing of captives wd. be a later stage in development; then sale and purchase, when the B.-man became a chattel. Though slavery undoubtedly existed among the Hebs., we have comparatively few refcs. to it; we must therefore supplement our Biblical information fm. other sources. In Bab., in the days of Ḥammurabi, bondage was an understood relationship, and was regulated by the Code. The condition of the B.-man and B.-maid are considered and regulated in the Law (Ex. 21.[2-11, 20, 21, 26, 27]; Lv. 25.[39-54]), but it is the case of the Heb. who has sold himself that is in question. He cd. only serve six years, and if the year of Jubilee intervened, that period mt. be shortened (Lv. 25.[10]). The existence of foreign slaves is assumed, but their status is not determined by law. A Heb., if his master had given him as w. a foreign B.-woman, mt. become permanently the B.-man of another. A race in bondage occupied the condition of an inferior caste. Thus Joshua did not make the Gibeonites slaves to individuals; they were "hewers of wood and drawers of water to the congregation." There seems to have been a form of serfdom, as we learn fm. the case of Ziba in relation to the family of Saul. While 'ebed, the Heb. word, means slave, na'ar, "youth," was frequently used for servant, whether B. or free. Although slaves cd. not have been numerous in Pal. in the days of our Lord, yet, fm. the frequency with wh. the word doulos occurs, the institution was well enough known. The Apostles had to consider the duties of slaves and slave-owners (Col. 3.[22], 4.[1]). See further, Slave, Slavery.

BONNET in AV. stands for two Heb. words. (1) Migbā'oth (Ex. 28.[40], &c.), RV. uniformly "head-tires." (2) Pe'ēr (Ex. 39.[28] EV. "goodly"; Is. 3.[20] RV. "head-tires"; 61.[3], AV. "beauty," RV. "a garland"; 61.[10], AV. "ornaments," RV. "a garland"; Ek. 24.[17], AV. "the tire of thine head," RV. "thy head-tire"; 24.[23] EV.

"tires"; 44.[18] RV. "tires." Prob. the ordinary eastern head-cloth is meant, wh., bound on with a fillet of wool, is at once an ornament and a good protection agst. the sun.

BOOTH. The booth is of simple construction, consisting of four upright posts with cross-bars in wh. are wattled leafy branches. In such a shelter the peasant often spends most of the working months in the fields. In a booth raised upon tall poles, the watcher sits guarding the fruit or vegetables in the open (Is. 1.[8], RV.). Bs. served instead of tents for the army (2 S. 11.[11], R.V., &c.). See Tabernacles, Feast of.

BOSSES were metal studs added to the surface of the anct. buckler of wood and hide to blunt the effect of a blow and bind the structure more closely together (Jb. 15.[26]).

Bottles of Skin

BOTTLE (Heb. nebel and no'd) was the skin of kid, goat, or bullock, stripped off and sewed up so as to retain roughly the shape of the animal. When Bs. are used for the conveyance of milk or water, the hair is not removed but simply turned inside. For wine or oil they are slightly tanned, partly with oak bark, and partly by being hung in the smoke. When new wine is put in these skin bottles the process of fermentation is not quite complete, and so the bottles suffer a distention; then the astringent power of the wine fixes them so that they can distend no more; hence the saying of our Lord (Mw. 9.[17]). There were also earthenware Bs. (baqbuq). Possibly the glass Bs. now found in tombs, for keeping perfume in, wd. be known in OT. times.

BOTTOMLESS PIT, Gr. phrear tēs abussou, "the pit of the abyss." See Pit.

BOW. See Arms.

BOWELS (Heb. mē'aim, Gr. σπλάγχνα), the seat of the emotions, tender or painful. Accdg. to Heb. psychology the various functions of the soul were distributed to the various organs of the body.

BOWL represents several Heb. words. (1) Menaqqith (Aram.), a libation vessel (Ex. 25.[29]). (2) Gabia, a cuplike ornament of the golden candlestick. (3) Gol, gulla, anything hemispherical (1 K. 7.[41]; Ec. 12.[6]). (4) Mizraq, a Bason (Nu. 7.[13]). (5) Saph sephel, anything to contain liquid (Jg. 5.[25], 6.[38]).

BOX, AV. for Heb. pak (2 K. 9.[1]), better RV. "vial"; for "B. of ointment," see Alabaster.

BOX TREE. The true boxwood is not found in Pal. The Syriac tr. Cupressus Semper virens, is only a guess. It was evidently a familiar tree, being named with others well known (Is. 41.[19], 60.[13]). In Ek. 27.[6], we shd. prob. read with RV., "inlaid in boxwood," בתאשרים for בת־אשרים. The tree is not identd.

BOY. See Family.

BOZEZ, a "rocky crag" opposite another called Seneh (1 S. 14.[4, 5]), wh. rose on the N. of the pass "in front of Michmash." Conder idents. it with the N. cliff, "a remarkable bastion of rock," E. of Mukhmās.

BOZRAH, "a fortification." (1) The capital of Edom (Gn. 36.[23]; 1 Ch. 1.[44]). It is often referred to by the prophets (Am. 1.[12]; Is. 63.[1], &c.). It may be el-Buseireh, 7 miles SW. of Tufīleh, on the main road to Petra. Or it may be Quṣūr Bashair, SE. of Dibon. The latter, however, may be Bezer. (2) B. in Moab (Jr. 48.[24]) is prob. = 1. The great city in the Ḥaurān seems too far to the N., and prob. appears for the first time in Maccabees as Bostra.

Bozrah, Western Gate (Bab el-Hawa)

BRACELETS have always been a favourite ornament among Eastern women. They are made in great variety both of form and material. They were also worn by men (Nu. 31.[50]). That worn by Saul was prob. part of the royal insignia (1 S. 1.[10]). The "bracelet" in Gn. 38.[18, 25], shd. be "cord," pāthīl, by wh. the signet was suspended round the neck.

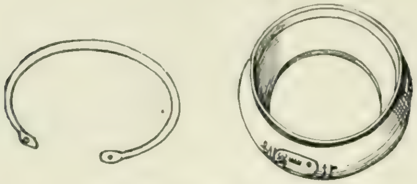
BRAMBLE is used in AV. for āṭād (Jo. 9.[14], &c., RV., " thorn "), and ḥōaḥ (Is. 34.[13], RV., " thistle "). The B. is, however, mentioned in Lk. 6.[44].



BRACELETS (Ancient Egyptian)

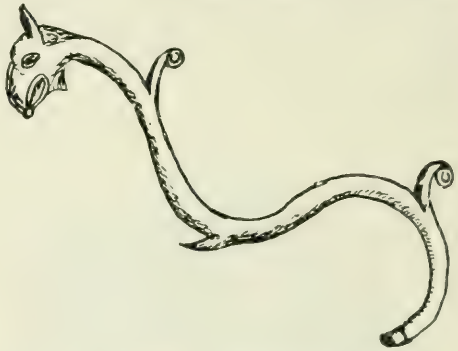
BRANCH. Many Heb. and four Gr. words are rendered B. in EV. B. is used figly. as in English. Qāneh, used of the Bs. of the Golden Candlestick (Ex. 25.[32], &c.), is lit. " cane." Tzemaḥ (Is. 4.[2]; Jr. 23.[5], &c.) and netzer (Is. 11.[1]) are clearly applied to the Messiah. Klēma appears only in Jn. 15., as the B. of a vine. The other three NT. words, Baion, klados, and stibas, were interchangeable (Jn. 12.[13]; Mw. 21.[8]; Mk. 11.[8]).

BRASS (Heb. nāḥūsh, neḥūshāh, neḥōsheth, Gr. chalkos). Where a simple metal is intended (e.g. Dt. 8.[9]; Jb. 28.[2]), we shd. read " copper." Sometimes, as in the case of Goliath's armour (1 S. 17.[5]), " bronze " may be meant. This alloy of copper and tin was known and used for such things B.C. 2286. B. is a symbol of hardness (Lv. 26.[19], " your earth as B."), of drought (Dt. 28.[23]), of strength (Jb. 6.[12]). B. in NT. stands for money, the coins most frequently in use being bronze (Mw. 10.[9]). The Brazen Altar and Brazen Sea were prob. of Bronze (see TEMPLE). Moses made a Serpent of B. that the serpent-bitten mt. look to it and live (Nu. 21.[9]). It becomes the symbol of the uplifted Christ (Jn. 3.[14]). Several anct. serpents of copper have been found in Pal. Some think they were designed to represent the Serpent of Moses.

PEF.

BRONZE COBRA

BREAD was usually made of wheaten flour; barley mt. be added (2 Ch. 2.[10]). See BARLEY. Other cereals mt. be mingled (Ek. 4.[9]). Prob. the earliest way of baking was to lay the dough, when prepared, on hot ashes (Is. 44.[15, 19]; cp. 1 K. 17.[12, 13]; Gn. 18.[6]). Smooth stones heated by fire came to be used for this purpose; and then the convex sheet of iron, found now almost everywhere in the East, part of the ordinary furniture of the Arb. tent (see OVEN). The original practice, no doubt, was to bake B. just when required, and to eat it preferably while fresh (Gn. 18.[6], &c.; Jo. 9.[5, 11, 12]). When thus prepared, leaven was not necessary (see LEAVEN). A common form of loaf is circular, fully 6 inches in diameter, and about an inch thick. But the most popular cakes are very thin, as their name indicates—marqūq, from waraq, " leaves " or " paper," corrspdg. to the Heb. rāqīq. The dough is rolled out, and then by dextrous casting between the hands and forearms, the desired thinness is secured. With a skilful twist the baker throws it over the plate, or on to a cushion, whence it is transferred to the heated side of the oven, and it is quickly ready for use. In eating this with butter, thickened milk, or cooked food, a portion is torn from the cake, folded to form a sort of spoon with wh. the food is conveyed to the mouth, the " spoon " being eaten with each mouthful.



SERPENT OF COPPER (Hollow)

Thus many will sit round a single dish, dipping the B. in turn (Mw. 26.[23]).

It is a mark of true liberality to give B. to the poor (Pr. 22.[9]); to deal B. to the hungry is acceptable to God. In the entertainment of the stranger B. must not be absent (Lk. 11.[5]). To injure one with whom we have eaten B. is esteemed unpardonable infamy (Ps. 41.[8]). Hence the obloquy of Judas' deed (Jn. 13.[26ff.]). See HOSPITALITY.

B. has always been regarded in the Orient with a certain religious reverence, as the evidence of God's bountiful care. Hence Orientals never willingly waste a morsel (Jn. 6.[12], &c.). They will rescue a crust from the mud and give it to a dog, or lay it where birds may find it.

As the staple article of diet, B. is used for the food necessary to sustain life (Gn. 3.[19]; Is. 51.[14], &c.). Manna is called B. (Ex. 16.[4], &c.). Referring to this Jesus calls Himself the " living bread," the B. " that came down fm. heaven," of wh., if a man eat, he shall live for ever (Jn. 6.[35], &c.).

BREAST-PLATE. See ARMOUR.

BREAST-PLATE OF THE HIGH-PRIEST (Heb. ḥōshen, " ornament "; the full name is ḥoshen hammishpāṭ, " the ornament of judgment "; the Gr. version conveys a slightly difft. idea, to logeion tôn kriseôn, " the oracle of judgment "). The B.

was essentially a bag in wh. the oracular URIM and THUMMIM were placed. The materials of it were the same as those of the EPHOD, gold, blue, purple, scarlet, fine twined linen (Ex. 28.[15]). It was in size a cubit each way, and was fastened to the Ephod by chains of wreathen work and " a lace of blue." Inserted in the B. were twelve gems, on wh. were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Isr. The B. was worn by the H. P. when he went into the presence of the Lord, that he mt. " bear the judgment of the children of Isr. upon his heart before the Lord continually." The gems by wh. it was adorned are treated under their names.

BREECHES, part of the dress prescribed for the priests, made of fine linen, tied round the waist, and reaching to the thighs (Ex. 28.[42], 39.[28]; Lv. 6.[10], 16.[4]; Ek. 44.[18]). See PRIEST.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD. Who the brethren of the Lord were is a question that owes its main interest to the bearing of the answer given, on another question—that of the perpetual virginity of Mary the mr. of Jesus. Many views have been held, but only three call for notice here. (1) The first takes the words lit., as meaning that they were the sons of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus. This seems to be the view of Hegesippus, A.D. 160 (Euseb. HE. iv. 22); it was advocated by Tertullian (died A.D. 220), and was restated by Helvidius—hence called the Helvidian view—and others c. A.D. 380. (2) The second, that of Jerome—the Hieronymian—put forward in opposition to that of Helvidius c. A.D. 380, makes them the sons of the virgin's sr., " Mary of Clopas," thus clearing the way to assert the virginity, not of Mary only, but also of Joseph. (3) The third, that supported by Epiphanius c. A.D. 370—the Epiphanian—regards them as the sons of Joseph by a former w. A clear and careful digest of the Lit. will be found in Lightfoot's Com. on Galatians, pp. 274ff.

A study of the relevant passages of Scrip. (Mw. 1.[25], 12.[47], 27.[56]; Mk. 3.[20ff., 31ff.], 15.[40, 47]; Lk. 2.[7], 4.[16-30], 8.[19], 24.[10]; Jn. 2.[12], 7.[2-8], 19.[25ff.]; Ac. 1.[14]; Gal. 1.[18f.]; 1 Cor. 9.[5]) will bring out the following points: (1) The mr. and B. of Jesus are spoken of as if living in the relationship nat. to mr. and sons in a family group. (2) They did not ackge. the claims of Jesus, and refused credit to His mission. (3) Consequently none of them were among the Twelve.

The last point is fatal to Jerome's view, wh. requires that not one but three of the B. of our Lord shd. be of the Twelve. Apart fm. this, Jerome has to make " Mary of Clopas " mean " M., the wife of C.," whereas the nat. meaning is " dr. of C." He has to ident. Clopas with Alphæus, making the latter a Gr. trltn. of the former (Aram.). But Alphæus stands for the Aram. Ḥalpai, and cd. not poss. represent an Aram. Qlōphā. Further, two sisters bearing the same name, Mary, cannot be lightly accepted. The passage on wh. this is based (Jn. 19.[25]) prob. refers to four women, named in pairs, " his mr. and his mr.'s sr.—prob. Salome—Mary the dr. of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene." The copula is not put between pairs.

In addition to this, Jerome's theory is quite unsupported by early tradition.

The Epiphanian view rests on no reliable authority. Hegesippus is indeed claimed as almost cert. favouring it (Harris, DCG. s.v.), but this is doubtful. Origen, who inclines to the view of Mary's perpetual virginity, although not regarding it as authoritative, cites in its support two apocryphal books, The Gospel of Peter—the part containing the refce. is lost—and the Protevangelium Jacobi.

Lightfoot rejects the Hieronymian theory, wh. even its author did not consistently hold. He regards the Epiphanian and the Helvidian as pretty equally balanced, but favours the former on what seems hardly adequate ground. "One objection," he says, " has been hurled at the Helvidian theory with great force, and as it seems to me, with fatal effect, wh. is powerless agst. the Epiphanian." Jesus on the Cross commits His mr. to the care of John, and the charge is at once accepted. If she had four sons besides drs. living at the time, wd. Jesus " thus have snapped asunder the most sacred ties of mutual affection " ? The mere fact of their unbelief, soon changed to faith, cd. not " override the paramount duties of filial piety." With them living in the same city, worshipping in common, cd. she thus be " consigned to the care of a stranger " ?

" Stranger " is perhaps hardly the word to use of one who was the bosom friend of her S., bound to Him in the close intimacy of sympathetic comprehension; and prob. her own nephew. We do not know how His B. were placed; but we may be sure that in the house of the beloved disciple His mr. wd. find the calm and loving friendship wh. her pierced and bleeding heart required. And we have only to note that if these others were her stepchildren, there was a stronger reason to avoid anything that mt. look like a slight upon them, to see with what " fatal effect " the objn. wd. tell on the other side.

The existence of a tradition of the perpetual virginity of Mary, in the early Church, may seem to favour the Epiphanian theory. But this may easily have arisen fm. the name given her in common use, as the Virgin mr. of the Lord. And perhaps it wd. be the less carefully examined, because it seemed to lend support to the excessively high ideas of the value of virginity, wh. became prevalent in the second cent.

In favour of the Helvidian view is the nat. meaning of the lang. of Scrip. " Brother " means " brother," not " cousin," or one more remotely connected, or not connected by blood at all. It takes the plain meaning of Mw. 1.[25], καὶ οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν υἱόν, as indicating the limit of abstinence; while the description of Jesus as her "first-born" wd., in other circumstances, be taken to mean that other children were born later. The difficulty remains, of course, that if Mary were the mr. of a large family, some of whom held by no means obscure positions in the Church, this fact shd. have been so utterly forgotten in the course of a single cent.

On the whole the balance of available evidence seems to favour the Helvidian theory.

BRICK, Heb. lĕbēnāh (from lābān, "to be white"), clay moulded and sun-dried or burnt in a kiln; the former was frequent in Egp., the latter in Bab. When made of Nile mud, the sun-dried Bs. were liable to crack in the sun unless they had straw in them. The invention of B. is attributed to Bab. (Gn. 11.[3]), in wh. case "slime" (bitumen) was used for mortar. Babylonian Bs. are usly. whitish in colour, in size about 14 in. sq., 3½ in. thick, and stamped with the name of the k. in whose reign they were made. In 2 S. 12.[31], Jr. 43.[9], Na. 3.[14], we find mention of B.-kilns, showing the acquaintance the Hebs. had with B.-making.

BRIMSTONE. Sulphur is plentiful in Pal.; in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea sulphur springs are frequent, as also near Gadara. Fm. the sulphurous smell that sometimes accompanies a thunderstorm, it was spoken of as a "rain of fire and B." (Gn. 19.[24]).

BROOK represents several words in Heb. (1) Āphīq (Ps. 42.[1]) is prop. the channel containing the water—elsewhere rendered "stream," "river." (2) Yeōr, an Egpn. word, applied almost invariably to the Nile and canals of Egp. It is rendered B. only in Is. 19.[6, 7, 8]. In Jb. 28.[10], it is the channel for water cut among rocks. In Is. 33.[21] "streams," EV. In Dn. 12. it is applied to the Tigris. (3) Mīkhal occurs only in 2 S. 17.[20]. The derivation and meaning are uncert. (4) Naḥal is the word commonly rendered B. There is no exact equivalent in Eng. It is applied to the valley with a watercourse in the bottom, and corrspds. to the Arb. Wādy. It shd. be distinguished from gai', a hollow not implying the presence of a stream. Like the Arb. wādy, naḥal is used now for the valley (Nu. 21.[12], &c.), and again for the stream (Dt. 9.[21], &c.). In Pal. the wādys form a striking feature of the landscape. Breaking down fm. the watershed of the Western Range, their descent E. to the Jordan Valley is short and steep. In the course of ages, terrific gorges have been hollowed out. Wādy el-'Aujeh, e.g., wh. enters the Jordan Valley N. of Jebel Quruntul, descends 4200 feet in about 15 miles. The slope towards the W. is longer and more gradual. The alluvial deposits in the valleys are rich, and, where cultivated, yield good returns. For great part of the year many of the watercourses are dry, depending for supplies solely on the rain. The Jordan is the one "river" of Pal., but cert. other streams, such as the Jabbok and the Yarmuk, are almost entitled to the name.

BURDEN. (1) Literal (Ex. 23.[5]; 2 K. 5.[17], &c.). (2) Of Prophecy, a specially Isaianic word

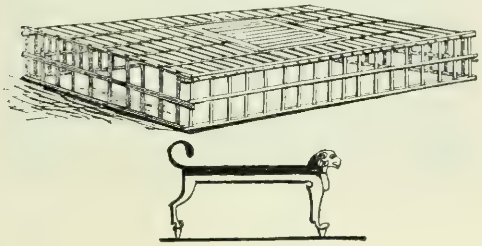
(Is. 13.[1], 15.[1], 17.[1]); used by Jr. (23.[33f.]), of false prophecy; accdg. to Isaiah's usage is Na. 1.[1]; Hb. 1.[1]. (3) Symbolic, of the sense of oppression due to trial, &c. (Gal. 6.[2]).

BURIAL. As recognised by Tacitus, the habit of the Jews was to bury their dead. When the person had ceased to breathe, some near relative, his eldest son for prefce., closed the eyes; the body then having been washed, it was wound round with linen, and the head bound with a napkin. Although embalming was not a Jewish custom, spices, as we see fm. the case of our Lord (Jn. 19.[39]), were used plentifully. Simultaneously with these preparations for entombment, the voice of lamentation was raised, not only by relatives, but by persons hired for the purpose (Jr. 9.[17]; Mk. 5.[38, 39]). Accompanied by these mourners, personal and professional, the body was carried on a bier to the tomb.



Bed and Bier (Egyptian)

No coffin was used by the Hebs., except in such a case as that of Joseph, and perhaps his fr. It seems prob. that the graves of the poor wd. simply be dug in the earth; only the wealthier people cd. afford rock-cut tombs. Of this latter class some, where the surface of the rock was bare of soil, were excavated for a couple of feet into the rock, and a slab to serve as a lid prepared to be placed over the deposited body. It was prob. to such tombs as these that our Lord referred (Lk. 11.[44]), "graves which appear not." More distinctively Jewish, however, was what may be called cave B. See further, Sepulchre.

BUSH represents two Heb. words: (1) siaḥ, a B. in the sense of a plant of a particular size (Jb. 30.[4]). (2) Ṣeneh, the B. wh. "Burned," "and was not consumed," in wh. J". appeared to Moses (Ex. 3.[2]). Fm. a somewhat doubtful etymology Ges. assumes ṣeneh to be a thorny bush of some sort; in favour of this is the LXX batos, "a bramble," wh., however, does not grow on Sinai.

BUSHEL (modius), a Rm. measure, about a peck (Mw. 5.[15]; Mk. 4.[21]; Lk. 11.[33], where it is the vessel, not the measure that is in question).

BUZI, the fr. of Ezekiel the Prophet (Ek. 1.[3]), an Aaronite; because B. means "despised," some Rabbinical comm. ident. him with Jeremiah.

CABUL. (1) A city on the border of Asher and Zebulun (Jo. 19.[27]), the Chabolo of Jos. (Vit. 43, &c.), the mod. Kābūl, a vill. E. of Acre. (2) A district containing 20 cities given by Solomon to Hiram (1 K. 9.[13]), prob. connected with the above (Buhl, GAP. 221).

CÆSAR, the cognomen (family name) of Julius C., the Dictator, and also of his gt.-nephew and adopted son, Augustus; it was transmitted as a title to all the successors of Augustus. C. appears only as a title in the NT. (Mw. 22.[21]; Ac. 25.[11]). Three Cs. are named: Augustus (Lk. 2.[1]), Tiberius (Lk. 3.[1]), Claudius (Ac. 11.[28], 18.[2]); Tiberius is the C. referred to in Jn. 19.[12], and Nero in Ac. 25.[11]. Our Lord's birth occurred during the reign of Augustus, His ministry, death, and resurrection under Tiberius; and Paul's missionary labours and martyrdom under the three following Cs. The Gospels and the later Epp. were written under the Flavians. Thus the foundation of Christianity coincided with the rule of the "twelve Cs." Until the Neronian persecution the Rm. power was on the whole favourable to the spread of the Church. With the burning of Rm. under Nero began the life and death struggle between the Empire and the Church.

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD. As Paul was handed over to the Prefect of the Prætorians, as the Imperial guard were called, he wd. be continually in contact with members of that body, and in consequence with members of "C.'s household." This wd. include not only the immense host of slaves actually in the palace, but also the numerous Imperial freedmen. Many of these were doubtless Jews, and therefore filled with Messianic hopes. Many of the names of those saluted in Rm. 16. have been found in Columbaria appropriated to members of the Imperial household. Agst. this identification is the idea, wh., however, is without support fm. MSS. or VV., that the 16th chap. of Rm. really belongs to an Epistle to the Ephesian Church.

CÆSAREA. (1) C. PALESTINA, on the sea coast, fully 30 miles N. of Jaffa, was known as Strato's Tower, B.C. 200 (Ant. XIII. xi. 2). It was greatly enlarged and adorned by Herod the Gt. (B.C. 12), who named it C. or Sebaste (Ant. XV. ix. 6; XVI. v. 1), in honour of Augustus. He instituted public games on a vast scale. The building of a good harbour added to the importance of the city, making it the main sea-port of the country. It became the seat of the Rm. procurator of Judea. It was owned for a time by Agrippa I., whose tragic death here is recorded (Ac. 12.[19, 23]). It was the home of Philip the Evangelist, and the station of Cornelius (Ac. 8.[40], 21.[8], 10.). It was visited by Paul in his travels (Ac. 9.[30], 18.[22]), was the scene of his repeated examinations, and hence he set out for Rome (Ac. 23.[23], &c.). Strife between the Jewish and Gentile inhabitants of C. occasioned the outbreak of the war (BJ. II. xiii. 7, xiv. 4ff.). The Jews suffered cruelly at the instance of Florus. Eusebius the historian was bishop of C. The ruins of the cathedral are still seen on the site of a temple built by Herod; also the traces of two aqueducts, by wh. water was brought across the marshes fm. the Crocodile river. The circuit of the anct. wall was much greater than that of the wall built by the Crusaders, wh. Sultan Bibars destroyed (1296). (2) C. PHILIPPI stood on a triangular terrace at the SW. foot of Hermon. The ruins of wall and towers testify to its anct. strength. Hard by the fountain of the Jordan rises in front of the great cave, dedicated of old to the worship of Pan, the Paneion, whence the name Paneas was given to the whole district (Ant. XV. x. 3). There is no more romantically beautiful place in all Syria. Unfailing streams bless the soil, fruitful garden and fair field are dashed with grateful shade fm. mighty oak and fragrant wood. The rushing water makes music in the glen, while high over all frowns the grim fortress, eṣ Ṣubeibeh, fm. the E. height. Herod the Gt. built a temple here in honour of Augustus. Philip enlarged and beautified the town, and called it C. The district was visited by Jesus (Mw. 16.[13], &c.). Called Neronias by Agrippa II., the old name prevailed over both C. and N., and still persists in the Arb. form of Bāniās—a vill. of some 350 inhabitants, built among the ruins.

CAIAPHAS (Heb. prob. Qayapha), a nickname of Joseph (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2), High-priest during our Lord's earthly ministry. Valerius Gratus had deprived ANNAS, C.'s fr.-in-law, of the H.-p'hood, and after three sons of the last named had briefly enjoyed the dignity, appointed C., shortly before PILATE succeeded him in the procuratorship. Although he had the dignity, his fr.-in-law had most of the power. C. took a leading part in the condemnation of JESUS. C. saw that any political rising mt. be made an excuse by the Rm. to deprive the Jews of the remnants of independence wh. they still retained. Hence, as Jesus had been proclaimed by multitudes as the Messiah, and therefore the prob. leader of a revolt in the near future, C.

thought it expedient that He shd. be put out of the way before He occasioned an uproar. When direct testimony failed to supply the Sadducean with a plausible pretext, C. adjured Jesus to declare whether or not He were the Messiah, forcing Him, either by abjuring His Messiahship to lose His power over the people, or by affirming it to furnish a reason for handing Him over to the Rm. as a rebel agst. their authority. C. was removed fm. the pontificate by Vitellius shortly after the recall of Pilate. Of his after fate there is no record.

CAIN, the first s. of Adam. The name in Heb. is ident. with Qayin, "a spear," wh. mt. sugg. the man of blood who slew his br. The motive for the crime was jealousy, indicating a condition of heart wh. sufficiently explains the rejection of his offering. His sullen question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" has become proverbial as describing the attitude of the selfish and unbrotherly. Convicted of the murder, he feared for his life. Protected by a terrible threat of vengeance agst. any who mt. hurt him, a mark was put upon him by wh. all mt. recognise him, and he was banished to the "land of Nod" = "flight" or "exile," where he is represented as building a city (Gn. 4.[17]). Among his descts. were the tent-dwellers, and those who originated the arts and handicrafts (4.[20, 21]). Accdg. to Jewish tradition C. was killed in mistake by Lamech, who also by misadventure killed his s. Tubal Cain (Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, I. 470f.), prob. an invention to explain the fragment of song (Gn. 4.[23f.]).

There are cert. difficulties in the nar. wh. we are not yet in a position to solve. The distinction of shepherd and husbandman, with their characteristic diffcs., seems to belong to a later time, although indeed it is not easy to say what is primitive and what is not. The building of a city, and the apparently widespread population, also present problems.

(2) A city in Judah (Jo. 15.[57]), prob. ident. with Khirbet Yaqīn, S. of Hebron, near which is the alleged tomb of C.

CALAH, RV. trs. Gn. 10.[11], "Out of that land he (Nimrod) went forth and builded Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah." Although it is thus regarded as one of the earliest Bab. colonies in Asyr., Shalmaneser claims to have founded C. It is represented now by the mound known as Nimrūd, SE. of Nineveh. In it have been found the ruins of the palaces of Asshur-nazir-pal, Shalmaneser II., Tiglath-pileser III., and Esarhaddon. These stood on a great stone-faced platform overhanging the Tigris.

CALAMUS. See Reed.

CALEB, s. of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah (Nu. 13.[6], &c.), one of the spies sent by Moses, shared with Joshua the distinction of opposing the advice of the faint-hearted, and received with him the reward of entering the promised land. He claimed and received fm. Joshua, as his possession, Hebron and the mountainous district belonging to it (Jo. 14.[6f.], where he is called "the Kenizzite"; 15.[13f.]). The city was assigned to the Kohathites, the surrounding country and vills. being possessed by C. (21.[10f.]). For C.'s genealogy, see 1 Ch. 2. He seems later to have been assumed as the hero-ancestor of a clan settled around Hebron (1 S. 25.[3], 30.[14]).

CALEB EPHRATHAH (1 Ch. 2.[24]). The true readg. prob. is "Caleb came to Ephrathah"—the district of Bethlehem. See Ephrathah.

CALF, THE GOLDEN (Heb. 'ēgel, really "bullock," Ex. 32.[1f.]). Starting fm. a highly sptl. relg., the Egyptians, among whom the Isrs. had lived for four cents., had descended to the lowest zoolatry, and worshipped, among other animals, very prominently the ox. The winged, human-headed bulls of Bab., whence Isr. had come, showed the sacred char. there ascribed to the ox. It is therefore not astonishing that when Moses had left them for forty days Isr. shd. fall back fm. the high sptl. level at wh. Moses endeavoured to keep them, and that they shd. revert for a visible symbol of Deity to Egp. They appealed to Aaron, and he demanded their golden ear-rings; fm. these he made the G. C. It is prob. that the gold in thin plates covered a core of wood. While Moses was in the mount J". warned him of what was taking place in the camp; this warning wd. be conveyed in symbol and by sugg., so the real concrete meaning only dawned upon him when he saw the God who had brought the people out of Egp. worshipped under the animal symbol of the god Apis (Ex. 32.[4]). Moses, when he saw the rebellion of Isr., called upon the Levites, his own tribe, to avenge the Lord; and they slew 3000 men. Then Moses renewed the petition in more definite terms, wh. he had presented to God in the mount, that He wd. pardon the sin of His people; in the sublimity of his self-devotion he is ready to be accursed for them.

Criticism distinguishes J. and E. portions of the nar., but Elohim occurs in J. and JHVH in E.; neither is complete without the other. The incident is also recorded in Dt. 9.[9-21].

Moses burnt the G. C. and ground it small, then cast it into the brook and made the people drink the water. This event is referred to in Ps. 106.[19f.]

CALVARY. See GOLGOTHA.

CAMEL (Heb. gāmāl and bēker, the latter prob. meaning "a dromedary"), the largest domesticated ruminant; it is practically the oldest of the larger mammals, as a C. not specifically difft. is found in the Miocene. The C. was among the first of animals to be domesticated. What the date is among plants that the C. is among animals to the inhabitant of SW. Asia; it is the Arab's most valuable possession. The C. bears his burdens; it has great powers of endurance, going days without food or water; its hair is woven into cloth for his tents, or for garments, like that of John the Baptist (Mw. 3.[4]); its milk is drunk, its flesh is eaten, and fm. its skin shoes are made. The C. seems to have been first domesticated in Arabia, as it is rare and relatively late on the monuments of Egp., and is not mentioned in the

CAMEL: ASSYRIANS LOADING

Code of Hammurabi; yet Abraham, Jacob, and Job have flocks of C. (Gn. 12.[16]; Gn. 30.[43]; Jb. 42.[12]). As suited to the needs of the nomads, the possession of the C. mt. be largely restricted to them. While the C. is adapted to tread on sand and gravel, and can live on the roughest provender, it is liable to slip and fall on mud; a fall to a C. is frequently fatal; hence they wd. be less useful on the banks of the Nile or the Euphrates. Not only is the C. the great bearer of burdens as he always has been, but he is the great roadmaker; the broad, heavy feet of the C. tread the sand and gravel into a firm pathway. Long strings of Cs., laden with wheat fm. the Ḥaurān, whenever the harvest has been thrashed and winnowed, are to be met on their way to 'Akka or Ḥaifa; sometimes as many as 100 may be seen following each other in single file, separated into groups of four or five by donkeys. The C. is the stupidest of domesticated animals: it can never find its way back to its home. The C. is surly and ill-tempered; he has no affection for his owner, if even any recognition of him; he growls when he receives the signal to kneel, even if it be for unloading; and growls equally when he is summoned to get up. The C.'s Furniture (Gn. 31.[34]) means prob. the palanquin in wh. women travelled on C.-back. As the C. is the largest animal in use in SW. Asia, its size is the charte. emphasised in proverbs; thus our Lord declares, "It is easier for a C. to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God" (Mt. 19.[24]); again He speaks of those who "strain out the gnat and swallow the C." (Mw. 23.[24] RV.). It ought to be noted that the cloth made from C.'s hair is soft, and brown in colour. Although the flesh of C. is eaten by the Arabs, it was unclean to Isr. (Lv. 11.[4]).

CAMP (Heb. mahaneh, "host," Gn. 32.[2]), the temporary resting-place of a tribe or army. In Nu. 2. we have an act. of the encampment of Isr. in the wilderness. They were divided into four Cs., prob. widely apart (see NUMBERS). The Isrs. used to erect round their C. a rampart of wagons (1 S. 26.[7], wrongly trd. "trench," AV.); sentinels were placed at recognised "watches" (Jg. 7.[19]); Cs. were usly. placed on heights (Jg. 4.[12]). Fm. the fact that sieges were commonly very prolonged, "to besiege" a city was "to encamp agst. it." In such cases "booths" (succoth) were erected (1 K. 20.[16]).

CAMPHIRE. This is the henna plant, found in Egp., Nubia, Arabia, and in the cleft by the Dead Sea. It grows to a height of 7 or 8 ft., "with pale green foliage, and clusters of white and yellow blossoms, wh. emit a delightful perfume." The leaves, dried, powdered, and made into paste with water, are used to stain figures on the hands and feet, and to dye the nails and the hair—a very favourite form of adornment in the E. A sprig of henna, for its sweet perfume, is put in nosegays. It is worn about the person by women (SS. 1.[13, 14]). It seems to have been grown along with the spikenard, and other plants yielding precious perfumes (SS. 4.[13, 14]).

CANA OF GALILEE (Jn. 2.[1f.], &c.), the home of Nathaniel, where Jesus wrought His first miracle. Guthe curiously makes it the home of Simon (Mw. 10.[4]; KB. s.v.). There is no clear indication of position. It was in the uplands, whence one had to "go down" to Capernaum (Jn. 2.[12]). The rival sites are Kefr Kennah, 3 miles fm. Nazareth, on the mod. Tiberias road, and Khirbet Qānā, 8 miles N. of Nazareth, on the edge of the plain of Asochis. This is prob. the vill. named by Jos (Vit. 16, cp. 41). Conder suggs. a third claimant, 'Ain Qānā, near er Reineh. There is no steady tradition pointing to any site. The Crusaders cert. accepted Khirbet Qānā, or, as it is also called by the natives, Qānā el Jelīl = Gr. Κανᾶ τῆς Γαλιλαίας (see evidence in Conder's Tent Work, 79ff.). The pilgrims agree only in placing C. between Nazareth and Capernaum. Probability seems inclined to the northern site.

CANAAN. See PALESTINE.

CANAANITES. Although used frequently for all the non-Isr. inhabitants, C. referred primarily to the dwellers on the sea-coast and the valley of the Jordan (Nu. 13.[29]). It wd. seem that the Phil. were regarded as C. (Jo. 13.[2, 3]); fm. Mw. 15.[22], confirmed by Euseb., Prepar. Evang. I. 10, the Phœnicians were regarded as C. This view of the extent of the C. is in agreement with Gn. 10.[19]. Fm. their dwelling on the sea-coast the thought readily suggs. itself that they were immigrants, a view wh. is confirmed by Dt. 2.[23], where it is asserted in regard to Philistia, that the Avim were the original inhabitants, but dispossessed by the Caphtorim. As in Gn. 10.[6] Canaan is represented as br. of Mizraim (Egypt), it wd. seem that the C. and the Egyptians were looked upon as cognate peoples. The C. were advanced in civilisation; they had cities united in confederacy; in war they used chariots of iron (Jo. 17.[16]); fm. the spoils taken by Thothmes III. it appears that they had also made advances in manufacture. They were addicted to trade, hence C. in later times meant "merchant" (Is. 23.[8]). As to the lang. of the C., it appears to have been Heb.; this is implied in Is. 19.[18]. In its wider use C. comprehends other five, or, with the addition of the Girgashites, six, races; regarding these, see under their respective names.

CANDACE, the Ethiopian queen whose treasurer was baptized by Philip (Ac. 8.[26f.]). C. was prob. a dynastic title. See Ethiopia.

CANDLE, CANDLESTICK. For C. we shd. prob. always read "lamp," and for C.-stick, "stand." RV. retains C. in Jr. 25.[10], Zp. 1.[12], without apparent reason. The lamp-stand is found in the prophet's chamber (2 K. 4.[10]). It figures in the Gospels (Mw. 5.[15], &c.). The nebrashtā (cp. Arb. nibrās, "lamp") supported the lights in Belshazzar's great hall (Dn. 5.[5]). The advent of the lucifer match has removed the necessity for the lamp kept always burning in the eastern house, wh. supplied the figs. in such passages as Ps. 18.[28], Pr. 24.[20], Rv. 2.[5].

Tell Hum, from the West

CANE. See Reed.

CANKERWORM, the caterpillar stage of the Locust.

CANON. See Scripture.

CAPERNAUM appears in the Gospels as a highly favoured city. When driven out of Nazareth Jesus found shelter here, and C. becomes "His own city," where only He is "at home" (Mw. 4.[13], 9.[1]; Mk.

Excavation of Synagogue: Tell Hum

2.[1]). It was the scene of many of His mighty works (Mw. 8.[5ff.], 11.[23], &c.). Peter and Andrew were called on the shore, and Matthew fm. the "place of toll" (Mk. 1.[16]; Mw. 9.[9]). Reports of Jesus' teaching here are given in Mw. 18.[2], &c., Jn. 6. C. stood "by the sea" (Mw. 4.[13]), in or near the plain of Gennesaret (Jn. 6.[17ff.]; cp. Mw. 14.[34], Mk. 6.[53], BJ. III. x. 8). A Christian tradition traceable to the 4th cent. idents. C. with Tell Ḥūm, a ruin on the N. shore of the Sea of Galilee, 2½ miles W. of the mouth of the Jordan. A Jewish tradition seems to locate C. at Khān Minyeh (Conder, Tent Work, 294). The question has been discussed recently by Dr. Sanday (SSG., and Journal of Theological Studies, quoted Expository Times, XV. 100ff.), Prof. Knight, and Rev. Asad Mansur, of Nazareth (Expositor, July 1906, April 1907), Mr. A. S. Macalister, and Dr. Masterman (PEFQ. April and July 1907). The only contribution of value is made by Mr. Macalister. Fm. the pottery found on the two sites, he concludes that at Khān Minyeh "there was no settlement whatever in the time of C.," while Tell Ḥūm "flourished at exactly the period of the glory of C." This seems to negative the claims of Khān Minyeh, tilting the beam in favour of Tell Ḥūm. For sure grounds of decision, however, we must await the results of the excavations now going forward. Meantime we make four observations :—

(1) The pottery points to the Rm. period, but hardly with cert. to the time of the Herods. The bldgs. seem to date fm. that of the Antonines.

(2) The local name is undoubtedly Tell Ḥūm. Mr. Macalister supports the derivation from Kaphar

Tanhumim, a Jewish variant of C. As no Arabic speaker wd. "ever think of applying the word Tell, 'mound,' to this flat, widespread ruin," he thinks it "more prob. that the name is one word, Talḥum, not two, Tell Ḥūm." But in Egyptian Arabic tell means "ruin," and the Rev. Asad Mansur, an educated Syrian, whose lang. is Arabic, after examining the site, says: "I do not understand what the objectors mean by the word 'tell.' In Arabic 'tell' is used for any heap of ruins or mound. So that the ruins of Tell Hum themselves are to-day a 'tell'" (Expositor, April 1907, 370). The rejection of "Tell Hum" is therefore precarious.

(3) The difficulties as to the fountain called C. by Josephus, still remain. If it is, as seems cert., 'Ain eṭ Ṭābgha, it is not only 2 miles distant; the efficacy of the spring was exercised westward—away from Tell Ḥūm. Having regard to the ruins on the neighbouring slopes, it is hard to see why the fountain shd. be connected with Tell Ḥūm, wh., standing on the shore, had no use for its water.

(4) Fm. Mw. 11.[23], &c., it mt. be inferred that C. stood on a height.

CAPHTOR, CAPHTORIM. The PHILISTINES are said to come fm. C. (Am. 9.[7]), poss. CRETE (Dillmann), or CILICIA (Cheyne).

CAPPADOCIA, the Rm. province N. of the Taurus Mts., stretching fm. the Euphrates in the E. to the border of Lycaonia in the W. Jews early found their way into C. (1 M. 15.[22]), maintaining, however, their intercourse with Jrs. (Ac. 2.[9]), and among them were converts to the Christian faith (1 P. 1.[1]).

CAPTAIN, a military title (Heb. nasi', nagīd, and sar, wh. are also rendered "prince": Gr. chiliarchos and stratēgos = Lat. tribunus militis). The corrspdg. title in mod. armies wd. be "colonel," and anything over that rank.

CAPTIVITY. See ISRAEL.

CARBUNCLE represents two Heb. words. (1) Eqdah, only used in Is. 54.[12] of the gates of the glorified Zion; the gem intended is not identd. (2) Bārqath, bāreqeth (Ek. 28.[13]), part of the treasures of the k. of Tyre. The second form appears in the third stone of the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[17], 39.[10]). Prob. this is the "emerald."

CARCHEMISH (Heb. Karkemīsh, Egpn. Qarqamēsh, Asyr. Gargamish), a city commanding the fords of the Euphrates. Formerly C. was identd. with Circesium, near the junction of the Khabûr and the Euphrates (Smith's Dict. Gr. and Rm. Geog.), but it has been proved (Maspero, G. Smith, &c.), fm. Egp. and Asyr. inscrs., and by excavations on the spot, to have been much further up the river. It is now represented by Jerablus (Gr. Hierapolis or Bambyce, Syr. Mabug), a vill. on the W. bank of the Euphrates. C. was taken by Thothmes III. fm. the Retennu, c. B.C. 1520, and held by the Egyptians for rather more than a cent. It then fell into the hands of the Hittites and became the capital of one of their kdms. When the Ninevite Empire was revived by Asshur-nazir-pal the Hittite k. Singara became tributary, c. B.C. 876. On the fall of the Asyr. Empire it was in the possession of Pharaoh Necho for a short time. In the decisive battle for this city, c. B.C. 605, Necho was defeated by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, thereafter C. became part of the Bab. Empire. Its remains, accdg. to G. Smith, consist of the ruins of huge walls and of a large palace.

CARMEL, usly. with the art. the Carmel, "the garden with fruit trees," is a mountain that rises abruptly fm. the shore, at the S. extremity of the bay of Acre, and extends to the SW. about 13 miles. The Monastery of Elias stands on the promontory, at a height of 500 ft. Rising gradually, the ridge reaches its greatest height at Esfīyeh (1742 ft.). It sinks in the depression of Wādy el-Mifteleh, rising again in el-Maḥraqah (1687 ft.). The mountain forms roughly an oblique triangle, its base running S. along the edge of the plain. It falls steeply on the NE. and E., but sinks gradually to the SW. in a series of long vales and ridges. Surrounded by plains on three sides, this great mountain forms an impressive feature of the landscape, arresting the eye fm. all parts of central Pal. The water supply is limited, but it still justifies its name, prosperous vills. dotting its fertile slopes. Oak, olive, and pine, myrtle, honeysuckle, box, and laurel grow luxuriantly, while in the spring its sides are radiant with the rainbow hues of multitudinous flowers. Cisterns, oil and wine presses hewn in the rock, attest the anct. cultivation. It is often refd. to in Scrip., e.g. as a symbol of beauty (SS. 7.[5]), of fertility (Is. 35.[2]), of prosperous and happy life (Jr. 50.[19]); while a blight upon C. signifies disastrous days for Isr. The position of the mountain made it worthless fm. a military point of view, but its isolation, and its abounding caves in the hard limestone, made it a haunt of refugees fm.

PROMONTORY OF MOUNT CARMEL. SEEN FROM HAIFA

old time (Am. 9.[3]). Its remote heights with their spacious outlook, its sheltered retreats and shady groves, attracted worshippers before the dawn of hist. On a place of sacrifice already anct., Elijah raised his altar (1 K. 18.[30ff.]), and here transpired the conflict of imperishable memory wh. closed in the carnage of the brook below. The place is genly. identd. with el-Maḥraqah, "the place of burnt-offering," a sanctuary of the Druzes in the mountain to this day. Near by is a Latin Chapel. Some think that C. is the scene of the incidents recorded in 2 K. 1.[9ff.] (see ELIJAH). The cave of Elijah is shown under the monastery, but an older claimant is that in ed-Deir, near 'Ain es-Sīḥ. Elisha also frequented C., clearly visible fm. Shunem, across the level reaches of Esdraelon (2 K. 2.[25], 4.[25]). C. was on the S. border of Asher, but later belonged to Tyre (BJ. III. iii. 1). (2) A town in the uplands of Judah (Jo. 15.[55]; 1 S. 15.[12]), owned by Nabal (1 S. 25.[2]), the mod. el-Karmal, 7 miles S. of Hebron, with considerable ruins, a tower of the 12th cent., a large reservoir, caves and tombs. The inhabitants are called CARMELITES (1 S. 27.[3], &c.).

CARPENTER. See HANDICRAFTS.

CART (Assyrian)

CARRIAGE, in AV. always means something "carried." (1) Kebûddāh, RV. "goods" (Jg. 18.[21]). (2) Kēlī, RV. "baggage" (1 S. 17.[22]; Is. 10.[28]). (3) Nesū'āh, RV. "a burden" (Is. 46.[1]). In Ac. 21.[15], AV. trs. a verbal phrase, "took up our carriages," RV. "took up our baggage," RVm. "made ready."

CART, 'ăgālā (1 S. 6.[7], &c.; EV. tr. "wagon" in Gn. 45.[19], &c.). It seems to have been a two-wheeled wooden vehicle, used for transport of passengers and goods, drawn by two oxen or cows. In the Egpn. and Phil. plains, they cd. be easily employed. Poss. in Pal. they were used in the fields as at the present day. For threshing wagon (Is. 28.[28]), see AGRICULTURE.

CARVE, sometimes used as = "grave"; e.g. "graven image" (Jg. 18.[18]), wh. represents one word in Heb., pesel. More specially it trs. qāla', and is used of the wooden panels of the Temple carved with "cherubim and palm-trees." AV. trs. ḥăṭūvōth, "carved works": better RV., "striped cloths."

CASEMENT, Heb. eshnāb (Pr. 7.[6], RV. "lattice," as in Jg. 5.[28] and SS. 2.[9]). See HOUSE.

ASSYRIAN CASTLE ON RIVER BANK

CASLUHIM (Gn. 10.[14]; 1 Ch. 1.[12]), a race represented as springing fm. Mizraim (Egp.), fm. whom the PHILISTINES sprang.

CASSIA, Heb. qiddāh (Ex. 30.[24]; Ek. 27.[19]), qĕtzī'ōth (Ps. 45.[8]). Prob. both words refer to strips of aromatic bark fm. the Cinnamomum Aromaticum, a native of Cochin China, inferior in fragrance, and so in value, to cinnamon.

CASTLE. (1) Ṭīrāh (Gn. 25.[16]; Nu. 31.[10]), RV. "encampment," prob. consisting of reed huts, defended by a rampart of thorns. (2) 'Armôn (Pr. 18.[19]), usly. "palace" (Is. 25.[2]). (3) Bīrānīyōth (2 Ch. 17.[12]), "fortresses." (4) Migdōl (1 Ch. 27.[25]), usly. "tower." (5) Mātzōd, matzūdāh (1 Ch. 11.[5, 7]), "a strong-hold." In Ac. 22.[24] the Tower Antonia is called C.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, twin sons of Zeus and Leda, and brs. of Helen, the patrons of sailors; hence the name of the Alexandrian ship (Ac. 28.[11]).

CATERPILLAR, Heb. ḥāsīl, and yeleq, the Locust in its wingless or caterpillar condition. The second of these is usly. trd. Cankerworm; fm. Na. 3.[16] it wd. seem that its assumption of wings had been observed.

CAUL. (1) Yothereth, the membrane enclosing the liver (Ex. 29.[13]). (2) Segōr, the enclosure of the heart, the rending of wh. signifies utter destruction (Ho. 13.[8]). (3) Shabīsīm (Is. 3.[18], EVm. "networks"), prob. represent the ornamented veil worn by women in the E., covering the head, and tucked under the hair behind.

Cave Dwellers at Petra

CAVE. In the limestone rock—the main formation of Pal.—natl. caves abound. They have often been modified by human art, and used for various purposes. In the sandstone of the Edom plateau, caves hollowed out in old time, prob. the homes of the Horites, the anct. cave-dwellers (Gn. 14.[6], &c.), may still be seen, esp. in and around Petra. On the E. of Jordan vast Cs. were transformed practically into underground cities, like that still to be seen at Der'ah, although now unoccupied. In mod. Pal. some vills., e.g. Siloam and Gadara, consist largely of Cs. protected by a wall in front. Cs., prob. dwellings in anct. times, are used to store grain, heavy stone doors being swung in their mouths. Others, carefully cemented, serve as cisterns. One such, of vast extent, under the city of Safed, is said to contain water sufficient for many months for the whole city. The Cs. afforded shelter for the shepherds and their flocks by night, and in stormy weather. They were places of refuge in old times (Gn. 19.[30]; Jo. 10.[16], &c.; see esp. Hist. of David). They were used for sepulture (Gn. 23.[19]; Jn. 11.[38], &c.). They were the haunts of robbers in later times. Herod the Gt. routed out the turbulent occupants of the Cs. in Wādy Ḥamām, the tremendous gorge that breaks back fm. Magdala (Ant. XIV. xv. 5). He also stamped out the banditti harboured in the Cs. of Trachonitis (XV. x. 1).

CEDAR. The C. is the noblest tree in its order (Conifera, "cone-bearers"). In its native home, the Taurus and Lebanon ranges, it attains gigantic stature, and lives through many cents. Although in countries where it has been introduced it yields timber of inferior quality, in its own mountains the wood is fine, close-grained, and greatly valued fm. old time for its aromatic perfume, its beauty, and durability. Remains of the anct. forest that prob. once covered the mountain are found in difft. parts. The most striking is the famous grove at the source of the Kadisha. The Phœnicians who dwelt on the skirt of the mountain were skilful in handling the C., and to them was entrusted the erection of the splendid bldgs. and timber work in Jrs. (2 S. 5.[11], 7.[2]; 1 K. 5.[8], &c.). Part of Solomon's glory was to make C.-wood common in Jrs. (1 K. 10.[27]). It natly. appears in the fig. lang. of Scrip. Jehoash boasts himself a C. agst. the thistle Amaziah (2 K. 14.[9]). The righteous grow in strength and beauty like the C. (Ps. 92.[12], 104.[16]). The C. of Lv. 14.[4] is prob. some species of juniper growing in the wilderness. It is uncert. what tree is meant in Nu. 24.[6].

CENCHREA, RV. correctly Chenchrea, the seaport on the E. side of the isthmus of Corinth, named in connection with Paul's vow (Ac. 18.[18]), and as the home of the deaconess Phœbe (Rm. 16.[1]).

CENSER. Heb. maḥtāh and miqṭoreth; the latter only occurs twice, and both times with a bad connotation (2 Ch. 26.[19]; Ek. 8.[11]), yet etymologically it seems to be the technical word. In Egp. the C. was either a metal spoon or a pot, prob. of earthenware. The former word is elsewhere rendered "snuff-dishes" (Ex. 25.[38]) and "firepans" (Ex. 27.[3]). C. occurs thrice in NT. (Gr. thumiatērion, more prop. "altar of incense" (Heb. 9.[4]), the LXX equivalent of miqṭoreth; libanōtos (Rv. 8.[3]), prop. "frankincense").

Egyptian Censer

CENTURION, the commander of fm. 50 to 100 men in the Rm. army. Although in the extent of his command similar to a "captain," in social position the C. seems more nearly equal to a "sergeant" in our army. Five centurions are mentioned in NT.: the C. whose servant was healed (Mw. 8.[5]); the C. who watched the Cross (Lk. 23.[47]); CORNELIUS, the first Gentile convert (Ac. 10.[1]); the C. told off to superintend the scourging of Paul, who warned the "chief captain" agst. carrying out his purpose; Julius, to whose charge Paul was committed when he was sent to Rm. It is to be noted that they all appear as having acted worthily. The badge of the C. was a vine-twig.

CENTURIONS

CEPHAS. See PETER.

CHAFF. AV. so trs. 4 words. (1) Ḥăshash (Is. 5.[24], 33.[11]), lit. "dry grass." (2) Mōtz (Jb. 21.[18], &c.) consists of the light husks and smaller pieces of straw wh., in the process of winnowing, are often driven by the wind far fm. the threshing-floor. (3) Teben (Jr. 23.[28]), this is the straw broken and crushed by threshing, wh. in winnowing falls in a heap hard by the grain. It is largely used for fodder. It is trd. "straw" in Gn. 24.[25], but "stubble" (Jb. 21.[18]) is wrong. (4) ʿŪr, Aram., of uncert. meaning, prob. the small dust of the threshing-floor. The Gr. achuron (Mw. 3.[12]; Lk. 3.[17]) prob. = teben. Only the refuse is ever burned.

CHAIN, AV. so trs. ḥaḥ, prop. "hook" (Ek. 19.[4, 9]), neḥōsheth, "brass," prob. "fetter" (Jr. 39.[7], &c.), netīphoth, prop. "pendants" (Is. 3.[19]), ḥarūzīm, prop. "strings of jewels." The other words meaning prop. "chain" need not be specified. Cs., esp. of gold, were a mark of distinction and symbol of authority (Gn. 41.[42]; Dn. 5.[7]). They were used for adornment (Nu. 31.[50]), and in ornamental work (Ex. 28.[14]). With Cs. or manacles captives and prisoners were bound (Ps. 149.[8]; Jr. 40.[1], &c.). In NT. demoniacs were, as now, bound with Cs. (Mk. 5.[3]); so Peter (Ac. 12.[6]) and the dragon (Rv. 20.[1]). Prisoners were chained by the wrist to the soldiers in charge of them (Ac. 28.[20], &c.). Criminals in Eastern fortresses to-day may be seen chained together by the ankles.

CHALCEDONY, the third foundation of the New Jrs. (Rv. 21.[19]). The mod. C. is a kind of agate. King (Antique Gems) thinks it was an inferior kind of emerald.

CHALDÆA, CHALDÆANS, in Biblical usage BABYLONIA and BABYLONIANS; earlier Bab. usage seems to have restricted C. to the part of Bab. near the Persian Gulf, as Merodach Baladan is sometimes called the k. of Beit Yakin, and sometimes k. of the country of the Kaldu. In Heb. the C. are called Kasdīm, a name that seems connected with Kassatu; a race that had the supremacy in Bab. about B.C. 1300. The Kaldu seem to have been a race of nomads civilised by contact with the Babs. Tried by the standard of lang. they appear to have been Semites. The use of the MT. in Daniel, wh. seems to make C. the name of a caste of magicians, is due to a false reading. In the majority of instances the LXX omits C. or puts the word in a difft. connection.

CHAMBERLAIN. The word so trd. in EV. is ṣarīṣ, lit. "eunuch" (2 K. 23.[11]; Est. 1.[10], &c.). These men often control the internal arrangements of the oriental palace, supervise the ḥarīm, and exercise great influence with their masters (Ac. 12.[20]). Erastus was city treasurer of Corinth (Rm. 16.[23], RV.), not C. (AV.).

CHAMELEON (Heb. koaḥ, Lv. 11.[30]). The C. is common in Pal., but prob. it is not here intended. The Heb. word means "strength," a characteristic one does not associate with the C. AV. trs. C., following LXX.; RV. "land-crocodile." RV. renders tinshemeth, "chameleon" (Lv. 11.[30], AV. "mole"). The same word appears among the names of birds in v. 18, where it is rendered, RV. "horned owl," AV. and RVm., following LXX, "swan"; so also in Dt. 14.[16]. This suggests some corruption of the text in Lv. 11.[30]. Whatever the koaḥ was, it was prob. among the unclean animals with wh. Isr. cd. not fail to be familiar, both in Egp. and Pal. See J. G. Wood, Bible Animals.

CHAMOIS (Heb. zemer, Dt. 14.[5]), a clean animal of the deer or antelope family. "Chamois," however, of EV., is certainly wrong, as the C. does not occur in either Egp. or Pal. "Camelo-pardus" of LXX and Vlg. is equally untenable. Psh. with greater probability renders "wild sheep." The agility of this animal suggests the goat rather than the sheep (Wood).

CHANCELLOR (Heb. bĕʿēl ṭĕʿēm, lit. "lord of judgment," or "man of commands"), the title of Rehum, one of those who wrote to Artaxerxes agst. Jrs. (Ez. 4.[8, 9, 17]). Sayce connects ṭĕʿēm with Asyr. Dhēm, applied to reports to the Bab. and Asyr. ks. fm. representatives in foreign lands; and wd. tr. "lord of official intelligence," or "post-master."

CHAPEL (Heb. miqdash, "sanctuary"), a mistrn. of AV. in Am. 7.[13], applied to BETHEL. It exhibits, however, the dependence of this sanctuary on the Court, calling it "the k.'s C."

CHAPITER (= Capital), represents three Heb. words: (1) kothereth, "a chaplet" (1 K. 7.[16f.]); "the ornamental upper portion of a column"; applied to the moulding of the "brazen lavers"; (2) tzepheth, of doubtful meaning, used for 1 (2 Ch. 3.[15]); (3) rosh, "head" (Ex. 38.[17]), of the pillars of the TABERNACLE.

CHARGER, the large round tray of metal, wood, or wattled work on wh. cooked food, e.g. meat with rice, is set down for a meal. Cs. of precious metal were esteemed as gifts, as salvers among ourselves.

CHARIOT (Heb. mainly merkābāh and rekeb), an anct. two-wheeled vehicle used for civil (Gn. 41.[43]) and military (Jg. 4.[15]) purposes, drawn usly. by horses, but sometimes by other animals (Is. 21.[7]). The form of the C. was practically the same fm. the times of the Pharaohs to that of the Cæsars; the C. in wh. Joseph rode did not differ essentially fm. that in wh. the Ethiopian eunuch sat and read "Esaias the Prophet."

CHARITY is the AV. tr. of agapē. We shd. read with RV. in every case "love."

CHARM, CHARMER. See DIVINATION.

CHASE. See HUNTING.

CHEBAR, a river of Bab. by the banks of wh. Ezekiel saw his visions (Ek. 1.[1]), not = HABOR (2 K. 17.[6]); poss. a canal (Shaṭṭ en-Nīl): identd. by Hilprecht, Bab. Exp. of the Univ. of Pennsylvania, ix. pp. 27f., 76; Expl. in Bible Lands, p. 411 n.

CHEDORLAOMER (Gn. 14.[1]), k. of ELAM, confederate with AMRAPHEL (LXX, chodollogomor). The name is Elamite: Kudur-Lagamar. In somewhat late inscrs. we find refcs. to the allies of C. as contemporaries; the name of C. also occurs, but fm. the absence of the determinative it is not absolutely cert. that he is a k. During the reign of Ḥammurabi (Amraphel) the supremacy in Bab. passed fm. ELAM to Bab. (see BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA); the occasion of this may have been the overthrow inflicted on C. by ABRAHAM at Hobah (Gn. 14.[15]).

CHEESE. See FOOD.

CHEMARIM, pl. of chomer, of Aram. origin (Zp. 1.[4]). It is trs. "idolatrous priests" (2 K. 23.[5]; Ho. 10.[5]). It has this evil sense in these three passages, but in the Syr. it carries no reproach.

CHEMOSH (Heb. Kĕmōsh), the name of the supreme Deity of the MOABITES (1 K. 11.[33]). JEPHTHAH appears to regard C. as supreme God of the AMMONITES (Jg. 11.[24]); it has been suggd. that the reading shd. be "Milcom." C., however, was prob. an attributive made a name, as Milcom or Molech cert. was; the fr. of Mesha seems to have been called Chemosh-Molech: the separation between C. and Molech may have been a later development.

CHEPHAR-AMMONI (AV. C.-HAAMMONAI), "vill. of the Ammonites," in Benjamin (Jo. 18.[24]), prob. = Kefr 'Ānā, c. 2 miles N.E. of Bethel.

CHEPHIRAH, a vill. of the Hivites, near Gibeon in Benj. (Jo. 9.[17], &c.), the mod. Kefīreh, c. 5 miles S.W. of el-Jib.

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES. The former of these fig. as a branch of the Phil. settled in the Negeb (1 S. 30.[14]); the latter seem a variation of Phil. As the Phil. came fm. CAPHTOR, wh. has been identd. with Crete, it has been argued that C. = "Cretans." These two races formed David's bodyguard (2 S. 8.[18]); the Swiss Guards of the later French kings are brought forward as an analogue. There is no cert. indication of their existence after the first yrs. of the reign of Solomon. C. are called "Carites" in RVm., following the Ktīb.

CHERITH, THE BROOK (1 K. 17.[3, 5]), was "before," i.e. "E. of Jordan," therefore not Wādy Qelt. In some unknown retreat among the gorges of his native uplands, familiar enough to him, the prophet fm. Gilead wd. find safe asylum.

CHERUBIM AND SERAPHIM, attendants on the Divine Majesty in a Theophany. In the record the fig. of C. is presumed to be familiar to the Isr.; no description is given, and we have to deduce the form of the C. and S. fm. what is said about them. That the C. had wings appears fm. Ex. 25.[20]. In the first appearance of C. they are associated with a "flaming sword" that guarded the "way of the tree of Life." In Ek. 10.[20] we have what at first sight purports to be a description of C., but when looked at more attentively this becomes more doubtful. We sometimes find the whole combined manifestation is one C. (Ek. 9.[3]); sometimes the four "living creatures" are regarded as each C., and so are referred to in the plural (Ek. 10.[1]). Again (Ek. 10.[21]), we are told "every one had four faces"; yet in v. 14 we learn that "the first face was the face of a C." We have to do, it wd. seem, with a very fluid symbol. At first C. was the symbol of storm, taking the place of the storm-cloud (Ps. 18.[10]); in Ek. the symbol appears to be extended to take in all nature. The C. are the sptl. beings behind physical phenomena. While C. are regarded as the sptl. side of the "storm-cloud," the "chariot of JHWH," the S. were the sptl. side of the lightning flashes that came fm. the cloud. Further as the HOLY SPIRIT is the Divine Hypostasis by wh. God realises Himself in things, the C. and S. may be regarded in their collective capacity as symbolising, in a rudimentary way, the third Person of the Trinity. The "seven Spirits wh. are before His Throne" are usly. regarded by orthodox divines as completing the Holy Trinity, with "Him wh. is and wh. was and wh. is to come," and "Jesus Christ the Faithful Witness, the First-begotten of the Dead, the Prince of the Kings of the Earth." It may be noted that "the four Beasts" (RV. "living creatures") represent the naturalistic side of the sacred symbol. But at the same time they have a cert. individuality ascribed to them. What has been said of the C. applies also to the S., wh. are C. regarded fm. a special point of view. There does not seem to be any connection with the winged bulls of the Ninevite palaces, save that both are composite symbols. The hist. of the degradation of the tremendous beings of Isaiah's and Ezekiel's visions to the chubby child's face, with wings and no body, is a somewhat amusing episode in the development of art. In the first place, while four wings were assigned to each CHERUB, they had only one face each, and that of childlike roundness; two of the four wings covered the feet, wh. were thus only indicated; the hands also were inconspicuous. In the next stage only the four wings were seen, and that in a somewhat tangled condition, as if the artist was encumbered by at least the second pair. The last step was to have only two wings and these of small size, while the face was undisguisedly that of a child.

CHESALON, on the N. border of Judah (Jo. 15.[10]) = Kesla, c. 2 miles N. of Kiriath-Jearim.

CHEST (Heb. 'ārōn, usly. trd. "ark," e.g. "ark of the Covenant": not, however, of Noah's "Ark"), used of the box for offerings made by Jehoiada (2 K. 12.[9]).

CHESTNUT TREE. The C. does not grow in Pal., so it was not indicated by 'armōn (Gn. 30.[37]; Ek. 31.[8]). The plane tree grows luxuriantly, and forms just such an impressive object as the prophet clearly alludes to. The branches wd. lend themselves to such a purpose as that of Jacob. Naturalists agree in identifying 'armōn with the plane.

CHESULLOTH (Jo. 19.[18]) = Chisloth Tabor (19.[12]), on the border of Zebulun. It is the mod. Iksāl, on the N. edge of Esdraelon, c. 3 miles W. of Tabor.

Another interpretation takes C. to mean "pedestal"—a rendering that has little to recommend it save the AV. tr. of Ṣikkūth as "tabernacle," wh. is genly. abandoned now. Prob. we shd. render "idol" instead of "images"; and recognise in the word trd. "star" the name of another deity.

CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST.

CHRIST, PERSON OF. The question which Jesus asked His disciples at Cæsarea Philippi, "Who say ye that I am?" is still the central one for Christianity. Peter's answer to that question was, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Mw. 16.[16]; in Mk. 8.[29], "Thou art the Christ"). What do the words of this confession mean? The answer of the Apostolic Church, which the Church in all ages has accepted as its own, is not obscure. Christ is the eternal Son of God, manifested on earth for man's salvation—true Man and true God in the unity of one Person. Often as the attempt has been made to remove Christ from this high dignity (Ebionites, Gnostics, Arians, Socinians, Humanitarians, &c.), the attempt has invariably broken down. The present age witnesses a new endeavour on the part of the adherents of a non-miraculous Christianity to interpret Christ in terms of mere humanity, but it may be predicted this, like the attempts which have preceded it, will end in failure. The facts will not fit into it. No historical Church (Latin, Greek, Protestant) has yet suggested the removal of this article from its creed, nor would it stand long if it did.

The doctrine of the Person of Christ, as the Church has held it, involves three points. (1) That Christ was true man—possessed humanity in its integrity. (2) That Christ was more than man—the Son of God, existing from eternity, Divine in nature as the Father is Divine. (3) That in Christ Divinity and humanity existed in the unity of a single Person. It is believed that this doctrine rests on Biblical data—is, indeed, nothing more than what Scripture teaches on the Person of the Redeemer.

I. A glance may be taken, first, at the Old Testament preparation for this doctrine of a Divine and human Christ. Messianic prophecy is sometimes said not to transcend the limits of an earthly king. This, however, is hardly the case. (1) Ps. 45. cannot be pressed in this connection, though its language is applied to Christ in Heb. 1.$^{8, 9}$. But other Messianic psalms, e.g. Ps. 2., 72., 110., do seem to transcend the limits of ordinary humanity. It is in no mere strain of Oriental eulogy that a King is looked for who is set by Divine decree at God's right hand, who shall reign for ever, in whom, in fulfilment of the oracle to Abraham, all nations shall be blessed. (2) The Immanuel oracle, culminating in the marvellous announcement, "Unto us a child is born," &c. (Is. 7.^{14}, 8.^{8}, 9.$^{6, 7}$), has a grandeur and breadth which imply Divine prerogatives: "God with us" (Mw. 1.^{23}). (3) The servant of Jehovah, especially as depicted in Is. 53., is rejected and put to death, yet enjoys a triumph which means a Divine exaltation (vv. 10–12). (4) The One "like unto a Son of Man," in Dn. 7.^{13}, to whom is given an everlasting kingdom (v. 14), was naturally identified with the Messianic King, and in later Apocalypse (Enoch) was regarded as Divine. Similarly, "the Messenger of the Covenant" in Ml. 3.$^{1-3}$ has attributes which transcend humanity. While the theocratic King is in this way practically invested with Divine attributes, there is no speculation as to the nature of His Person.

II. It is to what is narrated and taught about Christ Himself in the New Testament that we naturally turn for full instruction on His Person. The high Christology of the Epistles is hardly disputed. But it is contended by many that the doctrine of the Epistles is contradicted by the picture of the historical Christ in the Gospels. A distinction is again drawn between the Synoptic Gospels, which, it is alleged, know nothing of Christ's dignity, and the fourth Gospel. This, it is allowed, does teach it, but is set aside as a product of later theological reflection. It may be shown, however, that, while certain contrasts must be admitted, these are overstrained when held to imply an essentially different view of Christ's Person.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—Interwoven with the picture of Jesus in these Gospels are superhuman traits which no ingenuity of criticism can remove. Jesus is truly human, yet supernatural in a sense and degree which it requires the apostolic doctrine to explain and justify. The two names which are given to Christ in the Gospels attest this—"Son of Man" and "Son of God." (1) The one name affirms His unique relation to humanity. He is true and perfect man. He represents universal humanity. Not "Son of David," or "Son of Abraham" only, but "the Son of Man." The title may be suggested by Daniel, and have Messianic significance. But as it came from Christ's consciousness (He alone uses it) it meant a sense of relation to the race. (2) The other name affirms a like unique relation to God. He is not "Son" only, but "the Son" in a peculiar and incommunicable sense (Mw. 11.^{27}). He constantly in speech distinguishes His own relation to the Father from that of His disciples. He claimed the title "Son of God" in a sense which the High Priest interpreted as blasphemy (Mw. 26.$^{63-65}$; cp. Jn. 1.$^{49-51}$, 10.$^{33-36}$). In the baptismal formula He is united as Son with the Father and the Holy Spirit (Mw. 28.^{19}).

More particularly, no one now will doubt that in the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is represented (1) as partaker of a true humanity. The Gnostic fiction of a phantasmal Christ finds no support in these narratives. Jesus is born of a human mother; grows in wisdom and stature; hungers, thirsts, sleeps, is weary; is sustained by food; suffers pain; endures temptation; sorrows, weeps, rejoices; is moved with indignation; at length dies upon the Cross. A truer man never lived. The tendency in these days is not to question Christ's humanity, but to resolve everything into it. He is not only man, but perfect man—the ideal or archetype of humanity.

But (2) into the framework of this picture of one truly human what wonderful traits that transcend humanity are continually wrought! Not here and there, in features that might be removed, and leave the general representation intact, but as part of the total picture. Christ is miraculously born—so the only two Gospels that narrate His earthly origin affirm (Mw. 1., 2.; Lk. 1., 2.). He is perfectly sinless. Through His whole life He separates Himself in consciousness from sinners—puts Himself over against them on the side of God as their Saviour. He is the Holy One (Lk. 1.^{35}; Mk. 1.^{24}). He is announced by the Baptist as the Baptizer with the Holy Spirit (Mw. 3.^{11}), and Himself bestows the Spirit (Luke 24.^{49}). He represents Himself as the goal and fulfilment of all Old Testament revelation (Mw. 5.^{17}, 12.^{6}, 26.$^{24, 31, 54}$; Mk. 9.^{12}; Lk. 4.$^{17-21}$, 22.^{37}, 24.$^{27, 44}$, &c.). He is the Christ—the Messiah—at once the Founder of the Kingdom of God and Lord over it (Mw. 16.$^{16-19, 27, 28}$, 25.$^{31ff.}$, &c.). All power and authority have been given Him in heaven and on earth (Mw. 11.^{27}, 28.^{18}). He performs stupendous miracles on nature and on man—stills the storm, raises the dead. He announces His coming again to judge the world, and proclaims Himself the Judge—the arbiter of the everlasting destinies of men (Mw. 25.[31ff.], &c.). On one supreme occasion He was gloriously transfigured (Mw. 17.[1-8], &c.). His death is voluntary (Mw. 26.[53]), but after His death and burial He rises again from the dead. Can any one affirm that this is the image of One who can be put in a frame of mere humanity? It is not there the Gospels put Him. We have seen that the Son is joined with the Father and the Holy Spirit in the one Name into which we are baptized (Mw. 28.[19]). Not without good reason does Bousset declare that "already the oldest Gospel is written from the standpoint of faith; already for Mark is Jesus not only the Messiah of the Jewish people, but the miraculous eternal Son of God" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? p. 54).

2. The Gospel of John.—The representation in the Gospel of John is not essentially different, except that the Divine side of Christ's Person, in accordance with the aim of the Gospel (John 20.[31]), is now put in the forefront, and the discourses and miracles are selected with a view to illustrate Christ's Divine Sonship.

(1) The key to the Gospel is given in the prologue. "The Word became flesh" (1.[14]). "The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (v. 18). The "Word" (Logos) who became "flesh" was in the fullest sense Divine. "The Word was with God, and the Word was God" (v. 1). He was the Divine agent in creation (v. 3). Stress is laid in various sayings on Christ's pre-existence. He was "before Abraham" (8.[58]). He had glory with the Father before the world was (17.[5, 24]). As in the Synoptics, all authority is given to Him (17.[2]). The chief point of contrast with the Synoptics is that in the latter this clear declaration of pre-existence is wanting. This, however, only proves the fidelity of the Evangelists in recording Christ's utterances. Not one of them but knew and believed that Christ had pre-existed. But they never put this claim in Christ's own mouth. It could not be looked for at a time when Christ had not yet publicly proclaimed His Messiahship, or in discourses and parables addressed to Galilean multitudes. Even in John it occurs only rarely. Yet, as the passage quoted from Bousset shows, it is implied in what the Evangelists do say about Jesus. If Christ was Divine, pre-existence follows.

(2) But, again, not less than in the Synoptics is Jesus in John's Gospel truly human. "The Word became flesh" (1.[14]). He had human needs and wants, experienced human emotions, was tenderly sympathetic, had mental trouble as His hour drew near (12.[27]). It is John who preserves the trait of His being "wearied" at the well (4.[6]), of His "weeping" and "groaning" at the grave of Lazarus (11.[33-38]), of His saying on the cross, "I thirst" (19.[28]). He died a true death, and experienced a true resurrection. Yet through the humanity a Divine glory shone. It was from what John beheld in Him as man that he rose to think of Him as the only-begotten of the Father (1.[14]).

3. The Book of Acts agrees with the Gospels in seeing in Jesus One who was perfectly human yet truly Divine. He was "a man approved of God by mighty works, and wonders, and signs which God did by Him" (2.[22]: Peter takes the people here on their own ground); but He had been exalted to be "both Lord and Christ" at God's right hand (vv. 34–36), and had poured forth the Spirit on the Church. He was the ordained "Judge of living and dead" (10.[42], 17.[31]). Only through Him can men be saved (4.[12], 10.[43]).

4. The Epistles and Revelation.—(1) The perfect humanity of Jesus is attested or implied continually. Christ was "born of a woman" (Gal. 4.[4]), was "born of the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rm. 1.[3]; 2 Tm. 2.[8]), took flesh and blood (He. 2.[14]), was made in all things, except sin, like unto His brethren (Rm. 8.[3]; He. 2.[17], 4.[15]), endured temptation (He. 2.[18]), prayed "with strong crying and tears," was made perfect through suffering (He. 5.[7-9]). The mark of Antichrist, according to John, was the denial that Jesus had "come in the flesh" (1 J. 4.[2, 3]).

(2) As undeniably is Jesus conceived of in the Epistles of Paul, John, and Peter, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Book of Revelation, as a Being truly Divine. "Existing," Paul says, "in the form of God," He "emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant" (Php. 2.[6, 7]). He created all things in heaven and in earth (Col. 1.[16]). All things are "through Him, and unto Him; and He is before all things, and in Him all things consist" (vv. 16, 17). Similarly in Hebrews, "through whom He [God] made the worlds"; "Upholding all things by the word of His power" (1.[2, 3]). In Revelation, He is "the Alpha and Omega," "the first and the last" (1.[8, 17]). Divine worship is ordained to be paid to Him (Php. 2.[9, 10]; 1 P. 3.[22]; He. 1.[6]; Rv. 5.[11-14]). In every Epistle He is conjoined with the Father, sometimes with the Father and the Holy Spirit, as the Source of blessing to the Church. The recurring formula is: "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rm. 1.[7], and generally). Cp. the Trinitarian passages (1 Cor. 12.[4-6]; 2 Cor. 13.[14]; 1 P. 1.[2]; Rv. 1.[4, 5]). Theological difficulties as to the union of Divine and human in this one Person have not yet arisen. But that the Son is regarded as at once Divine and human, and this in the most perfect sense, is beyond reasonable question.

III. The questions which the New Testament writers do not yet raise could not but arise for the later thought of the Church. How is this union of divinity and humanity in one Person to be construed? The rise of heresy and error—negations or mutilations of the truth on one side or the other (Gnostic denials of the humanity; Ebionitic and Unitarian denials of the divinity; Arian denials of eternity and full Godhead, &c.)—made reflection on and testimony for the complete truth imperative. The problem also was one which, for its own satisfaction, the Church had to consider. Many answers were attempted, but most had to be rejected. Apollinarianism sought to substitute the Divine Logos for the rational soul in Jesus; but this was rightly pronounced a mutilation of the humanity. Nestorianism conceived of the union as a moral "indwelling" of the personal Logos in the human soul of Jesus: this was rejected as a dissolving of the unity of the Person. Eutychianism spoke of a blending of the natures, or of an absorption of the human in the Divine; this was repelled as repugnant to the distinctness of the natures. In A.D. 451 the Council of Chalcedon affirmed the unity of the Person of Christ "in two natures," without confusion, conversion, division, or separation, and this doctrine has passed into the creeds of the Greek, Latin, and Protestant Churches.

The Chalcedonian decision states a truth, but leaves the problem of the how of the union unresolved. Modern Christologies have too often cut the knot by rejecting the Divine Person, and reverting to a more or less disguised Humanitarianism. Jesus is God-filled man—or even less. Against this the teaching of Scripture, as traced above, the consciousness of the Christian Church, and the need of a Divine Saviour for the ends of redemption, unite in protest. A peculiar form of modern Christology is the "Kenotic." On this view the Incarnation meant the laying aside by the Son of God of His Divine glory, attributes, and even consciousness; His abdication for the time of His place and functions in the Godhead; and His being born as a human babe with all the limitations which that state implied. His Divine glory is resumed at the exaltation. Such a renunciation of the attributes of Godhead, however, as this theory supposes, must be pronounced an inconceivability; nor is there anything in Scripture to warrant such a view. The humiliation of Jesus relates only to His earthly manifestation Difficult as the conception may be, there seems to be implied in the Incarnation a twofold state of being, corresponding to Christ's twofold nature as God and Man. As in John: "No one hath ascended into heaven, but He that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man, who is in heaven" (3.[13]).

The question is frequently raised in modern times: How does the Incarnation affect Christ's human knowledge? On one side there have been those who denied all limitation in Christ's knowledge—all ignorance. On the other side are those who freely impute to Christ not only ignorance of most things, but abundance of error. Neither view can be justified. That Christ was humanly ignorant in spheres that lay beyond His Messianic vocation is implied in what is said of His growth in "wisdom and stature" (Lk. 2.[52]), and indeed in His assumption of a true humanity. Calvin, commenting on Lk. 2.[40], says: "If we do not choose to deny that Christ was made a real man, we ought not to be ashamed to acknowledge that He voluntarily took upon Him everything that is inseparable from human nature." In this he includes ignorance. In one notable case Jesus disclaims knowledge of the time of His own Advent (Mk. 13.[32]). Ignorance, however, does not necessarily imply error. From that it must be held that Christ's mind was free, even as it was from sin.

CHRISTIAN, a name coined by the Antiochians for the followers of Christ, c. A.D. 43 (Ac. 11.[26]). It is used by Agrippa (Ac. 26.[28]), and appears again in 1 P. 4.[16]. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), and Suetonius (Nero 16), use it as a familiar name of Christ's followers. The Jews wd. refrain fm. its use because of the significance attaching to the name "Christ" = "Messiah." If it were a term of contempt, this wd. explain why, at first, it was seldom used by Christians; and not until well into the second Christian cent. do we find them gen. so describing themselves.

CHRONICLES, I. and II. (Heb. Dibrê hayyāmīm, "the events of the days," Gr. paraleipomenon, "Appendices"). Our English name is derived fm. Jerome, who in the list of OT. Bks. in Prologus Galeatus calls this Bk. CHRONICA; this name has been gen. adopted in European VV., e.g. Luther's German and Osterwald's French. Originally it was one bk.; but the unwieldy size of a papyrus roll large enough to contain the whole of C. led, as in the case of Samuel and Kings, to its division. The relation of C. to EZRA and NEHEMIAH has occasioned some diffc. of opinion. The almost universal opinion of mod. scholars is that EZRA and NEHEMIAH formed one bk. with C.; on the other hand the early Jewish opinion appears to have separated C. from Ezra and Nehemiah; the received LXX, the Psh., Melito of Sardis, and Jerome all separate the bks. The Tlm. (Baba Bathra), while assigning the writing of C. to Ezra, separates C. fm. Ezra's own bk. The Apcr. bk. of 1 (3) Esdras begins with 2 Ch. 35., and, going to the end of the bk., contains the whole of the canonical Ezra with the 8th chap. of Nehemiah, inserting the episode concerning Truth after the 4th chap. of the canonical Ezra (Ezra and Esdras [Apcr.]): a phenomenon wh. seems to indicate that at some point in the evolution of the Canon, C., and at all events a portion of Ezra and Nehemiah, formed one bk. The structure of Nehemiah will be considered under Ezra and Nehemiah.

Contents.—C. may be regarded as an epitome of the hist. of the world fm. Adam to the Decree of Cyrus restoring the Jews. To the end of chap. 9. we have the genealogies mainly extracted fm. earlier Canonical bks. with notes frequently drawn fm. sources now lost, e.g. 1 C. 7.[21, 22]. The writer seems originally to have intended to give a genealogy for each of the Tribes of Israel; if he carried out his plan the portions referring to two have not come down to us. The most noticeable feature is the prominence given to the Tribes of Levi and Judah; to some extent also of Benjamin. The Temple stood close to the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, and the function of the Levites was found in the Temple worship. The next portion (1 C. 10.–29.) is occupied with the reign of David. There are many insertions and omissions, condensations and amplifications, wh. make the narr. of C. different fm. that of S. and K.; the purpose of these apparently is to concentrate the reader's attention on the Temple. David's conquest of Jerusalem, where the Temple was to be, and his making it his Capital; the bringing up of the Ark fm. Kirjath-Jearim first to the house of Obed-Edom, and then to Jerusalem; his foreign conquests, and the treasures of gold and silver wh. he thence acquired and stored up for use in the adornment of the Temple; his desire to build a Temple; his purchase of the threshing-floor of Araunah; his appointment of Solomon as his successor; and his directions to him as to the bldg. of the Temple—all prove that this was the point fm. wh. the author considered the hist. of David, and indeed of Isr. The hist. reaches its culmination in the act. of the reign of Solomon, wh. occupies the first 9 chaps. of 2nd C.; all notice of Solomon's declension is omitted, and even his literary activity (1 K. 4.[29-33]); Solomon has an interest for the writer only as the k. who built the Temple. The rest of the bk. exhibits the same characteristics. After Rehoboam's loss of the Northern Kdm. and the plunder of the Temple by Shishak, those ks. are made prominent whose efforts were directed to the reform of worship, or the repair of the Temple. Abijah, although not commended in 1 K., is honoured because of the speech assigned to him in wh. he glorifies the Temple and its worship. His son Asa has 3 chaps. devoted to him; his victory over the Ethiopians wh. followed his putting down of idolatry in his kdm. (14.); the further manifestation of his zeal and his great sacrifice (15.); his fall, his taking of the Temple treasures to hire Benhadad's help agst. Baasha, k. of Isr. (16.). Jehoshaphat has a yet larger space devoted to him because he continued the work of reformation; nevertheless he makes alliance with the wicked house of Omri, falls into danger and suffers loss on this act. (18.); is rebuked because of it by Jehu, s. of Hanani, and submits (19.); thereafter he gains a great victory over the combined forces of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir (20.). The wicked reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, and the usurpation of Athaliah, are more summarily treated. The nar. expands when it relates the hist. of Jehoash, the Temple child; his being hid, anointed, and proclaimed k. in the Temple (23.); his zeal for the repair of the Temple during the lifetime of Jehoiada, his preserver; his declension, punishment, and death (24.). Amaziah, Uzziah, and Jotham, warlike, and on the whole prosperous ks., are passed over with greater brevity; their activity had little to do with the Temple. Of Uzziah it is recorded that he attempted to desecrate the Temple by usurping the Priest's office and offering incense: but God smote him with leprosy. The evil reign of Ahaz, and the punishments inflicted on him because of his idolatries, occupy chap. 28. As to the reign of Hezekiah, the nar. of C., when compared with that in 2 K., is in parts fuller, and in parts more condensed; the parts relating to his reformation of the Temple worship, his celebration of the Passover, are dwelt on at considerable length; while his deliverance fm. Sennacherib, his recovery fm. sickness, the message of the Bab. ambassadors to him, are condensed (29.–32.). Although the reign of Manasseh is the longest of all the ks. whether of Judah or Isr., yet the narration of it occupies only 20 vv., nearly the half of this space being taken up with his captivity, repentance, and consequent efforts at the restoration of the Temple worship, incidents that have no place in the bk. of K. The concluding vv. of chap. 33. suffice for the short and wicked rule of Amon. The reformation of worship and of morals, and the repair of the Temple connected with Josiah are expanded fm. the nar. of K.; dwelt on at yet greater length is his Passover. His annexation of the provinces of the N. Kdm. in the confusion that accompanied the fall of the Empire of the Sargonids is passed over without notice (34., 35.). The reigns of the four ks. after the fall of Jrs., and the edict of Cyrus, are related in the space of a score of verses. When we treat of Ezra we shall find similar prominence given to the Temple. After this summary of its contents, it will be obvious that C. is primarily a hist. of the Temple and its worship, with passing refcs. to contemporary events.

Sources.—The Genealogies in the 1st chap. are apparently taken fm. Gn.; some of those that follow are drawn fm. Ex., Nu., Jo., and S. The other genealogical lists are prob. taken fm. the records preserved by cert. families; that there were such registers is proved by the sons of Barzillai (Ez. 2.[62]; Ne. 7.[64]), who claimed to be Aaronites but were unable to find "their register." Some of the histl. notes, e.g. 4.[38-43], 7.[21-23], owe their origin to this source. In the chaps. following the genealogies there are elaborate refcs. to authorities. (1) "The Bk. of the Ks. of Isr. and Judah"; apparently = the "Bk. of the Ks. of Isr.," "The doings of the Ks. of Isr." (2) The bks. of various prophets, e.g. "The words of Samuel the Seer," "The words of Nathan the Prophet," and "The words of Gad the Seer" (1 Ch. 29.[29]), "The Story (midrash) of the Prophet Iddo" (2 Ch. 13.[22]), &c.; poss., however, all these prophets wrote the annals of their successive times in a condensed shape, each message being in its turn added to the document that is now our "Bks. of Kings." This view is confirmed by 2 Ch. 32.[32], "The rest of the acts of Hezekiah . . . are written in the Vision of Isaiah the Prophet, the s. of Amoz, in the bk. of the Ks. of Judah and Isr.": see also 2 Ch. 20.[34] RV., Kings I. and II. There are, however, numerous cases where events are recorded of wh. there is no trace in the Bks. of Kings, e.g. "the falling away of Asa" (2 Ch. 16.), "Jehoshaphat's victory in the Valley of Berachah" (2 Ch. 20.[1-30]), and "Pekah's victorious expedition into Judah in the reign of Ahaz" (2 Ch. 28.[5-15]); these seem to have been extracted fm. prophetic Lit., although not inserted in our Bks. of Kings. (3) The lists of David's "mighty men," of those that came to him to Ziklag, of the singers, the musicians appointed by David, were prob. drawn fm. official documents. The relation of the Chronicler seems in some points to have been slavish dependence without adequate understanding; in others his modifications have been much greater than mod. historians permit themselves. This is most observable in regard to numbers wh. are increased beyond all reasonable belief. In this case, however, it is prob. we have to do with the megalomania of a later Jewish scribe. With regard to C. and most of the Kĕthubim, accuracy of transcription was not protected by Synagogue reading.

Historicity.—Putting to the one side the misdirected efforts of the ambitious redactor, we find, as we have already remarked, a slavish dependence on the sources. A well-known proof of this is 1 Ch. 25.[4b], in wh. a portion of a Psalm has accidentally dropped into the genealogy of Heman; the Chronicler has split the lines into nine names.

Some of the resulting names are common enough: e.g. Hananiah and Hanani; the others, while not occurring elsewhere, can be paralleled in form. This portion of the verse does not appear in the Psh. While in MT. 6 out of the 14 names in this verse are repeated in relating the order of the courses of the singers, in Psh. the names that are doubtful assume a difft. form: e.g. Romanti-ezer (MT.) becomes in the Psh. Rûmon; and Joshbekashah (MT.) becomes Eliashib (Psh.). This accidental intrusion does not seem to have been found in the Bab. copies fm. wh. the Psh. was trd. Sometimes when omitting an incident fm. his source the Chronicler quotes words and phrases wh. imply the portion he has omitted: e.g. 2 Ch. 10.[15] refers to Ahijah's prophecy, wh. yet is omitted. Some of the documents on wh. the Chronicler relied may not have been contemporary with the events, and some of them may have suffered fm. the hands of interpolators, but he seems to have given us a fairly accurate version of what they recorded. It is not scientific to degrade C. because it opposes the momentarily reigning hypothesis as to Jewish hist., and declare its statements to be "in conflict with the known course of history" (Curtiss, HDB.). Some of the events wh. we know only fm. C., and wh. were supposed to be instances of flagrant inaccuracy, e.g. the captivity of Manasseh in Bab., have been proved to be at least prob. In the case of Manasseh, the idolater and persecutor, whose iniquities had caused the destruction of Jrs., who was believed to have put Isaiah to death, whose evil reputation appears in unsoftened harshness in the reign of Nero when the Ascension of Isaiah was written, it seems improb., almost imposs., that a writer shd. invent for him a repentance, even if preceded by a captivity. The singular piece of historic accuracy in sending him to "Bab." rather than to Nineveh, when Esar-haddon had been crowned k. of Bab., treating it, along with Nineveh, as the twin capital of his empire, can scarcely be attributed to luck. The case of 2 S. 21.[19], compared with 1 Ch. 20.[5], seems at first sight an obvious effort of the harmoniser, but when the passages are looked at more carefully this does not seem so clear. It is admitted that the passage in S. is corrupt, that Jaare-oregim, "forest of weavers," is not a man's name, and that Jair in C. is more prob. In the Psh. the name is given as Malaph-zequri, "teacher of weaving," wh. seems an effort to put a sense into the Masoretic name. The 'ahi, "brother of," of the original document, has been confounded with 'eth, the sign of the accusative.

C. records the Hist. of the Temple, and of Judah and Jrs. so far as involved in it. Fm. this point of view it may be taken as accurate.

Style.—That the Heb. of C. is relatively late is what mt. be expected in a post-exilic bk.; but this may easily be exaggerated. When we compare C. with Ec. we find far more traces of lateness in the latter bk.; in Ec. we have the short relative so frequent in Talmudic; the vav conversive is rarely used. If we apply these tests to C. we find the Chronicler regularly uses the vav conversive, and never employs the short relative. Making allowance for the diffc. between prose and poetry, the Heb. of C. has a close resemblance to that of Haggai and the earlier chaps. of Zechariah. Shd. it be said that the Chronicler imitated the earlier and more classic style: agst. this it is to be noted that style, as an indication of a period, was not recognised; the writer of Ec. cd. claim to be Solomon, and have his claim allowed without making any attempt to avoid the peculiarities of his own time.

Date and Author.—Fm. the style, as above noted, C. wd. seem to be nearly contemporary with Haggai and Zechariah. Agst. this is to be put the fact that in the genealogy of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[19-24]), Anani, the last name, is of the 6th generation after Zerubbabel; in Ne. 12.[10-11] the priestly genealogy is carried down to Jaddua of the 5th generation; Jos. makes Jaddua contemporary with Alexander the Great, a view that is confirmed by vv. 22f., "the priests to the reign of Darius the Persian"—this "Darius" being, fm. the connection, Darius Codomannus who was overthrown by Alexander. These stages in descent occur only in two genealogies—the priestly, wh. was cert. kept with great care, and the Davidic, wh. was kept prob. with scarcely less care. A copyist who wished to bring the nar. up to date wd. have no difficulty in adding the various names: in both passages there are traces of interpolation. These later members of the genealogies are prob. due to the editor who exaggerated the numbers. Jewish tradition, alike in the Tlm. (Jw. En.) and the Apocalyptic 2nd Esdras, points out Ezra as the writer. Everything in the char. of Ezra suits the contents and style of C. Despite the adverse weight of critical opinion, we think that C. was originally written by Ezra, and edited about the time of Alexander the Great. This hypothesis appears to act. for all the phenomena.

CHRONOLOGY, the science of dating events in relation to other events. The earliest system of dating that has come down to us is by the yr. of the reign of the monarch. When people began to have a Calendar, that is before any extant hist., the relation of the regnal yr. to the Calendar became a matter of importance. The most common way was to reckon the first yr. of the k. that during wh. he ascended the throne, even though it mt. be in its last month: this method was genly. adopted. It has obvious disadvantages. The first yr. of one sovereign has been already denoted as the 13th or 14th, or whatever the number mt. be of his predecessor: thus at each change of monarch a yr. was added. Again, when a k. assumed his s. as colleague; it became a matter of doubt whether the regnal yrs. of a monarch who had been colleague with his fr. and survived him, shd. be reckoned fm. the date of his assumption as colleague, or fm. his reign as sole monarch; this is a frequent cause of confusion in the C. of the Bks. of Kings. The Babs. got rid of these difficulties by reckoning the first yr. of a sovereign that wh. began on the New Year after his accession; the portion of the preceding yr. wh. was included in his reign was called "the beginning of his reign"; so 2 K. 25.[27]. If there were colleagueships on the throne during the Bab. supremacy, no trace is left on the contract tables. The Asyr. C., though not reckoned on the Bab. system, is also very precise. The Egyptian methods are less reliable. Whether the various dyns. are to be regarded as all successive, or some of them as contemporaneous, is yet in doubt. When a synchronism can be got, it is clearly a great advantage in chronological investigation. It is esp. advantageous in regard to the C. of the Bible; the Christian Revelation in both Testaments is distinguished fm. every other Lit. claiming to have a Divine origin, in that it claims to be the hist. of a Divine process, related by human agency. While the Divine thought must be present there is also always the possibility of error. Biblical Hist. embraces the two Testaments; there is between the end of the first and the beginning of the second a period of four centuries and a half wh. need be little more than referred to. Fm. the contact with the Greek power every event during that period is brought into relation with the Era of the Seleucids, and through it with the Rm., ab urbe condita (AUC.) "fm. the foundation of the City." Neglecting then this intermediate period, there are two series of dates to be considered, the OT. and the NT.; these we take in order.

The Chronology of the Old Testament.—This occupies the period fm. the Creation to the end of the 2nd Governorship of Nehemiah; that is to say, on the received C. of Ussher, fm. B.C. 4004 to B.C. 430. This must be divided into several shorter periods accdg. to the relation in wh. they respectively stand to known external hist. (1) There is what may be called the Prehistoric: fm. the Creation to the Call of Abraham. This period is divided in two by the Flood. Here no events are narrated and no persons named in the sacred Hist. that can be identified in profane. (2) Semi-historic: fm. the Call of Abraham to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple. This period, like the former, is divided into two by an outstanding event—in this case the Exodus. While there are refcs. in the Bible story to events and persons known fm. other sources, there are no corrspdg. refcs. fm. profane hist. to any Biblical person or event. It embraces about a millennium and a quarter; fm., approximately, B.C. 2200 to B.C. 950. (3) Historic: fm. the Foundation of the Temple to the 2nd Governorship of Nehemiah; approximately fm. B.C. 950 to B.C. 430. Regarding this shorter period we have fuller information, and may divide it as follows: (a) Fm. the founding of the Temple to the Revolt of the Northern Tribes. (b) Fm. the Revolt of the Northern Tribes to the Fall of the House of Omri. (c) Fm. the Fall of the House of Omri to the Fall of Samaria. (d) Fm. the Fall of Samaria to the Capture of Jrs. by Nebuchadnezzar. (e) Fm. the Capture of Jrs. to the Decree of Cyrus. (f) Fm. the Decree of Cyrus to that of Darius. (g) Fm. that to the 2nd Governorship of Nehemiah, B.C. 430.

(1) The Prehistoric Period.—In calling this period prehistoric we do not imply that the events narrated did not happen, or that the persons named never lived, but that the events have come down to us in a parabolic or mythic form. The questions raised as to the historicity of the Bible nar. here are discussed under Babel, Fall, Flood: we have to do here only with the sequence of events and the time occupied by them. As we have already said, this period falls into two parts.

(a) Fm. the Creation of Adam to the Deluge. Accdg. to the received C., wh. we owe to Archbishop Ussher, the Creation occurred B.C. 4004. It seems imposs. to evade or deny the evidence wh. goes to show that man has lived upon the earth much longer than 6000 yrs. Even admitting the full force of the arguments wh. mt. enable us to shorten the Egpn. dates by regarding many of the dyns. as contemporary, we cannot place Menes later than about 1000 yrs. anterior to the received date of the Flood. Egpn. hist. did not begin with Menes: there are numerous remains of prehistoric races. Yet further back are we carried by Bab. hist.; at present it seems cert. that Sargon I. was reigning B.C. 3800, when, accdg. to the received C., Adam had 700 yrs. yet to live. Moreover in Sargon's time Bab. appeared to stand at the end of a long civilisation. We cannot in the present condition of kge. estimate precisely the value of the antediluvial records; yet we may note cert. things: many Biblical genealogies are defective in some places, wh. we can so far complete: many more, we have reason to suspect, are incomplete, but have not the means of making the lack good: any number of links may have been dropped out of the antediluvian genealogy. The extreme age ascribed to the patriarchs may be due, as some have thought, to the "month" being then the "year" (Heb. shĕnāh means primarily "repetition"), i.e. the period in wh. the celestial phenomena repeated themselves, tho' of such a mode of reckoning we have no indication. When, however, we compare the Biblical tales of the "beginnings" with those of Egp. and Asyr. we are struck with the moderation of the former. The Biblical genealogy fm. Adam to Noah has come down to us in three forms: the Massoretic (MT.), wh. we have in ordinary English Bibles; the Septuagint (LXX), the Gr. tr. used by the Apostles and the Early Church; this increases the period between the Creation of Adam and the Flood by nearly 600 yrs.; and the Samaritan, in the recension of the Pnt., used by the Samaritan community in Nablous; this shortens the period in question by almost 350 yrs. When we compare the three Genealogies, we find that in regard to the first five terms and the seventh, MT. agrees with Sam. agst. LXX; in the sixth it agrees with LXX agst. Sam.; in regard to the next two all three differ; while in regard to Noah all three are agreed. In this way the balance seems to lie with MT. as most near the original.

	MT.	LXX.	Sam.
At birth of s.—
Adam . . .	130	230	130
Seth . . .	105	205	105
Enos . . .	90	190	90
Cainan . . .	70	170	70
Mahalaleel . .	65	165	65
Jared . . .	162	162	62
Enoch . . .	65	165	65
Methuselah . .	187	167	67
Lamech . .	182	188	53
At the Flood—
Noah . . .	600	600	600
	1656	2242	1307

The reasons that lie behind these variations can only be vaguely conjectured; the desire to lengthen the time between the Creation and the Flood can scarcely act. for the LXX diffcs. as the lengthening is relatively so little.

(b) The remarks made in regard to the period before the Flood apply equally to that between the Flood and the Call of Abraham. It seems necessary, in the present state of kge., to regard not only the C. of MT., wh. is the shortest, but even that of LXX, the longest, as too short to meet the requirements of archæology. It is the twilight that skirts the historic. Here, as in the antediluvial period, there are three lines of Genealogy, the MT., LXX, Sam.: of these the MT. is much the shortest, and the LXX considerably the longest.

	MT.	LXX.	Sam.
Birth of s. to Shem after the Flood .	2	1	2
Age at birth of s.—
Arphaxad . .	35	135	135
Cainan . . .	...	130	...
Salah . . .	30	130	130
Eber . . .	34	1 4	134
Peleg . . .	30	130	130
Reu . . .	32	132	132
Serug . . .	30	130	130
Nahor . . .	29	179	79
Terah . . .	70	70	70
At his call—
Abraham . .	75	75	75
	367	1246	1017

Here, as before, in the majority of instances two sets of figs. agree agst. the third. MT. agrees with Sam. in saying that Arphaxad was born "two yrs. after the Flood"—LXX, "in the second yr. after the Flood"; they also agree in omitting the second Cainan inserted by LXX after Arphaxad: in regard to the age of Arphaxad and the five who come after (LXX) Cainan, LXX and Sam. agree agst. MT.; as to the age of Nahor all three differ, while as to that of Terah and of Abraham at his call all three are at one. This leads us to regard Sam. as best representing the primitive text.

For the period before the Flood the MT. reckoning, and for the period after the Flood that of the Sam., are prob. the most reliable. Combining these two we get approximately the duration of the whole period from Adam to the call of Abraham: thus—

	MT.	LXX.	Sam.	Comb. MT. & Sam.
Before Flood .	1656	2242	1307	1656
Till Abraham .	367	1246	1017	1017
	2023	3488	2324	2673

When more of the mounds of Bab. and Pal. are ransacked, the Genealogies of Scrip. may poss. be supplemented, or explained. Till that time comes our attitude shd. be one of suspended judgment, forbearing hypotheses.

(2) The Semi-historic Period: fm. the Call of Abraham to the Foundation of the Temple. During this time there are refcs. in the Bible to recognisable historic persons and events, but no corrspdg. refcs. have yet been found in profane records to Biblical chars. or transactions. The Exodus divides this period into two portions of nearly equal length.

(a) The Call of Abraham. If we may regard the identn. of AMRAPHEL with Ḥammurabi as proved, the Call of Abraham may be dated approximately B.C. 2200.

We may not assume absolute accuracy for the Chronological estimates of Nabunahid; dyns. may have been contemporary wh. he regarded as successive; links may have been left out or inserted; we cannot tell.

Fm. the Call of Abraham to the birth of ISAAC was 25 yrs. (Gn. 17.[17]); Isaac was 60 yrs. old at the birth of JACOB and ESAU (Gn. 25.[26]); and Jacob was 130 yrs. old when he went down to Egp. Of these numbers the sum is 215 yrs.; wh. wd. make the date of going down into Egp. B.C. 1985, towards the end of the Hyksos period. In Ex. 12.[40] it is said that "the sojourning of the Children of Isr. who dwelt in Egp. was 430 yrs." The nat. meaning is that this covered the residence of the people of Isr. in Egp.: not the whole period fm. the Call of Abraham to the Exodus. This wd. place the Exodus in the most flourishing period of Egpn. hist.; the period made illustrious by the reigns of the three Thothmes and of Queen Hatasu. An event such as the escape of the children of Isr. was not one to be chronicled on the walls of temples. The age of Ḥammurabi has only been approximately fixed and may be even a couple of cents. later. On the other hand, Egpn. Chronology is very uncert. The oppression and the Exodus may have occurred a cent. later than the date given above. Jos. in his quotation fm. Manetho indicates his belief that the Exodus took place during the reign of Tuthmosis (Thothmes): he prob. had some traditional reason for this identn. If the Ḥabiri of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets are to be identd. with the "Hebrews" we have another fact confirmatory of the above suggn. The oppression is commonly dated under Rameses II., and the Exodus under his s. and successor Menephtha. The recently discovered inscription of Menephtha seems to imply that the Isrs. were already in Canaan. Moreover it makes the stay of Isr. in Egp. too long, and does not leave time for the 480 yrs. wh. elapsed (1 K. 6.[1]) between the Exodus and the Foundation of the Temple. That Rameses in his campaign agst. the Hittites did not encounter the Isr. is explicable by the fact that he passed through the territory of the Phil.

(b) The period fm. the Exodus to the founding of the Temple was 480 yrs. (1 K. 6.[1]); there seems no more reason to assume that Solomon was inaccurate, than to regard Nabunahid as necessarily accurate in the far longer time he considered to have elapsed between himself and Naram-Sin. The LXX has 440 yrs., due poss. to the attraction of the two "4s." That Jos. makes the period 582 yrs. is of little value, as he has merely summed up the numbers given in the bk. of Judges; numbers that are suspicious by the frequent recurrence of "40 yrs.," and the possibility that several of the Judges were contemporaries. The Solomonic number may be regarded as confirmed by the argument of Jephtha (Jg. 11.[26]) that Isr. had enjoyed 300 yrs. of undisturbed possession of the Trans-Jordanic territory in his day. This wd. leave 180 yrs. to be distributed among the Judges who succeeded Jephtha and the reigns of Saul and David. No note of events affording synchronisms occur in Jg., unless Chushan-Rishathaim can be identd. The suggn. of Dr. Sayce (HCM.) that he was a chief of the Mitanni who assailed Egp. and were driven back by Rameses III. is worthy of consideration; poss., however, too late. He may have been one of the kings of the Ḥatti with whom so many of the Egpn. kings were in conflict. We may fix the end of this period—the founding of the Temple—not earlier than half a cent. before B.C. 1000, nor later than half a cent. after, say B.C. 950.

(3) The Historic Period: fm. the Foundation of the Temple to the 2nd Governorship of Nehemiah; fm. approximately B.C. 950 to approximately B.C. 435, when Artaxerxes Longimanus died. This period may be divided as follows: (a) The rest of the reign of Solomon and the Revolt of Ten Tribes. (b) Fm. the Revolt to the Fall of the House of Omri. (c) Fm. the Fall of the House of Omri to the Fall of Samaria. (d) Fm. the Fall of Samaria to that of Jrs. (e) The Bab. Captivity to the Decree of Cyrus. (f) Fm. that to the Decree of Darius. (g) Fm. the Decree of Darius to Nehemiah's second appointment as Governor.

(a) Taking the date of the Foundation of the Temple as B.C. 950, the Revolt may be placed about B.C. 910. This occurred while Shishak (Sheshonk) was k. of Egp.; but this synchronism, though confirmed by Egpn. annals, does not much assist Biblical C.

(b) The presence of Ahab at the battle of Karkar

(B.C. 854) makes one date fairly definite; it will place the Fall of the House of Omri between B.C. 850 and B.C. 840. The sum of the reigns of the kings of Isr. during this period is 98 yrs.; that of the kings of Judah is 95 yrs:—

Kings of Judah.			Kings of Israel.
Rehoboam	reigned	17 yrs.	Jeroboam	reigned	22 yrs.
Abijah	,,	3 ,,	Nadab	,,	2 ,,
Asa	,,	41 ,,	Baasha	,,	24 ,,
Jehoshaphat	,,	25 ,,	Elah	,,	2 ,,
Jehoram	,,	8 ,,	Omri	,,	12 ,,
Ahaziah	,,	1 ,,	Ahab	,,	22 ,,
			Ahaziah	,,	2 ,,
			Jehoram	,,	12 ,,
		95			98

Fm. these fall to be deducted five yrs. fm. the reigns of the Davidic kings, and eight yrs. fm. the reigns of the Northern kings, to compensate for the yrs. reckoned twice at each accession to the throne. Moreover, there are cases of co-regency: among the kings of Judah one is clearly noted. Jehoram was colleague with his fr. at all events two yrs. before his death (2 K. 8.[16]); very prob. also, for a yet longer time, Jehoshaphat was the colleague of Asa his fr. The same thing appears to have occurred in the kdm. of Isr.

(c) The period fm. the Fall of the House of Omri to Capture of Samaria by Sargon is clearly defined by the dates given in the Asyr. gypsum slabs. We learn that Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser II. in B.C. 842; this wd. prob. be done immediately on his usurping the throne. Samaria was taken by Sargon B.C. 722; but some have thought (Fotheringham, Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 72) that the overthrow of the Northern kdm. occurred 11 yrs. later, and that what took place in 722 was the deposition of Pekah. It is cert. that in 711 Sargon sent an expedition agst. the Phil. (Is. 20.[1]), and poss. then he deposed Hoshea. The sum of the reigns of the kings of Isr. fm. the accession of Jehu to the deposition of Hoshea is 143 yrs., while that of the kings of Judah is 164 yrs.

Kings of Israel.			Kings of Judah.
Jehu	reigned	28 yrs.	Athaliah	reigned	6 yrs.
Jehoahaz	,,	17 ,,	Jehoash	,,	40 ,,
Jehoash	,,	16 ,,	Amaziah	,,	29 ,,
Jeroboam	,,	41 ,,	Azariah	,,	52 ,,
Menahem	,,	10 ,,	Jotham	,,	16 ,,
Pekahiah	,,	2 ,,	Ahaz	,,	16 ,,
Pekah	,,	20 ,,	Hezekiah	,,	5* ,,
Hoshea	,,	9 ,,
		143			164

The older Chronologers tried to harmonise these totals by inserting "interregna" in the Northern list; it is now seen that even the sum of Northern reigns is too long by 10 or 20 yrs. The difficulty must be met by supposing "co-regencies."

(d) The sum of the reigns of the kings of Judah, fm. the Capture of Samaria to that of Jrs., is 134 yrs.; accdg. to the Bab. reckoning the period fm. 722 to 586 (the date of the capture of Jrs.) is 136 yrs.; fm. 711 it is 125 yrs. On neither hypothesis is the discrepancy great.

(e) The period fm. the Fall of Jrs. to the Decree of Cyrus is clearly marked; fm. B.C. 586 to 538 is 48 yrs. The events narrated in bk. of Daniel, and the favour shown by Evil-Merodach to Jehoiachin (Jeconiah, 2 K. 25.[27-30]), are the only things recorded.

(f) The Decree of Cyrus seems to have been taken advantage of only to a very limited extent; if "Ahasuerus" of Ez. 4.[6] is Cambyses, and Artaxerxes of 4.[7] is Smerdis the Mede, we have a reason for this. The Decree of Darius Hystaspis, B.C. 520, marked a renewal of Jewish activity.

(g) The period fm. the Decree of Darius to the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus embraces the bks. of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. It has an importance in the hist. of the Canon, as Jos. declares in his treatise agst. Apion, that one of the marks of a bk. received into the Canon was that it had been written before the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus.

In Nehemiah 12.[11, 22], there is mention of the High-priest Jaddua, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, and of "Darius the Persian," presumably Darius Codomannus, who was overthrown by Alexander. As, however, no events are recorded during the period between the death of Artaxerxes and the date implied by these refcs. we cannot reckon it into OT. Chronology.

The C. of the inter-Biblical period will be considered under the various bks. of the Apocrypha.

The Chronology of the New Testament.—This is divisible into the C. of the GOSPELS, and that of the ACTS. The majority of the critical dates will be discussed under JESUS CHRIST and PAUL; in the present article we shall only indicate general conclusions.

(a) The C. of the Gospels.—In regard to this part of NT. C. there are three dates of primary importance: (1) That of the Nativity; (2) that of our Lord's entrance upon His ministry; (3) that of His Crucifixion.

(1) The Nativity.—The Talmudic date wh. wd. make our Lord's visit to Egp. take place during the persecution inflicted on the Pharisees by Alexander Jannæus, our Lord being then a young man, may be dismissed without discussion. Almost as untenable is the date advocated by Bunsen (Chronology of the Bible, p. 78), B.C. 15. This idea is founded on the statement of Irenæus, that our Lord entered on His ministry when He was between 40 and 50 yrs. of age; and the shout of the multitude (Jn. 8.[57]), "Thou art not yet 50 yrs. old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" It involves the tossing out of doors the Gospel of Luke as a historical authority, in favour of the statements of Irenæus, who wrote more than a cent. after Luke, and of the jibe of the Jewish mob. As imposs. is the date assumed by Dionysius Exiguus as the first of our Era; the Gospels of Matthew and Luke unite in placing the Birth of our Lord in the reign of Herod the k.; but accdg. to the Dionysian date Herod was already four yrs. dead. The commonly received date—B.C. 4—implies that the Nativity occurred in the December immediately preceding Herod's death, a date rendered imposs. by the prolonged char. of his last illness, and his apparently perfect health at the time of the visit of the Wise Men. A number of lines converge on 6 or 7 B.C.; Lewin (Fasti Sacri), Turner (HDB.), Ramsay (Was Christ born in Bethlehem) agree in this date. Singularly Kepler was led to this date fm. astronomical reasons; he found that three of the planets—Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars—were in conjunction in the constellation Pisces in the yr. B.C. 6. The synchronism of the death of a s. or sons of Herod, as noted by Macrobius, points to the same date. The date of the "enrolment" ("taxing") under Quirinius ("Cyrenius"), referred to by Luke (2.[1]), seems on Professor Ramsay's showing to have, in all probability, taken place in one or other of these years. The one chronological statement that seriously conflicts with this is Jn. 2.[20], "40 and 6 yrs. was this temple in bldg."; if this dialogue took place at the very beginning of our Lord's ministry, and if Luke's "about 30 yrs. of age" is to be taken as a Gr. way of saying that this was His precise age (Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem? p. 197), it seems difficult to place the birth of our Lord earlier than B.C. 4. It mt., however, be the second yr. of our Lord's ministry, and if "40 and 6 yrs" meant, as in Jewish reckoning they mt., little if at all more than 45 yrs., we arrive at the earlier date above mentioned.

It may be observed before passing to other matters that the 25th of December cannot be the true anniversary of the Nativity, as it is between the beginning of May and the end of October that shepherds in the East are with the flocks at night. The ingenious calculations of Lewin make the beginning of August a not improbable date.

(2) The Beginning of the Ministry.—Our Lord's ministry began with His baptism, and this seems to have occurred early in the Baptist's Mission. The determinants of date in Lk. 3.[1] may be held as applying directly to our Lord's Mission; the Mission of the Baptist and its char. are thus another note of time. What precisely is meant by "the 15th yr. of the reign (hegemony) of Tiberius Cesar" is a question of some difficulty; the choice lies between "the 15th yr." after the death of Augustus, and "the 15th yr." after Augustus had transferred to Tiberius the supreme command in the Eastern provinces. If the former is preferred, then our Lord's Baptism took place in the beginning of A.D. 29; if the latter, then the Baptism must be dated A.D. 26. Of these dates Lewin prefers the former, and Ramsay the latter, while Turner, taking the notes of time in Lk. 3.[1] as applying to the preaching of John, wd. date the opening of the Ministry A.D. 27. The determination of these depend to some extent on the date to be assigned to the Crucifixion.

(3) The Crucifixion.—As, in the light of John's Gospel, the length of the Ministry must be three yrs., the possible dates are 29, 30, 33. Here the day of the week on wh. our Lord was crucified is of some importance; tradition has practically without variation declared that it was a Friday—a tradition wh. has the support of the Didache; yet there are several considerations wh. throw doubt on this. (1) Our Lord's definite statement (Mw. 12.[40]), "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." If He had been crucified on Friday, although He had been a portion of three days in the grave when He rose again, He had only been two nights. (2) When Joseph of Arimathæa went to Pilate to beg the body of Jesus, the sun having set, and so a new day begun, that day is called "the preparation," i.e. Friday (Mk. 15.[42,43]). (3) At "the ninth hour," within three hours of sunset and Sabbath, our Lord cried out, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani"; there is too little time, even if we deny the correctness of the last argument, for the transaction of all that was done. (4) Maimonides declares (yad ha-Hazakah) that the Jewish Calendar is so arranged that the Passover cd. not happen on the third, fourth, or sixth days of the week. (For further development of this, see Westcott's Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, p. 348; Gall, Good Friday, a Chronological Mistake.) These reasons seem very cogent; the main difficulty is the early tradition that Friday was the day of the Crucifixion. As the Jewish state was overthrown A.D. 70, and the Church became more and more essentially Gentile, the Jewish mode of reckoning the day fm. sunset to sunset wd. fall into forgetfulness; hence prob. the mistake. If this is correct it wd. seem that our Lord's crucifixion took place on the day preceding the "Preparation" of the Passover, A.D. 30.

(b) The C. of Acts.—The first important date is that of the conversion of St. Paul. There appears little reason to doubt the accuracy of the date assigned by Lewin (Fasti Sacri, p. 253), A.D. 37. The fact that Aretas had possession of Damascus fixes it between A.D. 34 and A.D. 40. The evidently slackened condition of Rm. authority, as evidenced by the murder of Stephen, points to the yr. of Tiberius' death, and the accession of Caligula. The conclusion of the Acts, when Paul had already "dwelt two whole yrs. in his own hired house," may be placed at A.D. 61; his release may have occurred the following yr. The Pastoral Epp., except 2 Tm., were written during this season of regained freedom. Paul's second arrest was prob. in A.D. 65; in prison he wrote 2 Tm. Prob. his martyrdom may be dated in that same yr.

Although the dates of the publication of the later books of the NT. are important, they belong more to Biblical Criticism than to Chronology: the dates of the FOURTH GOSPEL, of HEBREWS, and 2ND PETER will be considered under these headings.

CHURCH. "He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jonah, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father wh. is in heaven. And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail agst. it; and I will give unto thee the keys of the kdm. of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." The words of Jesus embodied in this incident form the fundamental statement of Scrip. on the subj. of the Church. The very difficulty and obscurity of some of the clauses are guarantees of truth; and the scene in wh. they occur was so critical in the life of our Lord that the record of it was sure to be faithfully retained in the memory of the Twelve. Apart, however, fm. diffcs. of interpretation, the intention of Jesus to found a Church on earth is unmistakably intimated; and He prophesies that it will last till the end of time. Jesus was not merely a teacher, who breathed into human existence a new spirit, destined to refresh and sweeten society: He was at the same time a founder, who appreciated the virtue of positive institutions, and He not only set agoing an incomparable influence, but provided the channel in wh. it shd. flow fm. land to land and fm. generation to generation.

Jesus Himself made use of the word in only one other recorded instance, to wh. allusion will be made below; but it occurs more than a hundred times between Acts and Revelation. There can be no doubt that it was introduced into the NT. fm. the Old, where, in the LXX, it is the word for "congregation," as in classical Greek it was the name for a public meeting. It ought not to be forgotten that, in its true conception and essence, the Church existed even before the commencement of the Christian era; as is indicated in the words of the Scots Confession of 1560: "We maist constantlie belief, that God preservit, instructit, multipleit, honourit, decoirit, and from death callit to lyfe His Kirk in all aiges, fra Adam till the cumming of Chryst Jesus in the flesche."

Though the adjective "ecclesiastical" is directly derived fm. the NT. noun, our own word "church" has a difft. origin, being fm. a Gr. adj., wh. means "belonging to the Lord," and is applied in 1 Cor. 11. to the Lord's Supper, and in Rv. 1. to the Lord's day. It no doubt, therefore, designates the Church as the Lord's house. Whatever, however, be the form of this term, no proof is required to bring home to any mind the place it holds in the hist. and lit. of the mod. world. It is obviously one of the great words of mankind, the sound of wh. has gone forth to the ends of the earth. It has been continually on the lips of the nations wh. have been foremost in the progress of the past; and, as new peoples emerge into the light of hist., they learn to repeat it. To a third part of the human race it is a term familiar yet sacred. Every utterance of it, however, echoes back to its pronouncement by Jesus at Cæsarea Philippi; and all the omens conspire to prove that the prophecy in wh. the word was embodied is destined to a still more universal fulfilment. On the rock, wh. is neither Peter apart fm. his testimony nor his testimony apart fm. Peter, and can be Peter only because he was built on Him who is the chief corner-stone, on wh. were built all the apostles, so that the Church may be said to be built on them all—on this rock has the edifice of wh. Jesus prophesied been rising fm. age to age; and it is no ruin or antiquarian relic, but a structure still attracting the very ablest hands, to rear it up to the measure of the dimensions of the Founder's plan.

In the great saying of our Lord on this subj. quoted above, the Church seems to comprehend the true Christians of all countries and all ages, and to be, therefore, to a large extent invisible, for many included in it have passed into the unseen, and many more are yet unborn. In other places, as e.g. Rm. 16.[23], where Paul calls Gaius "mine host and of the whole C.," it seems to include all the members of the Christian body at any time visible on the earth. A third undeniable meaning is where it denotes a single Christian congregation, the most obvious indication of this being the frequent use of the word in the plural. Whether, between these two last-quoted meanings, it ever, when used in the singular, denotes jointly all the churches of a city or country, is a question in wh. more is involved than may at first meet the eye; for the assumption that a number of congregations are spoken of as one C. is one of the favourite arguments of those who hold that in the NT. there is evidence of a central authority extending its power over a plurality of congregations. Congregationalists hold, on the contrary, that there is no indubitable proof of this, their minds being led to favour this view, as they believe the single congregation to be not only the unit but the limit of ecclesiastical authority. While some Congregationalists, indeed, allow to neighbouring congregations a cert. amount of control, and ordain elders in the individual C., and all recognise an ordained ministry, the keener advocates of the Congregationalist principle reject all interference fm. without with either creed or practice, and consider the congregation itself, in public meeting assembled, to be competent for the functions usly. handed over to office-bearers in other communions. Organisation, in short, is reduced to a minimum, its multiplication being regarded as an obstacle, instead of a help, and as a waste of men and means. At the opposite extreme fm. this stands the Romish C., in wh. organisation reaches the maximum, developing, fm. the Pope downwards, through numerous degrees into an extensive hierarchy. In the Anglican C. likewise the organisation is tolerably elaborate, there being many officials of various names. In this respect Presbyterianism comes in between Prelacy on the one hand and Congregationalism on the other. It looks on two offices only as essential—those of elder and deacon—but it holds that congregations ought to be combined in cities, provinces, and countries, and ruled by an authority representative of the several parts.

Such are the three forms of organisation wh. have historically manifested themselves; and each of them has, at some time or other, not only been found in the Scrips. but believed to be of Divine obligation to the exclusion of every other form. This is still the position of the C. of Rome in regard to its own organisation; and many Anglicans hold at least the threefold order of bishops, elders, and deacons to be essential to the existence of a true C. In the greatest book on the subj., however, that has ever issued fm. this communion, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, the opposite view is taken—that, while the organisation of the author's own C. can be defended as Scripl. and seemly, no stereotyped form of organisation is essential to a Church's existence; and a view akin to this, as to their several denominations, will prob. be increasingly held by the wise. As, three hundred yrs. ago, the Divine right of kings was devoutly believed in, and the members of a single family were supposed to have a claim to the crown derived directly fm. heaven, but we now know that there may be good government under difft. types of supreme authority, and that it is infinitely more vital that a nation shd. be well governed than that any particular dyn. shd. be kept upon the throne, so the first question about the C. is not what number or kind of officials it requires, but what kind of service it is intended to render to God and to man. The old political philosophy thought and spoke as if the people existed for the kings, instead of the kings for the people; and, similarly, in theology, theories about the clergy, their places, powers, and privileges, have been built up without refc. to either the plans of God or the utilities of mankind.

Of like nature are the discussions on the subj. of the C. usly. to be found in books of Catholic theology. As a rule, these resolve themselves into the specification of cert. marks of the true C., such as that it must be visible, undivided, holy, apostolic, catholic, and infallible; and then the question is raised, wh. of all the bodies professing to be the C. of Christ exhibits these qualities. The argument is managed as if the quest of the true C. were the one supreme concern of the human soul; and, while all other bodies are depreciated, the most extravagant claims are advanced on behalf of the C. of Rome. But it is only on the ignorant that this style of assumption can tell. In the same way, if Protestants modestly hesitate to take to themselves the great promise about the gift of the keys of the kdm. of heaven, or wonder what the Saviour can have meant by promising to mortals that what they bound on earth shd. be bound in heaven, and that what they mt. loose on earth shd. be loosed in heaven, Romanist interpreters have no hesitation in appropriating these words, in their crassest forms, for their C. and her officials; but they forget that, whatever binding and loosing may mean, there is nothing more notorious than that in cases innumerable, what the C. of Rome has bound and what it has loosed cd. not have been ratified by any authority that was wise, charitable, or just.

The true way of arriving at satisfactory views on this subj. is to inquire first for what purpose the C. exists, and then to ask what its functions must be, in order that this purpose may be best realised.

The purpose for wh. the C. exists is not difficult to define; for it is implied in the NT. name. The Gr. word is derived fm. two others, the one of wh. means " out " and the other " call "; and the C. exists for the purpose of calling out of the world a people to be the Lord's. It will be remembered how this idea was impressed on what the late Dean Stanley calls the first chapter in Church History—though it was not really the first—the call of Abraham. In our Lord's farewell addresses and high-priestly prayer, when the development of His C. was uppermost in His mind, the Twelve are spoken of as those chosen by Him out of the world; and no description of the new society of wh. He is the Founder is more characteristic than that in 1 P. 2.[9]: " Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye shd. show forth the praises of Him who hath called you out of darkness into His marvellous light." Christian hope may, indeed, anticipate a time when the limits of the C. of Christ will be identl. with those of the human race; but, even after that, there will be a separation, and the C. triumphant will consist of a multitude "redeemed fm. among men." The C. has to seek out those whom Jesus spoke of as given to Him by the Father; so that her work is a continuation of His own; for He came to seek and to save that wh. was lost. The same work is, in Scrip., specially ascribed to the Holy Spirit, who may be said to take it up at the point at wh. the Son of God left it; and few names ever given to the C. have been more felicitous than that of Dorner, when, in his great dogmatic work, he terms it "the kdm. of the Holy Ghost."

This primary obj., then, for wh. the C. exists determines its functions. Of these the first may be called Evangelisation. The very first duty of the C. is to make the Gospel known to those who are ignorant of it, or who are ignoring it as completely as if they were ignorant of it. The desire of the risen Saviour was the preaching of His name to all nations; and those who, like Paul, went forth at once to do this were acting most in accordance with the mind of Christ. Sometimes, in the course of subsequent ages, the primacy of this function has been forgotten; but, on the whole, the christianisation of the heathen has paused but seldom for any length of time, and in our day, at all events, the missionary enthusiasm has so captured the imagination that multitudes of the young are dreaming of the conversion of the world in a single generation. Of course the successful accomplishment of this work implies a variety of means and methods, the science of wh. is part of the C.'s responsibility. Foremost among methods is perhaps the translation and circulation of the Holy Scriptures; and this is going on in hundreds of langs.

Next to evangelisation comes what may be called Catechisation, or the instruction of the young. This might, indeed, be included amongst missionary methods; but it is so important as to deserve mention by itself. The training of catechumens was one of the most prominent features of early Christianity in its purest days, and it is equally prominent in mod. missionary enterprise. Catechisation, however, must always be one of the principal cares of the C. in its most organised form likewise; and it includes the place of relg. both in day schools and Sunday schools. The name itself suggs. the composition of catechisms, in wh. the essence of the Scrips. is expressed in forms easily apprehensible by youthful minds; and catechisms naturally expand into creeds, wh. may be employed for the same purpose for the benefit of the more mature, though they serve other ends besides, to wh. refc. may be made further on.

The Worship of God wd., no doubt, be placed by many first among the functions of the C.; and, if here it is put in the third place, because it is for those who have been already evangelised and catechised, this is with no intention of disparaging it. Public worship is not, indeed, an exclusively Christian act: it has belonged to all relgs. under the sun; and this may be the reason why at this point Christianity has oftener relapsed into pagan practices than at any other. But the worship of Him who is a Spirit in spt. and in truth is one of the supreme functions of the C., and it requires vigilant cultivation. Prayer and praise are its most obvious elements; but each of these involves the expenditure of care and wisdom in the accumulation of materials and their artistic employment. The art of architecture has to be called into use by all denominations wh. erect places of worship; and all employ the other arts as well, more or less, whether or not they consciously and on principle apply art to the service of relg. But the most distinctive elements of Christian worship are the sacraments. These go back for their authority to Christ Himself; and, although their importance has been often exaggerated in a manner for wh. there is no justification either in the words of the Lord or the other refcs. to them in the NT., yet they will always be cherished by true members of the Ch., and it will always be one of the standing duties of the C. to determine how they may best be administered for edification.

Preaching is a part of public worship, but it is such an important function of the C. as to deserve mention by itself. While the other parts of worship are directed towards those who have already been evangelised and catechised, preaching includes the evangelisation of those without as well as the edification of those within; for amongst those who are outwardly within the C. there are multitudes in whom the Word of the kdm. has taken no independent root; and nothing cd. be either more untrue to the facts of the case or more detrimental to the best interests of the C. than to preach exclusively, as some have proposed, to those already evangelised. Preaching, though practised also in some other relgs., such as the Mohammedan, holds a unique place in Christian worship. It was the main feature of the ministry of both our Lord and the apostles, express attention being drawn in Scrip. to the precedence given to it before sacraments; for "Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples," and St. Paul said: "Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the gospel." Our religion is not solely or principally one of emotions—it is founded on truth; it believes in the power of conviction to form the char. and to produce action in harmony with itself; and this is why the setting forth of the truth as it is in Jesus must always be the principal business of the C. in the world.

Along with preaching goes Pastoration. Through preaching the flock as a whole is fed; but the sheep have likewise to be shepherded one by one, and special care has to be bestowed upon the wandering, the suffering, the sinning. Even the stern processes of discipline cannot be spared. Jesus mt. indeed be supposed, in the parable of the wheat and the tares, to forbid all exclusion; but this impression is corrected by the only other passage, besides the one quoted at the commencement of this article, in wh. Jesus mentions the C. by name (Mw. 18.[15-18]), and in the Epp. to the Corinthians the most unmistakable instructions are given for the application of discipline to scandalous members of the C. The unrebuked presence of such within the Christian communion is an offence to the earnest disciples of Christ; where it is tolerated on a large scale there will always be a disposition to leave the C. and set up a purer communion; and, though this may be called schism, the blame may lie not on the seceding but the remanent body.

Such are the principal functions of the C.; and the aim of them all is to call out of human society a peculiar people, to be justified and sanctified, till they are ready to be transferred to a better world, where they will reign as ks. and priests unto God for ever. But it is to be carefully noted that all these are functions of the C. itself, not of the clergy. The entire task rests upon the body as a whole, and on every member in particular. It is, however, poss. that, for the efficient fulfilment of this immense task, the C. may require functionaries, i.e. members to whom cert. portions of the work are specially entrusted, or who may be called on to give up their secular occupations and devote their whole time and strength to the service. The selection and consecration of such may be designated Ordination; and this is the last function of the C. to be specified. The C. has the power, derived fm. God, to ordain as many officials of as many kinds as she may require for the fulfilment of all her legitimate functions, under the guidance of the Scriptures. In the 6th chapter of Acts we have the fullest report in the NT. of the ordination of office-bearers; and, in this case, these were elected by the members fm. among themselves, and then consecrated by prayer and the laying on of the apostles' hands; popular election by the membership being thus combined with the dignity of ordination by those already in office. Timothy wd. seem to have been designated for office by the prophets of the C. in wh. his ordination took place, and then to have been ordained by the elders with St. Paul at their head (1 Tm. 4.[14]; 2 Tm. 1.[6]). The essential principle is that office-bearers are fm. the C., wh. has the power of producing them through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Intelligent members of the C. recognise that few objs. are more deserving of their solicitude than the training of those about to enter the ministry; and they will often have on their lips the prayer enjoined by the Saviour Himself: "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few; pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth labourers into His harvest."

If nothing is to be allowed to come between the C. and her work, still less must anything be allowed to come between her and her Lord. The Ch. is the bride of Christ, and Christ is the Head of the C. This implies not only that His virtue is in all the true members, but that His authority extends over all the C.'s activities. Fm. Him she must take her instructions, allowing no rival authority to interpose. This gives her the right to defend herself agst. officials of her own who, assuming to themselves the position of lords over God's heritage, attempt to impose laws and observances of their own devising, in opposition to the prescriptions of the Word. The adult conscience, in such cases, is able and bound to ascertain the will of Christ for itself, and, having done so, to adhere to it. It has been by means of the same consciousness of loyalty to her living Lord that the C. has been able to resist the encroachments of the State; for, when the commands of the State have contradicted those of Christ, she has felt entitled to disobey them, in obedience to a previous responsibility. The relations of C. and State have, indeed, had a long and extraordinary hist. wh. is not yet complete. At first the State persecuted the C., forbidding its subjs. to worship God as the C. prescribed. Then, in the beginning of the fourth cent., under the reign of Constantine, the State adopted the C., showering upon it favours of every description. But these blandishments had to be dearly purchased, the Byzantine court assuming to itself extensive rights of control; and this continues to this day in the Eastern Church, where the Czar is virtually Pope. In the West there raged for cents. a mighty struggle between the officials of the C. and those of the State, as to wh. shd. have the upper hand. At the Reformation Protestantism received, in many quarters, the favour of princes, to whom on this act. was accorded far too much control in the Church's affairs, and under this incubus the continental churches are still groaning. But, in Great Britain and America, there has been a growth of freedom, wh. has passed through many phases, but still divides opinion too sharply to be discussed here. All earnest Christians, however, wd. claim the right to obey Christ rather than Cæsar.

James Stalker.

CILICIA, a stretch of country along the S.E. coast of Asia Minor; the W. part, mountainous and rugged, known as "C. aspera," and the E., a rich and fertile plain, as "C. campestris." Its principal city, Tarsus, was the birthplace of Paul (Ac. 22.[3], 23.[34]). The name Khilakku, is found in Asyr. inscrs. of the 9th cent. B.C., and still earlier Krk (Klk). Guthe (KB.) suggs. that C. is hidden in the meaningless Heb. Hělěk (Ek. 27.[11]), and wd. read "the men of Arvad and C." After the fall of the Seleucid empire the Rms. joined C. to the province of Syria, hence in NT. C. and Syria are closely associated (Ac. 15.[23], &c.). Jews were numerous in C. in NT. times (Ac. 6.[9], cp. Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 36). Twice at least in later life Paul visited C. (Ac. 9.[30], 15.[41]).

CINNAMON, the inner bark of the Cinnamomum Zeylonicum, a species of laurel wh. grows to greatest perfection in SW. Ceylon. It was an ingredient in the holy oil (Ex. 30.[23]), was used as a perfume (Pr. 7.[17]), and is named as part of the merchandise of Bab. (Rv. 18.[13]). Oil of C. is obtained by boiling the fruit. C. was imported into Judea thro' Arabia, and prob. also by the Phœnicians. It brought a high price in anct. times.

CIRCUMCISION. Cutting away the foreskin is a practice anct. and widespread. It is found in places as far apart as Africa, the New Hebrides, and America. It prevailed very early in Egp., whence prob. it spread to Ethiopia and Pal. It is significant that Abraham's C. is placed after his visit to Egp. (Gn. 17.[10], &c., P.). It seems to have been practised by Isr.'s neighbours (Jr. 9.[25]), the Phil. being an exception—a point of reproach to them (1 S. 17.[36], &c.). It is not easy to see exactly what weight attaches to the nar. in Jo. 5.[2ff.] Sound policy wd. be agst. disabling the whole army by this operation, in face of a vigilant enemy. But it is clear that C. is regarded as removing that wh. exposed them to the reproach of the Egpns. (v. 9). Its omission by Moses is represented as bringing him into deadly peril (Ex. 4.[24ff.] P.).

The age at wh. the rite was performed among other peoples shows it to be an initiation into the rights and privileges of manhood, as an adult member of the community. So it is among the Arabs to this day. In many cases it was an essential preliminary to marriage.

In Isr. the rite is in form the same, but it takes a decidedly religious char., and is performed at an earlier age. The idea is not so much membership in the nation, as dedication to the nation's God and protector. The sooner, therefore, the dedication was accomplished the better. The choice of the 8th day seems arbitrary (Lv. 12.[3], &c.). But we may note that on the 8th day animals were deemed fit for offering (Ex. 22.[30], &c.). Every male Isr., children of slaves born in the house, and strangers who desired to be identd. with the community had to be circumcised (Gn. 17.[10ff.]; Ex. 12.[46ff.]).

During the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, C. was forbidden (1 M. 1.[48]). While some proved unfaithful (v. 15), many mothers endured the extreme penalty for their fidelity (v. 60).

In later times the name was given at the time of C. (Lk. 1.[59], 2.[21]). At first the rite was performed with knives of flint or glass, wounds with wh. healed more easily than those made with bronze instruments. Steel is now universally employed. For practice of mod. Jews see Schechter, Studies in Judaism, 351ff.

The idea of C. is spiritualised in such passages as Dt. 10.[16]; Rm. 2.[29], &c. C. becomes the symbol of willing obedience; uncircumcision, of obstinacy and rebellion agst. God.

A section of the Apostolic Church wished to impose C. on all converts to Christianity, maintaining that only thro' Judaism, whose char. rite was C., cd. men enter the Christian Church. For the attitude of Paul, and the final decision of the Apostolic Council, see Ac. 16.[3], Rm. 4.[10], Gal. 2.[3], Ac. 15.[23ff.]

CISTERN. In Pal., where the rainfall is confined to a few months of the yr., and perennial springs are scarce, it has always been necessary to provide for the capture and storage of the rain water. Most houses of any pretensions have a cistern excavated below, in wh. the water is collected fm. the roofs. On the hills, and occasionally by the wayside, Cs. are found, whence by rope and leather bucket water is drawn for flocks or for animals in a caravan. Very large Cs. are sometimes found in the cities, e.g. the "Great Sea" under the Temple area in Jrs., with a capacity of 3,000,000 gallons. So also in such fortresses as Machærus and Masada (Ant. XIV. xiv. 6; BJ. VII. viii. 3, VII. vi. 2), wh. enabled them to hold out agst. a siege. An example may be seen in the old castle above Banias, with steps down to the bottom for cleansing purposes. A fissure in the rock, or a crack in the cement, made the C. useless for water. Then it mt. be used as a prison (Gn. 37.[23]; Jr. 38.[6]), or for storage of grain.

CITIES OF REFUGE. These were 6 in number, 3 on each side of Jordan. On the E., BEZER in the tribe of Reuben, RAMOTH-GILEAD in Gad, and GOLAN in the half tribe of Manasseh. On the W., HEBRON in Judah, SHECHEM in Ephraim, and KEDESH in Naphtali. Thither one mt. run who had slain a man unwittingly. If he eluded the AVENGER OF BLOOD, and reached the gate of the city, he was sure of asylum until the death of the High Priest, when he went forth without fear. The refuge, however, availed him nothing, if he were proved guilty of wilful murder (Nu. 35. 6; Dt. 19.[2]; Jo. 20.[2]).

CITIZEN. The word embodies an essentially Gr. idea corrspdg. to that of the autonomous city. Gr. C'ship was very restricted; Rm. was more generous in this respect; still even Rm. C'ship, till the time of Caracalla, was given sparingly. Rm. C'ship conveyed great advantages to its possessor: (1) exemption fm. scourging and crucifixion; (2) right of appeal to the Emperor. Paul inherited this rank; his grandfr. may have been a Pompeian captive, manumitted in Rm.; his descts. wd. be Cs. Paul took advantage of this on three occasions (Ac. 16.[37], 22.[25], 25.[11]). It is used metaphorically (Eph. 2.[19], "fellow-Cs. with the saints"); also in Php. 1.[27], where AV. has "let your conversation be," the Gr. has politeuesthe, "act the citizen." To the Jews the Church was a "kingdom," basileia tou ouranou; when it passed out of Jewry it became an ekklēsia—a "city"; this "city" was in heaven.

CITY. The fear of common danger fm. marauding bands prob. first led men to build their houses together, and organise for mutual protection. The favourite positions were by a river, on the seashore, or a spot easy of defence—e.g. Jrs. The Cs. thus resulting were not all walled (Est. 9.[19]), but natly. walls were the rule. These were often of great strength, pierced by gateways, the mighty doors in wh. were opened at sunrise, and closed at sunset (Rv. 21.[25]). Before the gate was a broad place where, in ordinary times, market was held, and justice was dispensed. Provision of a good water supply was of first importance. See CISTERN, CONDUIT. The streets (see STREET) were narrow and crooked, and, like those in the mod. East, often not in good repair (Is. 10.[6], &c.); while cleaning and lighting are new devices. Ideas of sanitation were elementary. Herod the Gt. did, however, build a system of sewers under the streets of Cæsarea (Ant. XV. ix. 6). Men of a particular trade were gathered in a street called by their name, e.g. "street of the bakers" (Jr. 37.[21], &c.). In mod. oriental Cs. people of various faiths occupy separate quarters; a Jew is not found in the Moslem qr., nor a Moslem in the Jewish. The C. was of old what it is still, a centre of learning (Is. 47.[10]), of luxury, and wickedness (Is. 5.[11ff.], 28.; Na. 3.[1ff.]). The more important were "mother Cs." (2 S. 20.[19]), each being the capital of a district; the smaller towns and vills., being in some respects dependent on it, were called its "daughters" (Nu. 21.[25]; Heb., &c.). See *Jw. CITY OF WATERS, and CITY ROYAL. See RABBAH.

CLAUDIA (2 Tm. 4.[21]), a Rm. lady saluted by Paul. The fact that PUDENS is also saluted in the same v. has suggested the ingenious identn. of C. with the "Claudia Rufina" of Mart. xi. 53, who was w. of Aulus Pudens. She was dr. of the British k., Claudius Cogidubnus (Tacitus, Agric., 14).

CLAUDIUS. The 4th Roman Emperor, elevated to the throne by the soldiery on the murder of Caligula. C. reigned fm. A.D. 41 to A.D. 54. The rule of C. was synchronous with the principal part of the Apostle Paul's missionary labours. Wise and liberal measures characterised the administration of C.; this was fortunate as coinciding with the infancy of the Church. His edict expelling the Jews fm. Rm. brought AQUILA and PRISCILLA in contact with Paul (Ac. 18.[2]). With the prophecy of AGABUS, and its fulfilment in the reign of C., another point of contact is found between him and Christianity. Suetonius (Claud. xxv.) informs us that the occasion of the decree expelling the Jews fm. Rome was "that the Jews raised tumults because of Christ (impulsore Chresto)." In his private relations C. was unfortunate; one needs only name his wives, Messalina and Agrippina, and his favourites, Pallas and Narcissus, to recognise this. He was poisoned by Agrippina to make way for her s. Nero.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, the military tribune commanding the cohort stationed in Jrs. when Paul returned thither. C. L. had purchased Rm. citizenship (Ac. 22.[28]), and represents in his letter to Felix that he saved Paul because he was a Rm. (Ac. 23.[27]).

CLAY was used for bldg. in anct. Egp., Pal., and Mesopotamia, the sun-dried bricks being sufficiently durable in a climate where there was no frost to crumble them. On C. tablets, letters and records of various kinds were impressed. They were then baked in an oven. To these, preserved in the earth for thousands of yrs., we owe much of our kge. of the past. See POTTERY. Sometimes the name C. is applied to the trodden mud in the streets (Is. 10.[6], &c., ḥōmer, EV. "mire"; Ps. 18.[42], &c., ṭīṭ, EV. "mire"), and to the sediment gathered in the bottom of a pond or well (Ps. 40.[2], &c., "miry C.). In Jn. 9.[6], C. is applied to earth moistened with spittle.

CLEAN (Heb. ṭahōr, bar, with the corresponding verbs ṭāhēr, bārar). It is characteristic of the Heb. mind that the first of these roots, and by far the most frequently used, never occurs but in a ceremonial or ethical sense. The 2nd is once used in the ordinary meaning (Pr. 14.[4]), "Where no oxen are the crib is clean." The origin of the distinction cannot be determined with cert. As to "animals" used for food there may have been hygienic reasons; but the pig is used for food freely by Christians in Syria without any observably bad effects. If it is suggested that as pastoral nomads it was fm. their flocks and herds that the Israelites took the material for their feasts, and what was customary to them soon was regarded as alone suitable, why was the camel excluded and the antelope included? The distinction prob. arose through consecration, and consequent separation, involving a certain amount of arbitrariness. In regard to persons, see UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS.

In several passages C. means "quite," and is not represented in the Heb.—e.g. Zc. 11.[17], "quite dried up." In NT. katharos most generally applies to cleanliness, e.g. Mw. 23.[26], "outside C. also."

CLEMENT, a Philippian believer saluted by Paul (Php. 4.[3]). It has been suggd. that this was Clemens Romanus; tho' it has the support of tradition, it is merely a possibility. C. was a common name under the Flavians.

CLOUD. Oct. till March is the usual time for Cs. in Pal. Fm. Apl. till Sep. dew-Cs. often form in the morning, but disappear with rising day. A C. in the S.W.—the direction called by the Arabs bāb esh-shitta, "the rain gate"—is still the herald of coming storm. The grateful shade and refreshment afforded by the Cs. give them a prominent place in the thought and imagery of the Orient. "Cs. without rain" awaken hopes they cannot fulfil (Ju.[12]; cp. Pr. 25.[14]). Their transiency makes them fit images of what is fleeting (Jb. 7.[9], &c.). The C. is the visible symbol of God's presence—e.g. in the PILLAR OF C., wh. cast a shadow by day, and glowed with light in the darkness (Ex. 33.[9], &c.). Cs. formed as it were the veil of the Divine Majesty on Sinai (Ex. 19.[16], &c.). Cs. are the habitation of J". (Ps. 97.[2], &c.). Fm. the C. God speaks on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Mw. 17.[5], &c.). A C. received Jesus as He ascended (Ac. 1.[9]), and in the Cs. the Son of Man is to appear again (Mw. 24.[30]).

CNIDUS, a Dorian colony, and a city of importance in the anct. world, was situated on Cape Cario, at the S.W. extremity of Asia Minor. An island off the coast was joined to the mainland by a causeway, forming two excellent harbours. There were Jews here in the 2nd cent. B.C. (1 M. 15.[23]). It was visited by Paul on his voyage to Rm. (Ac. 27.[7]).

COAL. The most common word is gaheleth (Gr. anthrax), wh. means "live embers." Less frequent is pehām, wh. seems to denote fuel prepared for the fire (Pr. 26.[21]). Mineral C. is not found in Pal. The most usual fuel fm. of old has been charcoal, unless, perhaps, dried dung shd. be given the first place.

COCK. Although the word barbūrīm in 1 K. 4.[23] tr. "fatted fowl" may be our domestic fowl, it is very doubtful, as no representation is to be found in Egyptian paintings; there is no other possible reference in the OT. In the NT. they have become common; the crowing of the C. is a note of time, and the habits of a hen with her chickens offer our Lord an illustration (Mw. 23.[37], &c.). The refce. in 1 K. 4.[23] may be to ducks, which were well known in Egypt.

COCKATRICE. See ADDER.

COCK-CROWING. It is the habit of the cock to crow at intervals during the night; as the diffc. in length of night between winter and summer is less in Pal., these crowings occur more regularly there. At midnight, and a short while before dawn, are the two Cs. of Scrip. (Mk. 14.[30], &c.).

COCKLE. The word bo'shāh occurs only in Jb. 31.[40]. It is not a proper name, but denotes genly. evil-smelling, noxious plants.

COLONY, used only once in NT. of PHILIPPI, wh. see.

COLOSSE, a Phrygian city on the S. bank of the river Lycus, in the Rm. province of Asia. It is described by Herodotus (vii. 30), and Xenophon (Anab. i. 26), as a "city of great size." Its prosperity was due to its flourishing weaving (wool) industry, and to its position on the great military and trade route fm. Ephesus to the Euphrates. Fm. Strabo (567, 568), we gather that C. was in his day overshadowed by the neighbouring Laodicea and Hierapolis. Paul hoped to visit C. (Phm.[22]), but there is no evidence that he ever did, although he may have done so in the course of the journey recorded in Ac. 18.[23] (but cp. Col. 1.[2]). The church in C. prob. owed its origin to EPAPHRAS, and seems to have been closely related to those in LAODICEA and HIERAPOLIS; all three being under the superintendence of Epaphras (Col. 4.[12, 13]). Michael became the patron saint of C. It was related that he interfered by a miracle to save the city fm. a threatened inundation, and opened the great gorge at Chonæ (Ramsay, Ch. in Rm. Emp., 456ff.). C. is now represented by Chonæ, a place with a mighty fortress, 3 miles S. of the anct. site.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. The Canonicity and Pauline Authorship of C. was acknowledged or implied very early. In the 2nd cent. Justin Martyr repeatedly quotes the phrase, " the first-born of every creature (' of all creation,' RV.)," in his dialogue with Trypho : this phrase is too striking to be dropped into accidentally, and too frequently quoted not to be regarded as authoritative. C. was in the Canon of Marcion. Irenæus quotes C. by name, and attributes it to Paul. Hippolytus quotes frequently, and still more frequently Tertullian. Eusebius placed C. among the homologoumena. It was necessary to Baur's theories of the development of doctrine to hold C. late, so he denied its authenticity because of the diffc. between its vocabulary and that of Romans, and alleged references to Gnostic heresies. That the style of C. and of the other Epp. of the 1st imprisonment differs fm. that of Rm., 1 and 2 Cor., and Gal. may be admitted, but not more than happens in the case of other authors. Diffc. of circumstances, subj., and audience, furnish sufficient explanation. The authenticity of C. is now generally admitted.

The place where C. was written is commonly believed to be Rome. Meyer, followed by Haupt, maintains that the imprisonment fm. wh. C. was written was endured in Cæsarea, not Rome, because Onesimus, he thinks, wd. more naturally flee to Cæsarea than to Rome, as if the communication between Rome and the provinces was not constant, while inter-provincial communication was intermittent, and a runaway wd. naturally feel safer in the vast " colluvies " of Rome than in the comparatively small community of Cæsarea.

The occasion of C. is the appearance in the church at C. of a Judæo-Gnostic heresy, prob. Essenism (Lightfoot, Colossians, pp. 71–111) ; asceticism and worship of angels seem to have been its most marked features.

Contents.—After salutation, thanksgiving, prayer (1.[1-14]), Paul dwells on the surpassing glory of Christ; declaring Him " the Image of the Invisible God," " the Creator of all things," " the Head of the Church," " the source of Redemption " (1.[15-29]). Fm. this he proceeds to deduce arguments wh. ought to prevent the Colossians fm. being led away by " Philosophy " (so Essenism is called by Jos.) ; the conquest over all things wh. Christ had achieved in His death raised them above the necessity of the ascetic conquest of the body (2.[1-23]). As there seem to have been symptoms of a reaction agst. Essenism, wh. tended to the opposite extreme, Paul warns the believers agst. excesses (3.[1-10]). He then gives affectionate exhortations, urging mutual love and helpfulness because of their renewal in Christ (3.[11-17]), and applies these principles to domestic relations (3.[18]–4.[6]). He concludes with personal notes concerning Tychicus, who is conveying the Epistle to C. ; Onesimus, the fugitive slave ; salutations fm. several saints with him ; and salutations to saints in Colosse. The resemblance between C. and Eph. is the result of composition in similar circumstances and in similar mental mood.

Literature : for the scholar Lightfoot's is prob. still the best commentary. For more popular use Moule (Cam. Bib. for Schools) and Maclaren (Exp. Bible) will be found of benefit.

COLOUR. The Heb. lang. has many words for colours. First there are those that indicate the presence or absence of reflected light, white and black ; the Heb. for these is lābān and shāhōr respectively ; the verbal form qēdār is used for the latter as applied to " night." In Gr. leukos and melas are the most common words. To pass on to colours as more genly. understood ; beginning at the upper end of the spectrum we have " blue " (tĕkēleth), and its cognate " purple " ('argāmān) ; in Ex. 24.[10] we have evidence of a sensitiveness to colour without the possession of a discriminating term, " like a sapphire stone as the body of heaven for clearness." There are two words for " yellow," yĕraqraq, also trd. " greenish " (Lv. 13.[49]), applied to " gold " (Ps. 68.[13]), and tzāhōb, applied to " hair " discoloured by leprosy. " Green " does not seem to have been discriminated fm. " yellow " ; yereq and yārāq, fm. the same root as the word for " yellow," is the term most common ; chlōros is the NT. term, also trd. " pale " (Rv. 6.[8]). When we reach the lower end of the spectrum Heb. is more prolific of terms : 'ādōm, " red " genly., tho' suggesting a " dull red " ; karmîl, " crimson," connected with our " carmine " ; tōla', " scarlet," appears to be connected with tola'ath, " a worm," Gr. kokkinos (Mw. 27.[28]) ; shāshar, " vermillion " (Ek. 23.[14]) ; shanîm, AV. " scarlet " (Is. 1.[18]). The symbolic use of colour we find in the Tabernacle and in Is. 1.[18], but more elaborately in Zc. 6.[2, 3] ; and more elaborately still in Rv., tho' indirectly, through the medium of precious stones ; " white " symbolises " purity " (RV. 7.[9]), " scarlet " and " purple " symbolise " cruelty " and " luxury " (Rv. 17.[3, 4]).

COMING OF THE LORD, THE SECOND. Altho' this phrase does not occur in Scrip., yet there is refc. (He. 9.[28]) to the appearance of Christ " the second time without sin unto salvation." In the prophets the two appearances are not distinguished, but the refcs. to the Messiah's coming in lowliness, and to His coming in splendour, sugg. an expectation of more than one manifestation. This distinction is obliterated in apocalyptic Lit., but in the preaching of the Lord it becomes prominent. In His apocalyptic discourse (Mw. 25.; Mk. 13.; Lk. 21.) this "coming" is not distinguished fm. that at the last judgment, but is intimately associated with the destruction of Jrs.

It has been a difficulty to some that there is no indication of a long interval between the first fulfilment, in the destruction of Jrs., and the second. When we bear in mind the psychological phenomena of prophecy this may be explained. The future was unveiled to the prophet in a vision—a picture, in wh. what was in the foreground represented the immediate future: that in the background the more remote. In lineal projection the near and the far wd. be in close juxtaposition; the prophet in telling his vision wd. retain this juxtaposition. As the immediate future was necessarily conditioned by the remote, it cd. only be understood in the light of it. Our Lord as Prophet acts under prophetic conditions, hence the apparent mixture.

The teaching of our Lord had another side: in the parables there is refc. to the Lord delaying His Coming (Mw. 24.[48], 25.[5]; Lk. 18.[7]). In the Epp. the Coming of Christ was expected during the lifetime of believers then living, but this was conditioned by the kge. that cert. signs wd. precede the appearing of their Lord. At last, in 2 P. 3.[8, 9], the possibility is clearly recognised that a millennium mt. elapse before the blessed event occurred.

This expectation, altho. a mistaken one, conferred a great economic benefit on the infant Church; when surrounded by foes that seemed mightier than themselves, the early believers were supported by the thought that their Lord wd. soon appear and discomfit all their enemies. As in course of time the Church grew stronger, and was able to realise the lengthened period it wd. have to wait, the expectation of an immediate Coming became fainter.

In the Apc. the hope has become slightly dimmer than in the Epp., tho' still the visions vouchsafed to the Apostle are of "things that must shortly come to pass." In the 4th Gospel the S. C. is revealed in its sptl. aspect, as fulfilled largely in the mission of the Comforter. For a fuller discussion of the questions involved, see Eschatology and Holy Spirit.

COMMUNION. See Fellowship, Lord's Supper.

CONCISION (Php. 3.[2]). Circumcision cd. not have for the Gentiles the significance it had for the Jews. Paul therefore wd. not call it by the time-honoured name (peritomē), but by one wh. suggests a mere bodily mutilation (katatomē).

CONCUBINE, Heb. pīlegesh, cp. Gr. pollakis. In the Heb. social system the C. had a recognised place, and in cert. cases her rights were guarded by law (Ex. 21.[7ff.]; Dt. 21.[10ff.]), i.e. when she was of Heb. blood, or was a captive taken in war. To the foreign woman purchased as a slave, no rights were secured; and no Isr. might take as Cs. the drs. of Canaan. The strong desire for many children, universal in the E., acts. for the presence and status of the C. Even legitimate ws., themselves barren, or of limited fruitfulness, gave maids to their hs., claiming some interest in the offspring of such unions (Gn. 30.[3], &c.; see Code of Hammurabi, 137, 183). But the numbers noted in later times (1 K. 11.[30]; 2 Ch. 11.[21], &c.) are due to luxury and deterioration of char.

The children of the C. had equal rights with those of the legitimate w., as we learn fm. the case of Jacob's sons. The C. was held equally inviolable with the w., and outrage on her was resented with no less fervour (Gn. 35.[22], 49.[4]; Jg. 19.; 2 S. 3.[7], 16.[21ff.]).

CONDUIT (2 K. 18.[17], &c.). There are in Pal. many remains of Cs., or aqueducts, by wh. the water was brought fm. distant sources for domestic use or for irrigation. The C. mt. be a channel cut in the rock, or built of stones, cemented, and covered with flat stones. The ancients did not know that water confined in a pipe will rise to the level of its source. The C. therefore preserved a slight slope fm. the source to the point of delivery; so it had to be carried round the flanks of the hills, or thro' them by a tunnel, and across the valleys on arches of masonry.

CONEY, a small animal resembling the rabbit in size and habits. Scientifically it is called Hyrax Syriacus, and is reckoned a pachyderm, i.e. of the same class as the elephant and the horse.

CONFESSION. In Scrip. C. has two meanings. (1) To acknowledge God as our God. This use is rare in OT., practically occurring only in Solomon's prayer at the Dedication of the Temple (1 K. 8.[33]; 2 Ch. 6.[26]), "confess Thy Name, and turn fm. their sin." In NT. it is more frequent (with the addition of C. of Christ), e.g. Mw. 10.[32], "Whosoever shall C. me before men"; Jn. 12.[42], "they did not C. him lest they shd. be put out of the Synagogue"; Rm. 10.[9], "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus." (2) An acknowledgment of guilt, either to God or to our fellows. The former of these is the commonest, esp. in OT., e.g. Lv. 5.[5], "he shall C. that he hath sinned"; Nu. 5.[7], "they shall C. the sins that they have done"; in NT. 1 Jn. 1.[9], "If we C. our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." The second aspect of C. in relation to sin is found in Js. 5.[16], "C. your faults one to another." There is no notice in Scrip. of auricular confession to a functionary of the Church.

CONGREGATION (Heb. 'ēdah, qāhāl, Gr. synagōgē: other three Heb. words are trd. C. in AV., but not in RV.: the most important is mō'ēd, as applied to the Tabernacle), genly. the assembly of the people of Isr. or of Judah, for political purposes. Fm. this it comes to mean the people who had a right so to assemble. "One ordinance shall be for the C. and the stranger" (Nu. 15.[15]). In Ac. 13.[43], where alone it occurs in NT., C. means those present in a "synagogue." See Assembly.

CONIAH. See Jehoiachin.

CONVERSATION in EV. is generally = "conduct" (Heb. derek, Ps. 37.[14], 50.[23], Gr. anastrophē, Gal. 1.[13]; Eph. 4.[22], &c.). Once (Phil. 3.[20]) it stands in AV. for politeuma, "citizenship"—so RV.; or "commonwealth"—RVm. Tropos (He. 13.[5]), may be well rendered with RVm., "turn of mind."

CONVOCATION (Heb. miqrā), an assembly of Isr. for religious purposes; hence it always has the adj. "holy"; e.g. Lv. 23.[8], "The seventh day is an holy C."

COPPER (Heb. nĕḥōsheth), usly. trd. Brass.

COR. See Weights and Measures.

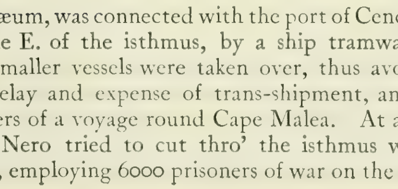
CORAL (רָאמוֹת, rā'mōth, Jb. 28.[18]; Ek. 27.[16]) is formed of the hard skeletons of cert. polyps, deposited in the bed of the sea. It is doubtful if this tr. is correct, but no more prob. suggestion has been made. The red C. is found in the Mediterranean. It was greatly prized by the ancts. as an ornament, and was also used for amulets.

CORBAN (Heb. qorbān), in Lv. and Nu. is used for "oblation" in payment of a vow. However rash the vow the stricter Rabbin wd. not allow any release fm. it; hence if a man in a moment of irritation agst. his father or his mother declared "Qorban by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me," he mt. not in any way assist them.

Perhaps through the influence of Christianity, the strictness of this was modified later when it infringed on filial duties.

CORIANDER. Manna is twice compared with C.-seed (Ex. 16.[31]; Nu. 11.[7]). It is the Arb. kuzbarah, a plant bearing aromatic seeds, used as a condiment, and in medicine as a carminative; much cultivated in the S. of Europe, and in the East.

CORINTH. The anct. city of C. was destroyed by L. Mummius, who transported its artistic treasures to Rm. in B.C. 146. A cent. later Julius Cæsar restored the city as a Rm. colony. This is the C. of the NT. It stood on the gulf of C., at the S. end of the isthmus wh. joins the Peloponnesus to the mainland. The harbour on the shore,



Coin of Corinth

Lechæum, was connected with the port of Cenchrea, on the E. of the isthmus, by a ship tramway, on wh. smaller vessels were taken over, thus avoiding the delay and expense of trans-shipment, and the dangers of a voyage round Cape Malea. At a later date Nero tried to cut thro' the isthmus with a canal, employing 6000 prisoners of war on the work. Standing thus with a foot on either sea, C. found herself on the great highway of the world's commerce, and the wealth of E. and W. flowed into the coffers of the Corinthian merchant princes. Capital of the province of Achaia, she soon ranked in wealth and importance, second in Europe only to Rm. herself. The citadel on the Acrocorinthus, S. of the city, rising 1800 ft. above the sea, together with her fortifications, rendered C. a position of great strength. Altho' no longer a purely Gr. city, C. had charge of the Isthmian Games held in the Stadium beside the shrine of Poseidon on the isthmus. The inhabitants included Italians, Greeks, and Asiatics. Gladiatorial displays were introduced, and foreign religions met with easy tolerance. To the influence of Asiatic superstitions, with their obscene ritual, we may perhaps trace the hideous social demoralisation, wh. gained for C. a name of infamy, and raised its revolting form even in the Christian Church (1 Cor. 5.[1ff.]). For the gospel campaign C. was a place of great strategic value, whence influences mt. radiate far and wide. Paul therefore spent in it no less than 18 months, labouring to establish and build up a Christian community (Ac. 18.[11]). Here he met Aquila and Priscilla, driven fm. Rm. by the decree of Claudius, and with them he wrought at his trade of tent-making. Stirred up no doubt by his success, Crispus, a ruler of the synagogue, being among his converts, the Jews rose agst. him. Their accusations were disregarded by Gallio, and their antagonism seems to have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel.

Corinth: The Citadel, Acrocorinthus

To the Church there founded, the Epistles to the Corinthians were addressed. Poss. Paul again visited the city (Ac. 20.[2]). In post-apostolic times the Epistle of Clement was written to the Corinthians.

C., altho' still the seat of a bishop, has fallen on evil days. The splendid city of the past is represented now by a miserable vill.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE, is one of the most important of the Pauline Epp., vying with ROMANS in eloquence and doctrinal significance. Its value historically is much greater, as revealing the habits, modes of worship, and moral characteristics of the early Christians. CORINTH, to the Christian community of wh. this Ep. and 2 C. were sent, was the commercial capital of Greece (see preceding article). Its situation, between two seas, attracted a large seafaring and commercial population fm. all quarters of the Mediterranean shores. While the city was notorious for its vice, it was to a great extent typically Gr., and therefore addicted to art and philosophy. Naturally there was a considerable Jewish population, through whom the Apostle gained an entrance to the rest of the inhabitants. During his stay of a year and a half Paul built up a Christian Church that was prominent all thro' the early cents. To this Church, during his stay in Ephesus, the Apostle Paul wrote the Ep. before us. The authenticity of 1 C. had never been doubted till the rise of the school of wh. Van Manen is the most typical representative.

Their arguments need not delay us, as by equivalent arguments one might outdo Hardouin and declare all classic Lit., even Herodotus and Cicero, the composition of mediæval monks. A good act. of this school of criticism is to be found in Dr. Dykes Shaw's The Pauline Epistles, pp. 67–84.

Fm. internal evidence we learn that 1 C. was written A.D. 56 or 57. The Occasion of its writing appears to have been twofold: (1) Information as to internal condition of the Corinthian Church conveyed to Paul by members of the "house of Chloe" (1 C. 1.[11]). Paul thus learned that there were among the Christian community in Corinth, religious parties; and immorality of various kinds. (a) Factions (1.[12]–4.[20]). The polished rhetoric of Apollos attracted to him a number of believers who seemed to think their admiration of Apollos was inadequate if they did not slight Paul. There were the Judaisers, as yet not prominent, who called themselves by the name of Cephas. Then there was a party allied to them, those who claimed that in contradistinction to others who named themselves not by any subordinate teacher, they were the followers of Christ Himself. These were of necessity Jewish Christians who poss. had seen our Lord in the flesh, or at all events had learned the substance of His personal teaching fm. those who had heard Him. They are prob. referred to in 2 C. 3.[1] as those who had received "epistles of commendation" fm. the Jrs. Apostles. Last, there was the still predominant division, the partisans of the Apostle Paul. Assuming as cert. that they were one in essentials, he shows the folly of faction ; he proceeds next to show the reason of the diffc. between his teaching and that of Apollos ; he came to Corinth determined to be simple (1 C. 2.[2]), and defends his decision. Not that he undervalued the gifts of Apollos. While he, Paul, planted, Apollos watered. Both had their place in the husbandry of God. In chap. 4. he offers a dignified rebuke to those who despised him. It is to be noted how small a space the Judaisers occupy in this epistle, compared with that given them in 2 C. or in Gal. (b) Immorality (4.[21]–6.[20]). This seems to have assumed three forms: Incest, Litigiousness, with its root Covetousness, and Sensuality. It is a Pauline characteristic to associate covetousness and sensuality, vices that we contrast ; see Rm. 1.[29] ; Eph. 5.[3]. The nat. of Corinthian society explains the prominent vices of the Church there. As we know by mod. examples, seaport towns are prone to wallow in sensuality. Covetousness is the vice of a trading community, and the Greeks were notoriously litigious. Paul expected that the Church, the " ekklēsia " of believers, wd. settle all civil disputes among themselves. The Church was to him the true state. (2) Answers to questions brought to the Apostle fm. the Corinthian Church by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus ; and his answers seem rather to have followed the order of the questions, than the logical order wh. the connection of the subjs. wd. have suggested. (a) Marriage and Celibacy. His conclusion on this is, that neither is in itself the holier state, but that in the then condition of the Church, matters wd. be easier for individuals who were not married. A concrete case seems to be referred to (7.[36-40]), where a member of the Corinthian Church had under his care, either as parent or guardian, young, marriageable women ; the Apostolic decision is, he is to be guided by circumstances and his own view of them. (b) Things offered to idols (chap. 8.). As idolatry permeated social life, and every feast was a sacrifice to some heathen deity, the position of the Christian member of a heathen household was one of extreme delicacy. The principle Paul lays down is the great Christian principle of love. Evidently some had maintained, what was logically true, that as an idol was nothing in the world, the fact that the viands had been offered to an idol was a matter of no import ; hence it was needful to show that love is higher than logic, and that eating or not eating was decided by it. (c) The support of the ministry of the gospel (chap. 9.). This support was to be fm. the free-will offerings of the Church. He meets an objection that he foresees may be offered ; he himself did not receive any fee or reward. His answer is that he feels himself to stand in a peculiar position : what was incumbent on him was not incumbent on other ministers of the word. (d) The subj. taken up in chap. 10. is connected closely with that of chap. 8.—the conduct of the believer in regard to idolatry. While to Paul the idol was nothing, the deity whom the idol represented he regarded not as a nonentity but as a devil. His argument wd. be none the less forcible if we take him as making use of the argumentum ad hominem ; his correspondents so believed; let them act accdgly.; over and above there was the motive of love wh. he had implied earlier in his discussion of the cognate subject of "meat offered to idols." (e) Public worship (chap. 11.). The conduct and deportment of women in Church is the first point he touches on (11.[1-16]) ; Paul had to harmonise the freedom that is in Christ Jesus with eastern ideas of propriety. In connection with the Lord's Supper, and the " Love Feast " with wh. it was so closely connected, he gives his nar. of the institution of the Ordinance. (f) In the section that follows (12.–14.) we find the Apostle's answer to questions about Sptl. Gifts, and incidentally of Church Government. Under this head comes the difficult subj. of the Gift of Tongues. (g) Whether the Corinthians had inquired concerning the Resurrection is not clear, but at all events some of them had doubted its reality, and thus gave Paul occasion to collect the evidence of our Lord's Resurrection, and to deduce fm. that the gen. Resurrection (15.). (h) The concluding section, after reminding the Corinthians of the collection to be made for the " poor saints," proceeds to personal notes and salutations. The whole Epistle ends with " My love be with you all in Christ Jesus."

CORINTHIANS, THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE. This Ep. stands in close relation to the first ; it is its sequel. While the diffc. in date between them is but little, much has happened since 1 C. was written. When 1 C. was sent to Corinth, Paul was in Ephesus, intending to stay there some time ; but the uproar excited by Demetrius the silver-smith had caused him to leave, and go to Philippi. In Corinth, too, there had been changes ; many favourable. The incestuous person had been brought to repentance, the Corinthian Church had been moved to an increase of Christian zeal by 1 C. Some of the changes were unfortunate ; the Judaisers, esp. those of the Christ party, had become more numerous and pronounced in their opposition to Paul. One of the marked features of 2 C. is its autobiographical char.; many important events in the life of Paul are only thus known to us. As in the case of 1 C., the Pauline Authorship of 2 C. has been denied only by German professors with a reputation to make. Its integrity has been called in question, but on grounds wh. it is imposs. to regard as cogent ; the connection between the sections, chaps. 1.–9. and 10.–13., is too close for them to have been published as separate letters. There may have been an epistle sent by Paul to Corinth wh. has been lost, as there seems to have been a visit paid of wh. we have no record save in the traces wh. we find in 2 C. Contents. After the salutation the Apostle "makes his peace," as it has been put, with the Corinthians (1.^{5}–7.^{16}). He had said some severe, although necessary things; now in tenderness of heart he begins to fear that he has been too severe; so when they have repented, Paul appears eager almost to minimise their faults. In the course of this, after a passing refc. to the Judaisers with their Epp. of commendation, Paul proceeds to give an act. of his ministry as an Apostle, its methods and motives; ending with a fervid appeal to those to whom he is writing (6.). In the following chap. he describes his own feelings in waiting for the coming of Titus, and his joy at the news he brought. Next (8.–9.) he urges on the Corinthian believers the duty of contributing to the collection he was gathering for the saints in Jrs.

It is to be observed that in regard to this collection Paul makes no appeal to the sympathies of his correspondents; he says nothing of the necessities of the saints in Jrs.; he assumes that the duty of this contribution wd. be acknowledged at once by all. The Christian republics recognised the church in Jrs. as their metropolis, it being to them what the "mother cities" were to the Gr. colonies; so they owed a certain tribute to the Mother Church. The same idea is seen in the contributions wh. Jewish communities all over the world were then in the habit of sending to Jrs.

As his Apostleship had been assailed by the Judaisers (10.–12.), he gives an act. of his call to that office, and of the tokens of divine favour he had received, ratifying this call; his own sufferings being an evidence of how costly a thing it was to him to have accepted it. He concludes the Ep. with an exhortation, to prepare them for his approaching visit.

CORMORANT (Heb. qā'ath, also trd. PELICAN; and shālāk), an aquatic bird common in Pal.; classified as unclean (Lv. 11.^{17}; Dt. 14.^{17}).

CORN, a gen. term applied to all cereals.

CORNELIUS, a Rm. officer in Cæsarea (Ac. 10.^{1}, &c.), prob. a native of Italy. He was friendly to the Jews (Ac. 10.^{22}), and is described as "one who feared God." The prominence given to his case shows clearly that his baptism marks an important step in the hist. of Christianity. This is quite intelligible if we suppose that he was the first uncircumcised person to be received into the fellowship of the Church.

Tradition says that he built a church in Cæsarea, and, later, became Bishop of Scamandros, exercising miraculous gifts.

CORNER-STONE. The first step in bldg. a house in Pal. is to dig four deep pits at the four corners of the area to be occupied by the house. In these is put either one large stone, or a mass of stones united with cement. Fm. the corner pits ditches are made, joining adjacent corners; as these become gradually shallower in the middle and the individual stones are shaped like arch-stones, the foundation of each wall is really an arch. The consequence of this is that the whole weight of the superincumbent bldg. ultimately rests on the C.-S.

CORNET. See MUSIC.

COS, an island off the SW. coast of Asia Minor, over agst. Cnidus and Halicarnassus. In its relations with the Jews it is referred to in 1 M. 15.^{23}, Ant. XIV. vii. 2, x. 15; BJ. I. xxi. 11. A town of the same name stood on the NE. of the island, to wh. perhaps refce. is made in Ac. 21.^{1}. It is very fertile, and in anct. times was noted for its silk.

COTTON, karpas, a foreign word in Est. 1.^{6}, EV. tr. "green." The marginal tr., "cotton," is prob. correct. Where "linen" appears, "C." may sometimes be intended. It was not always easy to distinguish the two materials.

COUNCIL (gen. tr. of synédrion, "the Sanhedrin"), the principal national council of the Jews. When the C. originated is not cert., but prob. something of the kind existed, at all events fm. the return fm. Bab. As to the constitution of the C. we have no reliable information. The High Priest appears to have been the president. Our Lord was tried before the C.; as also were the Apostles STEPHEN, and the Apostle Paul. The acts. of the Sanhedrin in the Talmud are valueless. They were not committed to writing until the Sanhedrin had ceased to exist for half a millennium.

COURT. See TEMPLE, HOUSE.

COVENANT. The Heb. berīth may be derived fm. the stem bārā, "to cut." This wd. accord with the view that originally Cs. were confirmed by a solemn ceremony wh. involved cutting of animal victims in pieces. The usl. phrase "to cut," kārath, "a C." poss. refers to this practice. Another derivation suggd. is fm. Asyr. birtu, a bond or fetter.

Originally there were prob. three stages in the making of a C. between parties on equal footing: (1) terms were arranged; (2) these were sworn to; (3) the parties passed between the severed pieces of the slaughtered victim or victims, apparently invoking upon themselves the like fate, shd. they violate their oath. Fm. this last may have come the phrase of such common use, "God do so unto me and more also," prob. surviving in speech long after the ceremony was obsolete.

Berīth is used of agreements between Isaac and Abimelech (Gn. 26.^{28}), Jacob and Laban (31.$^{44ff.}$), &c., where the contracting parties, as equals, make mutually satisfactory terms. But we have also the berīth between God and men, where the latter are bound to accept and observe the terms imposed, if they are to enjoy the benefits promised: e.g. the Cs., (1) with Noah, its sign is the rainbow; (2) with Abraham (Gn. 15.; J. 17., P.), confirmed by a weird and awful ceremony (15.$^{10ff.}$; cp. Jr. 34.^{18}): its sign is circumcision; (3) with Moses for Isr. at Sinai, confirmed by sacrifice and sprinkling of blood

(Ex. 24.[3ff.]). Accdg. to P. (31.[13]), its sign is the Sabbath. The word so used passes by an easy transition to mean the Divine will toward man, expressed in ordinance and appointment. LXX almost invariably tr. berîth by diathēkē, "appointment," not by sunthēkē, "contract." Jehoiada's C. with the captains, &c., was simply a duty imposed on them. C. becomes therefore a synonym for "law" in such phrases as "book of the C." (Ex. 24.[7], &c.), "ark of the C." (frequently).

The conditions of the C. mt. be conceived as fulfilled by outward observance. This led to their real, if not formal neglect, in times of declension. The prophets, penetrating to the deeper sptl. meaning, did not hesitate to predict the making of a new C. with the people, wh. shd. rest not in outward rite and ceremony, but in inward conformity to the will of God (Jr. 31.[31]; Ek. 37.[26]). Hence the familiar distinction of old and new Cs.

The NT. word is diathēkē: AV. often tr. "testament," RV. gen. prefers "C." The phrase "blood of the C." in the institution of the Lord's Supper, makes this appear as the counterpart of the C. confirmed by bloody sacrifice. The influence of classical usage, in wh. diathēkē = "last will" or "testament," may perhaps be traced in Gal. 3.[15, 17]; He. 9.[16, 17], passages of admitted difficulty. The pl. form in Rm. 9.[4], &c., may, accdg. to a common Gr. idiom, be sing. in meaning; or it may refer to the Cs. mentioned in the hist. of the patriarchs.

COVENANT OF SALT (Nu. 18.[19], &c.). To eat of a man's salt constitutes one of the most binding relationships in the E. Cases are known in wh. housebreakers, having accidentally tasted salt, have forthwith departed, leaving everything undisturbed.

CRANE (Heb. ṣûṣ or ṣîṣ, Is. 38.[14]; Jr. 8.[7], RV. "swallow," following LXX and Vlg.). Tristram (SDB.) trs. "swift"; he holds dĕrōr as the only word for Swallow; and 'agûr he wd. tr. "crane": but Dr. Post (HDB.) does not agree to this identn., as "the trumpeting of the crane" cd. not "be called twittering." It is difficult to see how birds so prominent were unnoticed in the Bible.

CREATION. The act. of C. found in Gn. 1.[1]–2.[3] (P.), wh. is followed by the more compendious act. (Gn. 2.[4-25], J.), is, rapidly stated, as follows: God (Elohîm) began by creating the heaven and the earth. When the earth was created it was "without form and void" (tōhû wabōhû), "darkness was on the abyss, and the Spirit of God brooded on the face of the waters," "and God said, Let there be light, and there was light." The division of light fm. darkness, of night fm. day, followed; "then there was evening and there was morning; one day." In the second day a firmament established a separation between waters above and waters beneath. On the third day the dry land appeared and plants were created. On the fourth day the heavenly bodies became visible. The fifth day saw the C. of marine animals and birds. The sixth day was occupied with the C. of the land animals and, finally, man.

It is to be noted that the succession of events does not essentially differ fm. that presented to us by geology. The earth is shown us first as a mass of incandescent gas, gradually depositing in fluid lava, wh. in turn shows symptoms of solidifying on the surface; while a covering of vapour hundreds of miles thick envelops it; yet not so thick but that faintly light and darkness, night and day, are distinguishable: this is not unlike the tōhû wabōhû of Gn. 1.[2]. As the earth cools and solidifies the vaporous envelope is gradually lifted up fm. the face of the mass of the earth: there is a separating "firmament" between the water that is being deposited on the cooling surface and that still suspended in vapour. The cloudy envelope gradually thinning becomes rent at times, and so the sun is seen during the day, and the moon and stars at night. The gradual cooling of the earth leads to the absorption of the water in the earth; and its shrinking forms heights and depressions in wh. the water collects, and the dry land appears. The swarming forth of the fishes in the sea, and fm. them the birds, is quite in accordance with the geologic record, in wh. the earliest fossils are those of marine animals. The sixth day shows the evolution of land animals and man, wh. coincides with the function of the Tertiary period. After that there is the practical arrest of the work of C.; "God rested on the seventh day fm. all the work wh. He had made." No careful reader can fail to be impressed with this as the leading feature; that the whole process is an orderly evolution under one intelligent creative Will.

It has been assumed by some that the Biblical act. has been derived fm. the Bab. C.-myth. This we may therefore briefly consider.

"Before the heaven above was named, or the earth beneath, there were Apsu, Mummu (der mitwaltende Sohn und Erzeuger; Weber, Lit. Bab. u. Asyr., p. 44), and Tiamat." When their "waters are mingled together" the gods are produced, first Lachmu and Lachamu, then Ashar and Kishar, and after an interval, Anu, Bel, and Ea, who produced among themselves the other gods. Apsu and Tiamat feel that their supremacy is threatened by these children of theirs, and so determine to destroy them. But Ea, discovering their purpose, deals with Apsu and Mummu as Kronos, accdg. to the Gr. myth, dealt with his father Uranus. Tiamat now forms other beings to help her in wreaking vengeance on the gods she had already produced; these new beings are dragons, fiery serpents, furious dogs, men-scorpions, &c. Agst. these the gods arm themselves; after various expedients Marduk agrees to be the champion of the other gods provided they are prepared to acknowledge him as Supreme. He encountered Tiamat and "cleft her like a fish" (Driver, Archæology and Authority, p. 12). One half of her he made into the heavens; as to the lower portion (Berosus), he made it into the earth. The sixth tablet wh., it is supposed, contained an act. of the dry land, has not yet been recovered; hence the statement of Berosus cannot be verified absolutely. Such is the C. story of Bab.; it is difficult to see any resemblance between this and the Biblical nar.; there is certainly here no intelligent will fixing the place of every successive phenomenon.

Even Canon Driver, who holds the dependence of the record in Gn. on the Bab. Epos, admits that there are profound theological diffcs., but holds that these are counterbalanced by "material resemblances." These resemblances reduce themselves to two; the world begins in "water"; and the first step in educing order is the separation of waters beneath fm. those above. With regard to the first point; the alleged resemblance is due to Dr. Driver's failure to recognise that the "mingling of the waters" is a euphemism for sexual intercourse. How Dr. Driver sees any resemblance in the second point it is difficult to comprehend. Marduk certainly places guardians at Tiamat's mouth that the waters within her body may not gush out; but that is a totally diffc. thing fm. separating into two portions waters wh. formed one mass.

If now the differences are considered these will be seen to be insurmountable. In the Bab. act. there is nothing parallel to the successive days each with its appropriate work wh. forms so characteristic and essential a feature in the Biblical nar.; there is nothing of the C. of light by the words wh. seemed so sublime to Longinus, "God said, Let there be light, and there was light." If we turn to the other side; if the ident. of Tiamat and tehōm ("the deep") be assumed, still there is no word in the Heb. act. of "the deep" supplying the material of the heaven and the earth, or of the gods being produced fm. Tiamat—essential features of the Bab. mythus. These diffcs. cannot be regarded as theological as distinct fm. what Dr. Driver calls "material." But the theological elements are essential to both narratives. Even the verbal ident. of Tiamat with tehōm of wh. Dr. Driver makes so much, wd. really prove the Bab. derivative due to the corruption of Language.

Dr. Driver is compelled to fall back on the alleged resemblance between the Bab. deluge myth and the scripl. act. of the flood, as making for the probability that the story of C. is borrowed also; but the one mt. be derived fm. Bab. without the other being so. See FLOOD. It is needless to claim greater antiquity for the Bab. myth; because the tablets containing the C. story were found in the library of Asshurbanipal (B.C. 668–626), therefore later than the dates commonly assigned to J. or E., the sources of the second C. nar. The Heb. nar. seems to us much nearer the source; its very simplicity over agst. the complexity of the other may be regarded as proof.

The tablet in the Bab. Creation Epos wh. prob. contained the act. of the Creation of Man has not yet been recovered.

The Tg. Jrs. tell that "The Lord God created man in two stages; He took dust fm Mt. Moriah the place of the Sanctuary, and fm. the four winds of the world, and mixed fm. all the waters of the world, and created him black, white, and red, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of Life." The Mohammedan myth asserts that the four angels were employed to gather the dust, and instead of the dust fm. Mt. Moriah it is dust from Mecca that is taken first. In the Qabala we are told that Adam was 96 miles high and 94 miles broad, and that he was androgynous. The Mohammedan tradition declares A.'s height to have been so great when first created that had he stood up his head wd. have reached the seventh heaven. He had as yet no soul; his soul had been made 1000 years before, and only unwillingly entered into the body. Then A. arose and his eyes were nearly blinded because his face was so near the throne of God. All the angels were called upon to worship him; but Eblis (Satan) refused to do so. Such are some of the myths of the creation of man.

Any one desiring more of this curious lore will find it in Baring-Gould's Legends of Old Testament Characters.

CRESCENS, a companion of Paul, sent to Galatia—poss. to Gaul in Europe (2 Tm. 4.[10]). Tradition says he founded churches in Vienne and Mayence.

CRETE is the large island now called Candia, lying to the S. of Greece. The climate is healthy; the soil fruitful. Paul touched it on his voyage to Rm. Tt. 1.[5] may imply an earlier visit. Recent excavations show that C. played a great part in prehistoric times. There are traces of Semitic settlements (see CAPHTOR, CHERETHITES). It was early colonised by the Dorians. The CRETANS, or CRETIANS (AV.), of Tt. 1.[12], were the native inhabitants, whose evil repute is noted by other anct. writers besides Epimenides, whose line is quoted here. The CRETANS of Ac. 2.[11] were Jews resident in the island. They were specially numerous in Gortyna (1 M. 15.[23]). Cretan soldiers were famous as archers and slingers, and were found as mercenaries in many great armies. C. was joined with Cyrene in a single province by Augustus, B.C. 27.

CRIMES AND PENALTIES. (1) CRIMES. C. is defined as "an iniquity to be punished by the judges" (Jb. 31.[11]). It is a deed agst. either God or man wh. exposes one to legal penalties. Such were the following:—

Adultery, unfaithfulness to marriage vows (Ex. 20.[14], &c.), mt. be punished by death (Lv. 20.[10]; Jn. 8.[5]), mutilation (Ek. 23.[25]), or, later, by divorce. It is used as a fig. of unfaithfulness to God (Jr. 3.[14], &c.). Blasphemy (Lv. 24.[10ff.]; Nu. 15.[30]). Breach of Trust (Lv. 6.[2ff.]). Bribery (Ex. 23.[8], &c.). Debt (Mw. 5.[26]). Divination (Dt. 18.[10]). Drunkenness (Is. 28.[1ff.], &c.). Failure or neglect to observe any Divine requirement. Falsehood or Deception, very common Oriental vices (Lv. 19.[11]; Ps. 62.[4]; 1 Jn. 1.[6], &c.). False swearing (Ex. 20.[16]), esp. agst. the innocent (Ex. 23.[7]; Pr. 6.[17]). Fornication, including all unlawful commerce between unmarried persons. Prostitution was prohibited (Lv. 19.[29]; Dt. 23.[17], &c.). F. is a fig. of idolatry (Jr. 3.[8], &c.), and of the infamies of Bab. (Rv. 14.[8], &c.). This formed part of heathen religious ceremonies (Gn. 38.[21], RVm.; Ho. 4.[14]), Homicide, or accidental taking of human life (Ex. 22.^{2}; Nu. 35.$^{22f.}$). The owner was responsible for the deeds of his cattle (Ex. 21.^{28}). Incest, carnal intercourse between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity (Lv. 18.$^{6ff.}$). Injuries to the person (Ex. 21.$^{18ff.}$; Lv. 24.$^{19ff.}$; Dt. 25.$^{11ff.}$). Irreverence to, or ill-treatment of parents (Ex. 20.^{12}, 21.$^{15, 17}$; Lv. 20.^{9}; Dt. 21.$^{18ff.}$, &c.). Man stealing (Dt. 24.^{7}). Murder, taking human life of set purpose, as the outcome of hatred (Dt. 19.^{11}, &c.), whether by violence or treachery (2 S. 22.^{19}, &c.). Usury mt. be taken fm. a foreigner, not fm. a br. Isr. (Ex. 22.^{25}; Dt. 23.^{20}).

(2) Penalties. Under this head we must take act. of suffering inflicted by arbitrary power, as well as of pains inflicted by law on wrong-doers. Banishment: not prescribed by Mosaic law, but a common Rm. penalty (Rv. 1.^{9}). Some offenders thought it wise to banish themselves (2 S. 13.^{37}; 1 K. 11.^{40}, &c.). Beating (He. 11.^{35}, RVm.; cp. 2 M. 6.^{19}, &c.). Beheading: practised by foreign people, but not a Mosaic penalty. Prob. thus the chief baker died

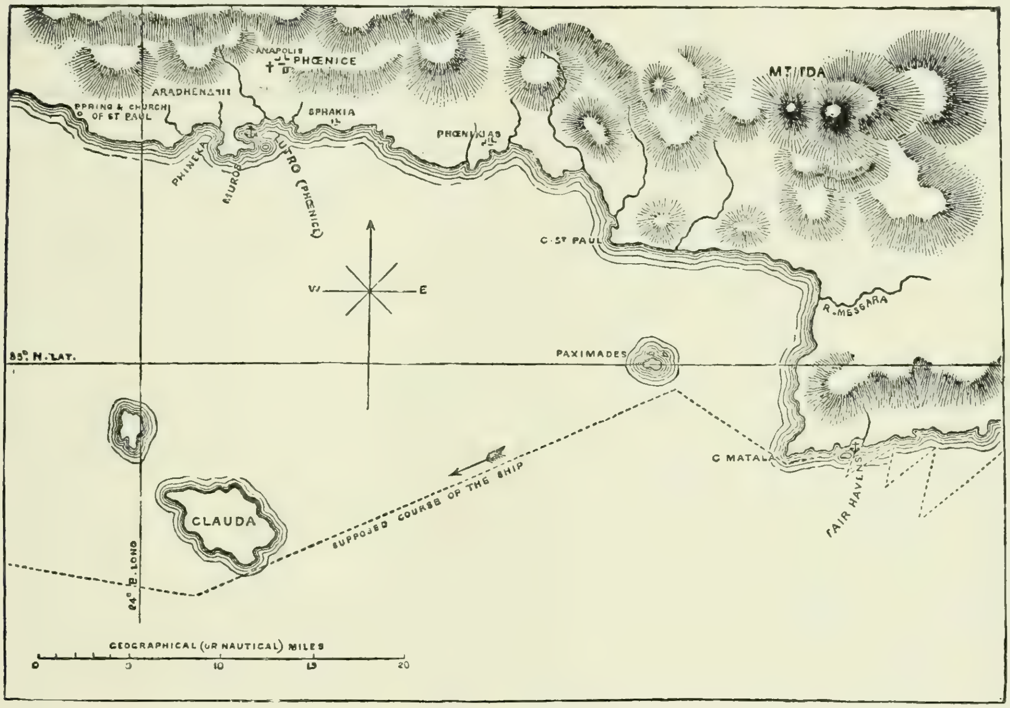

Chart of South Coast of Crete

4.$^{5ff.}$; Jr. 41.^{2}, &c.). Life for life was the law (Nu. 35.$^{16, 21}$, &c.). If an animal known to be vicious killed a man, its owner was judged guilty (Ex. 21.^{29}). Rape (Dt. 22.^{25}). Removing Landmarks (Dt. 19.^{14}). Reviling of Rulers, God's representatives (Ex. 22.^{28}, &c.). Robbery (Ex. 22.^{2}, &c.). Sabbath-breaking. Seduction. One who enticed an unbetrothed maid was bound to marry her unless her fr. objected, and in any case to pay the usual dowry (Ex. 22.$^{16ff.}$). Dt. 22.^{28} leaves no option. A bondmaid was scourged, and her betrayer fined, besides having to make a trespass offering (Lv. 19.$^{20ff.}$). Slander (Ex. 23.^{1}; Ps. 15.^{3}). Sodomy (Gn. 13.^{13}; Lv. 18.^{22}; Dt. 23.^{17}, &c.). Stealing (Ex. 22.^{1}); but the offence mt. be modified by necessity (Pr. 6.^{30}). Uncleanness (Gn. 38.$^{9f.}$; Lv. 15.$^{1ff.}$, 18.^{19}, 20.^{18}). Unnatural vice, a capital offence (Ex. (Gn. 40.^{19}), his body being afterwards hung up. Thus perished the Baptist (Mw. 14.^{8}), and the Apostle James (Ac. 12.^{2}; cp. Rv. 20.^{4}). In other cases the head may have been cut off after death (2 K. 10.$^{6ff.}$; 2 S. 20.$^{21ff.}$). Blinding: sanctioned in Isr. only in retaliation (Ex. 21.^{24}), but much practised by foreign nations (Jg. 16.^{21}; 2 K. 25.^{7}, &c.). Branding: forbidden by Moses (Lv. 19.^{28}), but slaves seem to have been branded to prove ownership (Is. 44.^{5}, RVm.; Gal. 6.^{17}). Burning: the punishment suggd. for Tamar (Gn. 38.^{24}); prescribed for cert. forms of unchastity (Lv. 20.^{14}); practised by the Phil. (Jg. 14.^{15}). In Bab. the furnace was used for execution (Jr. 29.^{22}; Dn. 3; cp. Is. 43.^{2}). Crucifixion: see Cross. Cutting asunder: the doom threatened to the astrologers, &c. (Dn. 2.^{5}, 3.^{29}; cp. Mw. 24.^{51}, &c.). Cutting off fm. the people : this seems to indicate the death penalty, but not the mode of its infliction (Gn. 17.[14], &c.). It mt. poss. mean excommunication. Drowning is alluded to in Mw. 8.[6], &c. ; cp. Ant. XIV. xv. 10. Exposure to wild beasts : practised by many anct. peoples (Dn. 6. ; Mi. 4.[13]), alluded to 1 Cor. 15.[32], &c. Fines : imposed by judges for injuries not resulting in permanent disablement (Ex. 21.[22]), and in certain cases of manslaughter, " for redemption of his life " (v. 30) ; but never for murder (Nu. 35.[31f.]). If his ox killed a slave, a man was fined 30 shekels of silver (cp. Dt. 22.[19, 29]). Flaying: referred to Mi. 3.[2f.] ; practised by the Asyrs. and Persians. Hanging : in our sense not an Isr. penalty, but Ahithophel and Judas thus committed suicide (2 S. 17.[23] ; Mw. 27.[5]). In Scrip. H. means impalement, the dead body being pierced and raised aloft on a pointed stake (1 S. 31.[10] ; 2 S. 4.[12], 21.[12f.]). One thus exposed was reckoned accursed (Dt. 21.[23] ; cp. Gal. 3.[13]). The " gallows " of Est. 2.[23], &c., was prob. the stake. Imprisonment : a common practice. It mt. itself be the penalty, e.g. that of the Baptist (Mw. 4.[12]), and Barabbas (Lk. 23.[19]). The accused were thus held for trial (Gn. 39.[20f.] ; Ac. 4.[3], &c.), and the condemned for execution (Ac. 12.[4]). It mt. be aggravated by toil (Jg. 16.[21]), beating (Jr. 37.[15]), torments (Mw. 18.[30, 34]), reduction of food (1 K. 22.[27]), stocks (Ac. 16.[24]), and chains (Ps. 105.[18], &c.). Jeremiah was imprisoned for his safety (37.[21]). See Prison. Mutilation : sanctioned only in retaliation, but inflicted at times, e.g. on Adonibezek (Jg. 1.[6f.]). The revolting cruelties of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 M. 7.[1ff.]) accorded with Asyr. practice. The custom of cutting off the hands of thieves may be alluded to in Jesus' counsel of self-mutilation rather than evil-doing (Mw. 5.[30], &c.). Plucking off the hair (Ne. 13.[25] ; cp. Is. 50.[6]) mt. cause great suffering (2 M. 7.[7]), and was always deep indignity. See Hair. Precipitation : inflicted on the Edomites (2 Ch. 25.[12] ; cp. 2 M. 6.[10]) ; prob. meant by " dashing in pieces " (2 K. 8.[12] ; Ho. 10.[11]). The Nazarenes sought thus to kill Jesus (Lk. 4.[29]) : see Stoning. Restitution. The offender was bound to make good to the injured any loss resulting fm. his crime, with cert. additions as penalty. An ox stolen and killed or sold shd. be restored fivefold, a sheep fourfold : if found alive in the thief's possession, double. Loss of crop caused by a strayed animal, or by fire thro' negligence, shd. be made good. Aught held in trust lost by theft or negligence shd. be restored double (Ex. 22.[1ff.]) ; and in the matter of a deposit, a fifth part was added (Lv. 6.[2ff.]). If a Rm. jailer lost his prisoner, he was liable to the penalty for the crime of wh. the latter was accused (Ac. 12.[19], 16.[27]). Retaliation. The law, " eye for eye," &c. (Ex. 21.[24], &c.), rests on the principle that injury is avenged by equal injury to the aggressor. But as the loss of a hand mt. be greater, e.g. to an engraver than to a singer, prob. it mt. be avoided by a money payment, regulated by the judges (Ex. 21.[22]). The false accuser incurred the penalty of the crime he alleged (Dt. 19.[16ff.]). Sawing asunder (He. 11.[37]). David subjected the people of Rabbah to " saws," and other instruments of torture (2 S. 12.[31]). Justin Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho) says that Isaiah died in this way. Scorpions, chastising with : prob. the use of whips into the lashes of wh. pointed pieces of metal had been twisted (1 K. 12.[11]). Slavery. A bankrupt, and a thief who cd. not make restitution, mt., with w. and children, be sold as slaves (Ex. 22.[3] ; 2 K. 4.[1], &c.), but no Isr. mt. be held in permanent bondage (Lv. 25.[39ff.]). See Slave. Slaying by spear, dart, or sword : a common form of execution (Ex. 19.[13] ; Nu. 25.[7f.] ; 1 K. 2.[25] ; He. 11.[37], 12.[20], &c.). Stocks, suffered by Hanani (2 Ch. 16.[10], RVm.) and Jeremiah (20.[2]) : a wooden engine with five holes, in wh. were placed the neck, arms, and legs of the victim. One form received the feet only (Ac. 16.[24]). Stoning : a death penalty incurred, e.g. by adultery (Lv. 20.[10] ; Dt. 22.[21, 24]), blasphemy (Lv. 24.[10ff.]), idolatry (Dt. 13.[10]). The culprit was precipitated fm. a height ; if this did not kill him, stones were cast at him. The witnesses cast the first stones (Dt. 17.[7]). Strangling : not used by Jews till post-biblical times. Stripes, as a penalty, were limited to 40. Not the punishment, but the excess, was felt to be degrading (Dt. 25.[3]). It was inflicted with a scourge of three thongs, 13 strokes of wh. made 39 stripes, thus keeping safely within the prescribed limit (2 Cor. 11.[24]). It was incurred by a man and a bondmaid having illegal intercourse (Lv. 19.[20]), a man slandering his w. (Dt. 22.[18]), a debtor (Mw. 18.[34]), &c. The culprit, stretched on the ground, or bound to a pillar, received it on his naked back. Females sat in a stooping posture. See Scourging.

The disgrace and ignominy of cert. penalties were deepened, e.g. by leaving the dead bodies exposed to the dogs and birds of prey (1 K. 14.[11] ; Ps. 79.[2]), cutting off the head (1 S. 17.[51], &c.), burning (Jo. 7.[15], &c.), or hanging the body aloft (2 S. 4.[12], &c.).

Many disasters befalling the people were regarded as penalties inflicted by God because of unfaithfulness : e.g. drought (Dt. 11.[17]), famine (Lv. 26.[26], &c.), plague and pestilence (Ek. 6.[11]), defeat and captivity. Any great national calamity was referred to the displeasure of God.

CRIMSON. See Colour.

CRISPUS, the chief ruler of the synagogue in Corinth, converted and baptized by Paul (Ac. 18.[8] ; 1 Cor. 1.[14]).

CROSS, CRUCIFIXION. The C. as an instrument of execution is found among many anct. peoples. We have here to do with its use under the Rms. The name, stauros, may mean a stake, but it is also the equivalent of the Lat. crux. This consisted of an upright post, with a cross-beam at the top; or the top mt. project above the beam. The latter seems to have been the form of the C. of Jesus (Mw. 27.[37], &c.), the superscription being nailed over the crucified. It was customary to scourge the condemned man—itself a terrific punishment—and to make him carry the cross-beam to the place of execution, where it was attached to the upright. The victim was stripped naked, set astride a piece of wood wh. projected fm. the stake—the sedile—his hands nailed to the cross-beam (sometimes the feet also were nailed to the post), and there he was left to die; the sedile supporting the weight, lest the hands shd. tear and the body fall forward. The feet were usly. almost touching the ground. Death came thro' excruciating agonies wh. mt. last for days. To the pain of inflamed wounds, and tortured limbs, in the fierce sun of Syria, there were added burning thirst and fever, often ending in wild delirium. The bodies of the crucified were commonly left to the dogs and vultures. Fm. the time of Augustus, however, the relatives of one condemned in a civil court mt. have the body if they begged it. The clothes were the perquisite of the executioners.

The ignominy of C. for the Jews was intensified by the fact that it was a foreign mode of execution, introduced by their conquerors, among whom no death was reckoned more shameful and degrading, it being at first employed only in the case of slaves. The extent to wh. C. was carried by Rm. authorities is appalling, wood for crosses and space to erect them alike failing under Titus (Ant. XVII. x. 10; XX. v. 2; BJ. II. xii. 6; II. xiii. 2; V. xi. 1).

The Jews did not practise C., but it was common to hang up the dead bodies of criminals (Dt. 21.[22]; 2 S. 4.[12]), and bodies thus exposed were accursed. The crucified were reckoned under this curse, as in the striking passage of Paul (Gal. 3.[13]).

The carrying of the cross-beam furnished the fig. used of those who face trouble and distress for Christ's sake—to take up their C. (Mw. 16.[24], &c.). The C., as the instrument by wh. Christ died, became the symbol of the saving work completed by His death (1 Cor. 1.[18]; Gal. 6.[12ff.], &c.). Thus the instrument of reproach and ignominy has been transfigured, and charged with holy and blessed significance.

CROWN, DIADEM. The C. (Heb. zēr) of Ex. 25., 30., 37. is a rim or moulding. It was prob. a decorative golden wreath. Nēzer (lit. "consecration") is the ornament on the high-priest's mitre (Ex. 29.[6]; Lv. 8.[9]), as well as that worn by the monarch (2 S. 1.[10]; 2 K. 11.[12]). 'Atārāh, "a band round the head," is the C. of the k. of Rabbah (2 S. 12.[30], &c.), made of gold, and flashing with precious stones, wh. became the C. of David (cp. Est. 8.[15]). It is frequently used figuratively of dignity, honour, and riches. Kether (Est. 1.[11], &c.) is the peak of the Persian turban; the jewelled tiara. Diadem in OT. stands for mitznepheth (Ek. 21.[26], RV. "mitre"), tzanōph, or tzanīph (Is. 62.[3]; Jb. 29.[14], RVm. "turban"), and tziphīrah (Is. 28.[5]). A diadem is in its origin nothing more than a fillet to confine hair that is worn long (RS.[2], 483). The Persian symbol of royalty was a broad fillet of silk, blue and white, worn round the head, and tied behind (Xenophon, Cyr. viii. 3, 13). It mt. be studded with jewels. Adopted by Alexander the Gt. it became the symbol of royalty among the Greeks.

In the NT. diadēma is the emblem of sovereign power (Rv. 12.[3], 13.[1], 19.[12]). Stephanos, the wreath or chaplet won in the games (1 Cor. 9.[25]), and the reward of fidelity (2 Tm. 4.[8]; Rv. 2.[10], &c.), is the emblem of victory or achievement. It was the "crown" of thorns placed in cruel mockery upon the head of Christ (Mw. 27.[29], &c.).

DIADEM

CRYSTAL (Heb. zekūkīth, qeraḥ), the first supposed by Tristam (SDB.) to be "GLASS" and the second "rock-crystal." There are no data on wh. to decide.

CUB, AV. CHUB. The Heb. kūb is prob. a scribal error for lūb, "Lybia" (Ek. 30.[5]): so LXX.

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CUCKOW (Heb. shaḥaph, Lv. 11.[16]; Dt. 14.[15], RV. "sea-mew"), an unclean bird wh. cannot be cert. identd.; supposed to be the petrel (Tristram, SDB.).

CUCUMBER. The word qishshu'īm is found only in Nu. 11.[5]. It prob. corrsps. to Arb. qiththā, a C. long and thin, with hairy, green rind, largely grown in the E. Another kind, the Arb. khiyār, is more appreciated for its succulence and flavour. But for its cultivation water is necessary, while the qiththā can almost bid drought defiance. Miqshāh (Is. 1.[8]) is "the place of Cs." The "lodge" is the frail shelter of wattled branches in wh. the watcher sits to guard the crop.

CUMMIN (Heb. kammōn, Arb. kammūn) is an umbelliferous plant, prob. indigenous to Pal., bearing small delicate seeds, wh. wd. be crushed by threshing in the ordinary way; the rod is still used to beat them out (Is. 28.[25, 27]). It is a common condiment, and has also cert. medicinal uses. It was one of the plants subj. to tithe (Mw. 23.[23]).

CUP (Heb. kōs, Arb. kās) is the name of various forms of drinking vessels. Gabī'a (Gn. 44.[2]) is Joseph's silver divining C., prob. larger than the kōs. The word is trd. "bowl" in Ex. 25.[31], &c. Qesā- vōth (1 Ch. 28.[17]). In Nu. 4.[7], AV. trs. " covers," RV. " cups " ; in Ex. 25.[29], 37.[16], AV. trs. " covers," RV. " flagons." 'Aggān (Is. 22.[24]). In Ex. 24.[26], EV. tr. " bason," and in SS. 7.[2] " goblet." The NT. potērion corrsps. to Heb. kōs.

Cup (Assyrian)

In Scripl. metaphor, C. stands for the experience of life wh. a man receives fm. God (Ps. 11.[6], &c. ; cp. Mw. 20.[22], &c.). As one drinks what is handed to him by the C.-bearer, so one takes what is given by God.

CUP-BEARER. The " butler," mashqeh (Gn. 40.[5]), is lit. " C.-bearer " (1 K. 10.[5]; 2 Ch. 9.[4]; Ne. 1.[11]). The duty of this official was to protect the k. agst. poison. His position was often one of intimate confidence. Frequently C.-bs. were eunuchs (Ant. XVI. viii. 1).

CURSE. The ideas connected with a C. are gen. the same everywhere. Here we need only note a point connected with the use of the word ḥerem, wh. AV. trs. now " a devoted thing " (Lv. 27.[28], &c.), and again " a cursed thing " (Dt. 7.[26], &c.) : RV. uniformly " a devoted thing." The root idea is that of separation. Whatever is ḥerem is removed irrevocably fm. all ordinary uses ; and this either (a) that it may be devoted absolutely to God, for the purposes of the sanctuary, and to supply the wants of the priests (Lv. 27.[28f.]), or (b) that it may be utterly destroyed (1 K. 20.[42], &c.). The latter sense is the more usual. To curse is to devote to irremediable ruin. The fear of a C. is still strong in the Oriental heart. It will blanch the cheek of even the intelligent and educated man, who is emancipated fm. most superstitions. Among the Moslems, to " curse the prophet " is a capital offence.

CURTAIN (Heb. yĕrī'ōth). Tents in the E. are usly. made of lengths of goat's-hair cloth sewn together. The various lengths of such that went to the formation of the TABERNACLE are called Cs. The " hanging " in front of the Holy Place (māsāk) is once called C. (Nu. 3.[26]). See HANGING.

CUSH. (1) The first named of the sons of HAM (Gn. 10.[6]).

Though it does not appear in AV., in RV. as in Heb. and AVm., in Gn. 2.[13] we have C. instead of Ethiopia; in every case where ETHIOPIA in OT. occurs, the Heb. has C.

(2) The general reference of C. (and Ethiopia) is to a powerful kdm. established S. of Egp. identd. with mod. Nubia and Abyssinia. In hieroglyphic the name appears as Kesh. TIRHAKAH (Is. 37.[9]), k. of C. (Ethiopia), threatened SENNACHERIB ; several dynasties fm. Ethiopia secured the supremacy in Egp. (3) In the title to Ps. 7. there is mention of C., a Benjamite ; nothing is known of him—it may have been a nickname. In 2 S. 18.[21], a runner is mentioned called Cushi, " Ethiopian " ; not impossibly he may have been a Nubian brought fm. Egp. as a slave ; there are many in Pal. at the present time. (4) As C. was the fr. of NIMROD, and, as mentioned above, the second river of PARADISE " compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia " (Gn. 2.[13]), it wd. seem that there was a C. in southern Bab. It is prob. that the Kashshu, " the Cossæans," are intended. Cushan, in Hb. 3.[7], is regarded as a lengthened form of C. : fm. the mention of Midian in the parallel clause it has been argued that this was an Arabian C.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, a k. of MESOPOTAMIA who oppressed Isr. (Jg. 3.[8]) ; not yet identd.

CUSTOM (Mw. 17.[25], RV. " toll " ; Rm. 13.[7]), an ad valorem tax upon goods, collected by the PUBLICANS. In Galilee and Peræa it went to the tetrarchs, in Judea to the Rms.

CUTH, CUTHAH. One of the cities whence colonists were brought to N. Isr., hence the inhabitants of SAMARIA are called by the Tlm. Cuthæans. C. is identd. with Tell Ibrahīm (Kuti of the inscrs.), to the NE. of Bab. ; remains of a temple to NERGAL have been found there.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH (Lv. 19.[28], 21.[5] ; Dt. 14.[1]). The phrase " for the dead " connects the custom prohibited with the practice of self-mutilation in mourning for the dead, common among many diverse and widely scattered peoples. Association with heathen rites wd. lead to its being forbidden, but in spite of the prohibition there are indications of its survival to a late time (Jr. 16.[6] ; cp. Ho. 9.[4]). The original meaning seems to persist among cert. rude peoples where the blood is applied to the dead body, fm. wh. in turn a piece is taken and kept, or even eaten. The obj. clearly is " to make an enduring covenant with the dead " (RS.[2] 323). Such a custom was intolerable among those who were " a people holy unto the Lord " (Dt. 14.[2]). In this light it appears in the nar. of the dramatic scene on Carmel (1 K. 18.[28]).

Marks printed on the body were also forbidden (Lv. 19.[28]), apparently because of their heathen associations. In origin, Robertson Smith thinks (RS.[2] 334, n.) they may be nothing more than the permanent scars of punctures made to draw blood for a ceremony of self-dedication to the deity. It is evidently the tattoo marks developed fm. this that are prohibited, the mark being the sign that the worshipper belonged to the god. The practice is alluded to in Is. 44.[5] (RVm.), and Gal. 6.[17]. See for discussion and Lit., Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia,[1] 212ff.

CYMBAL. See MUSIC.

CYPRESS, Heb. tirzāh (Is. 44.[14]). It is imposs. to say what tree is intended. It mt. be the beech, the holm-oak, or the juniper. It is safest, with Dr Post, to trlt. and call it the " tirzah."

CYPRUS, an island in the Levant, c. 60 miles off the Syr. coast, and 40 miles S. of Cilicia. It is 120 miles in length, and its greatest breadth is 60 miles. Two mountain ranges run parallel fm. E. to W., forming the N. and S. boundaries of a spacious and fertile plain. The highest peak of the S. range is Mt. Troödos, 6406 ft. The forests for wh. C. was noted in anct. times have largely disappeared, and the rainfall is far short of requirements. Recently, under British influence, trees have been protected, and extensive irrigation works have been carried out. The olive, vine, and palm grow luxuriantly. Grain, fruit, silk, and leather are among its exports.

The obj. of a long dispute between the Persians and the Greeks, at the death of Alexander the Gt. it passed with Egp. to Ptolemy, B.C. 306; falling to Rm. B.C. 57. After the battle of Actium it became an imperial province: but in B.C. 22 Augustus restored it to the Senate, and the governor (Ac. 13.[7]; cp. 18.[12], 19.[38]) is rightly called anthupatos, "proconsul."

Christianity was introduced by fugitives fm. the persecution in Jrs. (Ac. 11.[19]). It was the birthplace of BARNABAS and MNASON. Paul visited the island in company with Barnabas and John Mark (Ac. 13.[4f.]), and the latter two afterwards returned to C. (15.[39])

C. was known in OT. as Chittim.

CYRENE, a Gr. colony founded B.C. 624, the chief city of Cyrenaica (mod. Barca), the fruitful district on the shore W. of Egp. After Alexander the Gt. it was under the Ptolemies. Falling into the hands of the Rms. B.C. 96, it became a province B.C. 75, and was joined to Crete B.C. 67. There were many Jews in C. Ptolemy I. introduced great numbers, believing that their presence made for general prosperity (Ant. XIV. vii. 2). Of this city was Simon (Mw. 27.[32]). Jews fm. C. were in Jrs. at Pentecost, and had share in a synagogue (Ac. 2.[10], 6.[9]). Preachers fm. C. laboured in Antioch, of whom was Lucius (Ac. 11.[20], 13.[1]), afterwards, accdg. to tradition, first bishop of C.

CYRENIUS. See QUIRINIUS.

CYRUS (Heb. Koresh, Persian Kurush, Bab. Kuras, Susian Kuras). A popular etymology, quoted by Plutarch fm. Ctesias, derived the name fm. a Persian word signifying "the sun" (mod. Pers. Khor). This, however, is philologically imposs., and the name was prob. of Elamite origin, like that of the river Cyrus. Accdg. to Strabo (xv. p. 729) the original name was Agradates. Various legends grew up about the childhood of Cyrus and his conquest of Media, some of wh. are reported by the Gr. writers. Herodotus made him the grandson of Astyages of Media, whose dr., Mandanê, was married to a Persian noble, and who, in consequence of a dream, ordered Harpagus to put him to death. Harpagus, however, gave the child to a herdsman who adopted him. In time the royal origin of Cyrus was discovered, and he was acknowledged by his grandfr., who punished Harpagus by serving up his own s. to him at a banquet. In revenge Harpagus urged Cyrus to rebel agst. the Medes, and in a critical battle went over to the Persians, who captured Astyages and put an end to his kdm.

Accdg. to Ctesias, Cyrus was a Mardian bandit, not related to Astyages, who, after the overthrow of the Medes, treated Astyages like a fr. and married his dr. Amytis. Xenophon invented a s. and successor of Astyages, called Cyaxares, whom he made the uncle of Cyrus, the Persian k. having been brought up at the Median court, and afterwards conquering the Armenians and Chaldæans as general of Cyaxares, who left his kdm. to him.

The cuneiform inscr. of Nabonidos, the last Bab. k., and of Cyrus himself, have given us the true hist. of events. Cyrus calls himself k. of Ansan or Anzan, in Elam, and great-grandson of the Achæmenid Persian, Teispes, who was also the ancestor of Darius.

In B.C. 549 Astyages attacked Cyrus, who was already k. of Ansan, but his army revolted agst. him and handed him over to his enemy. Cyrus thereupon marched to Ecbatana, the Median capital, took possession of the treasures of Astyages, and became head of the Median empire. Three yrs. later he assumed the title of k. of Persia, and the overthrow of Crœsus of Lydia soon afterwards placed Asia Minor and the Gr. cities on its coast in his hands. In B.C. 538 he was ready to invade Bab. A battle fought near Opis in Tammuz or June, decided the fate of the Babn. army, wh. was commanded by Belshazzar, the son of Nabonidos. Sippara surrendered on the 14th of the month, and two days later Gobryas, governor of Kurdistan, entered Bab. with a portion of the invading forces "without fighting or battle." Nabonidos was captured and imprisoned there. On the 3rd of Marchesvan or October, Cyrus himself came to Bab. and proclaimed a gen. amnesty. Eight days later "the son" of Nabonidos died, and there was mourning for him throughout the country, after wh. Cambyses, the s. of Cyrus, offered gifts and made sacrifices to Merodach on his fr.'s account. The Gr. stories of the dissipation of the waters of the river Gyndes and of the long siege of Bab. were all fictions. Cyrus had been assisted in his campaign by a disaffected party in Bab. itself; after his conquest, therefore, he posed as the faithful worshipper and agent of Bel-Merodach, who had employed him to punish the godless Nabonidos. Nabonidos had been a usurper, and had created discontent by attempting to centralise Babylonian worship in Bab.; the Babylonian priests, accdly., professed to see in Cyrus the rightful successor of the anct. ks. In furtherance of his policy of conciliation he now allowed the exiled populations in Babylonia to return to their homes with the images of their gods. The Jews, who had no images, took with them their sacred vessels (Ez. 1.^{7}).

The conquest of Babylonia by Cyrus was followed by the extension of his empire to the E. In the last yr. of his reign Cambyses was associated with him on the throne. Accdg. to Herodotus he met his death in battle with Tomyris, queen of the Massagetæ, beyond the Araxes (B.C. 529); accdg. to Ctesias it was in war with the Derbices. The inscrs. show him to have been a ruler of great military genius, tactful and conciliatory in policy, and a polytheist rather than a Zoroastrian in religion.

DAGON, a Phil. deity, formerly taken to be the "fish-god." Prof. Sayce (SDB.) has shown, by the offerings sent to J″. En.*) and Seigfried (KB.) think D. = Ea (also Odakon), the Asyr. god of the waters. Final decision must await further discoveries.

Wellhausen (Text d. Büch. Sam. p. 50), thinks נ at the end of Dagon in the last clause of 1 S. 5.^{4} is due to the נ beginning the next word; so the clause shd. read "only his fish was left to him." This ingenious suggestion is without support fm. the VV.: all imply a word dropped out.

The city is girt around by the embowering greenery of her famous orchards, and by her marvellously fruitful gardens, through wh. the sweet waters of the Abana are carried in multitudinous channels. The plain, dotted with groves of olive and fruit trees, supports a peasant population of about 50,000. The inhabitants of D. number at least 150,000. A railway now climbs Mt. Lebanon, and, descending into the Beqa', runs down with the river to D. The line is continued to the S., along the great pilgrimage route, and is designed in the end to reach Mecca. A branch, crossing the Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, and ascending the Vale of Jezreel past Bethshan, connects D. with Haifa, at the base of Carmel. The old-world city is now lit by electricity, and the whizz of the electric car is heard in her streets.

DAMASCUS: FROM TOWER OF GREAT MOSQUE

The city is named in the Egpn. hists. of Thothmes III., B.C. 1501–1447 (timasqu), and in those of Ramses II., B.C. 1292–1225 (tirumasqi). To possess such a position wd. be an obj. of ambition between the Egpns. and Hittites in these far-off times. Accdg. to Moslem tradition, Eliezer founded the city, and Abraham reigned there for a time (cp. Ant. I. vii. 2). By the beginning of the 12th cent. the Syrs. were in possession. Their defeat by David is recorded in 2 S. 8. In his time Rezon, s. of Eliada, laid the foundations of the Syr. empire, wh. was destined to make much trouble for Isr., until its overthrow by Asyr., B.C. 732. Their relations, however, were often friendly; commercial exchanges promoted their mutual interests (1 K. 19.$^{15ff.}$, 20.^{34}; 2 K. 5., 8.$^{7ff.}$). Ahaz found here the altar on wh. he remodelled that at Jrs. (2 K. 16.$^{10ff.}$). With its conquest by Tiglath-pileser III., B.C. 732, the importance of D. waned (cp. Is. 8.^{4}, 17.^{1}, &c.). In the Gr. period her rank of first city in Syr. was surrendered to the newly-built Antioch on the Orontes. During the troubled yrs. that followed, she fell at times into the hands of the Ptolemies. Aretas, k. of Arabia, in B.C. 85, with the good-will of the people, entered the city and assumed control (Ant. XIII. xv. 2). In B.C. 65 it was taken by Metellus, and passed under the power of Rm. At the time of Saul's conversion (Ac. 9.$^{2ff.}$), the city was governed by a representative of Aretas, the Nabatæan k., to whom Caligula seems to have granted it (2 Cor. 11.^{32}). There must have been a large Jewish colony, as no fewer than 10,000 perished in one popular uprising (BJ. II. xx. 2). Pliny reckons D. to the Decapolis (NH. v. 6). A long hist. of strange vicissitudes leaves D. still the chief city in Syr., possessing, perhaps, more than any other, the mysterious spell of the Orient.

The great temple (2 K. 5.^{18}) was changed by Theodosius into a Christian church. Subsequently it became a Moslem mosque, where, accdg. to Moslem tradition, the head of John the Baptist, accdg. to Christian tradn. the body of John Damascenus, lies buried. Over the S. gateway stands in Gr. the text "Thy kdm., O Christ, is an everlasting Kdm., and Thy dominion endureth for all generations." The "Street called Straight" is the mod. Derb el-mustaqim, running due E. and W. The alleged houses of Ananias and of Judas, the spot where Paul escaped fm. the city, and the site of the house of Naaman, are all shown with a confidence wh. there is not much to justify.

Moslem Pilgrimage (el Ḥajj) setting out from Damascus

Outside the E. gate is the tomb of St. George, the porter who paid with his life for the assistance rendered to Paul.

The great highways "between N. and S., E. and W., along wh. flowed the commerce and marched the armies of the anct. world, lay through the heart of the city. Resting in the midst of a beautiful oasis, on the edge of the changeless desert, surrounded by desert hills, she formed the natural harbour, whither steered the argosies fm. the sea of sand, bearing the treasures of the E.; whence again the sombre mariners set forth on their dreary voyage homeward. Herein we have the secret of her perennial greatness. A strong position she never was, and often has she bent beneath the stroke of the conqueror, becoming 'a servant to task work.' But ever as the tides of war rolled back, she has arisen again, fresh and vigorous as of yore. She has been the meeting-place and mart of the nations, and as she has been of use to all, alike to the desert nomad and to the more settled peoples, so the necessities of all have conspired to perpetuate her prosperity." See Hastings, DB. s.v.

DAN and Naphtali were sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gn. 30.^{6}). They come next in order after the first four sons of Leah. "Dan" may be contracted fm. some Divine name such as Abidan (Nu. 1.^{11}). Nothing is recorded of his personal hist., and the tribe seems to have played quite a subordinate part. Only one clan is named, that of Hushim (Gn. 46.^{23}), or Shuham (Nu. 26.^{42}). We cannot fix the boundaries of the portion of D. (Jo. 19.). It lay S.W. of Ephraim, with Benjamin on the E., and Judah on the S.E. and S. It included the low hills and the plain, apparently reaching to Jaffa (Jo. 19.^{46}). Cert. cities given to D. in Jo. 19. are in Jo. 15. given to Judah. "The Amorites forced the children of D. into the mountain" (Jg. 1.^{34}), but in 5.^{16} they still appear on the coast. The district proved too small for them. An expedition of 600 men set out for the N., taking with them the idol and priest of Micah the Ephraimite, captured the town of Laish "in the valley that lieth by Beth Rehob," and settled there (Jg. 18.). Samson was the one great man produced by D., and the stories of his exploits concern the southern territory. The settlement in the N. grew in importance, and was regarded, along with Abel, as a strong conservator of true Israelite customs (2 S. 20.^{18} LXX). In Gn. 49.^{16} and Dt. 33.^{22}, D. is described as something of a freebooter, who joins cunning to his dashing bravery. Mahaneh-dan, "the camp of Dan," is placed behind Kirjath-jearim in Jg. 18.^{12}, between Zorah and Eshtaol in 13.^{25}. For the numbers assigned to D. see Numbers.

DAN, the anct. Laish (Leshem, Jo. 19.^{47}), apparently an outlying settlement of Tyre, captured by Dan (Jg. 18.), is possibly Dan-jaan of 2 S. 24.^{6}. It lay "near Mt. Lebanon and the fountains of the lesser Jordan" (Ant. V. iii. 1, VIII. viii. 4). OEJ. places it 4 Rm. miles fm. Paneas, on the way to Tyre. This clearly points to Tell el Qāḍy—Qāḍy being the Arb. equivalent of Heb. Dan—a mound in the plain W. of Banias, with ruins on the S. side. Two springs rise at its base, that on the W. being the largest source of the Jordan. The two unite their waters in Nahr el Leddān, wh., 5 miles lower, joins the streams fm. Hasbeiyeh and Banias, to form the Jordan. The mound is the crater of an extinct volcano, and rises some 80 ft. fm. the midst of a thicket of bushes. The worship of Micah's idol was here maintained "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (Jg. 18.^{31}). When Jeroboam set up the golden calf, the descendants of Micah's priest seem to have secured the priesthood (Jg.

18.[30f.]; 1 K. 12.[29, 30]), wh. they held till the invasion of Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 15.[29]). D. was taken by Benhadad (1 K. 15.[20]), restored to Ahab (20.[34]), and was doubtless included in the kdm. of Jeroboam II.

D. marked the N. boundary of Isr. (Jg. 20.[1], &c.), and of Gilead (Dt. 34.[1]). Hither Abraham pursued the army of Chedorlaomer.

DANCE. Among the anct. Isrs. occasions of joy were celebrated with song and D., esp. by the women, e.g. the great deliverance at the Red Sea (Ex. 15.[20]), the warriors' home-coming (Jg. 11.[34]; 1 S. 18.[6]), harvest and vintage (Jg. 21.[21]). The D. had also its place in worship (Ps. 149.[3], 150.[4], &c.). In these cases the word used is māḥōl, wh. signifies the rhythmic movement of a company, keeping time to the beat of tambourines. Men also danced, as David before the ark (2 S. 6.[14]), but fm. his wife's taunt, we may infer that this was common only among the humbler classes (6.[20]). In such religious processions, men and women seem to have marched together (Ps. 68.[25]). In their excitement they leaped, pāzaz (2 S. 6.[16]), skipped, rāgad (1 Ch. 15.[29]), and wheeled round, kārar (2 S. 6.[14]). The single dancer does not appear in OT., nor men and women dancing in couples. Gr. influence is seen in such a performance as that of the dr. of Herodias (Mw. 14.[6], &c.). This form of entertainment still persists in the E.; its attraction consists, unhappily, in its immodesty.

DANIEL ("God is my judge," or "Divine judge"). (1) Second s. of David (1 Ch. 3.[1]), born in Hebron (see Chileab). (2) A priest of the time of Ezra (8.[2]; Ne. 10.[6]). (3) The fourth of the "Greater Prophets." At Nebuchadnezzar's desire, Ashpenaz (Abiesdri LXX), "the master of the eunuchs," chose D., prob. of the "seed royal," with Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael, to be reared as hostages in the Bab. court. Their names being changed, D. was called Belshazzar, modified by the Massoretes into Belteshazzar. As they were prob. c. 18 yrs. old, the close of their novitiate of 3 yrs. finds them in early manhood. Nebuchadnezzar, in his 2nd or 3rd yr., has a dream, and requires his astrologers to reveal at once the dream and its interpretation. This he believes they can do, and, attributing their failure to treason, orders the execution of them all. Even students of astrology like D. and his friends are involved. In answer to prayer, the dream and its interpretation are revealed to D., so that he alone passes the k.'s test, and receives high honour, his friends also being promoted to positions of trust. D. likewise interprets a second dream of the k. (see following art.). Under Nabunahid D. is no longer at the head of the astrologers. He has to be specially summoned to Belshazzar's feast. He interprets the mysterious inscr. and is raised to the third place in the kdm. Darius (Gobryas) the Mede makes him one of the three Presidents. The envy of his associates in the government leads to his being thrown to the lions, fm. whom, to the joy of Darius and the discomfiture of his foes, he is delivered. His visions are considered in the next art. When Cyrus issued his decree D. was over 80, too old to go with the first contingent of returning exiles. Mohammedan tradition makes him governor of Syria.

DANIEL, THE BOOK OF, is the earliest Apocalypse. The authenticity of no bk. in OT. has been more persistently assailed.

Text.—The MT. in our Heb. Bibles differs markedly fm. that behind the LXX (Chigi), and considerably also fm. that implied in Thd., Psh., and Vlg. As D. was not a bk. regularly read in the synagogue, its text was not guarded by uniformly diffused kge., as was that of the Torah, fm. mistakes of scribes. Moreover, Apcs. were esp. liable to interpolation. There are traces of modification to adapt the text to its readers, esp. in the Aram., wh., originally Eastern, was changed into Western : a few Eastern forms survive, showing what the original was. The same process is seen in the Heb., e.g. in 1.[12] we have the consonantally common form zērō'īm, "pulse" : in v. 16 it is replaced by the late form zēr'ōnīm, a word already familiar to the scribe. In a frequently copied writing the presence of antique words proves its antiquity, while the presence of recent words proves only carelessness in the scribe. There was no motive to cultivate an antique style ; men had not yet thought of the chronology of style ; the writer of Ec., although he wished men to think Solomon the author, did not feel bound to avoid the short rel., or to make gen. use of the vav conversive.

Language.—D. shares with Ez., and to a small extent Jr., the peculiarity of being written in two langs., Heb. and Aram. : chaps. 2.[4]–7., about $\frac{4}{7}$ of the whole is Aram., the rest is Heb. In the few cases of works published in two langs., the reason for introducing a second is usually quite obvious. In histl. works, documents are sometimes quoted in their original form ; so also authorities for statements in scientific or philosophical writings. But in D. we have not to do with quotations ; another explanation must be found. Keil and others think that in the Aram. portion we have the development of the world-power over agst. the kdm. of God, and in the Heb. that of the kdm. of God over agst. the world-power. Merx's theory is that in the Aram. the unlearned Jews were addressed ; in the Heb. the learned. Eichhorn thinks the diffc. of lang. implies a diffc. of author. All these assume that D. is not one bk. Lenormant's view, very genly. adopted, is that the Heb. part of D., lost during the Antiochian persecutions, was supplied fm. a Tg. wh. survived. It is difficult, on this theory, to understand why there is no trace of any Tg. of the rest of D. If, as we think, D. was originally issued in separate tracts, it may well be imposs. now to assign the reasons why an author, to whom Aram. and Heb. were equally familiar, chose Aram. for one tract and Heb. for another.

The Aram. of D. as represented by MT. is Chaldee, i.e. Western Aram. There are many evidences that it was originally Eastern : e.g. the Mandaean use of ל preformative instead of י in the impf. of the substv. verb, and the use of נ compensative for dagesh forte : Eastern grammatical forms in the K'thib, occidentalised in the Qri : words found in Eastern Aram. wh. not even the influence of D. has been able to bring into Western use. Cert. confusions in the text and mistakes in trn. imply Eastern peculiarities in the exemplar before the copyist or translator. In many points, the Aram. of D. resembles grammatically that of the Sinjirli inscrs. : e.g. Haphel instead of Aphel ; the use of ות (יָת), the sign of the acc., only to support the oblique case of a pronoun ; the י performative in the impf. ; besides a gen. lexical similarity. The main points of diffc. are the use in D. of dī instead of zī for the rel., and 'ar'a' for 'arqa', "earth," "land." These represent scribal changes, to harmonise the written with the spoken lang. ; just as in Pal. Arabic q becomes even further attenuated into hamza, and dh becomes z. The Heb. of D. resembles that of Ez., Ne., and Ch. among the histl. bks., and of Ek. and Zc. among the Prophets. It contrasts with the Heb. of Ec., wh. uses the short rel., and sparingly the vav conversive. Aram. words in the Heb. part do not prove lateness in the work of one whose conversation and correspondence wd. be mainly Aram.

Structure and Contents.—D. consists of two nearly equal portions : the first deals with incidents, the second with visions. It is a further peculiarity that while most of the incidents are narrated in Aram. and most of the visions in Heb., the introduction to the incidents is in Heb., and the first vision is in Aram. Moreover, each incident and each vision is marked off by a distinct, genly. dated, beginning and ending ; all suggesting that each was published as a separate tract. This view is confirmed by the two recensions we possess of D., wh. treat the nars., esp. of the incidents, individually. Neither recension shows one chartc. throughout. In relating one incident, the Egpn., as seen in LXX, is pleonastic, the Palestinian condensed ; in relating another this is reversed. The tractates had evidently been current separately, one set in Egp., another in Pal. The two series, of incidents and of visions, are arranged chronologically. Prob. while the several tracts were still circulating, a collection of them was made, wh. forms our bk. of D. ; but meanwhile copyists were modifying individual elements, and these changes were introduced, one set into the Egyptian, the other into the Palestinian recension. In the 1st chap. there are indications of trn. fm. Aram.

On the above hypothesis D. is not an artistic unity. The contents of the separate tracts, published, prob. on clay tablets (in Heb. and Aram.,

NEBUCHADNEZZAR

not Asyr.), like those on wh. the Creation Epic was stamped, are not related to each other. First, certain hostages (among whom is Daniel), are selected to be educated in the Bab. court, accdg. to the practice of the ks. of Nineveh. The next section tells of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, the failure of the astrologers, and the success of D. (see preceding art.). In his 18th yr. (Thd. and LXX.) the k. makes a golden image, wh. he requires all officials in his empire to worship; D.'s three companions refuse, and are cast into the fiery furnace: their miraculous deliverance secures that J″. shd. be recognised as "a great god," dishonour to whom involves severe punishment. In this D. does not appear. Then comes the 2nd dream of Nebuchadnezzar, of the great tree that was cut down. D. is at once summoned (LXX), and with much sorrow foretells approaching disaster—becoming mad, the k. is to be driven forth fm. men. Belshazzar, s. of Nabunahid, makes a great feast, his guests drinking fm. the sacred vessels fm. the Temple at Jrs.: D. alone can interpret a mysterious inscr. wh. appears on the wall, and shows that it portends the overthrow of the Bab. Empire; he is raised to the third place in the kdm. On the overthrow of Belshazzar, Darius the Mede "receives the kdm.," and makes D. one of his three councillors. His envious associates conspiring agst. him, he is cast into the den of lions (see preceding art.). With this ends the series of six incidents. The first vision, the four beasts coming out of the sea, is dated the first yr. of Belshazzar; the next, in his third yr., describes the conflict of the Persian ram with the Grecian he-goat. The third vision, of the 70 weeks, is dated the first yr. of Darius; the fourth, in the third yr. of Cyrus, k. of Persia, describes the "man clothed in linen." Chap. 11. is an interpolation, describing the conflicts of the ks. of the N. and of the S. It may be the interpretation put on a lost vision of D. In chap. 12. the man clothed in white linen declares the end of the vision.

The Purpose of the bk. prob. was, by telling of God's dealings with D. and his friends, to show how He preserved His people's faith, even when they dwelt among the heathen, and to indicate by visions what wd. come to pass, "that when it had come to pass they mt. believe." The original writer, and the later collector and editor, acting under inspiration, need not have been clearly conscious of the final purpose. They were "holy men of God, who spake as they were moved."

Some hold that the bk. of D. is not a hist., but a work of imagination—a parable—designed to rouse the Jews to armed rebellion agst. the oppressor Epiphanes. In this idea there is nothing necessarily repugnant to inspiration. Our Lord's parables wd. be equally replete with sptl. meaning, whether or not they dealt with actual events. But a religious novel must conform to the nat. laws of such a composition. This D. does not do: it is not a self-complete whole: its parts are only externally united, and even at times appear discrepant: e.g. 1.[5] cp. 2.[1], 1.[21] cp. 10.[1]. If it is a novel some things call for explanation: e.g. D's. absence when his companions are called to worship the golden image: D. does nothing to facilitate the return of his people fm. exile, nor does he join them when numbers do return. These things make it difficult to take D. as a work of imagination. If it is a picture of a Jewish saint in a heathen court, they are inexplicable: in a hist. written immediately after the events, no explanation was required.

Again, the bk. does not suit the alleged purpose. It records no case of deliverance resulting fm. active resistance: in the stories of the Lions' Den and the Fiery Furnace, resistance is purely passive. We may see the nat. outcome of this teaching in the retreat of cert. Jews to the wilderness, and their slaughter by the soldiers of Antiochus (1 M. 2.[29ff.]). Mattathias and his followers, on the contrary, believed that only by active resistance to the utmost of their might could life and faith be preserved. A story modelled on the exploits of Samson wd. have served the alleged purpose better than the canonical Bk. of D. Those who assert that Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius are intended to be portraits of Epiphanes, must have singular ideas of portraiture: yet that is a necessary part of the case. The tendency in writing a novel with a purpose—the nearly irresistible tendency—is to overdrive the moral. In D. the moral is impenetrably concealed: yet it was meant for a popular audience.

It cannot be said that the bk. is written up to either possible sense of the name of the reputed author, "God is my Judge" or "Divine Judge." The Lions' Den incident alone mt. be construed as showing God as the hero's Judge. Nothing in the canonical bk. refers to the second meaning. The Apocryphal additions, Su. and Bel., show what Jewish imagination cd. do in creating a Divine Judge. There are, indeed, references to D. in the bk. of his contemporary Ezekiel (14.[14, 20], 28.[3]), but the characteristics there assigned to D. are not prominent in the bk. We may therefore reasonably assume that the bk. of D. is a nar. of facts.

Date and Authenticity.—We shall consider first, External Evidences; second, Internal Evidences; third, Objections.

(1) External Evidences.—These are indications in Lit. or Hist. of acquaintance with the bk. or its contents. Mattathias (1 M. 2.[59f.]) refers to the deliverance of "the three" fm. the fiery furnace, and of D. fm. the "den of lions." Some (Schurer, HJP., II. iii. 8) date 1 M. after B.C. 105, when John Hyrcanus died; others (Abrahams, Jw. En.), B.C. 135. We may take B.C. 100 as the latest prob. date. There is distinct reference to D. in En., in the Bk. of Similitudes, B.C. 200 (see ENOCH). There is a still earlier reference in the Prophecy of Baruch, c. B.C. 300, 1.[11]. "Nabuchadonosor, k. of Bab.," and "Balthasar his s." are mentioned. The rest of the bk. to the end of chap. 3. is mainly an expansion of the prayer in Dn. 9. We may note the resemblance of Nehemiah's prayer (Ne. 9.) to that of D., and of the "four horns" of Zc. to those of the "Grecian Goat." Further, if D. were not a man such as is portrayed in this bk., Ek. cd. not have placed him on a level with Noah and Job; nor wd. Tyrus be accused of arrogance in thinking itself wiser than D. In judging the force of this we must remember the paucity of contemporary or approximately contemporary Lit.—yet with all the Lit. of the Augustan age, the evidence that Virgil wrote the Æneid is not so strong as this.

Again, only by some such events as are recorded in D. can we account for the hist. of the Jews after the exile. Before the Captivity they were prone to idolatry. In the opinion of the time, the capture of J″.'s city, the burning of J″.'s temple, and the removal of J″.'s people by those of Bel-Marduk, wd. be taken as showing J″.'s inferiority to the gods of Bab. In Bab. the Jews were in the midst of heathen, ready, we may be sure, to wile them away. They were deprived of sacrifice, a familiar element in the worship of J″., the only element in the minds of many of themselves and of all their heathen neighbours. It was not thought wrong to worship the "god of the land" where one sojourned. David took his banishment as consignment to the service of "other gods." Every external influence made for the total abandonment of the worship of J″. Prophets of J″. indeed had declared that disaster wd. follow apostasy fm. the God of their fathers, and when disasters came, mt. appeal to these predictions. From Jr., however, we learn that the conduct of cert. prophets in Bab. tended to discredit the whole order, and therefore their interpretation of events. Another explanation of the national disasters was also current (Jr. 44.$^{16ff.}$); they were caused, not by Manasseh's apostasy, but by Josiah's reformation. Everything tended to an apostasy as complete as that of the captives fm. the N. Kdm. Yet the advent of Cyrus finds them fanatical monotheists, worshipping J″. alone. Only such events as the deliverance of the three Heb. youths, and of D., cd. explain this change of mental attitude.

Cyrus singled out the Jews for special treatment; the gods of other peoples were sent back to their respective countries; the Jews alone were restored to their own land. Religious sympathy mt. explain this favour, if Cyrus were a monotheist, wh. is doubtful. If, however, he learned fm. D. what J″. had done for His people, he mt. regard the God of the Jews as a great and terrible God, whom it mt. be well to propitiate.

(2) Internal Evidences.—The bk. is ascribed to D., who, but for it, wd. be an inconspicuous person. His mention by Ek. wd. tend to place him among the anct. patriarchs of the race. The statements in D. answer to facts now known, wh. had been forgotten as early as the Gr. period. The author knows of Belshazzar. Josephus, with Berosus before him, knew not that Nabunahid had a s. so named, and presumes Belshazzar to be another name of Nabunahid himself.

That Belshr. calls Nebuchadr. fr., does not prove the author's ignorance, for his acquaintce. with Jr. must be assumed; and there (52.^{31}) Evilmerodach is the immediate successor and presumably the s. of Nebuchadr. This is proved by the contract tablets. In Asyr. usage, the successor of a famous man was regarded as his s. Shalmaneser II. calls Jehu the s. of Omri. This was not due to ignorance; Asyr. monarchs had ample means of information regarding their subject allies (2 K. 18.^{22}). Hence in this sense Belshr. was the s. of Nebuchadr.

The writer says nothing of a siege of Bab. Herodotus and Xenophon, who had special advantages for knowing Persian affairs, tell of a siege, and the turning aside of the waters of the Euphrates, so that the Persians entered by the river bed. These historians differ so widely as to the hist. of Cyrus, that agreement here might almost seem proof of accuracy. Yet inscrs. by Cyrus prove that Bab. was betrayed to the Persians without a siege. How did the writer of D. escape the snare into wh. Josephus fell?

In D. persons are designated by symbols, intelligible in the Bab. or early Persian period, wh. wd. not be understood in the Gr. period. In the vision of the "Ram" and the "He-goat," Alexr. the Gt. appears as a one-horned he-goat, Persia, the power he overthrows, being a two-horned ram; yet Alexr. chose to declare himself the s. of Jupiter Ammon, and, on his coins, assumes the two ram's horns. All through the hither East this was known as the cognisance of Alexr. Mohammed, in the Qur'ān, calls him Iskander dhu 'l-Qarnain, "Alexr. of the two horns." After the conquest of Egp., when he assumed this symbol, to designate him as a goat and to transfer to Persia his own chosen symbol, the two-horned ram, wd. be unintelligible.

We can more easily follow the action of Meltzar with regard to the Heb. youths, if they sat in messes of four, accdg. to Asyr. custom, than if they reclined like the Greeks, on couches, in groups of nine or twelve; as in the former case the peculiarity of the food they ate wd. not be noticed, whereas it cd. not escape notice in the latter. Authors in anct. days did not aim at antiquarian accuracy; they transferred with careless freedom their own customs to other times and countries.

The writer leaves unexplained matters wh. to contemporaries required no explanation, but wh. mt. prove enigmas to a subsequent age. He knew Jr., and therefore knew that Evilmerodach was Nebuchadr.'s successor and s. Why then, it is asked, does he make Belshazzar call Nebuchadr. his fr.? Contemporaries did not need to be told in what sense Belshr. was Nebuchadr.'s s. If D. had been a fiction, written for men presumably familiar with Jr. and 2 K., the author wd. have been bound to explain why he gave Nebuchadr. a s. and successor difft. fm. the one mentioned in these accredited histories.

Why, it is often asked, did D. not return to Pal., under the decree of Cyrus? If D. is a contemporary nar., the reasons may have been too obvious to require mention. If it were written long after, silence is inexplicable. So to contemporaries, explanation of D's. absence fm. the trial of his three friends wd. have been superfluous.

Darius the Mede in the nar. has long been a difficulty. Josephus idents. him with the 2nd Cyaxares, s. of Astyages, uncle of Cyrus, mentioned only in Xenophon's Cyropædia. But if the writer of D. borrowed fm. Xenophon, why did he change the name to Darius? The author of Bel naively assigns the rôle of Darius in the story of the lions' den to Cyrus. Why did the writer of D. not explain who "Darius the Mede" was? This is intelligible if, as Dr. Pinches thinks, Darius stands for Gobryas—scribes who knew of Darius but not of Gobaru having changed the unknown into the well-known.

Dara (Darius) is to this day in the E. a name suggestive of magnificence, showing how deeply the imagination of the E. was impressed by the monarchs of that name.

The writer's geographical kge. suits the period of D. The writer of Esther knows of India in the E., and the writer of 1 M. knows of Rm. in the W. The writer of D. knows only of Javan and Chittim (Asia Minor and Cyprus) in the W., and Media and Persia in the E. His kge. in other directions suits the traditional D. He knows of Jr., the law of Moses, and Solomon's prayer; but not of the later bks.—Ez., Ne., Est., Hg., Zc., and Ml. These reasons appear to us convincing, but others mt. be adduced.

As to date, we must choose either the traditional date, making the writer approximately contemporary with the events; or the critical, i.e. the Maccabæan period. The latter is impossible. In the Maccabæan period great importance is attached to the ceremonial law, circumcision, avoidance of swine's flesh, observance of feasts, &c. In D. circumcision is not mentioned; nor is swine's flesh, although it mt. have been effectively introduced as rejected by the four hostages. Feasts are disregarded; D. fasts over the feast of the Passover (10.[3f.]). The date of his fasting is mentioned, but not its coincidence with the Passover. The Law of Moses is referred to, but the bk. of the law enjoys no special reverence; whereas in Maccabæan times, the Greek attempt to destroy them had lent to copies of the law a peculiar sanctity. Further, D.'s mental attitude to Nebuchadr. is very difft. fm. that of the Jews to Antiochus, as revealed in the bks. of the Maccabees. D. accepts the quasi worship offered by the k., a thing repugnant to the pious Jew of later times (Ac. 14.[11-18]).

(3) Objections.—These all aim to prove that D. was written, not by a contemporary of the alleged events, but by a Maccabæan author. It is contended that D.'s position among the Kĕthubīm, not the Prophets, is proof of lateness. This assumes: (a) That the Jews judged as late the bks. placed in the third division of their Canon; a view refuted by a simple study of the reputed authors. (b) That they always placed D. there; contrary to the evidence of LXX, Josephus, Melito, Psh., and NT. (Mw. 24.[15]; Mk. 13.[14]). The real question is, What led the Rabbis of Jerome's time to remove D. fm. the Prophets to the Hagiographa? It was done on literary grounds. Lamentations, attributed to Jr., is placed among the "writings." If the Jews thought canonical any writing by a prophet originating before the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Jos. cont. Ap. i. 8),* we cd. at once claim for D. a date in the early Persian period. Josephus' principle most easily explains the exclusion of Sr. fm. the Canon, and the inclusion of Est., the inclusion of SS., and exclusion of Ws.

* With Jos. the Kethubīm consist of only four bks., wh. "contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life."

Certain anachronisms are alleged in D. Nebuchadnezzar is said to have captured Jrs. in the third yr. of Jehoiakim, whereas the first of Nebuchadnezzar coincided with the fourth of Jehoiakim. But the fourth yr. in Jewish wd. be the third in Bab. reckoning. Fm. Berosus' act. Nebuchadnezzar must have taken Jrs. before he ascended the throne. Again, the Chaldeans are represented as magicians, a meaning attached to that term first in Rm. times. If this reading were right, D. must be dated after the capture of Jrs. by Titus! A correction of the text is clearly necessary. The text of the LXX does not make the Chaldeans a class of magicians.

It is said (Dn. 4.[8]) that D. was named "Belteshazzar, accdg. to the name of my god." This is held to prove the writer's ignorance of Asyr., as Belteshazzar has no connection with Bel. But in all the VV., the Bab. name of D. is "Belshazzar." The change was evidently made that a Heb. prophet mt. not appear with the name of a heathen god (cp. Jg. 18.[30]). For objections based on the names of musical instruments (Dn. 3.), see Dulcimer, Psaltery, Sackbut. Most other difficulties, prop. understood, really support our conclusion, that D. is essentially authentic.

Interpretation.—This concerns the view to be taken of the Four Monarchies, and the Seventy Weeks. (a) The Four Monarchies. Taking the image Nebuchadr. saw, and the Four Beasts of D. (Dn. 2., 7.), what kdm. is intended by the Fourth? The traditional view places, first, the Bab.; second, the Medo-Persian; third, the Greek; and fourth, the Roman. The gen. Critical view places, first, the Bab.; second, the Median; third, the Persian; and fourth, the Greek; thus splitting the Medo-Persian. But the writer seems almost to have taken pains to make this splitting impossible. By the "two arms" of the dream statue and the beast "that raised itself up on one side" he clearly presents the Empire as one, with two dominant but kindred races, that wh. last attains prominence becoming supreme. Of an empire ruled by two kindred peoples, what symbol cd. be clearer than that of the ram, wh. had "two horns, and the horns were high, but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last"? Again, Darius Hystaspis is called "k. of the Persians and the Medes" in 1 M. 1.[1]. Even if the Critical date of D. were accepted, a view wh. contradicts that of the author, and those prevalent among the Jews in the Maccabæan period, can hardly be correct.

Another Critical expedient to escape the traditional view is to distinguish the personal empire of Alexr. fm. that of his successors, esp. the Seleucidæ. But the writer (Dn. 9.), and the Maccabæan Jews (1 M. 1.[1], 6.[2]), regarded the whole reign of the Greeks as one.

The main obstacles to the acceptance of the traditional view are a priori ideas of the nat. of prophecy. There is no proof that the prophet must only speak what primarily appealed to his immediate audience; and we cannot discard the predictive element in prophecy, the purpose of wh. was stated by Jesus (Jn. 13.[19], 14.[29]). It must indeed be in terms conveying some definite ideas to the hearers; but unless predictive prophecy is denied, there is no valid objection to identg. the Fourth Monarchy with Rm.

Corruption of the text as shown in various rdgs. of the VV., esp. the LXX, makes it harder to interpret the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. The Critics assume that "the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jrs." (Dn. 9.[25]) is Jr.'s prophecy of its destruction; at least the calculations usly. start fm. B.C. 586. That daber l' shd. mean "prophecy of" is unexampled. The nat. and traditional meaning, "commandment," "decree," agrees with the universal rendering of yātzā dābār (Dn. 9.[23]), "the comdt. went forth." The "weeks" are generally regarded as "weeks of yrs."; 70 weeks = 490 yrs. As Cyrus' decree, permitting the return and rebuilding of the Temple, said nothing of rebuilding the city, we must come down to the decrees of Artaxerxes' 8th and 20th yrs. (B.C. 457 and B.C. 445 respectively); the latter distinctly commanding the rebuilding of the walls; this wd. bring the times into relatively close agreement. We must remember that prophetic times are not measured with astronomical accuracy. Jr.'s "70 yrs." of captivity are represented by 59, if we count fm. the carrying away of Jeconiah, B.C. 597, to Cyrus' decree, B.C. 538; by 66, if we start fm. Jehoiakim's submission to Nebuchadr. The problem also, as we have seen, is complicated by corruption of the text.

All Versions of value for the text of D. are earlier than the 6th cent.: (a) LXX, preserved in the Chigi MS., fm. a text differing much fm. MT., sometimes modified to suit Thd., c. B.C. 150. (b) Theodotion, representing the Pal. text of Origen's time. (c) Peshitta, Syr., c. A.D. 120; nearer MT. than Thd. (d) The Vulgate (Jerome), genly. agreeing with MT. There is also the Coptic trn. fm. Thd., interesting for an additional 11th chap., and Paulus Tellensis' trn. fm. LXX.

DARIUS. (1) "The Median" (Dn. 5.[31]). There are several suggestions as to who this is: (a) Cyaxares II., uncle of Cyrus, only known fm. Xenophon's romance, the Cyropædia. The circumstances wd. suit, but there is considerable doubt of his historic existence. (b) Astyages. Although both Herodotus and Ctesias tell us that Cyrus treated him with mildness, they have no hint that he made him governor of Babylon. (c) Cyrus. In the Apocryphal Add. to Dn., "Bel and the Dragon," Cyrus casts Daniel into the Lions' Den; the age and char. do not suit.

DARIUS

(d) Gobryas (Gobaru). This is the sugg. of Dr. Pinches; on the whole it seems the most prob. ident. We know that he was appointed governor of Babylon, and that he appointed under-governors. That he is called D. is probably due to a scribal blunder. (2) D. Hystaspis; the Persian k. under DATHAN AND ABIRAM (Nu. 16.^{1}) were Reubenites associated with Korah in rebellion agst. Moses. D. and A. are genly. named with Korah, but prob. their rebellion had a political, not like Korah's, a sacerdotal reference; the place of Reuben, Jacob's first-born, being usurped by Judah and Ephraim.

DAUGHTER (Heb. bath) is in Scrip. any female desct. (Gn. 24.^{48}, &c.); in the pl., the women of a nation (Gn. 27.^{46}, &c.). The D. of any art, e.g. music, is a female devoted to it (Ec. 12.^{4}). Sometimes D. stands for a city (Is. 52.^{2}), for town or vill. depending on a "mother city" (Nu. 21.^{25}, Heb.). See FAMILY.

DAVID ("beloved"), youngest s. of Jesse, who was apparently a well-to-do farmer in Bethlehem. No mention is made of his mr. His fr. was already an old man in the days of Saul (1 S. 17.^{12}). The family consisted of 8 sons and 2 drs. (1 S. 16.$^{10f.}$, 17.^{12}; 2 S. 17.^{25}—in this last verse for "Nahash," read "Jesse"). D.'s sr., ZERUIAH, was mr. of JOAB, ABISHAI, and ASAHEL; and ABIGAIL was mr. of the unfortunate AMASA. These four nephews of D. became soldiers of ability and distinction, playing no mean part in a time wh. was rich in heroic men.

Of D.'s parents almost nothing is known (see JESSE). His fr.'s ancestry is of course given in the genealogies; and Jewish tradition says that Jesse was a weaver of sacred carpets, who also farmed cert. lands near Bethlehem (Tg.Jn. on 2 S. 21.^{19}). When first mentioned D. was occupied guarding his fr.'s sheep; a task often performed by the younger members of the family (1 S. 16.^{11}). He is described as "ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look upon." It is not clear that D. or his relatives understood the significance of Samuel's anointing. That it signified a cert. preference they cd. not doubt. This may have somewhat qualified brotherly relationships. Eliab's speech (1 S. 17.^{28}) wd. hardly have been addressed to one whom he knew as the destined k. of Isr. It is appropriate enough as the expression of a jealous heart. But fm. the day of anointing we read that "the Spt. of the Lord came mightily upon D."

With the material at our disposal it is impossible to construct a continuous and self-consistent nar. of D.'s early yrs.

To explain the apparent discrepancies several expedients have been tried. The simplest is to assume that we have here bits of separate and independent accounts, thrown together by the hand of a scribe. If this is so he seems to have done the work rather clumsily, with a strange lack of intelligence, leaving very obvious difficulties to puzzle his readers. Not that all difficulties of wh. mod. scholars write have any real existence. In such a compressed nar. we need not be surprised to find that the youth of the earlier verses in a chapter is the valiant soldier of the later. But it is staggering to learn that the skilful harper of chap. 16., whose music charms away the evil spirit fm. the k.—the mighty man of valour, beloved of Saul, and made the royal armour-bearer—is the youth of chap. 17., apparently without experience of war, unknown to the k., and even to Abner: strange surely if he had been the k.'s armour-bearer. The statement that "D. went to and fro fm. Saul to feed his fr.'s sheep at Bethlehem," is regarded as a harmonistic insertion (17.^{15}).

This theory takes the incidents that resemble each other as "doublets," i.e. independent versions of the same events: e.g. 1 S. 18.$^{10f.}$ and 19.$^{9f.}$; 1 S. 10.$^{10ff.}$ and 19.$^{23f.}$

The difficulties are not of modern discovery. Prof. Robertson Smith thought that LXX. B. preserved the original text (OTJC.^{1} 125ff.). It omits vv. 12–31, 41, 50, 55–58 of chap. 17., and vv. 1–5 of chap. 18. A continuous and self-consistent nar. is thus secured: but the process suspiciously resembles an effort to get over difficulties by ignoring them: and critical opinion inclines to regard this simply as an early attempt to harmonise chaps. 16. and 17.

We must remember that the records are extremely scanty. In the light of ampler information no longer available, what seem to us discrepancies in the statements made, may have had no existence for the writer.

The youthful shepherd found time in the leisure of his days on the uplands to make himself master of the harp; an accomplishment turned to act., as we have seen, in soothing the paroxysms of the insane k. This secured for D. his introduction to the court: and here his wisdom and discretion, not less than his gifts, won for him a position of dignity and trust (1 S. 16.$^{14ff.}$).

The engrossments of a war with the Phil., who invaded the country, seem to have roused afresh the better nat. of the k., and D. was free for a longer period to return to his work at home. His elder brs. were at the war, where, one feels, Saul's armour-bearer ought to have been. But we do not know the terms of the relationship between the young soldier and the monarch.

The two armies lay over agst. each other in the Vale of ELAH. Goliath of Gath, the giant champion of the Phil., struck terror into the heart of Isr., and daily, with insulting challenges, cast reproach on Isr.'s God. D., whom his fr. had sent with provision for his brs., heard the loud boasting of the Phil., accepted his challenge, and, rejecting Saul's armour as untried, with the clear eye and steady hand of the shepherd, and the shepherd's simple sling and stone, vanquished the braggart, carrying away the giant's head in triumph. The disheartened Phil. fled before pursuing Isr. to the gates of Ekron.

D.'s victory carried the right to marriage with the k.'s dr. (1 S. 17.^{25}). Saul, recognising his value, attached him permanently to his person; and between D. and Jonathan, the k.'s son, an affection sprang up wh. was as strong and tender as it was romantic and beautiful.

When the stir and excitement of war were over, Saul's darker moods began to return, and the chivalrous monarch becomes the jealous and truculent despot. The women welcomed the army returning fm. the battle, and in their songs gave due meed of praise to the brave young soldier whose heroic venture had brought deliverance to Isr.

"Saul hath slain his thousands,
And David his ten thousands."

This was beyond what the proud spt. of the k. cd. brook. "What can he have more but the kdm.?" And so the tree was planted wh. was destined to bear such bitter fruit.

Distrust and hatred of D. brought a new element of disturbance into the distressed mind of the k., inducing attacks of frenzy no longer subj. to the influence of music. Twice he sought to kill the minstrel with his javelin. Failure convinced him that D. in some way was under divine protection, and filled his heart with fear. His supposed foe was therefore removed fm. the royal presence and given a command in the army, where he won golden opinions fm. all. Saul, observing, "stood in awe of him."

Saul then offered D. the hand of his dr. Merab, to wh. he was already entitled, on condition that "thou be valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles"; in the hope that Phil. spears mt. succeed where his own had failed. But, fickle in purpose as erring in aim, he soon gave Merab to another.

Michal, Saul's younger dr., loved the gallant and popular young captain. Saul heard of this with pleasure, and schemed to make it a means of getting rid of D. The latter was nothing loth to become the k.'s s.-in-law. As a poor man he was delighted to learn that to provide the dowry required he had but to slaughter 100 Phil. Saul's treacherous plot miscarried: the dowry was provided twice over: Michal became the w. of D. "Saul was yet the more afraid of D.," but also, apparently, yet the more his enemy.

Jonathan refused to be D.'s executioner, and persuaded his fr. for a time to relent. But a new victory won by D., bringing, doubtless, a fresh accession of popularity, roused the evil passion again, and, failing once more to transfix his victim, he sent his guards to D.'s house to despatch him. Michal contrived her h.'s escape, and he fled to Samuel, in Ramah. Company after company sent by Saul, and finally the k. himself, finding D. there with Samuel and the prophets, were overwhelmed by the Spt. of God and themselves prophesied. Thus protected, D. fled once more; and having learned, by signs agreed upon with Jonathan, that Saul's wrath was implacable, sought thenceforward to avoid personal contact with the k. Kindness shown to the fugitive by the priests at NOB brought dire vengeance upon them (see DOEG). Thence D. took the sword of Goliath. Girded with this weapon, his visit to Gath looks like foolhardiness. Of course he was recognised, and his preservation was due to his own ready wit, and skill in simulating madness.

Retiring to the cave of ADULLAM, his retreat became a gathering-place for the distressed, debtors, and discontented, and soon he found himself at the head of about 400 men. Provision for his parents' safety was made in Moab; an arrangement doubtless facilitated by the kindly relations of a past generation (Ru. 1.[1], &c.).

At the instance of the prophet Gad, D. went up to the forest of HARETH, where he was joined by Abiathar, the sole survivor of the massacre of the priests at Nob. D. then turned his arms agst. the Phil., who had attacked KEILAH. Inquiring of God by means of the ephod Abiathar had brought, he learned that the men of Keilah, the city he had rescued, were ready to hand him over to Saul. He therefore departed with his followers, numbering now about 600, and "remained in a mountain in the wilderness of ZIPH." Here he was encouraged by an interview with Jonathan; but the Ziphites sought to betray him to Saul, and he narrowly escaped capture in the wilderness of MAON, at "the rock of escape," Saul being called away at a critical moment to meet a raid of the Phil.

These two instances of loyalty to Saul illustrate the hold wh. that great k. still had upon his people's hearts, despite the darkness and oppression of these days.

D. then took refuge in the fastnesses around EN-GEDI. There Saul inadvertently fell into his power. D.'s forbearance and chivalry appealed to what of good was still in the distracted monarch, who with tears confessed his wickedness, and his conviction that D. wd. "surely be k." Having extracted fm. D. an oath of kindness to his seed when he shd. come to the throne, Saul went home (1 S. 24.).

A function of great value was performed by D. and his men to the flockmasters in the wide pastures of the wilderness, in protecting their property agst. marauders. This service was gladly acknowledged by gifts of food, &c. Such acknowledgment NABAL of CARMEL churlishly refused, and owed his preservation to the tact and skill of his beautiful w. ABIGAIL. And on the death of Nabal, Abigail became the w. of D. He also married AHINOAM of Jezreel. Meantime Saul had given D.'s w. Michal to Phalti (1 S. 25.).

Returning to the pursuit of D., guided by the Ziphites, Saul once more fell into D.'s power, and again D.'s forbearance melted for the time the k.'s heart (26.). But D., despairing of safety in the land of Isr., betook himself to Achish, k. of Gath, who assigned the town of Ziklag to D. and his 600 men. Here they remained a yr. and four months. Raids upon the Geshurites and others were reported to Achish as attacks upon Judah, &c. He therefore thought an irreparable breach had been made between the refugees and their own people (27.).

We can only conjecture D.'s purpose in agreeing to march with the Phil. to war agst. Isr. If he assisted the Phil., clearly he must resign all hope of the crown of Isr. He may have intended, as the lords of the Phil. thought, to fall away to Saul when the battle opened. In any case the suspicions of these men delivered him fm. an awkward situation. Despite the confidence of Achish, D. and his men were sent back (29.). In their absence the Amalekites had raided and burnt Ziklag, carrying off all the women and children. A swift pursuit, a sudden and unexpected attack, and that raid was avenged. Women, children, and all their property were recovered. A timely gift of the spoil taken fm. the Amalekites, to the elders in various cities of Judah, wd. pave the way for the return of the exile (30).

Two days later came the news of Isr.'s crushing defeat, and the death of Saul and his sons. An Amalekite, who brought to D. the k.'s crown and bracelet, claiming to have slain Saul, was at once ordered to execution. D. and his men were cast in great grief, and his personal sorrow over Saul and Jonathan found expression in the most pathetic and beautiful of the world's elegies (2 S. 1.).

D.'s reputation no doubt preceded him on his return to HEBRON, and there he was chosen, apparently with unanimity, k. of Judah, remaining prob. a vassal of the Phil. ABNER had meantime set up ISHBOSHETH as k. over Isr. in MAHANAIM. The troops of the rival monarchs met at Gibeon, under Joab and Abner, when the latter was beaten; and in the war wh. ensued, the supremacy of D. was gradually asserted (2 S. 2., 3.[1]).

As a mark of his growing dignity D. increased his harīm, and six sons were born to him in Hebron.

Abner does not seem to have been a good champion of a failing cause. A reproach fm. Ishbosheth decided him to cast in his lot with D., and his weak master was not in a position to resist him. Michal was restored at D.'s desire. The presence of Saul's dr. in his harīm mt. strengthen the apparent legitimacy of his claims. Abner came to an understanding with D. and proceeded with arrangements for the transfer of the kdm., when he was treacherously entrapped and murdered by Joab: doubtless fm. fear lest Abner's influence with D. shd. eclipse his own, altho' the ostensible motive was revenge for Asahel's death. D.'s grief was deep and sincere; but he cd. venture no more than to curse the man who had done the foul deed. He had already found one thorn in the crown he wore (3.).

Ishbosheth was murdered by the two sons of Rimmon, who brought his head to D., and received the reward they merited. Ishbosheth's head was buried in the grave of Abner (4.).

It was now recognised that D. was the only possible k. of Isr., and the tribes, assembling at Hebron, practically gave effect to a foregone conclusion by electing him. Then, doubtless, allegiance to the Phil. was renounced. The choice of a capital more central and easier of defence than Hebron was clearly necessary. The city JEBUS admirably met these conditions. The stronghold called Zion was taken by storm, and there arose the fortifications of the City of David (see JERUSALEM), and the workmen of Tyrian Hiram built a palace for the k. D. also still further enlarged his harīm.

The Phil. cd. not view with complacency the advancement of their erewhile vassal. They invaded the country apparently before his fortifications were complete, and he retired to "the hold"—prob. Adullam (1 S. 22.[4]). To this time must be assigned the incident recorded in 2 S. 23.[14ff.] Acting under Divine direction he twice defeated the enemy with great slaughter (2 S. 5.).

D.'s next step was to bring up the ARK fm. Kirjath-jearim to Jrs. Progress was interrupted by the tragedy at the threshing-floor of Nachon, and the Ark was left for a time in the house of OBED-EDOM. The blessing it brought there encouraged the k. to complete his task, and place it in the tent he had pitched for it in Jrs. What seemed to Michal his extravagant enthusiasm on this occasion provoked her contempt, for wh. she fell into the k.'s disfavour (6.).

The duties assigned to the Levites in the reorganised service are indicated in 1 Ch. 15., 16.. where D.'s psalm of thanksgiving is preserved (16.[7-36]).

While his purpose was reckoned to him for righteousness, D. was not permitted to build a temple for the Ark. The reason is explicitly stated in 1 Ch. 22.[8]. But great blessing was promised to him and to his house, and he was urged to prepare materials for the temple to be built by his s. This he did, in great abundance (1 Ch. 22.[2-5], &c.).

Kindly memory of old friendship led D. to make generous provision for Jonathan's son, MEPHIBOSHETH. A long-standing blood-feud between the house of Saul and the Gibeonites was settled by handing over to the latter two of that monarch's sons by RIZPAH, and five sons of his dr. Merab—a striking illustration of the recognised solidarity of the KIN. D. also brought the bones of Saul and Jonathan fm. Jabesh-gilead, and laid them in the sepulchre of Kish (2 S. 21.[1-14]).

The Phil. were completely subdued, D. taking "the bridle of the mother city fm. them." The Moabites shared a similar fate, becoming tributary. D. also defeated Hadadezer (or Hadarezer), k. of Zobah, and his allies of Damascus, carrying away rich booty. Garrisons were placed in the territory of Damascus, and its people brought tribute. Toi, k. of Hamath, thankful for deliverance fm. Hadadezer, sent his s. with generous gifts to D. The spoils of this campaign, together with those taken fm. the other peoples whom he had conquered, D.

dedicated to J″. A great victory was gained over the Aramæans in the Valley of Salt (2 S. 8.[1-13]). The Edomites also were brought low, Joab remaining in Edom for six months to complete its subjugation (8.[14]; 1 K. 11.[14ff.]). This opened for Isr. the approach to the Red Sea.

Hanun of Ammon grossly insulted the messengers sent by D. with a message of sympathy on the death of his fr. This cd. have but one result—war. The army of Isr. under Joab and Abishai defeated the Ammonites and such allies as they were able to gather. The Ammonites retired within the walls of Rabba. Hadadezer made a rally in the far north, but was decisively overthrown by D. at HELAM: Shobach, the captain of his host, being among the slain (10.).

Rabbah was now closely besieged under the direction of Joab. D., remaining in Jrs., fell under the spell of BATHSHEBA, and incurred the infamy of Uriah's treacherous murder. Bathsheba became D.'s w., and bare him a s. who, as a mark of God's displeasure, was not permitted to live. Her second s., Solomon, was destined to be D.'s successor (11.[1]–12.[25]).

Rabbah was finally taken, and the crown of Malcam *—poss. an idol—was placed on D.'s head. The inhabitants, if not tortured, were at least humiliated. See HARROW.

After his great sin D.'s life was shadowed by many trials, arising fm. his own family circle. Amnon's dastardly outrage, and Absalom's grimly waited-for revenge, must have burdened the royal heart. ABSALOM, whom he loved, must needs depart fm. his fr.'s presence, inflicting thus a double bereavement. That prince used the opportunities brought by restoration and reconciliation to conspire agst. the k. who loved him all too well. So strong was the support given to Absalom's unexpected rising that the aged D. fled, amid the jeers and insults of ungenerous foes, to MAHANAIM. AHITHOPHEL's wise counsel having been thwarted by the crafty Hushai, time was found for assembling the army wh. overwhelmed the prince's troops in the forest of Ephraim. Absalom's death ended the rebellion; but it also broke his fr.'s heart. D.'s unrestrained grief for his s. depressed the spirits of his followers, and but for Joab's rough but timely and kind remonstrance, it mt. yet have gone hard with him.

For the anarchy prevailing in Isr. as a result of the rebellion, the only cure was the return of the k. Judah was the first to welcome him. The men of Benjamin also came, with Shimei, whom D. forgave. He then rewarded such as had shown him kindness in the day of his sore adversity. The other tribes, however, professed offence because Judah had forestalled them in bringing back the k., and Sheba, s. of Bichri, a Benjamite, summoned them to a fresh rising agst. D. and Judah. D. had not forgiven Joab, whose hand had slain the rebel prince. Amasa, therefore, was sent to gather the men of Judah within three days for the conflict. Amasa delayed, and D., fearing lest Sheba shd. have time to strengthen his position, despatched the men who were with him under Abishai to pursue him. Joab, of course, was in the company. At Gibeon they met Amasa, and Joab, who cd. brook no rival, here covered his name with still deeper infamy by the treacherous murder of his cousin. Then, assuming command, he stamped out the revolt with his usual skill and promptitude (2 S. 20.).

A psalm, attributed to D. in the day that the Lord delivered him fm. the hand of all his enemies, is preserved in chap. 22. In chap. 23. a short psalm (vv. 1–7), also attributed to D., introduces an act. of D.'s mighty men and their exploits.

Two lists are given of D.'s administrative officers (8.[16-18], 20.[23ff.]), with slight variations. The latter may be taken as the fuller, poss. the original. Joab is commander-in-chief of the army; Benaiah is captain of the guard; Adoram has charge of the "levy," or "forced labour," always a feature of Eastern despotism; Jehoshaphat was the mazkīr: this has been understood as "recorder" or "annalist"; more prob. he was the counsellor who kept the k. informed as to the course of public affairs; Zadok and Abiathar—the companion of D.'s exile—were over the priests, evidently holding their appointment fm. the k. In the first list some priestly function appears to be assigned to D.'s sons; in the second, their place is taken by Ira, the Jairite.

D.'s bodyguard consisted of foreigners; CHERETHITES, prob. ident. with Phil., and PELETHITES, not identd. 1 Ch. 27. gives an act. of the army as organised by D., the warriors of the different tribes going out for exercise in a fixed rotation, so that there were always 24,000 men under arms. Six officers were entrusted with the management of the k.'s property; and the names are given of those who formed the royal council. Levites were appointed for the administration of justice (1 Ch. 23.[4]). Elaborate arrangements were made for the conduct of the services of the Sanctuary (1 Ch. 23.ff.). The chronicler's act. of the great k.'s work, although written much later, was doubtless derived fm. reliable sources.

Anything in the nat. of a census or registration has always been regarded with suspicion in the East, as furnishing rulers with an instrument for fresh extortion or oppression. That proposed by D. encountered a storm of opposition. Sorely agst. their will, Joab and his officers had to carry it out. This distasteful work, in wh. the numbering of Levi and Benjamin was omitted, occupied 9 months and 20 days: the men of war in Isr. were reported as 800,000, those of Judah 500,000. The Chronicler gives 1,000,000 and 470,000 respectively (2 S. 24.[1ff.]; 1 Ch. 21.[1ff.]). God's displeasure at this impious enterprise brought a pestilence by wh. 70,000 men perished, and the very existence of Jrs. was imperilled. The penitent k. bought the threshing-floor of Araunah, where the angel of destruction had paused, and offered sacrifice there, whereby "the Lord was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed fm. Isr." (2 S. 24.; 1 Ch. 21.).

Coverings were not sufficient to warm the spent frame of the aged k., so the young Shunammite, Abishag, was brought to "cherish" the old man.

Traditional Tomb of David

This time of his fr.'s weakness Adonijah chose to have himself declared D.'s successor. Joined by many who had hitherto stood by D. through all changes, his venture seemed hopeful. But he had failed to reckon with Nathan, and, above all, with Bathsheba, whose influence over the k. seems to have been unimpaired; and with the anointing and proclamation of Solomon, Bathsheba's s., by D.'s order, the cause of Adonijah collapsed.

The Chronicler tells of a great convocation addressed by D. when he gave his parting charge to Solomon, directing him as to the bldg. of the Temple. By exhibition of the treasures, &c., wh. he had provided for this purpose, he roused the liberality of the tribes, who willingly brought of their substance, to the great joy of the old k., who blessed the Lord, and prayed for blessing upon his s. and his people. The solemnities of the day concluded with a great sacrifice (1 Ch. 29.).

The last scene as depicted in 1 K. 2. opens with appropriate counsels to Solomon, but is unlovely in its close. Many critics think there are reasons for rejecting the authenticity of this part of the nar. For sake of D.'s reputation one wd. fain agree with them. But the case is not proved; and we must remember that there was a fierce strain in D.'s blood; while both Joab and Shimei had richly deserved their fate.

The complexity of D.'s char. makes any fair and adequate estimate difficult, if not impossible. In some respects he seems almost the combination of opposites. He is highly spiritual, and grossly sensual. Now he is impulsive and generous; again he is a man of calculating duplicity. He can show a fine chivalrous regard for what is good even in his enemies, restraining his hand when he has them in his power; but at other times the ferocity of his Semitic nature flashes forth in his treatment of fallen foes.

It is usual to say that D. must be tried by the standards of his own time. This is true. Compared with the monarchs who ruled the nations around him, D. might come out well. But the influence of his age will not act. for everything. In one matter his great predecessor set him an example he wd. have done well to follow (1 S. 14.[50]).

Others defend D. on the ground that if he was a great sinner, he was also great in repentance. No doubt it is well that wicked men shd. repent of the evil they have done; but no bitterest penitential tears will bring back to sweet life the murdered victim of unholy passion.*

D. was a man of many accomplishments. He was a skilful musician. His name attached to the hymn-book of the OT. Church attests his mastery of tuneful verse (see Psalms). He was a brave and capable soldier, possessing the magnetic charm wh. wins the affections of men, and inspires them to go through fire and water for their leader. How far D. gave Saul occasion for his suspicion that he was aiming at the throne, we cannot now tell; but clearly fm. an early time he regarded himself as that monarch's destined successor. When the opportunity came he proved himself fully equal to the dignities and responsibilities of the kdm. All hostile enterprises went down before his victorious arms, and under him the dominion of Isr. reached its widest limits. Dwelling in security, the nation was knit together, a people strong and free, bound in the ties of gratitude and affection to their deliverer. The unstable throne inherited fm. Saul, he bequeathed to his s. established on a broad and enduring base.

The troubles that darkened D.'s later yrs. sprang fm. the bosom of his own family. Engrossment with the affairs of state may be pleaded as his excuse for neglect to train aright his children (cp. 2 S. 13.). He seems to have been something of a doting father (2 S. 14.[1]; 1 K. 1.[6]). Some sense of his own failing may have lent poignancy to the k.'s grief over the fate of his wayward s. (2 S. 18.[33]).

With the exception of his s. Solomon, no k. so impressed the imagination of later ages with the greatness and splendour of his power; and in succeeding times the mightiest hopes of his people gathered round his name (Ek. 34.[23f.]; Ho. 3.[5]). By no nobler title than "son of D." can the Jewish populace greet him whom for the time they are ready to acknowledge as their Messiah (Mw. 21.[9]).

DAY (Heb. yom). The term is used for (1) The 24 hrs. that make a complete day (Gn. 1.[5], &c.). (2) The hrs. of light, as contrasted with "night," the time of darkness (Ps. 121.[6]). (3) The time in which anything occurs, e.g. the D. of calamity (2 S. 22.[19]). (4) In the pl. it indicates a period, e.g. "the days of Herod the k. (Mw. 2.[1]). It stands in the Heb. title of the bks. of Chronicles—"The words (deeds) of the Days."

DAY'S JOURNEY (Gn. 31.[23]; Ex. 3.[18], &c.). A day on the road means seven or eight hrs. in the E. Speed varies with the condition of the ground, of the animals, and of the travellers; but on an average, 20 to 25 miles may be taken as a D.-J.

DEACON, DEACONESS. The Gr. words diakonein, diakonia, diakonos, refer to service generally, so that the Apostle Paul finds it poss. to describe Christ as a "deacon of the Circumcision" (Rm. 15.[8]). Those who serve the guests are deacons (Jn. 2.[5]). The seven were chosen (Ac. 6.[1f.]), to "serve," diakonein, tables, that the Apostles mt. be free for the "service," diakonia, of the word. As a technical term applied to one holding office in the church, diakonos appears in Php. 1.[1]; 1 Tm. 3.[8f.] These officials are prob. indicated by the "helps" of 1 Cor. 12.[28]. Fitness for the position implied what is now regarded as the char. of a Christian gentleman (1 Tm. 3.[8ff.]). The "women" in this last passage are not the deacons' wives (AV.), but evidently women (DEACONESSES), set apart for similar functions (cp. Rm. 16.[1]). Their service wd. consist largely in attending to the poor. In view of the seclusion of women in the E., the help of females in this work wd. be necessary.

DEBIR (Heb. "back part" or "inmost recess," so applied to the Holy of Holies, in 1 K. 6.[5]). (1) A town, called also Kiriath-sepher, "book town" (Jo. 15.[15]), and Kiriath-sannah, "town of instruction" (Jo. 15.[49]). Fm. a refc. in the Egpn. papyrus, "Travels of a Mohar" (B.C. 1300), it appears that the name was K.-sopher, "scribe's town," not K.-sepher. Owing prob. to some confusion in the text, it is described as taken by Joshua (10.[38f.]), and again by Othniel (15.[15f.]; Jg. 1.[11ff.]). It was in the mountain of Judah, not far fm. Hebron; but no satisfactory identn. has been proposed. Guthe suggs. ed Daherīyeh, SW. of Hebron. It was given to the priests (Jo. 21.[15]). Fm. the anct. name, "book town" or "scribe's town," it is reasonable to expect that, when it is identd., some remains of old-world Lit., clay tablets, or such like may be found here. (2) On the border of Judah and Benj. (Jo. 15.[7]). There may be an echo of the name in Tughghat ed-Dabr, on the way fm. Jrs. to Jericho. (3) Not far fm. Mahanaim (Jo. 13.[26]). If the rdg. Lidĕbīr is correct, it is prob. = Lodĕbār (2 S. 9.[4], 17.[27]).

DEBORAH. (1) The nurse of Rebecca, who died on Jacob's return fm. Mesopotamia and was buried under the "terebinth of weeping" near Bethel (Gn. 35.[8]). (2) The prophetess, w. of Lapidoth. A prose version of her exploits is given in Jg. 4., and a poetical in Jg. 5. She dwelt under her palm "between Ramah and Bethel." She stirred up Barak to lead the N. tribes agst. Sisera, the captain of Jabin's forces. She accompanied the army on its victorious enterprise. There is no convincing reason why she shd. not be regarded along with Barak, as the authoress of the song commemorating the triumph. Attention has been called to the resemblance between lappīdōth, "flames," and Bārāq, "lightning," but it does not follow that these were names of the same man.

DEBT. With the idea of property, of wh. some of the higher animals seem to have the rudiments, is bound up that of borrowing and lending. At first men would accommodate each other with individual objects, such as weapons, implements, or animals; but in time the notion of a medium of exchange was evolved, and this came to be used in such transactions. Very early, grain seems to have served this purpose among agricultural peoples. With money came the idea of interest. From the laws of Ḥammurabi we learn that interest was expected on loans of grain. The Mosaic law seems to contemplate only loans of money. When a loan was obtained the borrower gave a pledge to his creditor (Dt. 24.^{10}); but not every object might be given as a pledge (v. 6, &c.). A frequent form of oppression was the retention of the pledge after the debt was paid (Ek. 18.$^{7-16}$). In the ancient as in the mod. East, men had often to borrow in order to pay their taxes (Ne. 5.^{4}). In the days of Nehemiah interest was exacted at the rate of 1 per cent. per month—the rate at wh. the Fellaḥīn in Pal. borrow now. The interest contemplated by the code of Ḥammurabi, on the lowest estimate, is nearly three times as much: on the higher, nearly 30 times as much. With interest on such a scale indebtedness wd. rapidly increase; and all hope of repayment wd. tend to vanish. To secure his "rights," the creditor mt. sell the debtor or his family into slavery (2 K. 4.^{1}; Mw. 18.^{25}). The Isr. were strictly forbidden to take interest of their brethren (Ex. 22.^{25}; Dt. 23.^{19}).

DECAPOLIS (Mw. 4.^{25}, &c., Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. III. ix. 7). This consisted of cities, originally ten in number, to wh. Pompey granted cert. privileges and immunities, constituting a confederacy for the purposes of self-defence and commerce, under the Governor of Syr. To each city was attached the district immediately around it, and they were independent of the tetrarchy or province in wh. they were situated. The number of cities in the league changed, but the name D. was retained. Ptolemy names 18. All were on the E. of Jordan except Scythopolis.

Carved Doorway, Qanawāt

The inhabitants were mainly Greek, and their relations with the Jews were uniformly hostile. The ruins of temples, theatres, and other public buildings in Jerash, Qanawāt. Gadara, &c., bear witness to the greatness and splendour of these cities. They were centres of Hellenic culture. All but two of the cities named by Pliny (N.H. v. 18) can still be identified: Gadara, Scythopolis=Beisān, Hippos=Susieh, E. of the Sea of Galilee, Damascus, Canatha=Qanawāt, on Jebel ed-Druze, Pella =Khirbet Fāhil, on the E. edge of the Jordan Valley, Gerasa=Jerash, and Philadelphia='ammān—see Rabbah. DEDAN appears, in Gn. 10.^{7}, as grandson of Cush, and in 25.^{3} as a desct. of Abraham, by Keturah. The reference is doubtless to Arabian tribe or tribes of whom D. was the reputed ancestor.

With the Dedanites Isr. seems to have been in close commercial relations (Is. 21.[13] ; Jr. 25.[23] ; Ek. 27.[20]). They may have occupied the country to the S. of Edom (Glazer, ii. 392ff.). Poss. they are mentioned in line 31 of the Moabite Stone Inscr.

In Ek. 27.[15], LXX gives Rodoi (Heb. Rodanīm), an easy change of ד into ר. The commodities there mentioned were no doubt familiar articles of trade with the merchantmen of Rhodes.

DEDICATION, THE FEAST OF, commemorated the reconsecration of the altar of burnt-offering by Judas Maccabæus, on the 25th of Chisleu, B.C. 167, after its pollution by Antiochus Epiphanes. It lasted eight days. The time being near the winter solstice, Jesus natly. sought protection fm. the cold winds of the mountains in Solomon's porch (Jn. 10.[22]). The customs of the feast resembled those of the Feast of Tabernacles (2 M. 10.[6]), by wh. name it appears in 2 M. 1.[9]. The Jews mt. celebrate this feast anywhere, not requiring to go up to Jrs. Every house was illuminated, and it was called the Feast of Lights (Ant. XII. vii. 7). Poss. this suggested to Jesus the claim, " I am the light of the world " (Jn. 9.[5]).

DEEP, THE (Heb. tehūm ; Gr. abussos). The primitive Semitic idea of a vast mass of water on wh. the world floated (Gn. 1.[2], 7.[11], 49.[25] ; Ex. 15.[5], &c.). It assumed the mythological form " Tiamat " in the Babylonian Epic of the CREATION. In NT. it signifies the abode of the Dead (Rm. 10.[7]). In Rv. 9.[1], &c., it is rendered " bottomless pit."

DEUTERONOMY. The bk. of Deuteronomy forms the conclusion of the fivefold collection known in the OT. Canon by the name of the Pentateuch or Torah. The name, Deuteronomium, taken over fm. the Gr., is the word used by the translators in 17.[18], " a copy of this law," wh. they took in the sense of repetition, or second giving of the Law. In the Heb. Bible, however, the bk. is simply indicated, as are the other bks. of the Pnt., by the opening expression : " These are the words," or, more briefly, " Words." As a component part of the Pnt. it follows the thread of hist. that runs through the whole, opening with the situation implied at the end of the bk. of Nu., and closing with the death of Moses. Yet a comparison with the three preceding bks. shows at once that it is not a literary continuation of these, but forms an independent and self-contained work. The bk. in its opening verses purports to give an act. of " words " or addresses delivered by Moses beyond Jordan before the Israelites crossed to take possession of Canaan. Fm. the first verse it mt. be inferred that there is to follow a recapitulation of various addresses given at various times and at various places on the wilderness journey ; but vv. 3–5 give the place, the land of Moab, and the time, the fortieth yr. fm. the Exodus, at wh. the succeeding addresses were delivered. And it is to be noted that the expression in v. 5, " began Moses to declare this law," does not mean that he then for the first time gave forth the Law as a new thing, but rather that he "set himself to expound" it. And in the sequel this is the characteristic of the laws, that they are put forth in a homiletical manner and with a practical enforcement. The thought is present throughout that the aged leader's work is done, and that a new era in the people's hist. is about to begin. But, though the bk. is a unity, in the sense that the situation and tone are the same throughout, and the style unusually uniform, yet the disposition of the matter is not such as we look for in a composition coming fm. one hand at one sitting. One large section in the middle of the bk., embracing chaps. 12.–26., and constituting what may be called the Deuteronomic Code, is so homogeneous that its essential unity may be taken for granted. But it is preceded and followed by chaps. wh. have more or less a detached or fragmentary char. It wd. be precarious and prob. misleading to judge anct. Oriental productions by mod. literary standards. The statements of the bk. itself (31.[9, 22-26]) do not warrant us to say that it professes, in its present form, to come fm. the hand of Moses. Accdgly., in the absence of direct information on the subject, we are left to speculation as to the manner in wh. any addresses and written materials of Moses may have been preserved, handed down, and embodied in the bk. wh. lies before us. On the one hand, it mt. be supposed that the "Code" was the original part of the bk., composed as a compend of the constitution under wh. the nation was to be consolidated and guided, and that the addresses wh. precede and follow, with the historical notes, were subsequently added as a framework or setting to the laws. On the other hand, we mt. suppose the addresses to have been the primary matter—the dying leader, solicitous for the future welfare of his people, insisting on the fundamental principles on wh. their national calling was based—and the laws, perhaps expanded in detail by a later writer, to have been expounded on those principles in their practical refc. to the life on wh. they were about to enter. It wd. seem that the writer of the bk., or the editor through whose hands it has come to us, took the latter view fm. the manner in wh. the person of Moses and the situation of the time are put in the forefront, and the tone that pervades the legal part as expounded by the legislator. This much is plain: that the stress of the bk. is laid, not so much on the inculcation of this or that law, or of the law genly., as on the enforcement of the duty of fidelity to the Covenant of God, and warning agst. the contamination of heathen worship.

The date and mode of composition of the bk. of Deut. have been among the most keenly debated questions of criticism. Canon Driver states the question (Intern. Crit. Com., p. xii) as follows: "As a work of the Mosaic age, Deut., I must own, though intelligible, if it stood perfectly alone, i.e. if the hist. of Isr. had been other than it was, does not seem to me to be intelligible, when viewed in the light shed upon it by other parts of the OT." Others mt. be disposed to express the matter differently and say that, as a work of the Mosaic age, the bk. is intelligible, provided that the hist. of Isr. is taken as it is represented by the Biblical historians, and not as reconstructed on the basis of modern theories. Be that as it may, it is a fact that, in the prevailing school of Criticism, the composition of the bk. is relegated to a period far posterior to the Mosaic age; and this is accounted one of the most incontestable, as it is one of the most far-reaching, conclusions of Criticism. It may be well, therefore, in the first place, to look at the bk. as "if it stood perfectly alone," i.e. apart fm. any preconceived or pre-established scheme of hist., and thereafter to consider the arguments by wh. its actual date is claimed to be determined.

The situation assumed by the writer of the bk. is plain. The people are encamped in the plains of Moab, ready to go in to possess the land. There is a pause of forty days, and the aged leader, who knows that he is not to cross the Jordan, takes occasion to deliver a series of solemn addresses, in wh. he recounts the leading events of the past wilderness journey, anticipates the vicissitudes of the future, and for the present gives such admonitions, warnings, and encouragements as seem fitting. He dwells particularly on the fact that God had made with them a covenant at Horeb, and insists on the duty wh. it implied. As to the future, he speaks both of the immediate task that lay before them, with its temptations, and also of the possibilities of the more distant time, when they shd. have exchanged their wandering life for that of a settled agricultural people, and when different social and national conditions shd. prevail. With all this in view, he recapitulates and sums up the statutes and ordinances wh., by Divine authority, he had communicated to them, forming a fairly comprehensive code for guidance in the life on wh. they were about to enter. The code is not all-embracing: although sacrifice and ceremony are presumed and prescribed, details of the ritual are omitted, it being taken for granted that the priests are instructed and able to give instructions on such matters (24.[8], 26.[3], &c.). One point, however, in regard to the worship is emphasised. When the people shd. have rest fm. all their enemies round about so that they shd. dwell in safety (12.[10]), the Lord wd. choose a place out of all their tribes to put His name there (12.[5, 11, 18, 21, 26]), and thither they shd. bring their burnt-offerings and sacrifices, and tithes and heave-offerings, and vows and freewill offerings and firstlings (12.[6]). A concession, however, is made (vv. 20–25); when their territory shd. be enlarged, and the place wh. God shd. choose wd.

be too far distant, they wd. be permitted to kill and eat of the herd and the flock, just as they wd. eat of the gazelle and the hart. That more is meant here than ordinary eating of food is implied in the mention of the distant sanctuary; for, had it been ordinary food, it did not matter whether the place were near or far. Moreover, a restriction follows (vv. 26f.) in regard to "holy things" wh. must only be eaten at the central sanctuary. But the immediate and pressing duty was to destroy all the "places" at wh. the heathen inhabitants of Canaan practised their worship, to break down their altars and dash in pieces their pillars, and burn their Asherim with fire, hew down the graven images of their gods and destroy their names out of "that place" (12.[2, 3]). And here it is remarkable that the term bāmāh, bāmōth, "high place," wh. occurs so frequently in the subsequent hist., is not employed, but only the gen. word "place," māqōm, wh. has survived in the mod. maqām.

In all this, one wd. say, the writer, whoever he is, keeps faithfully to the assumed situation; and, if he is long posterior to Moses, he has imagined very vividly the circumstances of speaker and hearers, without betraying himself by anachronisms such as mt. have been expected in a late writer. In point of fact, it is not fm. internal features of the bk. itself, but mainly fm. a comparison with other OT. bks. that the main arguments are drawn for the late origin of Deut.; and they form an important part of the wider question of the origin of the Pentateuch. First of all, on a comparison of the legislative elements of the Pnt., it is maintained that three different statements of the law as to the place of worship are discoverable. Whereas in the portions known as JE. sacrifice mt. be offered anywhere (Ex. 20.[24]), Deut., as we have seen, restricts it to a central sanctuary, and the legal system of the Priestly Code (PC.) is based on the idea that worship at a central sanctuary is the sole and customary practice. These are assumed to mark three stages in the historical evolution of the law on the subject, from a more free to a more restricted practice.

Turning then to the historical bks. for information as to the actual practice, the critics point out that, in the earlier period of the hist., and even after the Temple was built, sacrifice was offered at various places even by the most pious of the nation; that not till the time of Josiah were the high places abolished and worship concentrated at Jrs.; and that after the exile the restored Temple was the sole place of sacrificial worship. The conclusion is that the Code of Deut. was not in existence till about the time of Josiah, just as the Code of P. was not promulgated till the return fm. the Exile. To explain how the bk. came to be composed in this form at so late a time, it is supposed that some person or persons, grieving over the apostasy of the times, and esp. the existence of the high places, drew up a code or programme of what they believed to be the ideal of the national religion and worship, with the obj. of effecting a reform and providing an authoritative guide for the reformed State. Though not the work of Moses it was conceived in the spt. of the Mosaic legislation, and was such as Moses, had he been alive at the time, mt. have put forth; and, in order to give it authority, it was put into the mouth of Moses, and furnished with a historical and hortatory setting befitting the situation of Moses at the close of his life. The bk. may have been written in the troublous times of the reign of Manasseh (2 K. 21.), and may have been hidden in the Temple; or it may have been composed in the earlier yrs. of Josiah, when the reforming party saw the prospect of their hopes being accomplished. In any case it was the bk. of the Law discovered in the Temple in the 18th yr. of Josiah's reign (2 K. 22.[8]), and intimately connected with the reform.

This act. of the origin of the bk., "if it stood perfectly alone," has strong attractions at the present time, as professing to explain by a regular process of development certain apparent discrepancies in the laws and certain apparent difficulties in the hist. It may be questioned, however, whether it gives a fair estimate of these difficulties, and whether it does not raise other difficulties wh., to some minds, are at least as serious as those wh. it professes to remove. It must not be forgotten that the glaring primary fact in the hist. of Isr. is not the neglect or violation of the law of centralised worship, but the more heinous offence of forsaking their Covenant God and going after other gods. This was the root of the worship at the high places, wh. was condemned by prophets long before the time of Josiah. As to the offering of sacrifices by good men elsewhere than at the central sanctuary, it is to be remembered that the law of JE. did not legalise all places indifferently (Ex. 20.[24]), and presumed worship at a central sanctuary (23.[14-17]); that there is no record of good men frequenting the popular local sanctuaries, and that the code of Deut. itself, as we have seen, made provision for sacrifice at a distance fm. the sanctuary.

But the most serious difficulties are encountered in the act. that is given of the composition of the bk. There is nothing in Deut. itself to betray a late writer, nor is there the least indication that any one in the time of Josiah had a suspicion that the bk. found in the Temple was not anct. and authoritative. And, when it is asserted that the writer set himself to compose a work in the "spirit" of Moses, it is pertinent to ask how he came to know the Mosaic legislation, if nothing hitherto existed beyond the law of JE., composed, as is alleged, long after the time of Moses. Or, if he did write in the spirit of the Mosaic legislation, he must have understood the law of JE. to point to, or to be consistent with, worship at a central sanctuary. In fact, before the time of Samuel we find Shiloh regarded as a central sanctuary; it cannot be maintained that the Temple, when once erected, was on a level with the local high places; and Hezekiah, before the time at wh. Deut. is said to have been written, attempted to do what Josiah more effectually accomplished (2 K. 18.[4]). Moreover, this so-called late writer not only writes in the "spirit" of Moses, but introduces details of hist. and law wh., though quite apposite in the time and situation of Moses, have neither point nor application for the time of Josiah, apparently forgetting the primary obj. with wh. he sat down to write the bk. When all is said in favour of the late writer, an uneasy feeling remains that he is either too clever a romancer for the time, or that he is setting down what he knows will mislead his readers; and either supposition is hard to reconcile with the earnest, spiritual tone wh. pervades the bk. It is highly desirable, and surely it is not impossible, to give some act. of the origin of the bk. consistent with belief in the good faith and honesty of the writer. Is it not highly prob. that Moses, who had led his people for forty yrs., shd. have counselled and warned them as his end approached, and is it likely that any words he uttered in such circumstances shd. have been allowed to pass immediately into utter oblivion? We are told that "Isr. served the Lord all the days of Joshua and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua" (Jo. 24.[31]). Such a period, resembling the Apostolic and post-Apostolic periods of the Christian Church to wh. we owe so much relating to the origins of Christianity, wd. be a time in wh. the words of the lawgiver, as well as "the work of the Lord that He had wrought for Isr.," wd. be preserved by a pious tradition; and, though the times that followed were marked by apostasy and decline, there was not wanting a line of prophetic men who cherished and kept alive the principles of the Mosaic relg. The earliest writing prophets regard themselves as the continuators of the true national relg., and Hosea in so many respects resembles Deut. that Prof. Driver says, "In a special degree the author of Deut. is the spiritual heir of Hosea" (Deut. p. xxvii). May it not be the other way, that Hosea, a "prophet like unto" Moses, is only repeating and emphasising the teaching of the great leader? (cp. Dt. 18.[5] with Ho. 12.[13]). And, whereas critical writers find it necessary to postulate a Deuteronomic "school" of writers, who not only adopted the tone and style of Deut., but set themselves to revise and retouch older documents in the Deuteronomic "spirit," may it not be the case that these touches in earlier bks. are the echoes of the Deut. of the Mosaic age, and that Moses himself is the father of all the Deuteronomists? Certain it is that Mosaic authorship is claimed for this bk. in a much more explicit manner than for any other book of the Pentateuch.

DEVIL. See Satan.

DEW. During the dry season in Pal., when water is scanty, much of the vegetation owes its life to the dew. The west winds at evening are heavy with moisture fm. the sea, wh. settles in refreshing D. by night, and at sunrise covers plain and mountain-side with white drapery of cloud disappearing with the heat of day. For the country it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of D. (Gn. 27.[28], &c.; 2 S. 1.[21], &c.).

DIADEM. See Crown.

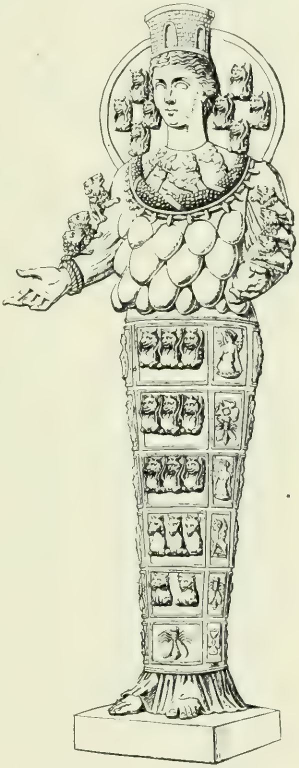
DIAL (2 K. 20.[11]; Is. 38.[8]), "the D. of Ahaz" (AVm. "degrees," RVm. "steps"). A D. is a device to tell the hour of the day by the length or direction of the shadow of some object. Herodotus (ii. 109) credits the Babylonians with this invention. As the civilisation of Asyr. and Bab. was really one, Ahaz may have learned the use of the D. fm. the Asyrs. in his intercourse with Tiglath-pileser. As there have as yet been found no specimens of D. we can only conjecture the appearance of "the D. of Ahaz." The most plausible suggn. is that it consisted of an obelisk set upon a pedestal of steps; after mid-day the lengthening shadow wd. descend more and more "steps." We do not know the space of time indicated by "a step."



Diana of the Ephesians

DIAMOND (Heb. yahălem, LXX iaspis, Vlg. jaspis). A precious stone, third in the second row on the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[18]), supposed to be the "onyx."

DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS. The Romans identd. their goddess of the woods, D., with Artemis. Even the Hellenic deity appears to have united several different divinities; the slim, beautiful huntress has but little in common with the polymastic monstrosity worshipped in Ephesus.

The Asiatic goddess was really a deification of all-sustaining Earth; hence the many breasts with wh. she was endowed. The image of D. was declared to have come down fm. heaven (diopetes); a statement wh. suggs. an aerolite. This is negatived by the fact that it was made of wood, prob. ebony (Pliny, NH. xvi. 40).

The Ephesian temple of D. was regarded as one of the wonders of the world; it was 425 ft. long and 220 broad, and had 127 pillars of the Ionic order. . . . Pausanias informs us that D. more than the other gods was privately worshipped (Paus. IV. 31. 6): this explains the trade in "silver shrines" (Ac. 19.[24]). He mentions that the worship of the Ephesian D. was common in the Peloponnesus. It is more curious than important that the priests of D. were called "Essenes."

DIBLAH, poss. an error for RIBLAH (Ek. 6.[14]), or it may be ident. with Dibl in Upper Galilee, S. of Tibnīn.

DIBON. (1) A city in Moab, taken by Sihon (Nu. 21.[26ff.]), captured later by Isr. and assigned to Gad; thence called D.-Gad (32.[34], 33.[45]), but reckoned to Reuben (Jo. 13.[17], P.). From the Moabite Stone we learn that D. had passed into Mesha's hands; and in Jr. 48.[18, 22] it appears as a Moabite city. In Is. 15.[9] it is called "Dimon." It is represented by the mod. Dībān, a little to the N. of the Arnon, on the Rm. road, with ruins of anct. tower, walls, cistern, &c. (2) A town occupied by the Jews after the exile (Ne. 11.[25]), perhaps = Dimonah, in the S. of Judah (Jo. 15.[22]).

DIDYMUS. See THOMAS.

DIKLAH (Heb. Diqlāh), s. of Joktan (Gn. 10.[27]). The tribe designated cannot be identd. In Aram. the Tigris is Diglath. The territory of the tribe may have been near that river, wh. may have given them their name.

DIMON, DIMONAH. See DIBON.

DINAH, dr. of Jacob and Leah, whose seduction by Shechem, s. of Hamor, was so treacherously and terribly avenged by her brs. (Gn. 30.[21], 34.), to the grief and indignation of Jacob (34.[30], 49.[5ff.]). See SIMEON, LEVI.

DINNER. See FOOD.

DIONYSIUS, a member of the council of Areopagus, converted by Paul (Ac. 17.[34]). Accdg. to Eusebius (HE. iii. 4, 10), he became bishop of Athens, where he is said to have suffered under Domitian (Niceph., HE. iii. 11). Others say he was beheaded in Paris, at Montmartre, "Martyr's Mount," c. A.D. 95; hence the claim that he is St. Denys, the patron saint of France. Voluminous writings, dealing with angelology, &c., were published under the name of D. in the fifth cent.

DISCIPLE. In classical Gr. mathētēs meant the "pupil" of a philosopher, i.e. didaskalos, or teacher. In NT. it is applied to the followers of John the Baptist (Mw. 9.[14], &c.), and to the Pharisees, as Ds. of Moses (Jn. 9.[28]); but in the Gospels esp. to the chosen twelve (Mw. 10.[1], &c.), who were always with Jesus. Elsewhere it occurs only in Ac., and there it denoted a believer in Jesus (16.[1], &c.). Once the fem. form appears, mathētria, of Tabitha (9.[36]).

DISEASES AND REMEDIES. Disease meets us very frequently in the Bible, and in many difft. aspects. It occurs among the incidents recorded as biography and hist. are unrolled before us; it is the motive prompting many enactments of sanitary legislation; it is the subj. of warnings and threatenings to the chosen people by their prophets; it is the background of much deep sptl. experience; it is the field where, even by the prophets of the old dispensation, but much more by our Lord and His Apostles, God's power over the forces of nat. is made manifest. The outstanding fact with regard to the attitude of the Scriptl. writers to disease, in hist. no less than in miracle, is the way in wh. they lose sight of secondary causes, and attribute both diseases and their cures directly to God's hand (e.g. Ex. 15.[26]; Dt. 28.[27-29], 32.[39]; Ps. 30.[2], 103.[3]). One of the most striking illustrations of this point of view occurs in 2 Ch. 16.[12], where we are told that Asa "in his disease sought not to the Lord but to the physicians": an antithesis wh. suggts. an attitude towards the healing art not unlike that of the "Peculiar People" at the present day.

A directly contrary estimate of the physician and his efforts appears in the Apcr. (Sr. 38.[1-15]), where he is so praised that some have supposed that the writer must himself have been a physician. Here it is fully recognised that the physician and his remedies are special gifts fm. God: "Then give place to the physician, for God hath created him . . . for they shall also pray unto the Lord that He would prosper that wh. they give for ease and remedy to prolong life."

A very difft. view of disease was held by most other anct. nations. The Babs. esp. seem to have had their lives made a burden to them by the many evil spts. whom they believed to be waiting at every turn to do them hurt. We need go no further than the Apcr. (Tobit) for a striking example of superstitious belief in evil spts., and in magical remedies for their discomfiture. The OT. writers, do, indeed, in rare instances attribute disease to evil spts.; but even then the powers of evil are regarded as under God's control (1 S. 16.[14]; Jb. 2.[4, 6, 7]).

Disease is in the OT. very genly. regarded as a direct punishment for sin (e.g. Dt. 28.[21f.], &c.; 1 S. 5.; 2 S. 24.; Ps. 107.[17f.]; Jr. 24.[10]). How strongly this view was held in the time of our Lord we learn in Jn. 9.[2], where the disciples assume as a matter of course that sin must be the cause of the blind man's affliction. Christ shows them that God sends disease for other ends than the infliction of punishment.

In Is. 38.[10-20], we have Hezekiah's psalm of thanksgiving "when he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness." It is natl. that such crises in men's lives shd. stir them to the depths, and that their gratitude for life restored shd. find expression. In many of the Psalms we meet with such vivid descriptions of physical distress that we cannot but regard them as the record of bodily disease, though they are usly. linked with the expression of mental suffering, either fm. the sense of sin or fm. the malignant enmity of foes (see Pss. 6., 22., 38., 39., 102., 116.). The most graphic and detailed record of the Psalmist's disease is given in Ps. 102. (see below); and it is in this Psalm also that the contrast is most striking between the depression and misery of sickness and the exaltation and rapture in the contemplation of the Lord, the Healer. Disease and its cure are described in Ps. 107^{17-22} as one of the great experiences of human life; here, however, the Psalmist is not the sufferer but the onlooker.

Of very special interest and importance are the diseases healed by our Lord. At the present day almost all the critics of the NT. are agreed that it is imposs. to separate the teaching of Christ fm. the cures He wrought. Those who do not believe in His supernatural origin or power maintain that the cures were of the same nat. as those met with at the present day, where a strong mental impression on the sufferer is effectual in at once removing the disease. Such cures all occur in what are known as functional diseases of the nervous system, that is diseases where no permanent change has occurred in the structure of the parts affected. They constitute a small proportion even of diseases affecting the nervous system; and a very small fraction of the whole number of cases of disease. The whole tenor of the Gospel nars. indicates that Christ did not "select His cases"; an appeal to Him for relief was always responded to; His method was applicable to "all manner of sickness and all manner of disease."

Further, such cases are almost always young, and in the great majority of instances of the female sex. In no single case cured by Christ with regard to wh. any details are given can this view of the disease be regarded as a natl. explanation of the circumstances recorded. Severe idiocy or insanity, a "withered hand," congenital blindness, an "issue of blood" (dysentery) of twelve yrs. duration, are not the diseases that are curable by means of a strong mental impression, so far as mod. experience can guide us. If Christ's power over disease had been no more than this, the record of its exercise wd. surely have included a proportion of cases wh. we cd. recognise as belonging to the class that is curable in this way. If it be admitted that the nars. are founded on real cures, these must have been of such a nat. as quite transcends any mod. experience of the treatment of disease (see Dr. Ryle's art., Hibbert Journ., vol. v., Apr. 1907).

Some of the diseases we may consider in groups: 1. Leprosy; 2. Epidemic Diseases; 3. Fevers; 4. Paralysis; 5. Blindness; 6. Demonic Possession. Individual cases of interest wh. do not fall into these groups will be discussed afterwards.

Leprosy.—This subj. is treated in such detail in Lv. 13. and 14. that we mt. hope to be able to recognise with certy. unattainable in the case of other maladies, what the disease is to wh. the descriptions and regulations apply. It is genly. assumed that it is the terrible disease familiar to us under the name of leprosy. In this country, happily, it is no longer to be met with, except in occasional imported cases; but in the Middle Ages it was very prevalent, and we hear much of it still in foreign lands—Norway, Syria, India, China and the Sandwich Islands among others. The hopelessness with wh. it is regarded, the terrible disfigurements and mutilations to wh. it leads, and the dread wh. its victims inspire, have impressed the imagination of the world.

There has been much confusion with regard to its nomenclature. Our name is directly derived fm. the Gr. word lepra, wh. occurs in the NT. and is rendered "leprosy" in our VV., and is also consistently used in LXX to represent the Heb. word tsāra'ath, trd. "leprosy" in EV. There is no reason to doubt that the Gr. and Heb. terms really corrspded. Now we know that the term lepra was used by the Gr. physicians not for what we know as L., but for cert. forms of scaly eruption of the skin, diseases disfiguring, no doubt, but not seriously affecting the general health. The most characteristic of these is now known in English as psoriasis. St. Luke was well acquainted with the Gr. nomenclature, and in all probty. used the term in the same sense as other physicians of the day. It is doubtful whether what we call L. was known to the earlier Gr. physicians: later, when they did become acquainted with it, they genly. designated it elephantiasis, never lepra, though among them also there was some confusion of names. The earliest known use of the word lepra to designate "true leprosy" occurs in a medical work of about the tenth cent. The evidence of nomenclature, therefore, is agst. the disease spoken of in the Bible being that wh. we now call L.

Let us look now at the refcs. to the disease in the Bible. In Lv. 13., 14. no mention is made of any sign or symptom of the disease except its effect on the skin and the hair; no allusion is made to the grave constitutional enfeeblement, the loss of eyesight, and the mutilations to wh. it so often leads. A variety of appearances in the skin and the hair in difft. parts of the body are described, and directions are given wh. are to be regarded as unclean and wh. as clean. Some of these corrspd. with appearances to be met with in L.; some are difficult to reconcile with the features of that disease. In doubtful cases a quarantine of one or two weeks is enjoined, with re-examination. The course of L. as it is met with at the present day is so extremely slow that this period cd. not be expected to produce any recognisable change in the features of the disease. One extremely curious enactment (Lv. 13.$^{12f.}$) is difficult to explain on any hypothesis, imposs. if the disease were the L. we know, namely, that if a person were leprous all over, he was clean.

The description in the same chapters of L. of garments (13.$^{47ff.}$) and of bldgs. (14.$^{33-53}$), increases the probty. that the term tsāra'ath was applied to a variety of appearances with a superficial resemblance, rather than to the manifestations of one disease. Nothing is known, however, as to the nat. of this L. of inanimate objs.

In the other Biblical refcs. to the disease we have (with one exception) no suggn. that any one dies of it, is disabled by it, is deprived of sight or limb; no one is prevented doing anything he wishes to do, or that any one else is able to do, except ceremonially (e.g. Naaman, who, though a leper, discharged the onerous duties of a commander-in-chief, 2 K. 5.^{1}).

In three passages one chartc. of the disease is prominent, namely, its white appearance, wh. in each of them is compared to snow (Moses, Ex. 4.^{6}; Miriam, Nu. 12.^{10}; Gehazi, 2 K. 5.^{27}). There are cert. forms and stages of true L. in wh. the colour of the affected part is somewhat paler than natural; but the common and prominent change of colour is in the opposite direction, and there is no known form of the disease that cd. be described as "white as snow." This comparison mt. quite well apply to some cases of psoriasis; and also to some other diseases, especially the condition known as leucoderma, esp. as they are met with in the darker races. In leucoderma the only discoverable change is the loss of colour in the skin and hair of the part affected.

The one passage wh. points to a more serious view of the malady is Nu. 12.^{12}, where Aaron's prayer for Miriam ("Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he comes out of his mother's womb") cert. suggs. an ulcerative and destructive form of disease. (With regard to Jb. 30.^{17} RVm., see below, in discussion of Job's disease.)

We have no independent evidence of the existence of true L. in Pal. in Bible times. The earliest classical writers who refer to it agree in regarding Egp. as the home of the disease, and allusions to it are believed to have been found in early Egpn. papyri. It is thus quite likely that the Isrs. may have known the disease in Egp.; and poss. that they may have carried it with them to Pal. As we have seen, it cannot be clearly recognised in the Biblical records.

The absence of any mention of L. by any of the prophets supports the idea that its importance was largely ceremonial. It is nowhere spoken of in the Bible as a type of sin, in the way so familiar in mod. theological writings. Even the Early Fathers use it much more as a type of heresy than of sin in the ordinary sense: the mod. view seems to have developed during the Middle Ages, when true L. was very prevalent in Europe.

It seems prob., then, that the words trd. "leprosy" (Heb. tsāra'ath, Gr. lepra) were used, not of what we wd. call one disease, but of a group or family of diseases, of wh. the most striking feature was a skin eruption. True, L. may poss. have been one of them. One at least of these forms of disease was prob. regarded as infectious, and the prevention of its communication to others was the original reason for the regulations in Lv. Such a provision as that in 13.$^{12f.}$ makes it imposs. to believe that the regulations were entirely directed agst. infection. A consideration of all the evidence makes it prob. that the importance of the disease was to a large extent due to ceremonial considerations, the meaning of wh. is very obscure to us now (see Sir J. Risdon Bennett, The Diseases of the Bible).

Epidemic Diseases.—Numerous severe and fatal pestilences are recorded in the Bible: the fifth of the plagues of Egp. (Ex. 9.$^{1-7}$) was a deadly disease, affecting the domestic animals; the last a mysterious death of the firstborn. The sins of the Children of Isr. in the wilderness (Nu. 11.^{33}, 14.^{37}, 16.^{46}), of the Phil. (1 S. 5.), of David (2 S. 24.$^{13-16}$), of Sennacherib (2 K. 19.^{35}), were punished by such visitations. In the prophetic bks. plague and pestilence are frequently foretold as punishments for sin (e.g. Dt. 28.$^{21, 58-62}$; Jr. 14.^{12}, &c.; Ek. 5.^{12}, &c.; Zc. 14.$^{12, 15, 18}$; Rv. 16.$^{2f.}$). With regard to most of these pestilences no details are given to indicate the nat. of the disease. At difft. times most of the acute epidemic diseases with wh. we are acquainted have been very fatal; bubonic plague, cholera, typhus fever, smallpox, measles, diphtheria, and many others: how many may have been prevalent in Bible times it is imposs. to tell. The nar. in Nu. 11.^{33} suggs. a direct causal connection between the quails and the pestilence; the flesh of the birds may have been poisonous because they had been feeding on some deleterious plant; or the insanitary conditions caused by so much decomposing flesh may have lighted some epidemic disease into unwonted virulence.

Bubonic Plague.—There is one of the pestilences, however, wh. we may with some confidence ident. The most fatal and terrible epidemic known to hist. was the "Black Death," wh. in about three yrs. in the 14th cent. of our era killed at least one-fourth of the population of Europe, and shook the framework of society to its foundations. It was a peculiarly virulent form of the bubonic plague, the plague par excellence, wh. has been responsible for many epidemics in past cents., and in our own times (since 1894) has reappeared in force in China, India, and elsewhere, and has even revisited our own shores after more than 200 yrs.' absence. It is a disease primarily affecting rats and mice; and in India it was known cents. before our era that its appearance among rats was the prelude to a human epidemic. Quite recently the meaning of this sequence has been explained, for it has been shown that the carrier of the infection is almost always one of the species of fleas that infest the rat. This creature leaves its host, when he dies, for some other animal or for a human being, carries the disease germs in its body, and inoculates its new host with them.

Bubonic plague is the only acute and fatal epidemic wh. is commonly characterised by the presence of tumours; these are always met with except in the most virulent and rapidly fatal cases. In 1 S. 5., 6. we have an act. of an epidemic attended by tumours (5.[6, 9], RV.) specially noted in the milder cases of the disease (5.[12]), and closely associated with mice (6.[4, 5]) or rats; the two are not distinguishable in the anct. tongues. It seems imposs. to avoid the conclusion that this was the same bubonic plague that we know to-day.

This identn. gives a new meaning to the epidemic at Bethshemesh (1 S. 6.[19]). The coverings of the Ark, particularly the "badger-skins" (Nu. 4.[5, 6]), wd. form an admirable retreat for the fleas fm. the dead plague-rats in the Temple which were harbouring the disease. Those who looked into the Ark must have disturbed these coverings, and would attract the fleas, and fall victims to the plague. The spread of the epidemic without human intercourse fm. Ekron to the Israelites is thus easily and naturally explained.

An interesting parallel has been suggd. with regard to the pestilence in Sennacherib's army, wh. made him abandon his expedition (2 K. 19.). Herodotus gives an Egpn. story of the same invasion, in wh. its abandonment is attributed to "mice of the fields, wh. ate up their quivers and their bows and the handles of their shields, so that being without defence of arms great numbers fell." Here, again, we have a fatal disease brought into connection with mice (or rats); it seems at least poss. that this too may have been bubonic plague of a very virulent char.

The Plague of the Fiery Serpents.—A curious suggn. has been made that the serpents fm. wh. the children of Isr. suffered (Nu. 21.[4-9]) were really Guinea-worms. This parasite, a kind of worm, occurs in various tropical countries, and has been known since before the Christian era to be prevalent in the neighbourhood of the Red Sea. It gains entrance to the body in drinking-water, develops to a length ranging up to three feet, and finds its way to the feet or legs, where it penetrates the skin and discharges its young externally. It sometimes causes much pain and inflammation, and if the person suffering fm. it be in a debilitated condition, may even prove fatal. The anct. Gr. name for the parasite, "little dragon" (δρακόντιον), suggs. that it was regarded as a sort of serpent; the epithet fiery may very well refer to the inflammation produced by its presence. This view of the passage, while it appears at first sight far-fetched, is yet a poss. explanation of the events recorded.

Fevers.—The word occurs in the AV. of the OT. only in Dt. 28.[22]; but the feverish state must have been common and familiar. In Ps. 102. the features of it may be clearly recognised; the heat (v. 3), the loss of appetite (v. 4), the dry mouth (v. 9), the pain and distress (vv. 5, 9), the depression (vv. 6, 8), the wasting (v. 11), the weakness (v. 23), all point to some severe febrile illness. Those who have suffered fm. ague in the E., where it is very common, say that the description may well apply to that disease.

In the NT. we have "a great fever" (the Gr. technical term) used of the illness fm. wh. Simon's w.'s mr. suffered when Jesus healed her (Lk. 4.[38]); the nobleman's s. whom He healed (Jn. 4.[46ff.]), also suffered fm. fever (v. 52); and in Ac. 28.[8], RV., we read that Publius' fr. was healed by Paul of "fever and dysentery," again a Gr. technical term.

Paralysis or Palsy.—Loss of power due to disease, temporary or permanent, of some part of the nervous system, is of many forms: it may be rapidly fatal, or it may not tend at all to the shortening of life. The centurion's servant (Mw. 8.[6]; Lk. 7.[2]), who was "grievously tormented," and "ready to die," was prob. suffering fm. an acute and progressive form of palsy; Æneas (Ac. 9.[33]), and prob. the man brought to Christ at Capernaum "borne of four" (Mk. 2.[3]), were chronic but severe cases. The man "whose right hand was withered" (Mw. 12.[10]; Mk. 3.[1]; Lk. 6.[6]) had prob. suffered fm. "infantile paralysis," wh. may leave one or more limbs shrunken and useless without detriment to the genl. health. We have a genl refce. to the healing of sufferers fm. palsy in Mw. 4.[24]; and again in Ac. 8.[7].

In the OT., Mephibosheth, who was "lame on both his feet" as the result of a fall at the age of five, prob. suffered fm. disease of the spine, with deformity and partial paralysis of the lower limbs (2 S. 4.[4], 9.).

Jeroboam (1 K. 13.[4-6]) was struck suddenly with paralysis of the arm, wh. is said to have "dried up," and was healed on the intercession of the prophet. Such a sudden withering of a limb as is suggd. by the nar. does not corrsp. to any known disease. If the expression is merely a fig. one, to emphasise the loss of power, the disease may have been the curious condition known as catalepsy, where a limb remains rigid in the position in wh. it happens to be placed, and cannot be moved by the exercise of the will.

Blindness.—Diseases of the eyes are extremely common in the E. at the present day; and fm. the frequent refcs. to blindness in the OT., and the number restored to sight by our Lord (Mw. 11.[5]; Lk. 7.[21], besides individual cases), we may be sure that they were so also in anct. times. In no case mentioned in the Bible can we be sure what form of disease was the cause of the blindness. The dimness of age referred to in Gn. 27.[1], 48.[10]; 1 S. 3.[2]; Ec. 12.[3], is usly. due to cataract.

Demonic Possession.—The belief in the direct causation of disease of many kinds by evil spts. was deep-rooted among the Jews in our Lord's time, as is clear fm. Rabbinical lit. An examination of the nars. regarding demoniacs in the NT. shows that the term is used in a much more limited sense. The demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk. 1.[23-26]; Lk. 4.[33-35]) was excited, aggressive, without self-control; he fell down (Lk.) with a loud cry and violent movements (Mk.). At the present day his malady wd. be described as epileptic insanity—one of the most dangerous and uncontrollable forms of mental disorder. The Gadarene demoniac (Mk. 5.[1-17]; Lk. 8.[26-37]), or demoniacs (Mw. 8.[28-34]), were dead to all social instincts and restraints; restless, noisy, violent, prone to inflict injuries upon themselves, and dangerous to others. Their disease wd. now be called acute mania.

In both these nars. one of the most remarkable features is the way in wh. the demoniacs bear testimony to Christ's mission, and the way in wh. Christ instantly silences that testimony. To this further refc. must be made.

The demoniac boy (Mw. 17.[14-20]; Mk. 9.[14-29]; Lk. 9.[37-43]) had been affected fm. infancy, was dumb, and suffered fm. severe epileptic fits, whose symptoms (the cry, the fall, the foaming mouth, the grinding teeth, the convulsive movements followed by stillness with deep unconsciousness) are faithfully narrated. This boy wd. now be called an epileptic idiot.

In the Acts of the Apostles we read of a "damsel possessed with a spirit of divination" wh. "came out" at the bidding of the Apostle Paul (Ac. 16.[16-18]); she appears to have been harmlessly and mildly demented; and of the man at Ephesus "in whom was the evil spt.," who turned upon and routed the "seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew," when they tried to exorcise the demon in the name of Jesus (Ac. 19.[13-16]), he must have been a dangerous lunatic.

The dr. of the Syro-phœnician woman (Mw. 15.[21-28], &c.), the dumb demoniac (Mw. 9.[32-34], &c.), and the blind and dumb demoniac (Mw. 12.[22-24], &c.), were prob. suffering fm. congenital mental defect, and wd. now be called idiots or imbeciles.

The other refcs. to demoniacs in the Gospels and the Acts furnish no particulars wh. enable us to ident. the form of disease; but we may safely assume that in all it was a disorder severely disturbing the minds of the sufferers. One feature of the cures stands out prominently; other demoniacs, like those of Capernaum and Gadara, bore witness to Christ's Messiahship, and were also at once silenced by Christ (Mk. 1.[34], 3.[11f.]; Lk. 4.[41]). This consistent testimony of the demoniacs to Christ's mission is no less remarkable than His response to it. How differently He receives such a confession fm. His disciples! (Mw. 14.[33], 16.[15-17]; Jn. 1.[49]). The other features of demonic possession, so far as they are recorded, may be explained by various forms of mental disorder with wh. we are familiar to-day. A repeated and distinct proclamation of Christ's office and authority by such witnesses is so surprising, so unlike what we shd. expect of the insane, that it seems to demand some further explanation. May we conclude with Alexander (Demonic Possession) that it was a deliberate attempt to frustrate Christ's mission by its premature proclamation, and that it was "due to demonic inspiration"?

Some of the individual cases of disease may be shortly considered.

(1) Saul.—The disease wh. afflicted his later yrs. wd. now undoubtedly be called melancholia, or severe mental depression. The outbursts of homicidal impulse (1 S. 18.[10f.], &c.) may poss. indicate an epileptic element in addition to the melancholia. The soothing influence of music and of cheerful companionship was for some time effectual in keeping his disorder in check.

(2) The Shunammite's Son (2 K. 4.[18-37]).—The disease of wh. the boy died was prob. either sunstroke or very acute meningitis.

(3) Jehoram (2 Ch. 21.[14-19]).—The features of the disease corrsp. to those of a severe chronic dysentery, prob. succeeding an acute epidemic of the disease (v. 14).

(4) Hezekiah (2 K. 20.[1-7]; 2 Ch. 32.[24]; Is. 38.).—The only definite indication we have of the nat. of the disease is that given us by the prophet Isaiah when he said: "Let them take a lump of figs and lay it for a plaister upon the boil and he shall recover." The severity of the disease, and its almost fatal issue, show that it cannot have been an ordinary boil. By some it has been supposed to be a case of bubonic plague, and connected with the pestilence wh. routed Sennacherib's army (vid. supra). A carbuncle, a disease similar to a boil but much more severe, and not unfrequently fatal, seems to corrsp. better with the facts given to us; it is usually a single swelling, as Hezekiah's appears to have been, whereas in plague there are almost always several distinct tumours. The local treatment, by means of a poultice, is not unlike what mt. be used to-day.

(5) Job.—Prominence is given to the skin eruption (2.[7], 7.[5], 30.[30]): the use of the "potsherd"

(2.[8]) prob. indicates either intense irritation, or much scaly exudation in connection with it. It greatly changed his appearance, and made him loathsome to look upon (2.[12], 7.[5] RVm., 19.[17] RVm.[2]). There are many indications, however, that it was not merely a skin disease, but affected deeper parts (2.[5], 19.[20], 30.[17]); there was emaciation (16.[8], 17.[7]); sleeplessness (7.[3f.]), and fearful dreams (v. 14); depression and hopelessness (3., &c.). There is an anct. belief that Job's disease was true leprosy; this wd. corrsp. to many of its features. The RVm. of chap. 30.[17], "my bones drop away fm. me," is much more appropriate to leprosy than to any other disease. This is, however, too doubtful a foundation to establish the conclusion, esp. as the Heb. text is here uncertain.

(6) Nebuchadnezzar (Dn. 4.) suffered fm. the variety of insanity known as lycanthropy, in wh. the sufferer believes himself to be one of the lower animals; for he appears to have imagined himself an ox. His being "driven fm. men" (v. 33) may indicate that he was violent and dangerous.

(7) Herod Agrippa I. (Ac. 12.[23]).—The same event is recorded by Josephus, who does not mention worms, but says that Herod was seized by sudden and violent pain in the belly, wh. lasted for five days before he died. The two nars. together make it prob. that intestinal worms led to perforation of the bowel and peritonitis (or inflammation of the coating of the bowels). This is an intensely painful form of disease; but consciousness is usly. retained till very near the end, as fm. Josephus' act. seems to have been the case here.

Remedies.—The refcs. to those who prepared and administered remedies in the OT. are few. We are told of the physicians in Egp. who did the work of embalming bodies (Gn. 50.[2]). Jb. 13.[4] and Jr. 8.[22] both make refc. to the calling of the physician. Asa's employment of physicians has already been referred to. Fm. Ex. 21.[19] we may infer that the healer of injuries received a reward for his work. "The art of the apothecary" is mentioned in Ex. 30.[25, 35], 37.[29]; and one of his products in Ec. 10.[1]; but he was rather a perfumer (as in RV.) than an apothecary as we understand the word. In almost all the passages where ointment is mentioned, it is used as a perfume and a luxury, not as a curative application. The only exception is in Is. 1.[6].

In our Lord's time physicians seem to have been more familiar figs. in society, as we may infer fm. the currency of the proverb, "Physician, heal thyself" (Lk. 4.[23]), and the "many physicians" who had treated the woman with dysentery (Mk. 5.[26]). The only one who is known to us by name is Luke (Col. 4.[14]).

Of drugs or other methods of treatment in use we have very scanty record. The mandrake (Gn. 30.[14-16]), the balm of Gilead (not certainly identd. Jr. 8.[22], 46.[11]), and perhaps the caper-berry (Ec. 12.[5] RV.), are the only individual drugs specified. No doubt the spices wh. are frequently mentioned were used not only as perfumes and condiments, but for medicinal purposes also.

Of external applications we read in Is. 1.[6] (dressing and ointment), 38.[21] (fig poultice); Lk. 10.[34] (dressing, oil and wine). We have also a refc. to the treatment of a broken limb in Ek. 30.[21], where it is clear that the importance of fixing the injured part in order to effect reunion of the broken bone was well known.

Our Lord's miraculous cures were often wrought "with a word" (Mw. 8.[16] RV., 15.[22-28]; Jn. 4.[46-53], &c.), but perhaps more often He laid His hands on the sick (Mk. 6.[5]; Lk. 4.[40], &c.), or otherwise touched them (Mk. 1.[31, 41], &c.), and the popular belief in the virtue of contact was very strong (Mk. 6.[56]). On three occasions we are told that He also used saliva (Mk. 7.[33], 8.[23]; Jn. 9.[6]): in the last instance earth in addition; perhaps it was for this reason that He directed the man to wash in the Pool of Siloam.

In the cures recorded in the Acts of the Apostles there is a similar variety. Contact by laying on of the hands or otherwise is mentioned in some cases, not in others. In chap. 19.[11f.] we read that garments wh. had been touched by Paul were the means by wh. cures were wrought; and fm. chap. 5.[15] we learn that the shadow of Peter was regarded as possessing the same virtue. DIVINATION. This may be explained as the pretended art of obtaining a kge. of the secret counsels of the gods, esp. with regard to the future, by means of signs and omens; and also in many cases as the means of counteracting destined evils by the use of spells and charms; and, by similar methods, of bringing evil upon others. Egp. and Bab. were to the anct. world the original sources of all such kge. and practice, and in each of these there was a considerable development, though fm. difft. bases and in difft. lines. In Egp. the start was fm. the idea of the divine unity. Then came the personification of the divine powers in a hierarchy of sptl. beings to wh. man by prop. means mt. approach, and wh. by suitable rites he cd. control. In Chaldea, on the other hand, the beginning was that idea of superstitious naturalism or fetichism wh. peoples all nature with spts. in man's image, and to wh. worship, consisting of enchantments and conjurations, must be paid. In the end, however, little diffc. existed between the methods practised in Egp. and Bab., and in each case the result was the same; the priests got into their hands all the functions of communication with the unseen world, they became sorcerers, and as superstition magnified the powers to wh. they made pretensions, they soon attained a despotic pre-eminence over the people, whom they bound in the bonds of superstitious fear. All the ks. of Bab. consulted diviners and awaited omens. The records of Sargon I. tell of these consultations, and at the head of each paragraph in his hist. we find the omen for the day. In Egp. the bks. of magic belonged to the king, and were used by the priests of the sacred college, who were called when their assistance was thought needful. Amongst the Hebs. we do not find any trace of an original development. Whatever they possessed or used of magic art they either brought with them as part of the original family inheritance fm. Bab., or borrowed fm. the Egpns. and the Cans., who also were given to all kinds of D. and necromancy (Dt. 18.[11]). The power and wealth that such pretensions brought soon attracted those who were desirous of such things, and thus we find that fm. very early times there were societies or guilds of the "initiated," who were known by various names. These are sometimes merely of gen. import, telling only of the kge. or wisdom of those who bear them, at other times they are an index to the pretended sources of sptl. illumination or to the methods of the soothsayer.

Among the general class distinctions we find that of chachamīm both in Egp. and Bab. (Ex. 7.[11]; Dn. 5.[11]). This word means wise men, a name wh. simply designated their superior learning, but with wh. vulgar superstition associated a supernatural power, wh. these men seem to have been ready enough to admit. Of a similar import is the word yidde'onīm (Lv. 19.[31], 20.[6]), wh. means the knowing ones or wizards, and wh. seem to be used to indicate all who by some means or other could reveal the future. The qōsĕmīm (Dt. 18.[14]) also, though, in the stricter sense, they may have belonged to the class of astrologers or magi, and although their name is connected with "cutting," either in the sense of "decreeing" fm. their observations, or fm. the practice of cutting their bodies (1 K. 18.[28]), gave general name to the practice of D. as we find in 1 S. 28.[8]. The chartumīm mentioned in both Egp. and Chaldea (Ex. 7.[11]; Dn. 1.[20]) were originally the sacred scribes and priests of Egp. Their name has been variously derived fm. the Egpn. for "wonder-workers" or "bearers of sacred spells," and fm. the Semitic for "a pen." They were in the way of getting greater learning than those around them, and were not slow in using it for their own advantage and credit. Jannes and Jambres (2 Tm. 3.[8]) prob. belonged to this class, as each of their names is compounded with the Egpn. for "scribe." As a rule the working of the charm or spell was understood to depend on the pronouncing of certain formulæ, and to those who acted this part the name of kashshaphīm or mekashshaphīm was given (Ex. 7.[11]; Dt. 18.[10]). The word is connected with praying and liturgical worship, and doubtless to those who were responsible for this we owe the multitude of hymns and spells that have been dug up in Egp. and Bab. It appears that women were admitted into this guild (Ex. 22.[18]). Every relationship to the mysterious was valuable to the sorcerer, and as serpents were worshipped in a great part of the anct. world, and as ability to control them was an indisputable proof of Divine power, there arose guilds of enchanters or menacheshīm (2 K. 17.[17], 21.[6]; Ps. 58.[5]), who were able to render them harmless and obedient. This was chiefly done by the power of music, and prob. also by the use of some hereditarily acquired secret. A similar influence was exercised over scorpions. The observation of the heavens was a frequently sought guide, and various sects of astrologers interpreted its signs. In Isaiah (47.[13]) we read of "observers of the heavens," "star gazers," and "prognosticators fm. the new moons," and this class included the NT. magi (Mw. 2.[1]). They watched the conjunctions and oppositions of the stars, their positions in rising, at the zenith, and when setting, and so cast horoscopes. Bab. esp. was devoted to such, and among the tablets fm. Bab. there is a set of seventy dated B.C. 1600, giving good and bad presages, and the ruling body in the heavens for every day in the yr. Prob. with the astrologers we ought to class the me'onīm (2 K. 21.[6]; Mi. 5.[12]), though the name has been variously interpreted. AV. regards them as "observers of times," auspicious for travel, trade, &c. Some derive the word fm. 'ānan, to cover, and so connect them with "covert or hidden" arts, or, to cloud over; and so make them soothsayers who predicted times fm. observation of the clouds; while others again connect it with the eye, 'ain, so that they become "fascinators with the eye," or have a connection with the "evil eye" in wh. there was a universal belief in these days (Dt. 15.[9]; Mw. 20.[15]). LXX is inclined to regard them as "observers of words," and that this was also a means of D. we can see in Gn. 24.[11]; 1 S. 14.[9-10]; 1 K. 20.[33].

Observations of various other kinds were made to obtain guidance in action. In Ezekiel (21.[21]) we have an example of belomancy, or D. with arrows.* Jerome explains this as the drawing of an arrow fm. a quiverful, each of wh. had the name of a city written upon it. Not unlike this was rabdomancy, or D. by rods (Ho. 4.[12]). It was an appeal to Allat, who was the "lady of the rod," and in practice short pieces of stick with the bark on the one side, and bare on the other, were used. They were thrown in the same way as dice, and the turning up of the white side was considered a good omen. In much the same manner the Arab to-day writes upon sticks "God bids," and "God forbids," and draws. We have also D. by cups (Gn. 44.[5]), a system still in use amongst the Arabs. The "initiated," by means of the radiation of the light on the water in the cup, is enabled to see in it, and to describe the actual scene regarding wh. kge. is sought. In sacrifices too the liver was examined (Ek. 21.[21]; Heb.), and success or failure determined accdg. to its healthy or unhealthy condition. The consultation of oracles (2 K. 1.[2]; Is. 41.[21-24], 44.[7]) and teraphīm (1 S. 15.[23]; Ek. 21.[21]; Zc. 10.[2]) may have been carried through in any or all of these ways. Dreams also were sought (1 S. 28.[6]), and their interpretation was a subject of systematic study (Dt. 13.[2-3]; Jg. 7.[13]).

Very much akin to the consultation of the spts. of nature or of minor deities, but still very different, was the conjuring of the spts. of the dead or necromancy, commonly designated the "having of familiar spts." The Heb. word, 'obh, originally meant a skin bottle (Jb. 32.[19]), wh. cd. be inflated by the wind. It was transferred to such magicians as were supposed to be controlled by some "sptl. afflatus" (Lv. 20.[6]), and thence to the spts. themselves, whose presence was the supposed cause of inspiration. In OT. we are told that they "chirped and muttered" (Is. 8.[19]), and in NT. they are named "spts. of Python" (Ac. 16.[16]), fm. wh. we understand that they spoke with a deep or suppressed voice, and so we may infer that a good deal of their power depended on ventriloquism. The "Witch of Endor" is named "the mistress of a spt. by wh. the dead are conjured" (1 S. 28.[7]), and her case is the only one in OT. in wh. we see anything of the art in operation.

The NT. shows us that this superstition still existed among the Jewish people in the time of Christ (Lk. 11.[19]); and elsewhere in the Rm. world, in view of the prevailing scepticism toward the Greco-Roman pantheon, it was natural that light shd. be sought where it professed to shine. Simon Magus (Ac. 8.[9-11]) was thus enabled to carry on a lucrative trade; so was Elymas the sorcerer (Ac. 13.[6-8]), and other Jews (Ac. 19.[13]). To the extent of the practice we have ample testimony in the statement of the value of the bks. of D. belonging to one community (Ac. 19.[19]).

The amount of reality behind the pretensions of the magician has been variously estimated. The synagogue and the early Church regarded such powers as real and attributed them to infernal or satanic agency, and advocates of this view have in modern times brought forward as proof of it the confessions of converted Esquimaux and Indians, who declared that they had acted under the control of a supernatural power with wh. they lost contact on conversion. A contrary view is that it is altogether trickery and fraud on the one hand, and superstition and excessive credulity on the other. To us it seems, however, that while in the main issue—revelation fm. the unseen world—all is fraud and imposture, the sorcerer did use and manifest powers with wh. the people were unacquainted. We have mentioned ventriloquism, and we receive confirmation of its use fm. stories of speaking statues, while there was doubtless also a kge. of mesmerism, telepathy, and allied forces, wh. science is once again revealing, and wh., but for the spread of education, wd. be as incomprehensible now as in former days.

Considering the part played by these agencies in the Semitic world, the manner of their treatment by the Bible is remarkable. Never once are they treated as powers that have in them any reality that is to be feared. In this it stands in striking contrast to all other holy books. The hymns of Bab. and Egp. are all prayers agst. magical powers. The Kor'ān treats charms and incantations as having power to produce evil consequences; while the books of rabbinical Judaism are saturated with this superstition. They teach that hurtful demons may be seen; that life, children, wealth, and wisdom depend on the stars; that change of name may alter one's fate (Gn. 17.[5-6]); that amulets are efficacious agst. scorpions and serpent bites, agst. bleeding at the nose, and a mad dog. Yet in the whole Bible there is not a single prayer for protection agst. the powers of sorcery. So far as life and action are concerned, its teaching is that the results of these things are illusive. When we study the most tangible of all examples—that at Endor—we see this. The witch at the best manifestly depended on skilled acting, and Saul was expected to see nothing with his own eyes. Something unusual, however, did occur—unusual even to the woman—for that the raising of Samuel was something of a kind she had never before accomplished, we can see by her consternation, wh. was even greater than that of Saul (1 S. 28.[12]). Her power came far short of that night's results. But though to the authors of the Bible the pretensions of sorcery are baseless, they unhesitatingly condemn its practices (Ex. 22.[18]; Is. 65.[4]; Ek. 13.[7]; Gal. 5.[20]; Rv. 9.[21]); and prophet and king in Isr. were expected to stamp it out. In Egp. equally hard things were said about it, as e.g. that it was "a villainy worthy of death"; but there the offence was agst. Pharaoh and the interests of the privileged class. In Isr. the offence was agst. God. Witchcraft was rebellion (1 S. 15.[23]) as being an appeal to a supposed power alien to God, a false system of ascertaining the Divine counsels, an abandonment of the true oracle wh. was open to faithful Isr. (Jg. 1.[1f.]; 2 S. 2.[1]; Ps. 28.[2]) but closed to the unfaithful (1 S. 28.[6]). It was allied to idolatry, and consequently death was the penalty on all who professed the use of sorcery. Such men were not only the most shameless and unscrupulous of impostors and deceivers, but for their own material interests they were antagonistic to all truth, and besides, the crimes that were perpetrated in all lands on account of their teaching and influence justified the extreme penalty.

DIZAHAB (Dt. 1.[1]). Burckhardt (Syria, 1822) and others have suggested Mina edh-Dhahab, between Ras Muhammad and 'Aqaba: but cert. identn. is imposs.

DODANIM (Gn. 10.[4]), s. of Javan. Instead of D. the Sam. and the LXX read Rodanim and Rodioi respectively; although the change is easy in the square character, it is not so in the Sam., but is easiest of all in the "angular script." wh. preceded it. The reading of the LXX is preferable on diplomatic grounds. The Rhodians, moreover, as great traders, wd. early be known in Pal.

DODO. (1) Fr. of Eleazar, one of David's "mighty men" (2 S. 23.[9]). (2) Fr. of Elhanan, another of David's worthies (2 S. 23.[24]). (3) Fr. of Tola, the judge who succeeded Abimelech (Jg. 10.[1]).

The first of these ought to be read "DODAI"; so LXX and Jos.

DOEG (1 S. 21.[7], 22.[9ff.]), an Edomite, chief of Saul's herdsmen—Grätz reads haratzīm, "runners," for haro'īm, "herdsmen"—who told Saul of David's kindly entertainment by the priests at Nob; and finally, when the guards shrank fm. the sacrilegious crime, executed Saul's impious order, slaughtering the priests and all connected with them.

DOG. The neighbours of Isr. on the SW. and NE., the Egpns. and Asyrns., made use of the D. in hunting. Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 9) assumes that the D. was employed in Isr. fm. early times, both in hunting and in guarding the sheep. The only notice of this in Scrip. is in Jb. 30.[1]. The gen. attitude of the Jew to the D. was one of contempt (Ex. 22.[31]; Dt. 23.[18]; Ec. 9.[4]). They, however, performed a function of the greatest value, as they do to this day in Eastern cities, devouring refuse thrown into the streets, wh., but for their scavenging, mt. breed a pestilence (2 K. 9.[10, 36]). The three breeds of D. in Pal. to-day are the Kurdish, shaped like the collie, but with reddish hair; a larger D. resembling the mastiff; and the street, or pariah D., smaller than either. The howling of these last, in the streets after nightfall, is often dismal in the extreme (Ps. 59.[6, 14]).

Children in the East often make pets of the little dogs, even taking them into the houses of their parents, so that they may well eat of the crumbs falling fm. the table (Mk. 7.[27f.], where the Gr. word is kunaria, "little dogs"). Soon, however, they outgrow this kindness, and must resume their life on the streets.

DOR, a city founded by the Phœnicians (Jos. Vit. 8; Contra Ap. ii. 10), conquered by Joshua (11.[2], 12.[23]), assigned to Manasseh in the territory of Issachar (17.[11], Ant. V. i. 22, the W. boundary of Manasseh). The city is distinguished fm. the nāphōth, "heights" of D. (Jo. 11.[2], 12.[23]). These were prob. the W. and SW. slopes of Carmel, D. being represented by the ruin Ṭanṭūrā, on the adjoining coast. The inhabitants held out agst. Manasseh (17.[11]), but were tributary to Solomon (1 K. 4.[11]). The town played some part in later Jewish hist. (Ant. XIII. vii. 1f.; xii. 2; XIV. iv. 4; XIX. vi. 3).

DORCAS is the LXX equivalent of Heb. Tzĕbī, Aram. Tabītha, "a roe" or "gazelle" (Dt. 12.[15], &c.). It occurs as a personal name (Ac. 9.). D. was evidently a woman of means, who added value to the gifts of her charity by personal labour. Her raising fm. the dead was an illustration of the miraculous power granted to Peter. Her memory and influence are perpetuated in the Christian Church by numerous "Dorcas" societies. Locally her name is commemorated by an institution in Jaffa, called by her Aram. name, the "Tabitha School," for the education and care of poor girls.

DOTHAN (Gn. 37.[17]; 2 K. 6.[13]). About five miles SW. of Jenīn, on the side of an anct. highway fm. Esdraelon to the coast, lies the mod. Tell Dōthān, a considerable mound with ruins, cisterns, and a spring. The plain and neighbouring slopes furnish excellent pasture. This is prob. the scene of Joseph's sale, and of Elisha's marvellous preservation fm. the Syr.

DOVE. The D. is one of the most plentiful wild birds of Pal. There are several species, all known to the Arb. as Ḥamām. Wādy Ḥamām, "valley of doves," is a common name, where, in the caves, doves are specially numerous (Jr. 48.[28]). It appears early in Scrip. (Gn. 8.[8]), and is the only bird specified for sacrifice (Lv. 14.[21]). It is used as a term of endearment (SS. 2.[12]); and as a type of harmlessness (Mw. 10.[16]); but also of silliness (Ho. 7.[11]). Its powers of long flight were well known (Ps. 55.[6]; Ho. 11.[11]). Tame doves are taught to fly into the air at a given signal, and after circling there, to alight upon their master's head, shoulder, or hand. This may have suggd. to the Evangelists the beautiful comparison of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Jesus' head to that of a D. (Jn. 1.[32], &c.).

What was meant by Doves' dung it is impossible now to say (2 K. 6.[25]). Prob. it denoted some kind of seed. There is no known instance of lit. Doves' dung being eaten, even in famine.

DOWRY. See MARRIAGE.

DRAGON is the Eng. equivalent in AV. of several Heb. words and one Gr. (1) Tannīm, fem. tannōth, pl. of tan (Is. 13.[22], &c.), the name of an animal that howls in waste places. RV. trs. "jackals." More prob. "wolves" are intended. (2) Tannīm, in Ek. 29.[3], 32.[2], is perhaps a mistake for tannīn, as evidently the Egpn. crocodile is meant. (3) Tannīn, pl. tannīnīm (Gn. 1.[21], AV. "whales," RV. "sea-monsters"; Is. 27.[1], &c.). While genly. it seems to denote some monster of the deep, it is also used of serpents (Ex. 7.[9], &c.). (4) Gr. Drakōn, the monstrosity of Rv. 12.[3], &c., shaped like a serpent (20.[2]), is prob. a development from the serpent of Gn. 3.[1], &c.

DREAMS. Accdg. to the view clearly assumed throughout Scrip., that no region or condition of human consciousness is beyond the influence of the Spirit of God, the Hebs. believed that intimations of the Divine will mt. come to men in dreams (Gn. 20.[3], 28.[12]; Mw. 1.[20], &c.). Certain dreamers are indeed condemned, not, however, because of their dreams, but because they are false prophets (Dt. 13.[2ff.]; Jr. 23.[25ff.]). It is consonant with the Scripl. conception of the dignity of man, that greater importance is attached to the conscious operation of the human faculties. It is almost exclusively in the earlier times that Ds. are used as the medium of revelation (Gn. 15.[1], &c.). In NT. they are used only to give direction in circumstances of difficulty or peril (Mw. 2.[13]; Ac. 18.[9], &c.). While the "interpretation of Ds. belongs to God," the bulk of the Ds. recorded in OT. were granted to men beyond the pale of Isr., e.g. to Abimelech (Gn. 20.[3]), to Laban (31.[24]), to the chief butler and baker (40.[5]), to Pharaoh (41.[1ff.]), to the Midianites (Jg. 7.[13]), and to Nebuchadnezzar (Dn. 2.[1]); and in NT. to the Magi (Mw. 2.[12]), and to Pilate's w. (27.[19]). The experience recorded of Jacob at Bethel, and of Solomon at Gibeon (Gn. 28.[11ff.], cp. Ho. 12.[4]; 1 K. 3.[5ff.]), may indicate an expectation, that to one sleeping in his sanctuary special revelations mt. be made by the deity. While Ds. are recognised as a means for Divine communication with men, we have also a rational suggn. of their cause: "a D. cometh through the multitude of business" (Ec. 5.[3]). To this day much importance is attached to Ds. in the E. Mohammed is reported to have given rules for behaviour after good and bad Ds. He declares that the truest dream is the one you have about daybreak (Mishkāt, XXI. c. 4).

DRESS. (1) Material.—The first record of the use of clothing tells us it was made of the skins of animals (Gn. 3.[21]), and till the present day such has remained common among the poorer classes. In Syr. we see the fellaḥīn with sleeved jackets made of skins, the hair or wool being on the inner side. Weaving was early introduced. The use of tents (Gn. 4.[20]) implies this, and the most convenient material was hair-cloth, of wh. there is also early mention (Ex. 26.[7], 35.[6]). As used by the Arabs to-day it is mostly of black goats' hair, waterproof, and almost indestructible. The sack-cloth of wh. we read so often (Is. 20.[2], &c.) was of this coarse, black material. A finer brown cloth was made of camels' hair, and it seems that the ordinary mantle of the prophet—the addereth—was of this (2 K. 1.[8]; Zc. 13.[4]; Mw. 3.[4]). Wool was also used fm. early times, and flocks of sheep were kept by the patriarchs for its production (Gn. 38.[12]). It was woven into cloth and made into garments (Lv. 13.[47]; Dt. 22.[11]). Linen and cotton were known in Egp., and were used by the Isrs. fm. the time of the Exodus (1 Ch. 4.[21]; Ex. 28.[4ff.]). Mixtures of flax and wool, shatnez, were forbidden (Dt. 22.[11]). The introduction of silk was late (Rv. 18.[12]).

(2) Colour.—Egpn. taste, as we know from the monuments, was toward simplicity in colouring, and the garments of that country are mostly white. The Cans., on the contrary, were fond of brilliant colours and gaudy combinations. Long before the Exodus we find Semites, represented on 12th dyn. monuments at Thebes, clad in patchwork of various colours, and amongst them a Syrn. ambassador clad in alternate stripes of blue and red. The Hebs., by the way they speak of purple, scarlet, violet, and blue, show us that, like the Cans., they mostly appreciated what was gorgeous and brilliant. The art of dyeing was known to the patriarchs (Gn. 38.[28]), and cloth was woven of coloured (Ex. 35.[25]) and even of gold (Ex. 28.[6]) threads. Embroidery was greatly prized (Jg. 5.[30]), and, as used by persons of rank, was of gold (Ps. 45.[13]). It was a special product of Tyre (Ek. 16.[13]), but neighbouring peoples also knew the art. Purple (Pr. 31.[22]; Lk. 16.[19]) and scarlet (2 S. 1.[24]) were worn by people of wealth, but in the use of these the adjoining peoples seem to have been more lavish than the Isrs. (Ek. 23.[6], 27.[7]; Est. 8.[15]). Gorgeous garments of foreign manufacture were among the imports to Pal. (Jo. 7.[21]; Zp. 1.[8]). The poor had to be content with clothing of more sober appearance. Indigo is used at Magdala to-day, and that town was famous for its dyeworks in our Lord's days. Fm. this and several Talmudic references we shd. judge that the blue and white striped cloth of mod. Galilee was very common in the first cent.

(3) Articles.—The clothing of the Hebs. differed very little in form fm. that of the Beduin and fellaḥīn of to-day, and can best be understood fm. a study of theirs. The kŭttōneth (Gr. chitōn) or coat was the inner garment, and it corrsps. to the thaub of the Arab. It is commonly made of cotton stuff, by folding the length of the material in two, sewing it down the sides, and leaving openings for the head and for attaching the sleeves wh. sometimes reach the knee; though on pictures of Jewish prisoners on Asyr. monuments it has very short sleeves. Sometimes the opening at the neck and the front of the skirt are ornamented with coloured needlework. By a cord or a girdle of leather or linen the thaub is bound round the waist. A very fine dress of this kind was the kŭttōneth paṣṣīm, wh. reached the wrists and the ankles. It was the dress of princesses (2 S. 13.[18ff.]), and was the coat wh. Joseph's brethren envied him; as it meant that to him, as the eldest son of Rachel the beloved wife, had been given the right and badge of primogeniture. It is doubtful if the tr. "of many colours" is correct. Even if it were, the meaning wd. be the same. It has always been the custom of the sheikh, in virtue of his rank, to wear a garment of many coloured stripes. The simlāh (Gr. himation) or cloak was worn above the kŭttōneth, but of its form we have no evidence fm. the OT. In its uses it corrsps. to the Arb. 'abâyeh. This is made of coarse, almost untearable woollen cloth, often of brown and white stripes. It is made by sewing together two pieces of the material three cubits (27 in.) long and one cubit wide, doubling over each end about 18 in. and sewing along the top. Openings are then made to allow the arms to pass through, and the hems are all overedged, while the neck and front are sometimes ornamented with needlework. The strength and the form made it a useful article for carrying all sorts of things (Ex. 12.[34]; Jg. 8.[25]; 1 S. 21.[9]). It was a protection by day agst. rain and heat, and by night agst. the cold as a bedcover, for wh. reason it was not allowed to be kept as a pledge after sunset (Ex. 22.[26]; Dt. 24.[12ff.]). The most primitive form of head-dress known among the Arabs is a single cord to bind the hair. The Syrian ambassador on the Egpn. monument appears thus, so it is not unlikely this was also an early Heb. custom (cp. 1 K. 20.[31]). But as it formed no protection, the adoption of the kaffîyeh was natl. It is made of a square of cloth folded corner-wise, and, laid on the head over a small felt or knitted skullcap, is bound to the head by the cord or 'agâl. One of its corners thus protects the neck, while the other two are drawn round under the chin and thrown over the shoulders. On the feet sandals were worn. The na'al consisted of a sole of wood or leather attached to the foot by thongs or straps—the sĕrōkh of Gn. 14.[23]; Is. 5.[27]. Even the very poor possessed them (Am. 2.[6], 8.[6]), and, as a token of respect, they were removed on entering a house or sanctuary (Ex. 3.[5], 12.[11]). These articles form the costume of the nomad to-day, and there is no reason for believing the Isr. dressed otherwise before the conquest of Can.

With settled life, however, changes had to come. The simlāh wd. be felt to be a bulky and inconvenient costume for the home, and so among the peasantry its proportions were reduced to the size and form of a jacket, reaching almost to the knees, and having sleeves half-way down to the elbows. Among the upper classes the simlāh retained its place as the outdoor cloak; but they introduced another article of D.—the mĕ'īl, mantle—wh. was worn over the kŭttōneth, and wh. corrsps. to the Ghumbāz as now worn in Pal. It is of much finer cloth than the simlāh and difft. in shape; resembling a closely fitting dressing-gown. When it is worn, the thaub or kŭttōneth consists of plain cotton or linen, and is designated the qamīs.

The mĕ'īl is mentioned in the OT. as worn by ks. (1 S. 24.[4]), prophets (1 S. 28.[14]), chiefs (Jb. 1.[20]), and young men (1 S. 2.[19]). Round the waist above the mĕ'īl, the girdle, hagōr, was now worn. It sometimes consists of a linen or cotton shawl folded up and wound around the body, but oftener it is a strong woven band not unlike a saddle girth and ending with an ornamental fringe or tassel. It allows the upper part of the mĕ'īl to be used as a pocket; the writer's outfit is carried between it and the body, and a fold within it forms a very safe purse (cp. Mw. 10.[9], zōnē). The head-dress also suffered change. The kaffîyeh was folded in a long strip and wound round the felt cap forming a tzanīph (Is. 3.[23], 62.[3]), Arab. laffêh, or turban, and the cord was laid aside. Fm. the Jrs. Tlm. we learn that all turbans were white. Further change does not seem to have taken place in the clothing of the men except in the adorning of these articles, and in the imitating the magnificence of foreigners. In references to the further East, however, we find the names of other garments worn there by Isrs., and they deserve attention. The sarbālīn, "hosen" (Dn. 3.[21]), are also mentioned by Herodotus (i. 195), and are without doubt the sirwāl of mod. Syr. These are loose trousers made of a sack of cloth and having openings at the lower corners for the feet to pass through. They are gathered round the waist by a draw-cord. The pattīsh, worn with the sarbālīn, must have been the short jacket or vest that is worn with the sirwāl. The karbĕlā is explained by the Asyr. karballatu, as a head-dress, hat, or helmet. The takhrīkh (Est. 8.[15]) seems to be a general term for the inner garments of fine linen. Other words of general import are met in the OT. wh. have sometimes been mistaken for the names of particular garments. Beged seems to be of this nat. It is used equally for gorgeous (1 K. 22.[10]) and for filthy clothing (Is. 64.[6]). It even includes the girdle and the turban (Ex. 28.[4]). Kĕsūth is used when covering or protection is mainly thought of (Ex. 22.[26]; Jb. 26.[6], 31.[19]); lĕbūsh, wh. is chiefly poetical, is used in prose of the warrior's cloak (2 S. 20.[8]) and the priest's vestments (2 K. 10.[22]). Sadīn, wh. means linen, seems to have been the same as the kŭttoneth (Jg. 14.[12]; Is. 3.[23]), and was prob. just another designation for that garment (cp. Mk. 14.[51]). The simlāh, though meaning particularly the cloak, is also used occasionally for clothing generally (Gn. 35.[2]; Ex. 3.[22]; Dt. 10.[18]), as is also its Gr. equivalent himation, in the NT. Other NT. articles are the chlamys, the military cloak introduced by the Rm. Emperors and worn by the soldiery (Mw. 27.[28]), and the Rm. pænula (Gr. phailonēs), a long travelling cloak (2 Tm. 4.[13]), with only one opening for the head, and a hood to protect agst. the weather.

The priests in connection with their official duties wore a particular adaptation of the ordinary

D. It consisted of short drawers (mikhnāṣayīm), extending fm. the waist to the upper thighs, and a kŭttōneth, reaching to the feet, both of white linen. The girdle (abnēṭ) was woven with coloured flowers. The turban (migbā'āh) was goblet-shaped. The High Priest's clothing was much adorned with embroidered work and colours, and he wore, above a gorgeous mĕ'īl, the ephod and breastplate. His turban (mitznepheth) was difft. in form fm. that of the common priests. Heb. women wore the kŭttōneth, the simlāh, and the tzaniph (SS. 5.3; Ru. 3.3; Is. 3.23), just as the men did, but there was some diff., and one was forbidden to wear the garments of the other sex (Dt. 22.5). When the mĕ'īl was introduced the same diffc. may have existed as we find to-day. That of the men is open down the front, but the woman's ghumbāz is sewed fm. the breast downward. The distinguishing feature, however, of the woman's D. was the veil. In the days of the ks. the Heb. woman was greatly given to luxury in D., and many new names of articles of adornment are met with. The contents of a lady's wardrobe may be seen in Is. 3.18-24. Much disputation has taken place over the various articles of D. and jewellery, but on the whole RV. may be trusted.

Stores of clothing were a characteristic of wealth (Jb. 27.16; Mw. 6.19; Js. 5.2), and the presentation of robes was a way of showing honour (Gn. 45.22; 2 K. 5.5). The giving of the best robe meant special distinction (Lk. 15.22). When given in token of office, investiture was also implied (Gn. 41.42; Is. 22.21; Est. 8.15), and the taking of them away meant dismissal (2 M. 4.38).

The simlāh was natly. thrown off (Mk. 10.50; Jn. 13.4; Ac. 7.58) or left in the house close by (Mw. 24.18), when active work was to be done. For the purposes of running the mê'īl was girded, i.e. the ends were drawn up and within the girdle (1 K. 18.46; 2 K. 4.29, 9.1). Grief and indignation were shown by rending the garments (Jb. 1.20; Mw. 26.65), renunciation by shaking them (Ne. 5.13; Ac. 18.6), loyalty and joyful submission by spreading them cut before another (2 K. 9.13), and reverent awe and sorrow by wrapping them round the head (2 S. 15.30; 1 K. 19.13). One dressed in the kŭttōneth alone was said to be naked (Is. 20.2).

We can now understand the division of our Lord's clothing among the quaternion of soldiers at the cross. The five parts, four of wh. the soldiers took without dispute, were the sandals, the head-D., the kŭttōneth, the mĕ'īl, and the simlāh. There still remains a doubt over wh. part the lots were cast. John names it chitōn, but although that was originally the kŭttōneth, it seems to us that when the word came back to Pal. in Greek it meant another garment wh., judging fm. its contrast with the himation (Mw. 5.40), we shd. infer to be the mĕ'īl.

DRINK. See Food.

DRINK, STRONG. See Drunkenness.

DROMEDARY, a light, swift, riding camel (Heb. bēker, rekesh, 1 K. 4.28; Jr. 2.23, &c.), bearing the same relation to the carrying camel as the riding horse to the dray horse.

DROPSY. See Diseases.

DROSS, the impurities extracted in the process of refining metals, esp. silver (Is. 1.25; Pr. 25.4). It is used figly. for the wicked and degraded (Ps. 119.119; Ek. 22.19, &c.).

DROUGHT represents various Heb. words, all referring to the effects produced by heat in the absence of rain. All vegetation in Pal. is dependent on the rainfall. When it is exceptionally late or scanty, the crops are light; when it fails, the earth is baked hard in the fierce heat, and famine stares the husbandman in the face. In the late summer all but the more important streams are dried up, and then the traveller may often know what is meant by "the D. of summer" (Ps. 32.4).

DRUNKENNESS is the condition resulting fm. excessive indulgence in Strong Drink. Of the words used in OT. the most important is shākar, "to be drunken," fm. wh. we have the noun shēkār, "strong," i.e. "intoxicating liquor." The NT. word is methuō, "to be softened" or "soaked with drink." For the various kinds of drink, see Food. We need not specify the mental and physical effects of D. noted in Scrip. These are the same everywhere. We only observe that while these were fully understood, and their debasing influence appreciated, so that D. is condemned in the most emphatic manner (Is. 28.1; 1 Cor. 6.10, &c.), there is no general prohibition of the use of intoxicants. On the other hand their moderate and medicinal use seems to be commended (Ps. 104.15; 1 Tm. 3.8, 5.23). Abstinence, however, was imposed upon the priest in view of his service in the sanctuary (Lv. 10.9), and upon the Nazirite during the period of his vow (Nu. 6.3, &c.); fm. wh. it may be inferred that higher efficiency of mind and body was thus secured. It must be remembered also, that in anct. times, not many cd. afford to drink intoxicants. The cheap processes by wh. alcoholic liquors are now produced, bringing them within reach of the poorest, have introduced a new phase of the problem. The personal practice of the Christian must be determined in accdce. with the principle stated by Paul (1 Cor. 8.13). See Wine.

DRUSILLA, third and youngest dr. of Agrippa I. She married, A.D. 53, Aziz, k. of Emesa, who consented to be circumcised, Epiphanes, s. of Autiachus, k. of Commagene, to whom she had been betrothed, having resigned her rather than submit to this rite. Felix, attracted by her great beauty, employed one Simon—poss. Magus—a professed magician, who persuaded her to leave Aziz; whereupon she was married to Felix, to whom she bore a s. When she accompanied Felix to the court where Paul was on trial, she was only 18. Nothing further is known of her hist. (Ant. XIX. ix. 1; XX. vii. 2; Ac. 24.24).

DULCIMER (Dn. 3.5, 10, 15), tr. of Heb. [kthīb] sumponiya, v. 10 siponiya; Psh. tziphoniya; RV. "bagpipe."

It seems as if this were a loan word fm. the Greek; certainly there is a Gr. word almost identical with this wh. means "concert," "harmony." Its place in the text is doubtful; it is omitted fm. the list in v. 7, in the kthb in v. 10 its place is taken by siponia, another word altogether; it only appears once in Thd. If it is in the text the form of the word has to be considered. The word tziphoniya in the Psh. cd. not have been derived fm. sumponiya; it is more akin siponiya; though even in regard to the latter, it wd. more naturally be derived fm. tziphoniya than vice versa. There is a Gr. word siphonia wh., however, has no musical meaning. If it means anything it is "a little fire-engine." When the Gr. word sumphonia occurs in the NT., as it does in Lk. 15.[25], Psh. does not render tziphoniya, but zemōra, "singing," showing that the Gr. sumphonia was not regarded as meaning the same as the Aramaic word wh. is so like it. It cd. be no objection to the first consonant, for σύμβολα is transferred (Ws. 2.[9]). Further, the Gr. word does not mean "a musical instrument," but a concert of singers (Polyb. xxvi. 10.; Plato, Sym. 187). It appears to be a case of verbal assimilation.

DUMAH. (1) A city in the mountain of Judah (Jo. 15.[52]), prob. = Dōmeh, a considerable ruin, with rock tombs, cisterns, &c., about 13 miles SE. of Beit Jibrin. (2) A s. of Ishmael (Gn. 25.[14]; 1 Ch. 1.[30]), prob. representing a locality in Arabia. The most likely identn. is with Dammat el-Jandal, now known as el-Jauf (see Doughty, Arabia Deserta, by index). Some have thought that the oracle, Is. 21.[11], refers to this D. Poss. Idumea (LXX) may be intended.

DUNG. In the absence of wood, the D. of camels and other animals is often used as fuel. Cows' D. mingled with straw, and plastered on the rough walls to dry for fuel, is a common sight in the E. For regulations as to cleanliness, see Dt. 23.[10ff.]; Ex. 29.[14]; Lv. 4.[11f.]; Nu. 19.[5]. For the use of D. as expressing contempt, see 2 K. 9.[37]; Jr. 9.[22]; Zp. 1.[17]; Ml. 2.[3]; Php. 3.[8], &c.

DUNGEON. See PRISON.

DUNG GATE. See JERUSALEM.

DURA, the plain, or district, near Bab., where Nebuchadnezzar set up the golden image (Dn. 3.[1]). The name is poss. related to the Bab. dūra, "a wall." The most prob. site appears to be that suggd. by Oppert (Expéd. en Mesop. i. 238), to the SE. of Bab., where, near a mound called "Dúair," he found the base of a great statue.

DUST is a very common cause of discomfort in Pal. The limestone rock is easily worn, and in the drought and heat of summer the fine D. is very searching; esp. does it fret the feet of the traveller. This makes washing peculiarly refreshing. For the Jews, the D. of heathen countries was unclean. Figly. anything that stuck to one was called D.; e.g. "the dust of an evil tongue" (LTJ. i. 644). To shake the D. off feet or garments indicates entire separation.

DWARF (Heb. daq., "thin," "shrunk," "withered"). The term indicated some physical defect, on account of wh. a priest mt. not "approach to offer the bread of his God" (Lv. 21.[20]). Many renderings have been suggd., "blear-eyed" (Vlg.), "short-sighted," "freckled" (LXX, ephēlos), &c. The lit. meaning, "withered," mt. suit as well as any.

DYEING. Although the process of D. is never mentioned in Scrip., yet the result is referred to (Ex. 25.[5]; Is. 63.[1]; Ek. 23.[15]). It was practised in Egp. and prob. in Asyr. In Classical antiquity Phœnicia was regarded as the centre of this industry. This is confirmed by huge mounds of fragments of the shells of the murex beside TYRE and SIDON; but although there are frequent refcs. to the cities of Phœnicia in Scrip., there is no notice of D. in connection with them. See COLOURS, DRESS, HANDICRAFTS.

E

EAGLE (Heb. nesher, Gr. aetos). Like the Arb. nisr, the Heb. term denotes several birds of prey. Prob. the griffon vulture is most frequently intended. It has no true feathers on head and neck; hence the phrase, "enlarge thy baldness as the E." (Mi. 1.[16]). This bird abounds in Pal., making its nest in the lofty cliffs that overhang the valleys (Jr. 49.[16]). It is noted for the telescopic range of its eyesight (Jb. 39.[29]). It spies the fallen animal from immense distances, and its flight seems to be watched by many other birds that follow to feast upon the carrion (Mw. 24.[28]). It attracted the eye of the prophet as it soared in graceful circles far into the sunny sky (Is. 40.[31]). Its speed on the wing is often referred to (Dt. 28.[49]; Jr. 4.[13], &c.), and in Ek. 17. it is the symbol of power. There is an allusion in Ps. 103.[5] to the ancient belief that, by some means, the eagle was able to renew its youth. In the Middle Ages it was believed that every ten yrs. the E. beat its way upward high into the sun, whence, plunging into the sea, its old feathers were shed, and, new plumage appearing, it rejoiced again in the strength of youth. There is, of course, no ground for this superstition.

There are also found in Pal. the Lammergeier (ossifrage), the greater spotted eagle, the tawny eagle, the golden eagle, the imperial eagle, and the short-toed eagle. This last feeds entirely on reptiles, lizards, snakes, &c., and migrates in the season when snakes hibernate.

EAR, the organ of hearing, associated in Heb., as in many langs., with the idea of obedience. To "incline the E." is to give attention, "to hearken" is often = to obey. The tip of the priest's E. was touched with blood at his consecration (Lv. 8.[23f.]), also that of the cleansed leper (14.[14], &c.). An awl put through a slave's E. into the door-post signified for him perpetual servitude (Ex. 21.[6]). Ear-rings have always been a favourite female ornament in the East (Gn. 24.[22], AV.; Ex. 32.[2], &c.). They form part of every young bride's outfit, and are frequently valued as amulets. They are seldom now worn by men (Jg. 8.[24]).

EAR-RINGS

EARNEST (2 Cor. 1.[22], 5.[5]; Eph. 1.[14]), Gr. arrabōn, mod. Arb. ra'bōn. This is some part of the price, or wage for service, agreed upon, given when the bargain is made, as a pledge of mutual obligation to fulfil the terms. What the Christian enjoys here of God's goodness is a foretaste, or E., of his inheritance.

EARTH stands in EV. for several Heb. and Gr. words. (1) 'Adāmāh, the soil worked by the husbandman (Gn. 2.[5]), used also for land or country (Gn. 47.[19]; Is. 19.[17]; Zc. 2.[12]), and for the whole earth (Gn. 12.[3], 28.[14]). (2) 'Eretz, earth as opposed to heaven (Gn. 1.[1]), as opposed to the sea (1.[20]). This is the usual word for country (19.[28], &c.), but it occurs also for the whole earth (Gn. 18.[18], &c.). (3) In 1 S. 2.[8], &c., tēbēl is a synonym for 'eretz. Like 'eretz (Gn. 1.[28], &c.) it may denote the whole inhabited earth, and so is prop. equivalent to the Gr. oikoumenē (Mw. 24.[14], &c.; cp. Lk. 21.[26]). This meaning also attaches to Gr. gē (Mw. 5.[5]; Rm. 9.[17], &c.). It is used as equivalent to adāmāh (Mw. 13.[5], &c.), and to 'eretz (Mw. 24.[35], &c.).

EARTHQUAKE. Although in recent geologic times there have been no active volcanoes in Pal., earthquakes often occur, and are sometimes of great severity. On the 1st of Jan. 1837, the city of Safed in Galilee was reduced to a heap of ruins by an E. That only the more remarkable earthquakes are recorded, two only being mentioned in the historical bks. (1 S. 14.[15]; 1 K. 19.[11]), may be due to the very frequency of the phenomenon. The giving of the law on Sinai was accompanied by an E. (Ex. 19.[18]). Korah and his company perished by means of an E., when the ground opened and swallowed them up (Nu. 16.[31f.]; Ant. IV. iii. 3). The E. in the reign of Uzziah must have been terrible (Am. 1.[1]; Zc. 14.[5]). Josephus tells of an E. in the reign of Herod wh. wrought great and widespread destruction (Ant. XV. v. 2). Matthew reports an E. at the time of the Crucifixion in Jrs. (27.[51]). An E. signalised the deliverance of Paul and Silas fm. bonds in the jail at Philippi. The E. is prominent among the causes of calamity spoken of in the latter days (Mw. 24.[7], &c.), and fm. the terror it inspires it natly. plays a large part in the visions of the Apocalypse (Rv. 6.[12], &c.).

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE (Jg. 6.[3], &c.), denotes genly. the peoples dwelling to the E. of Pal., esp. the nomads in the Syr. desert and Arabia.

EAST SEA, EASTERN SEA. See SEAS.

EASTER (Ac. 12.[4], AV.) = PASSOVER.

EBAL. (1) (1 Ch. 1.[22]), or Obal (Gn. 10.[28]), s. of Joktan, prob. representing some S. Arabian people or district. (2) (Gn. 36.[23]; 1 Ch. 1.[40]), s. of Shobal.

EBAL. The twin summits in central Pal., seen on all sides fm. afar, Mts. Ebal and Gerizim, rise N. and S. of the deep, narrow vale wh., running E. and W., cuts Mt. Ephraim in two. In the bottom of the vale lies the city of Nāblūs, the anct. Shechem. The slopes of E. on the N. rise through fruitful gardens, shady orchards, and olives to steep, rocky terraces, sprinkled with thorny scrub, over wh. the ascent is painful, to the wide back of the mountain. The highest point is to the W., 3077 ft. above the sea, 1402 ft. above Nāblūs, more than 200 ft. higher than Gerizim. On the summit are the ruins of an anct. fortress, with mighty walls. To the E. is a ruin called Khirbet kanīseh, "church ruin." A Moslem Wely near the top is reputed to cover the skull of John the Baptist. The view ranges fm. Hermon and the S. buttresses of Mt. Lebanon in the N., to Jrs. and the Dead Sea in the S., with Bashan, Gilead, and Moab on the E., and the long line of the seashore to Carmel in the W.

E. appears in the dramatic picture of Jo. 8.[33ff.], when Moses' instructions (Dt. 27.[11ff.]) were carried out. The ark, with priests and Levites, was in the midst, the tribes being divided between the slopes of E. and Gerizim, responding respectively, when the law was read, to the "blessing" and the "cursing." In Dt. 27. the response seems to be required only to the cursing. On the mountain Joshua set up an altar of unhewn stones, on wh. he offered sacrifice (Dt. 27.[6]; Jo. 8.[30]). Upon the stones of this altar (Jo. 8.[32]), or upon "great stones" set up for the purpose and plastered over (Dt. 27.[2]), he wrote a copy of the law. The mountain was thus associated, in the minds of the people, with this revelation of the will of God; and its giant form, dominating all the land, wd. perpetually remind them of their covenant relation to Him.

EAGLE. (See p. 148)

The formation of the Vale of Shechem, at the watershed, with a slight recess in either mountain, makes quite poss. the scene depicted in Jo. 8.[33ff.]

EBED-MELECH, "servant of the k.," an Ethiopian eunuch who secured Jeremiah's release fm. the dungeon of Malchiah (Jr. 38.[6f.], 39.[16]).

EBENEZER, "stone of help." (1) The scene of Isr.'s defeat by the Phil. (1 S. 4.[1]), over agst. Aphek, also unidentd. (cp. Jo. 12.[18], LXX). (2) A stone erected by Samuel to commemorate Isr.'s victory over the Phil., somewhere between Mizpah and Yeshana (1 S. 7.[12], LXX, Syr.), the latter being prob. = 'Ain Sinia, N. of Bethel.

EBER, s. of Salah, gt.-grandson of Shem, fm. whom the Hebs. are named (Gn. 10.[21], &c.). See also 1 Ch. 5.[13], 8.[12, 22]; Ne. 12.[20].

EBONY (Ek. 27.[15]), brought fm. Dedan on the Persian Gulf to Tyre, is the familiar E. of commerce. The tree grows mainly in tropical India and Ceylon.

EBRON, a town in Asher (Jo. 19.[28], AV. wrongly, Hebron). Poss. we shd. read "Ebdon," wh. stands for E. (Jo. 21.[30]; 1 Ch. 6.[74]). It is prob. = 'Abdeh on the N. of the plain of Acre, 3 miles E. of ez-Zīb.

ECCLESIASTES (Heb. qōheleth, Gr. ekklēsiastēs), the fourth of the five Megillōth in the ordinary Heb. Bible. The Gr. title, fm. wh. the Eng. is derived, means "a member of assembly": the Heb. has occasioned more discussion as it only appears in this bk.; it seems to mean the "herald" who summons an assembly. On the whole, Luther's trn., followed by EV., is fairly satisfactory; the purpose of the bk. is hortatory, and the form of the word implies an assembly: the tr. der Prediger, "the Preacher," combines the two ideas.

(1) Scope and Contents.—The literary form is that adopted by Browning in "The Ring and the Book"; a monologue wh. conceals a real dialogue. In matter it is the nar. of a series of speculations and sptl. experiments on the "Highest Good." It is proved that if the individual makes it his aim to attain merely and solely his own personal happiness, whatever the sphere be in wh. he makes his attempt, the result is "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." The epilogue is the necessary conclusion "of the whole matter." "Fear God and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man"—not pleasure but duty is man to make his purpose of life. While this is the scope of the bk., there is no strict logical sequence; such a thing was not to be expected then or there. A general division may, however, be hazarded. There is first a prologue wh. assigns a reason for undertaking the investigation (1.[1-11]). Second, an act. of the first investigation; can wisdom, or pleasure, or both combined, be the Supreme Good? The result is: "Vanity of vanities" (1.[12]–2.[26]). In the third the preacher extends his view; what, after all, can a person effect? There is a fixed cycle of events; generations come and pass; all labour is really resultless; hence it is all "Vanity and vexation of spt." (3.[1]–4.[16]). Before he begins his fourth section the preacher seems to hear some one sugg. that vows and prayers judiciously used will secure much. He does not deny the benefit, but implies that the worshipper has to be so perpetually on his guard lest his worship be the sacrifice of fools, that this will benefit him little. He proceeds to consider knowledge as poss. the "Supreme Good." Its limitations, however, show that it cannot be what is sought for. Men benefit by wisdom but forget him who manifested it; it has little influence (9.[14-18]); any failure makes it appear valueless (10.[1]). Throughout there is, as the chorus of a Gr. tragedy, the sugg. that after all comfort is best; the total neglect of all speculative difficulties, united with a cynical recognition of the valuelessness of it all: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth . . . for childhood and youth are vanity." The solemn epilogue emphasises this last by a highly wrought description of old age and death; then sums up the whole in the declaration that to revere God and obey Him is the supreme end of man. The attitude of the writer is not one of dogmatic doubt, wh. is only an explanation of disbelief; but reverent doubt, rising fm. a ground of profound belief.

(2) Language.—The Heb. of E. is unlike that of any other portion of the OT. No other bk. has so large a proportion of words, phrases, and senses of words peculiar to itself. In its vocabulary, and many of its constructions, it is related to the Mishna. We need only remark on the preference for the short relative, the rare use of the vav conversive, and the avoidance of the sign of the acc. At the same time it must be observed that most of the linguistic peculiarities have analogues in classic Heb.

(3) Date and Authorship.—No one without violence to facts can maintain the Solomonic authorship. The author assumes the name of Solomon as Browning speaks as "Abt Vogler" or "Fra Lippo Lippi." Many of the autobiographical notes are only dramatically so; the background is not at all that of the time of Solomon; there are oppressions of the poor by the rich, wh., if Solomon had known of, he wd. have remedied. He claims to have more wealth "above all that were in Jrs. before him." But David, his fr., was his only predecessor in Jrs.; this makes the word "all" absurd. Without pressing the lateness of the language, the style is unlike that of "Proverbs" or the "Song of Songs." At the same time it is difficult to fix its date; some, as Graetz, followed by Robertson Smith, declared it was written during the reign of the Herodians. Agst. this is the fact that it is quoted repeatedly in Sr., wh. cannot be dated later than B.C. 130. Save that it is post-Solomonic, the earlier limit cannot be fixed so definitely. There seem to be refcs. to definite external events, but these cannot be identd. with cert. While the contrast (4.[13, 14]) between "a poor and wise child," and "an old and foolish king," suggts. some historic event, it may be a cynical refce. to the joy with wh. Eastern subjects anticipated a new reign, and poured contempt on that wh. was nearing its termination. It is difficult to regard the incident in 9.[14, 15] as other than actual: the title "Great King" wd. seem to indicate either an Assyrian or a Persian monarch. The state of matters referred to in 10.[16, 17] is somewhat obscured by the current tr.; the "king" of v. 16 is not a "child," but "a servant," as may be seen by the contrast in v. 17, "a king—the son of nobles." The servant k. suggs. a satrap, under whom the native nobility, excluded fm. affairs, wd. be liable to give themselves over to luxury; when, on the other hand, the suzerain selected one of the nobles and made him subject k., the nobles wd. be admitted by him into judgeships, &c., and so wd. not be left to find in gluttony the only refuge fm. ennui open to them. As is well known, the hist. of Judea and of SW. Asia for the last cent. of the Persian rule is an absolute blank. It is not to be wondered at that we cannot ident. events. If we may assume with the Canon of Jos. (contra. Ap. 18) that only prophetic writings dating before the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus were received as authoritative by the Jews, then it must be placed in the early part of the Persian domination. The claim to Solomonic authorship wd. confuse the issue. As the latest additions to Nehemiah appear to have been made at the time of Alexander the Great, we may assume the Jewish Canon (SCRIPTURES) to have been formed then: prob. we may assign the composition of E. to some time during the later Persian period. Of the author nothing is known except what may be deduced fm. internal evidence. He prob. was a scribe, a leading member of the Jewish community, resident in the territory of a k., subject to the Persians. The frequent refce. to ks. and to the conduct of men in regard to them (8.[2, 4], 10.[20]), implies that the circle of the writer was in touch with royalty. Yet the refce. to a "Great King" (9.[14]), and the fragment of autobiography we have in that connection, imply that it was a much lowlier k. that he had to do with.

(4) Canonicity.—It formed part of the Alexandrian Canon when the Younger Siracides went to Egp. In the time of Jos. it was in the Canon of Judea. The Talmudic stories about the Council at Jabne are without historic value.

(5) Versions.—The LXX is slavishly close to the Heb., so much so that את, the sign of the acc., is trd. σύν, but construed with acc., not with dat., as in Gr. gram. The Psh. is much freer. The Tg. is very diffuse, but supplies the Jewish interpretation wh. is always interesting. The Vlg. is fairly accurate.

(6) Commentaries.—A full list up to 1860 in Ginsburg, Coheleth. Since then Wright, Bullock, Zockler.

ED, "witness," the name apparently given to the altar erected by Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh on returning to the E. of Jordan after the conquest of Canaan (Jo. 22.[34]). See GAD, REUBEN.

EDEN, the land in wh. was the garden where God placed ADAM when He had created him (Gn. 2.[8]). Many idents. have been suggd., but the presence of the Euphrates and the Hiddekel (Tigris) limits the area within wh. it must be sought. The Asyr. inscrs. fixed E. in Babylonia. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies?) regards the Gihon and Pison as the Arakhtu and Pallukat of the inscrs.; as yet there does not seem to be any genly. admitted equivalents of these. There is another E. conquered by the predecessor of Sennacherib (2 K. 19.[12]). E. traded with Tyre (Ek. 27.[23]). It appears to have been in the neighbourhood of Damascus.

EDOM, EDOMITES. (1) Name and Origin.

—The term Edom has been variously derived (a) fm. the root meaning red, supposed to apply to the red colour of the sandstone cliffs of Mt. Seir; (b) fm. the word adam, "man" or "mankind"; (c) fm. the name of the god contained in the term Obed-edom; (d) fm. the town Udumu, or Adumu, or Dumah. There seem to have been several towns of that name, and Dumah in Mt. Seir (cp. Is. 21.[11]) may have given its name to the tribe who lived there.

The Edomites, or collectively Edom, or the "sons of Edom" (Ps. 137.[7]), are represented as the descts. of Esau, the brother of Jacob, and the story of the two brothers is undoubtedly coloured by the relations between the two peoples (cp. art. Esau). The wild Bedouin tribe of Edom, living by plunder in the mountain fastness of Mt. Seir, is hated by the peaceful agricultural people of Isr., while their common reverence for the same patriarchal heroes and their kindred lang. point to a similar origin. Edom seems to have taken possession of Mt. Seir prior to the occupation of Canaan by Isr. (cp. Nu. 20.[14-21]). The original inhabitants, the Horites, were destroyed (Dt. 2.[22]) or assimilated by the conquering nation (cp. Gn. 36.).

(2) Country and Government.—The boundaries of the land of E. do not appear to have ever been very clearly defined, and varied at different times in the hist. of the tribe. Mt. Seir remained the home of the people, but their sphere of influence extended at various times E. and W. The towns Dumah, Bozrah, Teman, and the important seaport Elath, on the Ælanitic Gulf, are mentioned as belonging to E. The people were governed by dukes (allu-phim), a form of government no doubt taken over fm. the original Horites (Gn. 36.[29, 40-43]; Ex. 15.[15]), though at a later date we find a k. in E. (Nu. 20.[14]).

(3) History.—The relations of E. to Isr. were marked by deadly hate and bitter jealousy (cp. Am. 1.[11]), dating in all probty. fm. David's subjection of the country (2 S. 8.[14]; 1 Ch. 18.[11-13]), although Isr. was prohibited fm. smiting E. in the wilderness journey, and the Edomite was allowed to enter the congregation of the Lord in the third generation (Dt. 23.[7, 8]). Fm. the conquest of David, E. remained a vassal kdm. till the days of Jehoram (2 K. 3.[8ff.]), but was again subdued by Amaziah (2 K. 14.[7]). At a later date we find Edomites united with Moab, Judah, Egp., and Philistia agst. Sargon, B.C. 711, and agst. Sennacherib, 701. On the destruction of Jrs. the Edomites joined in the plunder and took possession of several Jewish towns (La. 4.[21f.]; Ek. 35.[3-15]). At a later date, during the Maccabæan revolt, E. (now known as Idumea) harassed the Jews, who under John Hyrcanus reduced the nation, compelling them to accept circumcision and the Jewish faith. Fm. this time onward Idumea became a Jewish province, and the Idumean Herod became k. of Judea (cp. art. Herodian Family). Regarding the relg. of E. little is known besides the names of their gods Kosah, Kaus, Hadad, Edom; although it is not unlikely that circumcision was practised before Hyrcanus. W. F. Boyd.

EDREI. (1) A city of Bashan, near Ashtaroth (Jo. 12.[4], 13.[12]), the scene of Og's overthrow (Nu. 21.[33ff.]; Dt. 3.[1ff.]), assigned to Machir, s. of Manasseh (Jo. 13.[31]). It is the W. limit of Bashan, as agst. Salecah on the E. (Dt. 3.[10]). The mod. Der'ah, c. 13 miles SE. of Tell 'Ashterah, and nearly due W. of the great fortress of Salkhad, seems to meet all requirements. It is remarkable for what is practically an underground city, as yet imperfectly explored (Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 121ff.). It lies on the S. lip of Wādy ez-Zeidy. EGYPT (Heb. Mitzraim), fm. Gr. Αἴγυπτος, itself derived fm. Ḥâ-ku-Ptaḥ, "House of the double of Ptah" (Ḥikupta in the Tel el-Amarna tablets), was the sacred name of Memphis. The Heb. name means the two "Matzors," i.e. Upper and Lower Egp.; Matzor, "the wall of fortification," being the name applied to Lower or Northern Egp. (2 K. 19.[24]; Is. 19.[6], 37.[25]) fm. the line of forts wh. protected it on the Asiatic side and gave a name to the desert of Shur, the "wall" (Gn. 25.[18]). Upper Egp. was properly Pa-to-ris, "the land of the South," Pathros in Heb. (Is. 11.[11], whence the Pathrusim of Gn. 10.[14]). In the OT. Egp. is also called poetically "the land of Ham," and Rahab (Ps. 87.[4]). In the native texts it is often named Kemi, fm. its "black" soil, the desert being Desher, "the red" land. The country is the gift of the Nile, the Delta in the N. being formed fm. the silt brought down by the river, and Upper Egp. consisting of the Nile-banks and of such portions of the desert beyond as can be irrigated by canals. In the OT. the Nile is Yĕor, fm. the Egpn. Atur, later Aur (Coptic Ior), the arms of the Nile in the Delta being known as the Yĕorê Mâtzor, or "Rivers of Matzor" (2 K. 19.[24]). They were formerly seven in number, the two chief of wh. were the Canopic on the W. and the Pelusiac on the E.; the last is now dry. In Egpn. the Nile was usly. termed Ḥâpi. The permanent body of water in the river is provided by the White Nile wh. flows fm. Lake Albert Nyanza, the inundation being derived fm. the three Abyssinian rivers—the Blue Nile, Atbara, and Sobat, and depending on the rains in Abyssinia. In Egp. the inundation usly. begins in June or July, and is at its height in September. The fertility of the soil mainly depends upon it, tho' the actual existence of Egp. is due to the White Nile, wh. provides a continuous supply of water for what (fm. March to June) wd. otherwise be a waterless land. Fm. Khartûm to the sea, a distance of 1800 miles, the Nile receives no tributary, and after the drying up of the Abyssinian rivers in the early spring the amount of water in it varies with the rainfall in Central Africa wh. provides water for the White Nile.

Geologically the Delta is of recent formation—a bay of the sea wh. once extended to the present Cairo: southward the rocks consist of nummulitic limestone until, a little to the N. of Silsilis, the older sandstone crops up. At the First Cataract the original granite floor makes its appearance; the primitive metamorphic rocks similarly rise to the surface in the higher parts of the eastern desert. The Nile valley was originally a fault or crevasse intersected by a number of shallow lakes; thro' this the river gradually cut its way, deepening its channel and filling the bay at its mouth with silt.

Thanks to this silt, the fertility of the Egpn. soil is enormous. But as nothing will grow without water, constant irrigation is necessary, and every inch of irrigated land is too valuable to be left uncultivated. Consequently there are few trees in Egp., except palms and acacias, wh. are grown for the sake of profit, and no wild flowers except those of the desert. But cereals and vegetables of all kinds, and most fruits, grow there more luxuriantly than elsewhere (see Nu. 11.[5]). Since the beginning of its dynastic hist. Egp. has been a land of agriculturists and gardeners, and the shadûf, or machine for irrigation, goes back to an early date. After the Persian conquest it was supplemented by the water-wheel, and in the 19th cent. by the pumping-engine. The fisheries of Egp. have always been productive, tho' the scaleless fish have a muddy taste wh. is displeasing to European palates.

The characteristic flora of anct. Egp.—the papyrus and blue lotus—have both disappeared. When, with the invention of linen paper, the use of papyrus for writing purposes was given up by the Arab conquerors of Egp., its artificial cultivation ceased, and to find it growing naturally we must now go to the Sudân. It is the "flag" or "reed" of the AV., and river-boats were made of its rind (Ex. 2.³; Is. 18.²). Like the flora, the characteristic fauna of anct. Egp. is also extinct—the crocodile or "dragon" (Ek. 29.³), wh. has retired southward before the steamers, the hippopotamus (see Behemoth), and the sacred ibis. With the exception of the hyæna there have been no other dangerous wild beasts in Egp. since the beginning of the historical epoch, and the presence there of the giraffe, elephant, and ostrich likewise belongs to the prehistoric age. The horse was not introduced before the Hyksos period, and the camel before the Roman age. The domestic cat comes in with the Middle Empire. Snakes and scorpions still abound.

The earliest division of the country was into nomes or districts (Egpn. ḥesepu), each with its special deity or obj. of worship, and its central town. Out of the separate nomes gradually emerged the two kdms. of Upper and Lower Egp., the capital of the kdm. of Upper Egp. being at Hieraconpolis, opposite El-Kab. But the division into nomes persisted to the last. The number and boundaries of them varied, however, at different times; in the Mosaic age the number was 37, subsequently we hear of 42, 20 in Lower, and 22 in Upper Egp., while Ptolemy makes them 47.

History.—In the prehistoric age Egp. was inhabited by a race, sometimes supposed to be related to the Libyans, wh. was unacquainted with the use of metal or the art of writing, and was still in the pastoral stage. It lived in the desert, the Delta and banks of the Nile being morasses covered with jungle, the haunt of wild beasts and venomous serpents. It buried its dead, and had attained a considerable proficiency in the manufacture of flint implements and hard stone vases, while its pottery (wh. survived in Nubia down to a late date) indicates a strong artistic sense. Invaders fm. Asia, who prob. came fm. Babylonia thro' Southern Arabia, entered the Nile valley in the neighbourhood of Edfu, bringing with them a kge. of copper and writing, and speaking a lang. of the Semitic type. With the help of their metal weapons they conquered the natives of the country, and slowly moved northward under leaders who regarded themselves as the representatives of the hawk-god Horus. Cities were built wh. became the centres of the nomes, the land was drained, the inundation of the Nile regulated, and canals dug. The engineering science wh. directed the work seems to have been derived fm. Babylonia, the conquered natives being employed upon it and transformed into agriculturists. Eventually the different states into wh. the country was divided coalesced into the two kdms. of the N. and S. These were finally united under Menes, the k. of This (now Girga), This having succeeded Hieraconpolis as the capital of Upper Egp. Menes, the founder of the 1st dyn. of the united kdm., diverted the Nile, a little to the S. of the apex of the Delta and the priestly city of On or Heliopolis, into a new channel, and on the embankment gained fm. the river built a new capital, Memphis (Mennefer, "the good place"), at the point where the borders of Upper and Lower Egp. had met. The date of Menes is uncertain, Egpn. chronology before the rise of the 18th dyn. being still a subj. of dispute. The latest chronological scheme is that of Prof. Flinders Petrie, wh. wd. make it B.C. 5510, in substantial agreement with the date assigned to it by Prof. Wiedemann (B.C. 5650). The French Egyptologists give it as B.C. 5000, while the Berlin School wd. reduce it to B.C. 3400 on the strength of a supposed calendrical date in a 12th dyn. papyrus, wh., however, has turned out not to bear the interpretation put upon it (see A. H. Gardiner, Zeitschr. für Ægyptische Sprache, xliii. p. 136 *). Moreover, the

* Papyri examined by Mr. Gardiner show that, at least from the 18th dynasty onwards, the names of the months for calendrical purposes were a month behindhand, the name of Epiphi, for instance, being applied not to the real Epiphi but to the following month.

chronological reduction wd. not allow time for the number of ks. belonging to the 13th and 14th dyns., whose names we know, or for the three dyns. of Hyksos Pharaohs. Unfortunately our two authorities for

Sphinx and Great Pyramid

Egpn. chronology are incomplete or otherwise insufficient—the Turin papyrus, compiled in the time of Ramses II., wh. contained a list of the Egpn. ks. with the length of their reigns, but wh. has come down to us in fragments, and Manetho, who wrote a lost hist. of Egp. in Gr. (B.C. 270), and whose ciphers are reported differently by his Christian copyists, Julius Africanus and Eusebius. We now know, however, that an accurate register of yrs., imitated fm. Babylonia, was kept fm. the earliest days of the united monarchy. A portion of it, compiled in the time of the 5th dyn., is engraved on a monument now in the Museum of Palermo. The Babylonian system was adopted of naming the yrs. fm. the important events wh. characterised them ; to this was added a statement of the height of the Nile in each yr. The date of the accession and death of each Pharaoh was of course carefully noted.

The tomb of Menes has been found at Negada, some twenty miles N. of Thebes ; those of his successors at Abydos. The dynastic civilisation of Egp. was already far advanced ; the system of writing was complete, and a cursive hand was already in use. Exquisitely cut vases of obsidian indicate trade with Melos. The ks. of the 2nd dyn. continued to bury at Abydos ; those of the 3rd built vast structures of brick with arched staircases, and finally introduced the stone pyramid. The great pyramid at Medûm was the sepulchre of the last k. of the dyn. ; those of Giza belong to Khufu (Cheops), and his two successors, Khafra (Chephren) and Men-ka-Ra (Mycerinus), of the 4th dyn. Under the 3rd and 4th dyns. art reached a high perfection. The realistic statuary carved out of the hardest of stones has never been surpassed, and the huge blocks of stone that were transported fm. one end of Egp. to the other show that mechanics were in by no means a backward condition. Indeed, Prof. Petrie has discovered that the granite blocks of the great pyramid at Giza were cut with tubular drills filled with the points of some hard stone. The 5th and 6th dyns. carried on the traditions of the 4th. A wooden fig. of a well-to-do farmer ("Sheikh el-Beled"), now at Cairo, is one of the most striking and realistic statues in existence, while a statue of Pepi of the 6th dyn., more than life-size and made of hammered copper, is a remarkable example of modelling and portraiture. Scribes and books were already numerous, tho' the oldest bk. that has been preserved is an ethical treatise written in the age of the 3rd dynasty.

The first six dyns. constituted the Old Empire. They were followed by a period of civil war and decay. Egp. revived again under the 11th and 12th dyns., wh., with the 13th and 14th, constitute the Middle Empire. The princes of the 11th dyn. were of Theban origin, and after carrying on war for several generations with the Herakleopolite Pharaohs of the 10th dyn., finally succeeded in making themselves masters of the whole country. Memphis was supplanted by the new capital, Thebes, wh. had grown up around the sanctuary of Amon at Karnak, and Egp. entered upon one of the most glorious periods in its hist. Nubia was conquered, art patronised, and architecture received a new impulse. The pyramid made way for the rock-cut tomb, the temple of brick for the temple of stone.

The architectural work of Montuhotep, the virtual founder of Thebes, was never surpassed. But the Middle Empire was also the feudal period of Egp.; the princes of Thebes had been themselves members of a territorial aristocracy, and their success meant the triumph of the aristocratic over the autocratic principle in the state. The result of feudalism, when there was no longer a strong ruler to check it, was seen in the short reigns and decaying power of the ks. of the 14th dyn. When Egp. was invaded by the Hyksos or "Shepherd" hordes fm. Canaan, the reigning Pharaoh was in no condition to oppose him. The whole country was overrun by the barbarians, who sacked, burnt the temples, and entrenched themselves in a great camp, with ramparts of earth, N. of Memphis. The foreigners, however, soon yielded to the culture of Egp.; the Hyksos leader became a Pharaoh, whose seat was at Memphis, and who was followed by three successive dyns. of Hyksos ks. during a period of more than 500 yrs. The Hyksos court became outwardly Egpn.; the foreign Pharaohs even adopted Egpn. names and patronised Egpn. lit. and science. An Egpn. mathematical work that has come down to us was composed for one of them. The Egpns., however, never forgot that they were foreigners; the country had to be garrisoned with Asiatic troops and was regarded as an appanage of Canaan, the southern part of wh. was also under the control of the Hyksos k. An attack on Egpn. relg. eventually led the prince of Thebes to revolt, and after five generations of warfare the Asiatic stranger was at length expelled by Ahmes I., the founder of the 18th dyn., and therewith of the New Empire. Under Ahmes and his successors the war was carried into Asia, and an empire founded wh. extended to the Euphrates and Cilicia in the N., while the Sudân was conquered in the S. The reign of Thothmes III. (B.C. 1503–1449, according to Mahler) was one long series of victories, and tribute was sent to him fm. Asyr. as well as fm. the islands of the Gr. seas.

The New Empire was distinguished by a new art and a new political system. Feudalism was replaced by a bureaucracy wh. looked to the k. for its wealth and honours. Henceforward there were only three powers in the kdm., the Pharaoh, the priests, and the soldiery, for a standing army also had come into existence. With the influx of wealth pauperism made its appearance, and workmen's strikes were organised at the capital, Thebes. But the 18th dyn. went down in disaster. Asia captured the Pharaoh and his court; marriages were contracted with Asiatic princesses, and Asiatics were raised to the high offices of state. Eventually Amon-hotep IV., under the influence of his mr., Teie, endeavoured to introduce a religious revolution. The Pharaoh sought to replace the old relg. of Egp. by a monotheistic pantheism, and persecuted the followers of the faith of wh. he was the religious head. He changed his own name to Khu-n-Aten, "the splendour of the solar disk"—the visible symbol of his new creed—and expunged the name of the god Amon fm. the monuments of his predecessors. But the priesthood of Thebes proved too strong for the k. He retired northward with his followers, and built a new capital at Tel el-Amarna, on the eastern bank of the Nile, midway between Assiut and Minia, where he drew up the articles of the new faith and expounded the dogmas of its creed. Along with the new relg. a new art was introduced wh. aimed at excessive realism, and workmen fm. the Ægean were employed on the ornamentation of a palace wh. was made gorgeous with frescoes, mosaics, statuary, and gilded bronze.

Khu-n-Aten died in the midst of civil and religious war. His mummy was torn to shreds, his capital and palace destroyed, and his religion proscribed. The Asiatics were driven into exile or reduced to serfdom, and after a few short reigns the 19th dyn. was founded in the person of Ramses I., who represented the national reaction agst. the Asiatic stranger and the foreign creed. Two yrs. later he was succeeded by his son Seti I., who reconquered Pal., wh. had been lost in the recent troubles. Seti was followed by Ramses II., whose long reign of 67 yrs. was chiefly marked by his passion for bldg. Among the cities he founded were Raamses and Pithom (Pa-Tum, now Tel el-Maskhuta), wh. were constructed by Israelitish labour. The earlier part of his reign was spent in a struggle with the Hittites for the possession of Pal.; eventually, in his 21st yr., a treaty was concluded fixing the boundaries between the two powers, and guaranteeing amnesty to all political offenders who had found refuge in the dominions of the two contracting parties. Ramses II. was followed by his s., Meneptah, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, wh. seems to have taken place in his 5th yr., when Egp. was invaded by Libyans fm. the W. and sea-pirates fm. Asia Minor and the Gr. islands, since the land of Goshen is described shortly afterwards as having been deserted by its inhabitants. Egp. never recovered fm. the shock of the invasion, and when Meneptah died a few yrs. later, his s., Seti II., found that the empire in Asia was gone. The 20th dyn. followed, the second k. of wh., Ramses III., was the last of the conquering Pharaohs. He succeeded in beating back an invasion of Egp. by the Northern tribes, wh. was even more formidable than that in Meneptah's reign, and the temple of Medînet Habu at Thebes commemorates his victories by land and sea. But the struggle between the k. and the priesthood wh. had been going on since the time of Khu-n-Aten, had now ended in favour of the priests: henceforward Egp. was virtually governed by the high-priests of Thebes, the Pharaohs being either mere shadows of sovereignty or finding a refuge in the Delta. The 22nd dyn., founded by Shishak I., the general of the Libyan mercenaries, formed, however, a partial exception; but it, too, decayed, and Egp. was overrun by negro chieftains fm. the Sudân. One of these, Sabako, established the 25th dyn., wh. offered a vigorous but unsuccessful resistance to the Assyrians. Taharka, the third k. of the dyn., was driven back to the Sudân; Thebes, after more than one revolt, was levelled by the Assyrians to the ground (B.C. 662), and the whole country divided into 20 satrapies under Assyrian rule.

The revolt of Babylonia fm. Asyr. gave Psammetichus, s. of Necho, the satrap of Sais, an opportunity of shaking off the foreign yoke; and with the help of Ionian and Carian mercenaries sent to him by Gyges of Lydia, he succeeded in making himself independent k. of Egp. and founding the 26th dyn., B.C. 660. Egp. now entered upon the St. Luke's summer of its hist., and an antiquarian revival was accompanied by a revival of art. Wealth poured in fm. the Gr. settlements in the N., and order was kept by Gr. mercenaries. Psammetichus was followed by his s. Necho (B.C. 610), who reopened the canal between the Nile and the Red Sea, and sent Phœnician sailors to circumnavigate Africa. The fall of Nineveh tempted the Pharaoh to re-establish the Egpn. empire in Asia; Josiah was overthrown and slain at Megiddo, and Syr. once more obeyed Egpn. rule as far as the Euphrates. But Necho was himself overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar in a battle at Carchemish (B.C. 605), and his Asiatic possessions lost. Ten yrs. later he died (B.C. 594). His s., Psammetichus II., reconquered Nubia, but died in B.C. 589, when he was succeeded by Apries (HOPHRA), who seems to have been his br. After failing to relieve Zedekiah, whom he had tempted to revolt fm. Nebuchadnezzar, Apries, with the help of his Gr. mercenaries, succeeded in capturing Sidon and the other Phœnician cities, but in an expedition agst. Cyrene his army was utterly overthrown. The fugitive remnants of it demanded the deposition of the k., whose preference for his Gr. body-guard they resented; the general Amasis, sent to pacify them, joined the rebels; the Gr. mercenaries were overwhelmed by numbers in a battle at Momemphis, and Apries fell into the hands of his enemies and soon afterwards was put to death. Amasis (Ahmes II.) now seized the crown (B.C. 569), and covered Egp. with his bldgs. Taught by the experience of his predecessor, he disbanded the native army and relied entirely on his Gr. soldiers. Gr. commerce was encouraged, the Pharaoh married a Gr. w. and sent presents to the Gr. temples. He died B.C. 525, at the very moment when Cambyses was marching agst. him, and his young s., Psammetichus III., was powerless to resist the invader. The Gr. troops were decimated in a decisive battle at Pelusium, Memphis was taken by storm and Psammetichus put to death. Cambyses now proceeded to despatch invading forces into Ethiopia and agst. the Oasis of Ammon, and aroused the hatred of the Egpns. by slaying the sacred bull, Apis, and profaning the temples. But the warm climate of Egp. tempted him to remain too long away fm. his capital. The Magian conspiracy was allowed to come to a head, and he died while on the march to oppose it. Darius endeavoured to conciliate his Egpn. subjs., but the revolt of Khabbash, after the Persian defeat at Marathon, shows that his efforts were in vain. On the death of Xerxes the Egpns. again revolted under the Lybian Inaros, with the help of the Athenians (B.C. 464), and more successfully under Amyrtæus of Sais, who constituted the 28th dyn. (B.C. 415). He was followed by Nepherites of Mendes, the founder of the 29th dyn., under whose four successors Egp. continued to be independent. The last of the Mendesians was murdered by his soldiery, who placed Nectanebo I. of Sebennytus on the throne. Under the three Pharaohs of the 30th (Sebennyte) dyn. Egp. witnessed a revival of power and art, but in B.C. 349 the last of them, Nectanebo II., was forced to fly to Ethiopia, and Egp. compelled to submit to the army of Artaxerxes Ochus. The Persian empire, however, soon made way for that of Alexander; Alexandria was founded, and Egp. fell eventually to the share of Ptolemy Lagus and his successors.

Religion.—Egpn. relg. varied at different periods, and little attempt was made to harmonise the later conceptions with those wh. had been derived fm. an earlier period. Each nome had originally its presiding deity or deities; these were in most cases fetiches, or more often sacred animals, in wh. we must see the objects of worship of the primitive African population. The dynastic Egpns. brought with them the idea of anthropomorphism; the gods were conceived as men, and conversely the men as gods, the Pharaoh himself becoming divine. The hist. of Egpn. relg. is pervaded by the attempt to reconcile the two conceptions of divinity, fm. the day when the "dynastic" leader was identd. with the hawk-god who was a sort of totem of his tribe, down to the time when the sacred animals were explained as mere symbols of the omnipresent godhead, and art united their heads to the body of a man.

Various schools of theology grew up in the country, and the combination of their often contradictory doctrines, with little or no attempt to harmonise them, constitutes one of the chief difficulties of Egpn. relg. At Hermopolis the supreme deity was Thoth, the Moon-god and patron of learning, who had created the world by his word, or rather voice; at Heliopolis the inferior deities were resolved into forms of the Sun-god in his threefold manifestation as rising, mid-day, and setting sun. But the theology wh. eventually became the official and orthodox creed of Egp. was that of Abydos (derived, perhaps, originally fm. the Delta), with its god Osiris, "the Good Being." Osiris had revealed himself in human form and been the benefactor of man; in return he had been put to death; but his worshippers believed that he had risen fm. the dead, as they too wd. do thro' faith in him, and that those who had followed his example on earth wd. dwell with him hereafter in the Paradise of the Blest—the fields of Aalu. Alone among pagan relgs. the Osirian creed taught that salvation cd. be secured only thro' obedience to an exceedingly high moral code, and the examination of the soul before the tribunal of Osiris after death was searching in the extreme. Osiris formed part of a trinity, the other members of wh. were the goddess Isis and his s. Horus—"the avenger" of his father, with whom also he was one. Horus at an early date had been identd. with Ra, the Sun-god of Heliopolis, and in his title of "Redeemer" the early Christians of Egp. saw a reflection of Christ. The "Book of the Dead," the origin of wh. goes back to the age of the 1st dyn., was the ritual of the Osirian creed. But the creed was not accepted throughout Egp. before the time of the 18th dyn., when the practice of embalming first became universal. Under the earlier dyns. the other world was conceived of as a dark and dreary region underground, and in place of the winged ba or "soul," the Egpn. believed in a ka or "double," dependent on the food and drink offered in the tomb, and condemned to a shadowy existence in the sunless land of the dead. At the end of the 18th dyn. Amon-hotep IV. endeavoured to establish a new faith wh. was a pantheistic monotheism. The manifold deities of Egp. had already been resolved into forms of "the one God"; to this one God Amon-hotep gave individual shape, and saw his visible symbol in the solar disc. For the first time it was declared that all mankind, Egpn. and barbarian alike, were children of "the one God," and that the beasts and birds and plants—including the sacred animals of Egp.—had their origin in him. For the first time also there was persecution for religion's sake, and an attempt was made by the Pharaoh to extirpate the worship of Amon and the old official relg. of his country. Under his direction the articles of the new faith were drawn up and embodied in a creed, and the Pharaoh himself delivered sermons upon them. But the religious revolution failed; and the 18th dyn. went down in disaster. Under the 19th dyn. the solar theology of Heliopolis became fashionable at court; the gods were all identd. with the Sun-god, whose bark carried each night thro' the heavens the select few to whom the mysteries of the solar theology were known. Salvation was thus made to depend upon knowledge, and the Osirian creed, with its doctrine of righteousness, was replaced by a system of Gnosticism. Meanwhile the uneducated masses continued to worship the sacred animals in whom the educated saw only symbols and forms of the divine. Magic, however, played a large part in the religious life and belief of both classes of society; the "Book of the Dead" itself is full of it. In the later days of Egp. the magical element absorbed everything else, and the charm and amulet took the place once occupied by the performance of good deeds and the avoidance of sin. Dreams had always occupied an important place in Egpn. belief; it was believed that the future was revealed in them, and books to interpret them were numerous.

Social Condition.—Under the Old Empire Egp. was a land of agriculturists. Much of the land was owned by the farmers who worked it; many of them were wealthy, and they could rise to high offices of state. With the Middle Empire feudalism was introduced; property passed into the hands of the great proprietors, who also formed an exclusive aristocracy, and had bodies of armed retainers in their service. Then came the Hyksos conquest, out of wh. Egp. emerged with a bureaucracy appointed by the k. in place of the feudal aristocracy, and the individual possession of the land was at an end. Henceforward the k. and the priesthood, apart fm. the military allotments, were the sole legal owners of the land; and public granaries (laritu) had been built into wh. all the corn grown in Egp. was stored and then sold by the government. The hist. of this change in the political and economical condition of the country, wh. has not yet been recovered fm. the monuments, is given in Gn. 46.[20-26]. All kinds of cereals were cultivated: in the 11th dyn. tombs at Der el-Bâḥarî have been found oats, wheat, barley, durra, as well as beans, millet, flax, and olives. Along with them was a basket of the lichen Pamelia furfuracea, wh. was used for leavening bread, and must have been imported fm. Greece. Vines were grown in Upper Egp. fm. a very early period; the names of the vineyards of some of the ks. of the 1st dyn. are now known to us; and wine was made fm. the grapes. The houses of the rich had flower-gardens attached to them, and flowers were used as a decoration at dinner. Geese, ducks, oxen and sheep were fattened on the farms, and tho' swine were regarded as unclean they were known at least as early as the time of the 4th dyn. The Egpn. was fond of fish, and large quantities of the scaleless fish of the Nile were consumed. Ropes and baskets were made fm. palm-fibre; Moses' cradle, however, was of papyrus rind. Land was divided into small plots, and as the changes in the Nile frequently altered the form of these, it was necessary for cadastral purposes that the plots shd. be measured every yr. Hence arose the science of trigonometry and surveying.

Literature.—The art of writing was introduced by the dynastic Egpns., the script being pictorial. But before the accession of Menes the pictorial hieroglyphs had come to be used syllabically to express the mere sounds of words as well as the words themselves, and an alphabet had been further evolved fm. them. It was not long before a cursive hand was formed out of the hieroglyphs, and employed in writing upon parchment and papyrus. In the age of the 22nd dyn. this cursive hand, or "hieratic," became still more conventional, and passed into what is called "demotic," wh. was finally superseded by the Gr. alphabet when Egp. became Christian. The addition of four demotic characters to the Gr. letters made the alphabet "Coptic." Egpn. Lit. is as old as the introduction of the "hieratic" script; the earliest fragment of it that has come down to us is a moral treatise by Qaqemna of the time of the 3rd dyn. Another early bk. is a work on ethical philosophy by Ptah-hotep, who lived under the later 5th dyn. kings. As time went on, most branches of Lit. came to be represented; among others, the historical novel. One of the most curious bks. that have survived is a satirical act. of a tourist's misadventures in Canaan in the reign of Ramses II. A treatise on mathematics was written for a Hyksos king. Legal matters are the subj. of other papyri. Egpn. law was famed for its combination of justice with humanity; the supreme court consisted of 30 judges, and litigation seems to have been frequent.

Society and Mode of Life.—Women enjoyed as much freedom as men, and the throne cd. be occupied by a queen. Indeed one of the greatest of the Egpn. sovereigns was Queen Hatshepsu of the 18th dyn. They cd. hold and dispose of property, and in the Ptolemaic age a large proportion of the landed estate in the country was in their hands. A demotic papyrus contains a record of a suit brought by a husband agst. his wife to recover the "pin-money" due to him fm. her under the marriage settlement. Monogamy was the rule, except in the case of the ks., who also, as members of the divine solar race, were encouraged to marry their half-sisters, and descent was counted thro' the mother.

Under the Old Empire the army consisted of militia; after the accession of the 18th dyn. it was a standing one, and was mainly composed of foreign mercenaries—Libyans, negroes, Sardinians, &c.—under Egpn. officers. The use of mercenaries went back at least to the age of the 12th dyn.; wooden models of that age have been found representing a squadron of native Egpn. troops, in mod. marching order, armed with metal, and another squadron of Nubians armed with flint-tipped arrows. Engines of war were employed for the capture of cities. The Egpns. were advanced in mechanics, and were able to move large blocks of stone with great rapidity. They were fond of games, and had invented harps and other musical instruments. Their artistic sense was great; their animal drawings are especially good, and they had a keen appreciation of colour. The common articles of every-day use were artistically made, and chairs and tables with bulls' legs were already manufactured in the age of Menes. Much of their jewellery was of exquisite workmanship, and the 12th dyn. pectorals discovered at Dahshur are so skilfully inlaid with precious stones as to resemble work in enamel. Their religious architecture was distinguished by massive sublimity; the domestic architecture, on the other hand, was graceful, and owed much to bright colouring. The private houses found at Tel el-Amarna, the site of the capital of the "Heretic King," had their walls frescoed with domestic scenes, and were provided with bath-rooms, while in summer they were cooled by fountains, and kept warm in winter by braziers (Mitteilungen der Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft, Sept. 1907, pp. 14–31).

Paul, was followed by c. 30,000 (poss. we shd. correct to 4000) people, who believed him to be a prophet, to the Mt. of Olives, expecting that by miraculous destruction of the walls he wd. take Jrs. EGYPT, RIVER OF. Two Heb. terms are thus trd. in the AV., nehar Mitzraim (Gn. 15.[18]), and Naḥal Mitzraim (Nu. 34.[5]; Jo. 15.[4, 47]; 1 K. 8.[65]; 2 K. 24.[7]; Is. 27.[12], "stream of Egypt"). In Gn. 15.[18] the phrase ought to mean the Nile; this, however, is excluded by the context, and the choice of the word nahar, "river," seems to be due to its opposition to the "great river" Euphrates. The Naḥal Mitzraim corrspds. with the mod. Wādy el-'Arish, and formed the boundary between Pal. and Egp. In Jo. 13.[3], its place appears to be taken by the Sihor, wh. Brugsch idents. with the Shi-Hor or "Horus Canal," wh. passed Zar, the frontier city of Egp. A. H. Sayce.

EHUD, a Benjamite, s. of Gera, who went with a company, apparently carrying tribute, to Eglon, the oppressor of Isr. When they had gone a cert. distance homeward—as far as "the quarries," or "carved stones," wh. may have refc. to the stones set up by Joshua (4.[20])—he returned to the k., and on the pretext of having a secret to communicate, secured a private interview. Being left-handed, he took the k. at unawares and stabbed him with a two-edged dagger. Locking the door of the apartment, as no danger was suspected, he escaped, and stirred up his countrymen to strike effectively for freedom (Jg. 3.[11ff.]).

EKRON, the most northerly of the five chief Phil. cities, with its district (Jo. 13.[3], 15.[45]), first assigned to Judah, and later to Dan (Jo. 19.[43]). There was no effective conquest of E. by Isr. Under David, for a time, it may have been tributary (2 S. 8.[1]). Otherwise it is represented as in Phil. hands (1 S. 5., 6.; Am. 1.[8], &c.; also Asyr. inscrs. of the time of Sargon and Sennacherib). It was given to Judas Maccabæus by Alex. Balus (1 M. 10.[89]). It is prob. the mod. 'Aqîr, 14 miles SE. of Jaffa, a small vill. with few anct. remains.

ELAM (עֵילָם, Αἰλάμ, Ἐλάμ, Elymais). The Heb. name represents the Asyr. Elamtu, "the high-lands," a tr. of the Sumerian Numma. It was given to the mountainous district to the E. of Bab., the chief city of wh. was Susun, or "Shushan the fortress," Susa (now Shush). The larger portion of Elam was known as Anzan or Ansan, wh. seems to have derived its name fm. a city Anzan, the site of wh. is still unknown. East of Susa was the plain of Mal-Amir, where important monuments have been discovered. In the Neo-Susian inscrs. of the Persian period Khapirti (or Apirti) takes the place of Anzan and Elamtu, its equivalent in the Persian texts being Uwaja (classical Uxii (Herod. iii. 93), mod. Khuzistan).

De Morgan's excavations at Susa and Mussian have revealed there a neolithic age with painted pottery of fine fabric and beautiful forms. Much of it resembles the early geometric pottery of the Ægean, and along with it is found a black ware with incised lines filled with white. The introduction of copper was accompanied by that of the cuneiform system of writing, or rather the pictographs out of wh. the cuneiform or cursive script was evolved. At a later date (B.C. 3750) Susa was conquered by Sargon of Akkad and his s. Naram-Sin, and became the seat of a Babn. satrap. The Babylonian lang. and script were introduced, as well as Babn. law and other elements of culture, and Elam cd. accordingly be described as a s. of Shem (Gn. 10.[22]). About B.C. 2500 the native Elamites revolted; the last k. of the dyn. of Ur was slain in battle with them, and Susa was henceforward the capital of a non-Semitic kdm. The cuneiform script was retained, but the lang. for which it was used (commonly called "Anzanite" and "Neo-Susian") was agglutinative. The Semitic advance, wh. was thus checked in Elam, was next assailed in Bab. itself, and for many cents. the Elamite ks. made frequent endeavours to conquer the Babylonian plain. About B.C. 2100 Kudur-Laghghamar (Chedor-laomer) made himself master of Bab., and the Elamite, Eri-Aku, governed Southern Bab. as his vassal. Khammu-rabi (Amraphel), however, succeeded in defeating the Elamite army, and uniting Bab. under his sceptre.

The great builder at Susa was a later k., Untasgal, who erected temples and statues innumerable. A statue of his w., cast in bronze, is one of the finest portrait-statues that have come down to us. The temples were richly coated with bronze and coloured enamelled tiles, wh. seem to have been an Elamite invention. At a still later date (c. B.C. 1100) Sutruk-Nakhkhunte, who styles himself "k. of Anzan and Susa, prince of Khapirti," made Susa a sort of national museum, filling it with the monuments he had carried off fm. Bab., wh. included the famous Code of Khammu-rabi and the stelæ whereon Naram-Sin had recorded his victories. After the rise of the later Asyr. empire Elam assisted Bab. in resisting the Asyr. attack. But tho' the assistance delayed the Asyrn. conquest of Bab. and enabled the Babns. to rebel fm. time to time agst. their Asyr. masters, it was never permanently effective. The Elamites counted descent thro' the mother, so that the nephew of the k. rather than his s. succeeded him, the result being continual civil wars. The country, moreover, was in the hands of feudal chieftains, like mod. Abyssinia, who often refused to unite under the nominal k. Merodach-baladan, however, was successfully protected by Ummannigas of Elam agst. Sargon in B.C. 721, and in B.C. 695 Bab. was captured by Khalludus in the rear of Sennacherib. But a yr. and a half afterwards the Elamite nominee at Bab. fell into the hands of the Asyrns., and in the following September Khalludus was murdered. Sennacherib thereupon ravaged the western and northern parts of Elam. In B.C. 690 came the battle of Khalulê between Sennacherib and the combined forces of Bab. and the Elamite k., who had under him the troops of Parsuas or Persia. About B.C. 665 internal discord opened Elam to the army of Assur-bani-pal, who placed Umman-igas on the throne as tributary prince. He joined, however, the great revolt agst. Asyr., but his murder by his s., and the civil wars wh. followed, once more left Elam a prey to the Asyrns. Susa and other cities were burnt, the temples and palaces destroyed, and the sacred groves cut down. Thirty-two statues of the ks. were carried to Asyr. along with the images of the Elamite deities. But Asyr. derived little benefit fm. the desolated province, and the drain of men and money involved in its subjugation had much to do with the decay of the Assyrian empire. After the overthrow of the empire, Susa, wh. was restored by Nebuchadnezzar, fell to the share of Bab., while Anzan was occupied by the Persian Teispes, who, like his descendant Cyrus, was a tributary of the Babs. In B.C. 606, Jeremiah (25.[25]) refers to "the ks. of Elam," and the Persian conquest of Anzan is prob. meant in 49.[35-39]. In Is. 21.[2] "Elam" may be a refce. to Cyrus of Anzan. Fm. Acts 2.[9] we may gather that the native lang. continued to be spoken after the Christian era.

ELATH, or ELOTH, "a grove," a seaport town on the Red Sea, belonging to Edom, on the route followed by Isr. (Dt. 2.[8]). As the name indicates, it was a place of trees, and is prob. ident. with El Paran of Gn. 14.[6]. After David's conquest of Edom (2 S. 8.[14]), it is mentioned along with Ezion-geber as a place of shipbuilding, and the starting-point of merchant fleets (1 K. 9.[26]). Lost by Jehoram (2 K. 8.[20]), it was retaken and restored by Uzziah (14.[22]), and finally taken fm. Ahaz by the Syrs. (16.[6]). E. is identd. with mod. 'Aqaba.

ELDAD AND MEDAD, two of the seventy elders chosen by Moses (Nu. 11.[16]). While the others obeyed the summons to the Tabernacle, E. and M. remained in the camp and prophesied (v. 26). Joshua's jealous appeal to Moses agst. their conduct elicited that leader's generous response on their behalf. An apocryphal Bk. of E. and M. is quoted by Hermas and in Tg.Jrs.

ELDER (OT.). In all primitive communities of wh. we have any kge. rule was in the hands of the heads of families, or the older men in the state. The word "elder" was not a mere official designation as it is among us, but actually denoted seniority in age. The Rm. patres, and Gr. gerontes, find their mod. counterpart in the Sheyûkh, "elders," of Arabia. The like functionaries were found in anct. Egp. (Gn. 50.[7]), Moab, and Midian (Nu. 22.[7]). In war each E. led the men of his own house; in time of peace they administered justice, each within the sphere marked by definite relationship.

There is nothing to show how a man became acknowledged as an E., wielding authority in the congregation. Prob. the process was not unlike what takes place among the Arabian tribes to-day. One is not chosen for this position by any direct appeal to the people. Authority gradually gathers in the hands of those who, by their wisdom, high character, and deeds, have won the respect and esteem of the community. All intertribal questions are entrusted to their management; and their decisions in matters of dispute submitted to them are, for the most part, loyally accepted.

Fm. among those recognised as elders in Isr. Moses chose seventy to share with him the burden of responsibility in the wilderness (Nu. 11.[16ff.]). See SANHEDRIN.

In the cities the elders dispensed justice in the market-place, wh. in Semitic cities was at the principal gate. They decided both criminal and civil causes (Jo. 20.[4]; Ru. 4.[2], &c.). Not only every township, but every tribe (2 S. 19.[11]), had its own elders. The "heads of the tribes" (Dt. 5.[23]) prob. occupied a position superior to that of the E., but no act. is given of their mode of election.

As the line between secular and sacred is not drawn in the East as it is among us, the civil functions of the E. cd. never be strictly distinguished fm. the religious. The management of the SYNAGOGUE, on its institution, naturally fell to the local elders in each place. Christ's rejection by the elders (Lk. 6.[22]) indicates that they were the Pharisees who exercised the right of casting men out of the synagogue on cause shown (Jn. 12.[42]). They are also among the leaders who take counsel to put Jesus to death (Mw. 21.[23], &c.).

ELDER (NT.). See BISHOP.

ELEALEH, a town in Reuben (Nu. 32.[37], &c.), near Heshbon = el-'Al, a mound with ruins fm. the Byzantine period, c. a mile N. of Heshbon. It is referred to as a Moabite town (Is. 15.[4]; Jr. 48.[34]).

ELEAZAR, the third s. of AARON (Ex. 6.[23]), appointed chief over the Levites (Nu. 3.[32]); on his fr.'s death E. was invested with the sacred garments as his successor (Nu. 20.[28]). With MOSES he superintended the second census of the people (Nu. 26.[3f.]), and with JOSHUA he presided at the allocation of CANAAN to the tribes (Jo. 14.[1]). He was buried in Mt. EPHRAIM (Jo. 24.[33]), and was succeeded by PHINEHAS his s.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL. JACOB so named the altar he erected on the ground he had bought fm. the sons of HAMOR (Gn. 33.[20]). It is difficult to understand why such a name shd. be given to an altar. Dr. Selbie (HDB.), following LXX, suggs.

ELHANAN. As the text stands in 2 S. 21.[19], E., s. of Jaare-oregim, a Bethlehemite, slays Goliath of Gath; in 1 Ch. 20.[5], E., s. of Jair, slays Lahmi the br. of Goliath. Oregim, "weavers," has evidently slipped into the name in 2 S. fm. the following line. "Bethlehemite" and "Lahmi" are also confused. It is held by many that "the br." is introduced in 1 Ch. to harmonise with the nar. in 1 S. 17. E., s. of Dodo, one of David's mighty men (2 S. 23.[24], &c.), is prob. the same man.

ELI, judge (1 S. 4.[18]) and priest (1.[9]) in Shiloh late in the period of the Judges. To his care Samuel was entrusted, and by the latter God communicated His purpose to destroy the house of E., because of the misconduct of his sons, whom he had failed to correct (1 S. 2., 3). This was confirmed by a man of God (2.[27]). On receiving tidings that the ark was captured by the Phil., and his sons slain, E. fell back and brake his neck. The house of E. was finally ejected fm. the priesthood in the person of Abiathar (1 K. 2.[26]).

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI. These words of our Lord upon the cross are Aram., not Heb. Although not committed to writing, it is not impossible that there was an Aram. version of the Psalms, handed down by usage. While poss. our Lord's lang. was usually Greek, in the house at Nazareth it would be Aram. that wd. be spoken. In the time of His extremity our Lord returned to the tongue of His childhood. Some have thought that He repeated the whole of the 22nd Psalm; but of this there is no evidence.

ELIAB. (1) Prince of Zebulun (Nu. 1.[9], &c.). (2) Fr. of Dathan and Abiram (Nu. 16.[1]). (3) David's eldest br. (1 S. 16.[6], &c.). (4) One of David's musicians, a player on the psaltery. (5) A Gadite warrior who joined David in the wilderness (1 Ch. 12.[9]). (6) An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch. 6.[27]).

ELIAKIM. (1) Successor of Shebna as master of the k.'s household at the time of the invasion of Sennacherib (2 K. 18.[18], &c.). The position was one of great influence, frequently used by the occupant to the advantage of his own friends. E. is the "nail fastened in a sure place" on wh. all his fr.'s house, both great and small, depend (Is. 22.[23], &c.). (2) S. of Josiah = Jehoiakim (2 K. 23.[34]). (3) A priest in Nehemiah's time (Ne. 12.[41]). (4) An ancestor of Jesus Christ (Mw. 1.[13]; Lk. 3.[30]).

ELIAM, fr. of Bathsheba (2 S. 11.[3]), called Ammiel (1 Ch. 3.[5]), prob. identd. with E., s. of Ahithophel (2 S. 23.[34]).

ELIASHIB, a high-priest who assisted in bldg. the wall of Jrs. (Ne. 3.[1]), but who did not share the objection—he wd. prob. have called it prejudice—of Ezra and Nehemiah agst. foreign alliances. He was himself related to Tobiah (13.[4]), Nehemiah's bitter foe, and provided for him a chamber in the temple court, whence he was driven by Nehemiah (13.[7ff.]). E.'s s. married the dr. of Sanballat, and was promptly expelled by Nehemiah (13.[28]). The name E., "God will restore," occurs also in 1 Ch. 3.[24], 24.[12]; Ez. 10.[24], &c.).

ELIEZER. Twelve men of this name are mentioned in Scrip. The more important are (1) Abraham's steward, a native of Damascus (Gn. 15.[2]). (2) The prophet who foretold the wreck of the joint fleet of Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah (2 Ch. 20.[37]).

ELIHU. (1) Grandfr. of Elkana, fr. of Samuel (1 S. 1.[1]). (2) S. of Barachel the Buzite, a supplementary speaker in Job. It is to be noted that the name is consonantally the same as Elijah.

ELIJAH ("Jah is God"). Under the influence of the Phœnician princess Jezebel, the cult of the Tyrian Baal had made great progress in Isr. Ahab lent himself to support it, even to the extent of persecuting the worshippers of J″. A splendid temple had been built to Baal in Samaria, and a great establishment of prophets of Baal and of the Asherah flourished under the royal favour.

When the prospects of the true faith seemed at their darkest, one of the greatest figures in the prophetic line suddenly appeared—Elijah the Tishbite (1 K. 17.[1]), a native of Thesbon in Mt. Gilead (LXX). Nothing is known of his parentage and early life. Reared among the rough uplands E. of Jordan, he seems to have possessed a powerful physique. He seems to have loved solitary life; and in his musings amid the great silences of mountain and wilderness, in communion with God, his strong soul was girt with power for the dangerous and difficult task of stemming the tide of apostasy in Isr. Clothed with the rough hair-mantle of the prophet, he ignored the refinements of city life; and even in the presence of royalty he affected nothing of the courtesy of the courtier. The message he delivered to Ahab was as startling as his appearance must have been. The guilty conscience of the k. required not statement of the reason for the drought wh. E. announced. The prophet vanished as suddenly as he had appeared.

The "three yrs." become "three yrs. and six months" in Lk. 4.[25]. If the drought began with the close of the spring rains, then, when three yrs. had passed, there wd. still be the six months of summer before the rainy season wd. commence.

E. found a hiding-place by the brook Cherith, "before," i.e. "east" of Jordan. This was doubtless some gorge among his own native hills. His kge. of the district wd. guide him to a safe retreat. Here he was miraculously supplied by ravens. Late Jewish tradition has it that the birds carried the flesh from the altar in Jrs. The brook furnished him with drink.

With the continuance of the drought the brook dried up, and E. was guided by the Spt. of God to the Phœnician seaboard, where at ZAREPHATH he found hospitable shelter with a widow. Her generosity was rewarded by the prophet's action, wh. prevented the meal and oil in her store from becoming exhausted, and by the restoration of her dead son to life (1 K. 17.).

Finally E. was commanded to go and show himself to Ahab, the set time of the drought having been accomplished. The land suffered heavily fm. famine. Ahab and Obadiah his chamberlain were scouring the country in search of water and fodder for the horses and mules. In spite of the corruptions of the court Obadiah had preserved his interest in the religion of J″., a hundred of whose prophets he had concealed and supplied with necessaries, no doubt at his own imminent peril, through the days of persecution. Him E. met and sent with a message to Ahab, appointing a meeting.

The k. attempted to browbeat the prophet, but his reproaches were hurled back with interest. It was no cringing, apologetic fig. that stood before Ahab. It is the k. who quails, and is fain to accept E.'s challenge to put the rival claimants for the homage of Isr. to such a test as shall prove decisively whether Baal or J″. is God.

Then followed the never-to-be-forgotten scene on Mt. Carmel, wh. culminated in the triumphant vindication of J″.'s claims, and the slaughter of the prophets of Baal.

It is sometimes asked where the water so lavishly employed on this occasion cd. have come fm. at the end of such a long period of drought. If the contest took place at El Mahraqah, the traditional "place of burnt sacrifice," the eastern summit of Mt. Carmel, then the water mt. have been discovered in a great rock cistern; or it mt. have been obtained fm. a perennial spring wh. rises lower down on the breast of the slope.

No better token of the return of Jehovah's favour cd. be given than the coming of rain. A most realistic description of E.'s waiting and the gathering of the rain-clouds is preserved (18.[42ff.]). The rich plain between Carmel and Jezreel goes swiftly to mud when the rains fall. Ahab, warned that there was no time to lose, "mounted his chariot at the foot of the hill. And E. was touched as by a supporting hand: and he snatched up his streaming mantle, and twisted it round his loins, and, amidst the rushing storm with wh. the night closed in, he out-tripped even the speed of the royal horses, and 'ran before the chariot'—as Bedouins of his native Gilead wd. still run, with inexhaustible strength—to the entrance of Jezreel, distant, though visible, fm. the scene of his triumph."

If the prophet thought the proud spt. of Jezebel wd. be humbled by the disaster at Carmel, he was bitterly disappointed, and fm. her truculent threatenings he fled once more. Taking with him only his "servant," whom tradition idents. with the s. of the widow of Zarephath and the prophet Jonah, he went to Beersheba. Thence, quite alone, he entered the southern desert. In a mood of despair, he lay down with his head under the shade of a flowering broom (see JUNIPER) and prayed for death. Instead of death came words of cheer and divine sustenance, which upheld him during 40 days' roaming in the wilderness, at the end of which time he found himself at "Horeb, the mount of God." Tradition locates the cave in wh. he lodged in a rocky retreat under the summit of Jebel Mûsa, "the mount of Moses." Amid these mighty solitudes, shut in by granite rock and precipice, what fitter theatre can be imagined for the tremendous drama to be enacted; wherein was demonstrated the power of gentleness as agst. violence; of grace and mercy as agst. law and justice. The disheartened prophet was taught the lesson often repeated in the hist. of our race; he was encouraged to believe that quieter and gentler methods mt. succeed where the more forceful had seemed to fail; while his despondency was rebuked by the assurance that seeming failure is not always real, for J″. has reserved to Himself 7000 men in Isr. who have not bowed the knee to Baal.

E. was sent forth again with a threefold commission: to anoint Hazael as k. of Syria, Jehu as k. of Isr., and Elisha as the successor to his own office. The last of these he executed (see ELISHA); the other two seem to have been bequeathed as sacred duties to Elisha, who, fm. the day of his call, became as a s. to E. (2 K. 2.[12]).

The dastardly crime by wh. Naboth was murdered and his patrimony filched brought E. once more, as the herald of doom, into the presence of the wretched Ahab (1 K. 21.[20]). His terrible denunciation of wrath overwhelmed the k., and because he "humbled himself," execution of judgment was stayed during Ahab's lifetime. The stern duty of vengeance fell to an officer who rode behind the k. that day, who, when the time came, made effective use of E.'s words (2 K. 9.[25f.]); see JEHU. This cd. not fail to show that the relg. of J″. was not merely a thing affecting ceremonial observances, but was the true and only effective safeguard of the rights and liberties of men.

The attempt of AHAZIAH, s. and successor of Ahab, to consult BAAL-ZEBUB as to the result of an accident he had suffered, was thwarted by E., who sent word to the k. that he wd. surely die. The prophet is here described as "an hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins" (2 K. 1.[7]). He dwelt "in the top of the hill," evidently somewhere between Samaria and Ekron. Two captains and their fifties sent by the k. to capture him were destroyed by fire. At the entreaty of the third captain sent, by divine direction E. went with him; but no reprieve was granted to the royal culprit.

How long E. lived we cannot tell. A letter sent by him to Jehoram, k. of Judah, was prob. written during a co-regency of Jehoram with his fr. in the closing yrs. of Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Ch. 21.[12]). E. was prob. gone before Jehoram came to the throne.

Aware that his time was drawing near, E. sought to meet the hour of his departure alone, but the faithful Elisha wd. not leave him. They went together fm. Gilgal to Bethel, and fm. Bethel to Jericho; in both places the "sons of the prophets" alluded to the coming separation of the two. Still together they walked eastwards. E. divided the Jordan by a stroke of his mantle, and on the other side Elisha received the reward of his fidelity. He seeks a double portion of the spt. of E.—not double the endowment possessed by E., but as a s. he asks the portion of the first-born (Dt. 21.[17]). The request was granted on condition that he shd. see his master when he was taken away. This looks like a test of Elisha's powers; to see if he possessed the seer's peculiar gift of vision, enabling him to see what others cd. not (cp. 2 K. 6.[17]). And as they went on and talked, "behold there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, wh. parted them both asunder; and E. went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Elisha, seeing, exclaimed, "My father, my father, the chariots of Isr. and the horsemen thereof." Did he think his master a defender of Isr. stronger than all the chariots and horsemen of her foes? Lifting the mantle of E. wh. had fallen, he sadly retraced his steps to Jericho, the waters of Jordan responding again to the touch of the prophet's robe. To this day in the Orient the virtue of a holy man is believed in some mysterious way to cling to his garments (cp. Ac. 19.[12]).

The manner of his departure well became one who may almost be described as the prophet of fire and whirlwind. Swift, impetuous, fearless, with a passion for the honour of J″., and for the highest welfare of his countrymen, he appeared at a time when all that was best in Isr. was in grave jeopardy. Single-handed, agst. what must have seemed overwhelming odds, with splendid courage he fought successfully the battle for righteousness. Of the influence he exercised we may gather some idea fm. the impression made on the mind and imagination of succeeding generations. It was expected that E. would come to earth again to right all wrongs, and end oppressions (Ml. 4.[5f.]). He was to be the herald of the Messiah (Lk. 1.[17]; Jn. 1.[21], cp. Mw. 17.[10ff.]). He was one of the three who communed with Christ on the Mt. of Transfiguration; and those who thought that Jesus on the cross had called for E. wd. apparently not have been surprised had the prophet responded to the appeal (Mw. 27.[47]). He plays a great part to this day in the traditional beliefs of the Jews. He is also confused with El-Khudr, that strange, weird creature of the Moslem fancy, who goes unwearied, an endless pilgrimage round the world, to whom little sanctuaries are erected wherever he appears. When he rests by night in one of these, the light is so strong within that none can enter; but the awed beholders know that the immortal wanderer tarries here a little ere setting out once more on his age-long journeyings.

Of the relation of Elijah, and his successor Elisha, with the communities called sons of the prophets, we have no sure information. Living in communities, they were not celibates (2 K. 4.[1]). We hear of no great prophet who grew up among them. Samuel appears to have been the "head" of the community in Ramah. Poss. Elijah and Elisha exercised some oversight over the different establishments.

ELIM, a station in the wilderness (Ex. 15.[27]; Nu. 33.[9]), with 12 wells of fresh water and 70 palms. The most prob. identn. seems to be Wady Gharandel, where vegetation is plentiful, with many palms, and wells dug in the sand, where water is generally to be found. A day's journey wd. take the wanderers to the Red Sea. Elath has also been suggd., but this involves a different position—not determined—for Mt. Sinai. See Exodus.

ELIMELECH, an Ephrathite of Bethlehem, h. of Naomi, the mr.-in-law of Ruth, apparently the head of a clan in Judah (Ru. 1.[2], 2.[1]).

ELIPHAZ. (1) S. of Esau (Gn. 36.[4]). (2) The Temanite, one of the friends of Job.

ELISHA ("God is salvation"), s. of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah (1 K. 19.[16]), brought up to farm work on the rich land of the Jordan valley. Summoned by Elijah fm. the plough, he slaughtered the yoke of oxen, boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen, and made a feast for his neighbours. Then he went with Elijah as his companion and minister—he "poured water on the hands of Elijah" (2 K. 3.[11]). E.'s bearing at this critical point proved his fitness for the prophetic office to wh. he was called. He did not lightly sever the ties of kindred and home: but recognising the call of God, he did not flinch fm. the choice; and over the sacrificial meal he bade his friends farewell. At this time he must have been quite a young man, as, after some seven yrs. of preparatory training with Elijah, his own prophetic activity in Isr. extended through more than 50 yrs. He took the place of a s. to the older prophet, and was bound to him in the ties of deep loyalty and affection. He was the sole human witness of Elijah's translation; and fm. that sublime scene he turned to the task that awaited him, with a "double portion" of his master's spt.

The Jordan divided at the touch of the old prophet's mantle in his hand, and thus his confidence was strengthened.

E. was in many respects difft. fm. his great predecessor. He was not a frequenter of deserts: he was easily accessible to those who wished to consult him: he was the friend and counsellor of ks.: and his miracles were for the most part deeds of beneficence. He was prob. a man of independent means; and his lot was cast in happier times, the conflict with Baal being over, and J″. recognised as the God of His people.

We need not here follow in minute detail the familiar act. of E.'s activities. No attempt is made to preserve strict chronological order. "The k. of Isr." cannot always be identd. Jehoram succeeded Ahaziah, and he was followed by Jehu the regicide.

ELISHA'S FOUNTAIN: JERICHO

E. continued to prophesy under two ks. of Jehu's dyn.—Jehoahaz and Joash.

At Jericho E. healed the noxious waters of the spring—prob. that still known as "the Fountain of E." At Bethel the insulting youths were torn by the she-bears fm. the wood. He visited Elijah's haunts on Carmel, and returned to Samaria. He went with JEHORAM, Jehoshaphat, and the k. of Edom agst. Mesha of Moab. The prophetic mood having been induced by the playing of a minstrel, he announced miraculous deliverance for the allies (2 K. 3.). He relieved the necessities of the widow of a prophet by multiplying her store of oil. Passing on his way to and fm. Carmel, he was hospitably entertained by a lady of Shunem—mod. Sōlam, at the W. base of Little Hermon—whose dead s. he restored to life. At Gilgal he rendered harmless the poisonous pottage prepared, in a time of dearth, for the sons of the prophets. Miraculous increase was given to the bread and barley brought fm. Baal-shalishah. At E.'s direction NAAMAN bathed in Jordan and was healed of leprosy. Gehazi, the prophet's servant, for falsehood and covetousness, was punished with this loathsome disease. Then we have the story of the iron that he made to swim (6.[1-7]).

The ambuscades and stratagems of the k. of Syr., who made war agst. the k. of Isr.—prob. Jehoram—were uniformly revealed to the latter by E. Discovering who thus thwarted his plans, the Syr. k. surrounded E. in Dothan; and the prophet's trembling servant was reassured by the vision of the celestial armament sent for his master's defence. The Syrs. were blinded and led to Samaria, where E. delivered them fm. the k.'s purpose of cowardly revenge (2 K. 6.[8-23]).

The marauding "bands" of Syr. gave place to the entire Syr. host, who besieged Samaria and reduced it to dire straits, for wh. the k. was disposed to blame E. To the messenger of that murderer's s. E. announced a deliverance wh. must have seemed incredible, but wh. soon came (6.[24]–7.).

E.'s gratitude to his erewhile hostess of Shunem received further illustration (8.[1-6]). There is no notice elsewhere of the seven yrs. of famine here referred to; poss. E. spent them in Damascus. With patriotic grief at the disasters this man wd. inflict upon Isr. E. anointed Hazael as k. of Syr.: a position wh. the latter secured by the murder of his master (8.[7-15]).

E. saw in the rough soldier JEHU a fit instrument to carry out the doom pronounced on Ahab's house, and of the prophet's part, inviting him to the bloody work, there can be little doubt (9.[1ff.]).

E.'s career for the rest of his life is left in obscurity. Jehu's immediate successor did not possess his martial power, and Isr. fell on evil days. But ere his death the prophet saw the dawning of a new day of hope with the advent of the youthful JOASH, to whom, fm. his dying bed, he gave a message of good cheer (13.[14-19]).

The miraculous power of the prophet was not exhausted with his death. A dead man cast into his tomb suddenly revived (13.[20f.]).

Altho' there is no further mention of E. in the OT. scrip., and his name appears but once in the NT. (Lk. 4.[27]), he certainly held a position of great influence in his time. Even the k. of Syr. sends to consult him: and he takes his place in hist. as a divinely inspired prophet, a true patriot, and a kindly man.

For E.'s relation to the sons of the prophets, see ELIJAH.

ELISHAH, s. of Javan (Gn. 10.[4]); prob. Greece. With this suits Ek. 27.[7], where mention is made of the "isles of E." (JAVAN).

ELKANAH, an Ephraimite (1 S. 1.[1]), or Levite

(1 Ch. 6.[26ff., 33ff.]), h. of Hannah and Peninnah, the former of whom, barren for a time, after prayer at Shiloh became the mr. of Samuel. For others of this name see Ex. 6.[24]; 1 Ch. 6.[25]; 2 Ch. 28.[7], &c.

ELKOSH, birthplace of the prophet NAHUM (Na. 1.[1]). Some wd. place E. in Galilee; others in Judea; others on the Tigris. There is no material for a satisfactory decision.

ELLASAR, the capital of ARIOCH, one of the allies of CHEDARLAOMER (Gn. 14.[1]), ident. with Larsa.

ELM (Ho. 4.[13], AV.), shd. be TEREBINTH.

ELNATHAN, a courtier of Jehoiakim, sent to Egp. to fetch Uriah (Jr. 26.[22]). He was present and remonstrated when the k. burned the roll (36.[12, 25]). He was prob. ident. with E., fr. of Nehushta (2 K. 24.[8]). For others see Ez. 8.[16].

ELON. (1) The Hittite fr.-in-law of Esau (Gn. 26.[34]). (2) S. of Zebulun (Gn. 46.[14]; cp. Nu. 26.[26]). (3) A Zebulunite judge of Isr. (Jg. 12.[11f.]), buried in Aijalon—prob. Elon—of Zebulun. (4) A town in Dan (Jo. 19.[43]), prob. = Elon Beth Hanan (1 K. 4.[9]), unidentd.

ELTEKEH, an unidentd. town in Dan (Jo. 19.[44]), given to the Kohathite Levites (21.[23]), prob. near Ekron. It was the scene of the Asyr. victory over the Phil. and Egpns. (Sennacherib's hexagon prism inscr.).

ELTEKON, an unidentd. town in Judah (Jo. 15.[59]), poss. = TEKOA.

ELTOLAD, one of Simeon's towns in Judah (Jo. 15.[30]), prob. = Tolad (1 Ch. 4.[29]), unidentd.

ELUL. See YEAR.

ELYMAS, the title of Bar-jesus, who in the presence of Sergius Paulus, governor of Cyprus, withstood Paul and Barnabas (Ac. 13.[6-11]). E. is explained as Magos, "Sorcerer." The word seems akin to the Arb. 'alama, "to know," whence we have 'alīm, "learned man," or "doctor of the law," pl. 'ulamā'.

E. seems to have been a representative of that system of interpreting Nature and her mysterious powers which in the anct. world took the place now occupied by mod. science. It claimed to be a religion as well, a claim advanced for science also, by some of its less prudent votaries. Wonders wrought by means revealed only to the initiated, poss. at times by the application of recondite forces, at others by feats of legerdemain, were relied upon to secure adherents. E. doubtless regarded Paul and Barnabas as rivals competing for the favour of the governor, and used his black arts agst. them. Paul replied in kind; and the blindness that fell upon the "sorcerer" was demonstration of a Power behind the apostle, greater than any known to E. The Cypriot, Simon, who assisted Felix in his nefarious designs upon Drusilla (Ant. XX. vii. 2), and Simon Magus (Ac. 8.[9ff.]), prob. belonged to the same class.

EMBALMING. Among the Hebs. we hear only of Jacob's body and that of Joseph being embalmed (Gn. 50.[2, 26]). The practice prevailed in Egp. (For full act. see Herod ii. 86ff., Bohn's edn.; WAE. ii. 382, &c.)

The brain was removed, and all the vessels and organs fm. the cavity of the body, wh. was then washed out with palm wine, and perfumes applied. It was filled with fragrant spices and drugs, myrrh, cassia, &c., and steeped in natron for seventy days—in Jacob's case it appears to have been forty. It was then washed, rubbed with saltpetre, and swathed in strips of linen smeared with gum. Several methods were followed, varying in cost fm. £40 upwards, the object being the preservation of the body fm. decay. The features remained quite recognisable. The body was placed in a wooden case, and set up in the home. It might be enclosed in a stone coffin before being placed in the burial vault. It has thus been poss. to ident. the bodies of many of the great Egpn. monarchs of the past.

EMBROIDERY. The Heb. words do not mean E. in our sense: shābatz is prop. to make cloth of chequer work (Ex. 28.[39]; cp. v. 4); rōqem, "embroiderer" (EV.), and ḥōsheb, "cunning workman," are distinguished in Ex. 35.[35], &c. The work of the rōqem was composed of "blue, purple, and scarlet, and fine twisted linen" simply interwoven (Ex. 26.[36], &c.), while that of the ḥōsheb was marked by gold thread, and inwrought designs (SSG. 31) that Luke was mistaken as to the distance, we may place E. here. There are no fewer than six sites whose claims have been supported.

ENAIM (Gn. 38.[14]; Jo. 15.[34], "Enam"), a town in the Shephelah, between Adullam and Timnah. It may be Khirbet Wādy Alin (Conder), near Beth-shemesh (AV. trs. Gn. 38.[14] "in an open place," RV. "in the gate of E.").

ENDOR, a town of Manasseh, in the territory of Issachar (Jo. 17.[11]), the home of the witch consulted by Saul (1 S. 28.[7]), past wh. fugitives fm. Sisera's army attempted escape (Ps. 83.[10]). It is the mod. Endūr, on the N. slope of Jebel ed-Duhy.

EN-EGLAIM (Ek. 47.[10]), an unidentd. place on the Dead Sea, named with En-gedi. 'Ain el-Feshkah and 'Ain Ḥajleh have been suggd. Eglaim (Is. 15.[8]) must be sought E. of the Dead Sea.

EN-GANNIM. (1) A town in the Shephelah named between Zanoah and Tappuah (Jo. 15.[34]), prob. = Umm Jīna, S. of Wādy es-Sarar. (2) A Levite town in Issachar (Jo. 19.[21], 21.[29]; 1 Ch. 6.[73] "Anem"), prob. = Ginnea (Ant. XX. vi. 1; BJ. III. iii. 4), the mod. Jenīn, on the S. edge of the plain of Esdraelon, with copious springs, gardens, and orchards.

EN-GEDI (Jo. 15.[62], &c.). The anct. name persists in the mod. 'Ain Jidy, a spring about the middle of the W. coast of the Dead Sea. It rises on a terrace at the foot of a steep slope, and is surrounded by luxurious vegetation, all the more beautiful because of the bleak desolation of the district. Hazazon Tamar was the name by wh. it seems to have been known to Abraham (Gn. 14.[7]; cp. 2 Ch. 20.[2]); it may linger still in Wādy Haṣāṣa to the N. The ruins nearer the shore represent a place of great antiquity. The wilderness of Judea here lets itself down upon the sea in beetling crags, torn by great gorges, in the limestone sides of wh. caves abound (1 S. 24.[1]).

ENGINE (Heb. ḥishshābōn, 2 Ch. 26.[15]). It is mentioned in Chronicles that Uzziah had E. "invented by cunning men to shoot arrows and great stones withal," apparently balistæ and catapultæ. Although no trace of these has been found either on the Asyr. or Egpn. monuments, Pliny (vii. 56) attributes these two engines of war to the Syrians and the Phœnicians respectively.

EN-HADDAH, named with En-gannim (Jo. 19.[21]), a town in Issachar, prob. = the mod. Kefr Adān, c. three miles W. of Jenīn.

EN-HAKKORE, "spring of the crier," or "of the partridge" (Jg. 15.[19]), in "the hollow place that is in Lehi," so called perhaps fm. its resemblance to a jaw-bone. Water flowed fm. the cleft, whence drinking, Samson was refreshed. Conder suggs. A'yūn Kāra, near Zorah.

EN-HAZOR, in Naphtali, named with Kedesh, Edrei, and Iron (Jo. 19.[37]), poss. = Hazīreh; although the absence of a fountain to corrspd. with "En" is a difficulty.

EN-MISHPAT, "fountain of judgment" (Gn. 14.[7]), a name of KADESH.

ENOCH. (1) S. of Cain; Cain built a city and called it after his son's name (Gn. 4.[17]). (2) S. of Jared and br. of Methuselah; he lived 365 yrs. and was translated.

Book of E.—The Bk. (or rather the Bks.) of E. forms the largest and most important of the remains of Jewish Apocalyptic. It is quoted in Jude, and largely influenced the thought of the times of our Lord and of those immediately succeeding. The title "Son of Man," wh. our Lord assumes as denoting His claim to be the Messiah, has been taken fm. E.

(1) Contents.—The Bk. is made up of portions of various dates. There are several pretty clearly marked sections. (a) Chaps. 1.-36. are occupied with Angelology; the fall and punishment of the angels is narrated; the story of their fall is taken fm. Gn. 6.[2]. (b) Chaps. 37.–71. form the Bk. of Similitudes; this is largely modelled on Daniel, and is Messianic in its aim. There are three of these similitudes, the last in a fragmentary condition. (c) The Bk. of the Course of the Heavens; this gives an act. of physical phenomena as apprehended by the writer (chaps. 72.–82.). (d) The Bk. of Visions sketches the hist. of mankind fm. Adam to the wars of the Maccabees, and the figure of what befalls a herd of cattle wh. latterly becomes a flock of sheep (chaps. 83.–92.). (e) In the fifth Bk., after recapitulating the summary of the world's hist., the writer proceeds to warn his descendants agst. evil (chaps. 94.–104.). There follow appendices in wh. is narrated the birth of Noah, and the portents that accompanied it; then the conclusion of the Bk. (chaps. 106., 107.). Mainly in the second Bk. there are a number of interpolations fm. a Bk. of Noah.

(2) Date.—The most generally received view is that the framework is formed of sections a, c, and d, and that this was written towards the end of the Maccabæan struggle. Next section b appeared, wh. some have dated as late as the days of Herod, if not even in Apostolic times. The present writer ventures to hold that section b is the nucleus, and that interpolations were made in this fm. the lost "Apocalypse of Noah"; of the same date and authorship are chaps. 91., 92.; these shd. be dated c. B.C. 200, and the Noachian fragments a score of yrs. after. Sections a, c, and d, except the last two chaps., were written about B.C. 160. One of the main reasons for assigning to section b the position of nucleus is the relative simplicity of the physical speculations in it, as compared with the complexity in the Noachian fragments and the yet greater complexity of those in section c. In what we reckon the nucleus there seem to be refces. to events wh. occurred in the reign of Antiochus the Great, as if they had just happened; and it seems most natural to regard the ram with the noticeable horn (chap. 90.[2]) as no other than Judas Maccabæus. The white bull that appears after is the Messiah, with whose appearance the vision really ends.

(3) Place of Origin.—There seems no doubt that it originated in Pal. As the various parts proceed fm. one movement this naturally suggs. that it sprang fm. a community. This led the present writer to ascribe the authorship to the Essenes, the visionaries who had their central habitation on the shores of the Dead Sea. Jos. says of them that they were addicted to prophecy and had sacred bks. of their own; features that wd. suit the Apocalyptic bks. generally, and especially the E. bks.

(4) Language and Text.—Altho' it had been influential in modifying the thought of Apostolic and post-Apostolic times, and was known in Gr. as late as George Syncellus (c. A.D. 800), it utterly disappeared fm. knowledge till, in 1773, Bruce the Abyssinian traveller brought to Europe three copies of an Ethiopic tr.; retaining one himself, he deposited the other two, one in the Royal Library in Paris, and the other in the British Museum. It was almost half a century later that Archbishop Lawrence published his tr. Lord Napier's capture of Magdala was the occasion of a great many more MSS. of the Eth. version being brought within the knowledge of scholars. Later came, in 1887, the recovery in Akhmim of fragments of the Gr. text: these were edited, with a new tr. of the Eth., by Mr. Charles in 1894. The lang. fm. wh. the Eth. has been trd. is Gr., but behind the Gr. there is a Semitic original. It is difficult to say with certainty whether this original was in Heb. or Aram.; the balance on the whole is in favour of Heb. being the lang. in wh. E. was first written.

The Book of the Secrets of Enoch.—In the Latin tr. of Origen (de Princip.) there is refce. to a Bk. of E. wh. does not suit our bk.; there has been found in a Slavonic tr. a bk. with wh. it agrees. It is mainly occupied with physical speculations, and appears to have been written in Egp. An edition of it was published in 1896 by Messrs. Charles and Morfill.

Literature.—This is very extensive. Charles's tr. is the best; Schodde's and Lawrence's may be consulted. For discussions of the questions involved, Lucke, Offen. Johannes; Ewald, uber Henokh; Hilgenfeld, Mes. Jud.; Drummond, Jewish Messiah; Thomson, Bks. wh. Influenced our Lord, &c.

ENOS (Heb. 'enosh, "man"), s. of SETH and grands. of ADAM (Gn. 4.[26] J., 5.[6] P.).

EN-RIMMON, occupied by the Judahites after the Exile (Ne. 11.[29]). This is cert. the town indicated by "Ain and Rimmon" (Jo. 15.[32], 19.[7]; 1 Ch. 4.[32] "Ain Rimmon"). It is prob. = Umm er-Rummamīn, c. 16 miles S. of Beit Jibrin.

EN-ROGEL (prob. "fuller's spring"), accdg. to Jo. 15.[7], 18.[16], lay immediately S. of Jrs. It is called the dragon's spring (Ne. 2.[13], Heb.). The high place of the stone ZOHELETH was near it (1 K. 1.[9]). It was thus a convenient place for feasts like Adonijah's, and maidservants going there for water cd. give news of things going on in Jrs. (2 S. 17.[17]). It must be ident. with that now called by the Jews Bīr Eyūb, "Job's Well." Josephus has a monstrous story about the earthquake in Uzziah's time (Zc. 14.[5]), wh. detached half of the mountain W. of the spring, and made it roll four stadia agst. the mountain to the E. (Ant. IX. x. 4). Something like this, on a very small scale, may have happened. The well is now 125 ft. deep. In former times there was, of course, less depth on the surface of alluvial soil, and the well prob. had direct communication with the small stream wh. in the winter sometimes rises a little lower down the valley. To the SW. of the well, stairs and subterranean passages in the rock were found by Sir Charles Warren, only 70 ft. under the present surface. Perhaps they belonged to the old En-rogel, the water of wh. cd. then be reached by a staircase. One can understand, therefore, why it was spoken of as "a spring," 'ain: and, with its "living water," it may still be properly called a spring. G. H. Dalman.

ENROLMENT. In Lk. 2.[1], RV. and AVm., "to be enrolled" is used instead of "to be taxed," to tr. apographesthai. It has been discovered that in addition to a general census there were provincial Es. wh. occurred periodically, e.g. in Egp. every 14 yrs: Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem? See Quirinius.

EN-SHEMESH ("sun spring"), on the border of Judah and Benj., between Adummim and En-rogel (Jo. 15.[7], 18.[17]), prob. 'Ain el-Ḥōḍ, known as the EPÆNETUS, a believer saluted (Rm. 16.[5]) as the "firstfruits of Asia," a member of the Rm. Church, wh. seems to have consisted largely of foreigners; or on the supposition that Rm. 16. was really appended to the epistle when it was sent to Ephesus, he wd. be an Ephesian.

EPAPHRAS, a leading Colossian believer, founder of the Church in Colosse (Col. 1.[7]), and probably also of those in Laodicæa and Hierapolis, over wh. he seems to have had charge (Col. 4.[12f.]). He was the bearer of good news to St. Paul during the first imprisonment in Rome (Col. 1.[4, 7f.]), where he also seems to have suffered confinement for the truth (Phm.[23]). St. Paul refers to him by the honourable title of "bond-servant of Jesus Christ," and bears testimony to his char. as "a faithful minister of Christ" (Col. 1.[7], 4.[12]). The name is an abbreviation of Epaphroditus.

EPAPHRODITUS, a member of the Church in Philippi sent to Rm. with gifts for St. Paul (Php. 4.[18]). There, in his devotion to the Apostle, he hazarded his life (Php. 2.[30]), and was sick nigh unto death. How greatly St. Paul esteemed him, and how deep had been his anxiety, may be gathered fm. the fervour of his thanksgiving for the recovery of his "brother and fellow-worker, and fellow-soldier" (Php. 2.[25ff.]). He was the bearer of the epistle to the Philippians.

EPHESIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. The longest of the Epp. of the first imprisonment.

(1) Contents.—It may be divided into two nearly equal portions occupied with thanksgiving and exhortation. (a) Thanksgiving: after two vv. of formal exordium the Apostle blesses God for the Gospel as the great unifying principle, by wh. all things were made one in Christ, who is for this exalted above all principality and power. This leads to thanksgiving for believers as "quickened together with Christ," and, changing the metaphor, "built . . . a holy temple in the Lord." In the third chap. the Apostle, on the supposition that his thanksgiving has been well grounded, prays for the believers he is addressing, that they may continue to abound in all grace. (b) The hortatory portion begins with urging generally the duty of holy living in order to maintain the unity of the Church wh. is the glory of Christ. Next the believers are warned against special sins; lying, dishonesty, and impurity. Fm. considering sins to be avoided the Apostle directs attention to duties; these he considers under the different domestic relations, wives and husbands, children and parents, servants and masters. Finally he exhorts those to whom he writes "to be strong in the Lord," and for this end to "put on the whole armour of God." He concludes by asking for their prayers, and telling them that Tychicus will inform them of his state. While E. is rich in doctrine it is all subservient to the main objects of thanksgiving and exhortation. Its Christology is esp. prominent. In the Angelology of E. there is a suggestion of a hierarchy, wh. gave rise in later centuries to the works published under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. There are no greetings of individuals, and no autobiographic notes such as those wh. make the Epp. to the Corinthians so interesting.

(2) Authenticity.—Altho' the vocabulary of E. is different fm. that of Romans, 1 and 2 Cor., and Gal., yet the external evidence is strong and consistent; referred to by Ignatius in the short Gr. recension (Eph. 12), quoted by Polycarp (12), and echoed in Clement of Rome's Epistle to the Corinthians. E. is quoted as Paul's by Irenæus (adv.

Hær. v. 2), and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 65; Pæd, i. 18). Thereafter testimonies are frequent. Marcion, altho' he called it "to the Laodicæans," ascribed it to Paul. A tradition thus early and unvarying is of great weight.

(3) Destination and Origin.—The only voice denying that it was sent to the Church at Ephesus is that of Marcion. Our two oldest MSS., B. and ℵ., omit the words ἐν Εφέσῳ; Basil the Great and Jerome appear to have used MSS. wh. had not these words. On the other hand Tertullian and Epiphanius denounce Marcion for calling it, not "to the Ephesians," but "to the Laodicæans." If it were intended for the believers in the Roman province of Asia it wd. naturally be sent first and principally to the Church in the capital city, as at once the largest, most influential, and the one he knew best (see Ephesus).

(4) Where written.—There is a practical unanimity in the tradition that E. was written in Rm. As Paul was a prisoner when he wrote E. the choice is limited to his imprisonment in Cæsarea and that in Rm. There is nothing impossible in either hypothesis. But E. seems to have written in the same circumstances as Col., Php., and Phm., therefore indications of time and place wh. apply to one must apply to all. Guided by this, the balance of probability appears to be in favour of Rm. as the place of origin. Fm. this it follows that E. must be dated A.D. 63. It is impossible to fix the order in wh. the Epp. of the first imprisonment were written; E. and Col. and Phm. appear to have been written about the same time.

EPHESUS. Four valleys break westward fm. the main mass of Asia Minor, those of the Caicus, the Hermus, the Cayster, and the Mæander, separated by ridges, like the fingers (Ramsay) of a gigantic hand, wh. reach out to the sea. E. stood in the mouth of the Cayster valley, on a rich plain c. three miles fm. the shore, the Cayster being then navigable to the walls. E. was the most important city in the Rm. province of Asia. The great road swept fm. her gates into the eastern uplands; and, as the leading seaport, here the highway of land travel and commerce, joined with those of the sea. Jews early settled here, and attained the dignity of citizenship (Ant. XIV. x. 11, 19, 25; Ac. 18.[19], 19.[8]). They were protected in the exercise of their religion, and freed fm. military service. The chief glory of E., and a main source of wealth to her people, was the splendid temple of Diana (see Diana), the city boasting the title of "Temple-keeper," or "Temple-warden" (Ac. 19.[35]). It attracted multitudes of worshippers, who spent freely of their means; and in the sacred security of the temple itself, was deposited much public and private treasure. Miniatures of the shrine in the precious metals were greatly sought after, as souvenirs or amulets (see Demetrius). Secure in the supremacy of their own goddess, the Ephesians seem to have entertained no jealousy of other religious sects, as long as their teaching produced no injurious effects upon their trade and income. They seem to have been peculiarly open to the influence of those who practised the "black arts" (Ac. 19.[11ff.]), cert. magical formulas being known as "Ephesian letters." But while superstitions such as these flourished under the ægis of Diana, the overthrow of the sorcerers wd. cause no anxiety to the temple authorities. The sanctuary was the centre of Asiatic influence, of opposition to enlightenment and progress, as agst. the Greeks, who loved freedom, and sought outlet for their energy and ambition in commercial enterprise.

The strategic value of E. fm. St. Paul's point of view is obvious. By gaining a footing here, he cd. not only attack the rampant heathenism at its very heart: by means of the vast companies of pilgrims, and those whose commercial and other interests brought them to E., he cd. touch practically the whole of the great Asian province. He first visited E. on his second missionary journey, returning fm. Corinth (Ac. 18.[19]). His stay then was short; but he left with the purpose of coming again for a longer period, clearly making it his objective in his third missionary journey. Coming fm. Pisidian Antioch, he settled down to three years' work in E. (Ac. 19.[1, 10], &c.). Apollos and his friends, knowing only the baptism of John (Apollos), were more fully instructed, and added to the fellowship of Christians. Then followed a period of great and varied activity, in wh. the foundations of the Ephesian Church were laid. First to the Jews in the synagogue, for three months, he sought to commend the gospel. Finding them obdurate, he secured the lecture hall of the philosopher Tyrannus, where he met with great success. But privately also, fm. house to house, he prosecuted his mission, until the influence of his teaching was seen in the public failure of interest in the worship of Diana, manifested in the disinclination to purchase the souvenirs by wh. the craftsmen made their wealth. These then stirred up the crowd agst. Paul and his companions, and rushing to the theatre with vast uproar, things assumed a threatening aspect. Then the "chief officers of Asia" (ASIARCHS), officials of the province, not of the city, having no direct concern with the worship of Diana, befriended Paul; and the wise advice of the secretary of the city, allaying the tumult, averted danger for the time. Then he deemed it expedient to leave the city. On his return fm. Macedonia, going to Jrs., he summoned the elders of E. to meet him at Miletus (Ac. 18., 19., 20.). On Paul's departure Timothy was left in general charge (1 Tm. 1.[3]), prob. with the assistance of John Mark (2 Tm. 4.[9-11]). Later the Apostle John resided in E. The first of the Epp. to the seven churches is addressed to E. (Rv. 1.[11], 2.[1])—the first brilliant on the string of stars. Here, says tradition, were buried John, Timothy, and the Virgin Mary.

The decline of E. was marked by the silting up of the river bed and the harbour with alluvial deposits, wh. she lacked energy to prevent. Cut off thus from the sea, her importance for commerce disappeared, and her glory departed.

The remains of the temple discovered by Mr. Wood in 1870 show the grandeur of the scale on wh. it was constructed. The temple itself measured 343 ft. by 164 ft., and the basement 418 ft. by 239 ft. The theatre, an enormous structure of the usual form, with tiers of stone seats, was capable of holding over 24,000 people.

EPHOD. The E. was the characteristic garment of the priests (1 S. 22.[18]). The E. of the High Priest was a very elaborate and costly garment. Full and minute directions for its making are given in Ex. 28.[6-12], but fm. the terms employed it is imposs. now to determine its form with certainty. It may have been like a herald's coat—a back and front, united by shoulder-straps, and bound round the body by a girdle (RV. "cunningly woven band"). It was fastened on the shoulders by two brooches of onyx stone, on each of wh. were engraved the names of six of the tribes of Isr. The E. was made "of gold, of blue, and of purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen, the work of the cunning workman." The "robe of the E." (v. 31ff.), over wh. it was worn (29.[5]), was all of blue, with "a hole for the head in the midst thereof." There is no mention of armholes, so prob. it was like the garments described by Doughty (Arabia Deserta, i. 375). "Some of these women's smocks are made open sidewise, as it were but a shirt-cloth, through whose midst the head is put, so only hanging fm. the neck." The skirts were ornamented with pomegranates of blue and purple and scarlet, and balls of gold. The breastplate was fastened to the E. by "a lace of blue," through rings of gold attached to each.

The E. worn by the ordinary priests was of simple linen, but prob. similar in shape to the above.

Gideon "set up" (Heb. yatzēg) in Ophrah an E. made of gold the present value of wh. wd. be about £3600 (Jg. 8.[26f.]). This, it has been thought, cd. not be an ornamental vestment for a priest: but prob. encased some obj. of idolatrous worship, as the E. did the priest. "All Isr. went a whoring after it." We may, however, suppose it to have been an elaborate piece of golden scale or chain-work, worn by the priest, to whose oracles a factitious value and superstitious reverence attached. The Heb. yatzēg means "to establish" (Am. 5.[15]), as well as "to set up." The mention of E. and TERAPHIM as principal objects in a sanctuary (Jg. 17.[5], &c.) points to a distinction between images and E.

At Nob we find that Goliath's sword was placed "behind the E." (1 S. 21.[9]). This prob. refers to the frame or other support on wh. the E. hung when not in use. "The E." there is doubtless that of the High Priest, as distinguished fm. those of the other priests (22.[18]). It was taken by Abiathar when he escaped to David. In it seems to have been the bag containing the sacred lots, URIM and THUMMIM. Wearing the E., the priest was able to give oracular responses (30.[7]). This made the E. so essential a part of the furniture of a shrine.

EPHPHATHA, an Aram. word spoken by our Lord to a deaf and dumb man (Mk. 7.[34]); imp. ithpa'al of pethaḥ, "to open." Strictly it ought to be ethphathaḥ. The assimilation of the ת to the פ may represent a Galilean pronunciation.

EPHRAIM, 2nd s. of Joseph and Asenath, born in Egp., adopted, along with his br. Manasseh, by Jacob, who preferred the younger to the elder (Gn. 41.[50ff.], 48.[13ff.]). The blessing of Jacob united them in Joseph (49.[22f.]). For the strength of the tribe see NUMBERS. A certain prestige attached to E., whence sprang the great leader Joshua (1 Ch. 7.[27]). It never willingly occupied a second place, and was quick to resent a real or fancied slight (Jg. 7.[24], 8.[1], 12.[1ff.]). No objn. was raised to the advancement of Benjamin, a Rachel tribe, by Saul's election to the throne, although the passing of power fm. the hands of the Ephraimite Samuel must have been a wrench to loyalty; but only with a bad grace did E. concede the hegemony to Judah, in the person of David (2 S. 2.[9ff.]). The Ephraimites were ready to stab at Judah by alliance with Absalom (2 S. 15.[13]), and tried to sow discord on the k.'s return (19.[41ff.]). E.'s own ambition, and her envy of Judah, opened an inviting field for the designs of Jeroboam, and when the folly of Rehoboam furnished the occasion, E. was more than ripe for revolt. After the disruption there was no question of E.'s leadership in the northern kdm.; fm. that time "Israel" and "Ephraim" are synonymous terms.

E. and Manasseh appear at first to have occupied territory in common (Jo. 17.14ff.). When the division was made we do not know. In Jo. 16. the boundaries of E. are indicated, but we cannot follow them with certy. The S. corrsps. with the N. border of Benj., running down W'ward fm. Bethel to Beth-horon the lower. It then swept N'ward to the bank of the brook Kanah (Wādy Kanah), along wh. it ran E'ward and turned to the N., skirting the W. edge of the plain of Mukhneh (Michmethah) to the neighbourhood of Shechem. It then bent E. and S. past Taanath-shilo (Ta'ana) and Janoah (Yanūn) to Ataroth, prob. et Trîme, on the border of Benj. This included much excellent land, well watered, abounding in corn-fields and vineyards. The prosperous agricultural life in E. is reflected in many prophetic utterances, e.g. Is. 28.1, 4; Jr. 31.18; Ho. 9.13, 10.11, &c.

The Forest of E., Heb. ya'ar E., prob. a rocky district with scrub and brushwood = Arb. wa'r, where Absalom was overthrown, therefore E. of Jordan, not far fm. Mahanaim, unidentd.

Mount E.—The Heb. har-E. must not be trd. with RV. " hill country of E." It is a phrase like the mod. Jebel Nāblūs, wh. does not mean " hill country of N.," but that part of the mountain wh. is subj. to Nablūs. So Mt. E. is just that part of the mountain wh. fell to the lot of E.

EPHRAIM. (1) An unidentd. city, near wh. was Baal Hazor—Tell 'Asūr (2 S. 13.23), prob. = the E. of OEJ., 20 Rm. miles N. of Jrs., near Sinjil and el-Lubbān. Fm. it the district " Apherima in Samaria " may have been named (1 M. 11.34; Ant. XIII. iv. 9). (2) The place near the wilderness, whither Jesus withdrew (Jn. 11.54). Jerome (OEJ. s.v. " Afra ") mentions a vill. " Efrem " five Rm. miles E. of Bethel, perhaps the same named by Josephus with Bethel (BJ. IV. ix. 9). This prob. corrspds. with mod. et-Taiyibeh, an anct. site four miles NE. of Beitīn.

EPHRATAH, RV. EPHRATHAH. Taking Ps. 132.6 with 1 Ch. 2.50, it wd. appear that E. is the name of a district, not of a city, the extent of wh. may be roughly estimated fm. the three cities within it; Kirjath-jearim, Bethlehem, and Beth Gader. Ephrath.—(1) Said to be the anct. name of Bethlehem (Gn. 35.16; Ru. 4.11, &c.); fm. this the above district may have been named. (2) Caleb's second w. (1 Ch. 2.19).

EPHRON (2 Ch. 13.19, AV. " Ephrain "). (1) A town taken by Abijah along with Bethel and Jeshana: prob. = EPHRAIM 2. (2) A mountain on the border of Judah and Benj. between Nephtoah and Kirjath-jearim (Jo. 15.9): prob. the ridge W. of Bethlehem. (3) A Hittite fm. whom Abraham bought the land with the cave of Machpelah.

EPICUREAN, a follower of Epicurus; the E. taught that tranquil pleasure was the Supreme Good: that though there were gods they took no care of men. When Paul encountered the E. they had become mere materialists (Ac. 17.18). The word survives in the speech of mod. Palestinian Jews in the form of Epikoris, a term of opprobrium applied to apostates fm. the ancestral faith.

ERASTUS. (1) Chamberlain (RV. " treasurer ") of the city of Corinth (Rm. 16.23); see CHAMBERLAIN. (2) A friend and travelling companion of Paul and Timothy (Ac. 19.22; 2 Tm. 4.20).

ERECH, one of the four cities that formed the beginning of Nimrod's kdm. (Gn. 10.10). It is the Uruk of the inscrs., the Arb. Warka, a great and important ruin to the SE. of Bab., on the left bank of the Euphrates. The site measures about six miles in circumference. Extensive excavations have cast light chiefly on the later hist. of the city, but inscrs. prove it to have been made the capital of Bab. c. 4000 B.C. (Rogers, History of Bab. and Asyr. i. 354f.). Here Ishtar was worshipped. The city is frequently mentioned in the Lit. of Bab. and Asyr.

ESAR-HADDON (Asshur-ah-iddina, " Asshur has given a brother "), s. and successor of Sennacherib, k. of Asyr. E. was conducting a war in Ararat when his fr. was murdered by his brs. (2 K. 19.37; Is. 37.38). He met and defeated the parricides with the army of Ararat, where they had taken refuge, near Malatiyeh, and was hailed by the victors as k. of Asyr. He rebuilt the ruined Bab., wh. then ranked with Nineveh as a royal residence. For this restoration Manasseh, k. of Judah, along with other subject monarchs in the W., provided wood and stone; and hither, accdg. to the chronicler (2 Ch. 33.11), he was carried captive.

As a ruler E. was prudent and humane, as a soldier he was sagacious and skilful. His enemies in the N. were decisively subdued. SIDON he took and destroyed, settling in the country colonists fm. Elam and Bab. (Ez. 4.[2]). After a successful campaign to reduce certain tribes in Arabia, he subdued Egp., Taharka the k. taking refuge in Ethiopia. Two years later, while on the way to quell a rebellion in Egp., he was taken ill and died, having reigned thirteen yrs. Under him, with the conquest of Egp., the Asyr. empire attained its greatest power.

ESAU, the elder twin br. of Jacob, with whom rivalry began before their birth (Gn. 25.[22, 26]). His name, "rough," was given fm. his appearance, "all over like an hairy garment." E. grew up strong of frame and fond of the chase. He was his fr.'s favourite, while Jacob, a quiet lad about the tents, was his mr.'s care. To the weary huntsman returning fm. the hills, ready to perish with hunger, the prerogatives of the first-born, including social and religious headship of the family, besides, in this case, the inheritance of the promise, did not seem of great value, and he fell into the snare laid for him by his crafty br., selling, in his extremity, his birthright for a dish of cooked lentils. Fm. the colour of the food he is said to have been called "Edom," red. The name, as applied to the land occupied by his descendants, prob. came fm. the red hue of the prevailing rocks (EDOM). E.'s hope of securing his fr.'s blessing was frustrated by the artifice of Rebekah and Jacob's skill in deception (Gn. 27.). Rebekah, hearing of E.'s anger and purpose of revenge, got Jacob sent to her own kindred, under pretext of seeking a w. (see JACOB). E. married, at the age of 40, two Hittite w.'s (Gn. 26.[34]). In the hope of pleasing his parents he married also Mahalath, his cousin (Gn. 28.[9]). During Jacob's absence E. gained a position of wealth and influence in Mt. Seir, henceforth associated with his descendants. Poss. no longer caring for revenge, or mollified by the rich gifts of his br., he welcomed him back with great cordiality, and returned to his adopted home (Gn. 32., 33.[1-16]). The brs. met again at the burial of their fr. (35.[29]). Thereafter they parted amicably, E. taking with him to Mt. Seir the share of his fr.'s property that fell to him (36.[6ff.]). Perhaps "worldly-minded" best expresses the meaning of bebēlos, applied to E. (He. 12.[16]). The memory of E. was cordially detested among the later Jews, who thought no crime too black to be laid to his charge. See JACOB.

ESCHATOLOGY. In treating of this subj. we must be on our guard agst. the tendency to build conclusions upon single texts, or to ask fm. the N.T. detailed information about the future world. Everything about that world necessary for consolation is to be found in the NT., but nothing that ministers to curiosity. Further, it is not always easy to determine for how much of his teaching an apostle wd. have claimed authority. How far did NT. writers simply use the fig. lang. of their time? may there not be more than one eschatological scheme in Scrip.? has the teaching of Jesus on the subj. been modified by His reporters?—these are some of the more difficult problems confronting the mod. student. In short, there is no department of theology where we are more urgently called to maintain a wise agnosticism as to all unessential details on the one hand, and on the other unflinching assurance as to the central fact.

We shall take three natural divisions: (1) The Return of Christ; (2) Resurrection and Immortality; (3) Judgment and its Issues.

(1) The Return of Christ.—Our Lord, we may reasonably hold, spoke of His own return in the lang. of His age; ignoring, however, the national limitations wh. the Jewish mind had bound up with its eschatology, as well as all inquisitive calculations of day and hour. But of the fact that He will come again in glory Jesus was sure; it is indeed upon its certainty and its suddenness that He chiefly dwells. Again and again He warns the disciples agst. being unprepared. Did He regard the end as very near? Some features of His teaching, like the parable of the Mustard Seed, representing the kdm. as subj. to the law of growth, make that improbable, and in general it is unlike Jesus to be much concerned with times and seasons. He seems rather desirous of so forearming and forewarning His followers as that they shd. not grow dejected or confused if the Parousia were long delayed. Not exact prediction, but sptl. truth, is His chief aim; and fm. this point of view the elusive atmosphere wh. surrounds many of His refcs. to the end is quite intelligible. His own return in glory, then, as an event of absolute certainty but incalculable suddenness—this forms the core of the eschatology of Jesus. There is a remarkable kinship of ideas, suggestive of dependence on the part of the apostle, between the eschatology of Jesus and that of St. Paul. Like other Christians, the apostle felt that the exaltation of Christ could not be the last chapter in the story. Some day the growth of the kdm. would be complete, and the Lord wd. come again to vindicate His universal power. But he rarely paints a picture of the Lord's return. When he does, the minor details vary. The one thing needful—that we shall be for ever with the Lord—is insisted on; everything else is left in obscurity. To begin with, St. Paul expected the Parousia in his own, or at all events his readers' lifetime. Though he wd. not have affirmed it dogmatically, this is clear from 1 Thess. In 2 Cor., however, a presentiment crosses his mind that his life will have ended before Christ comes. And in Php. there is a striking juxtaposition of the two modes of feeling; while in 1.[23]—"I have a desire to depart and be with Christ, for it is very far better"—both the certainty and the desire of surviving have disappeared. Yet to the last St. Paul held that the end of the world was not far distant. He does not profess, any more than Jesus Himself, to know the day or hour. And in general we may say that the nearness of the Second Advent is a variable, and, so to speak, a detachable element in his forecast. St. John, on the other hand, dwells not so much on the fact that Christ will come again on the clouds of heaven, as on the experimental certainty given to every believer that He has come already, and is with His people always as an unseen presence. The only other point wh. we need mark is the allusion in Rv. 20.[4-8] to a millennial kdm.; a period, that is, in wh. Christ will reign in bodily presence upon earth for a thousand yrs. Before this period the writer of the bk. places a resurrection of saints; at its close occur the general resurrection and the Last Judgment. The only general principle wh. casts real light on such a passage is the principle that all numbers of the kind have a symbolic, rather than an arithmetical significance. As the late Prof. Milligan has put it: "The thousand yrs. mentioned in this passage express no period of time. . . . They embody an idea; and that idea, whether applied to the subjugation of Satan or to the triumph of the saints, is the idea of completeness or perfection. Satan is bound for a thousand yrs.; that is, he is completely bound. The saints reign for a thousand yrs.; that is, they are introduced into a state of perfect and glorious victory."

There is that in the Christian mind, incontestably, wh. kindles at once to the promise of Jesus that He will come again. The faith evoked by His Person dares to believe that He will one day strike finally into hist., bringing salvation to its climax. The Church, coping with evil in her anguish, knows that triumph can never be the result of a merely nat. process of evolution. There must be a supernatural interposition on God's part. All the conditions of our being must be transformed, and hist. conducted to its close. Hence the Christian hope of the Second Advent is only, at bottom, one aspect of faith in the exalted Lord, for wh. His return is not an event within the present order, but the end of it. Only so is the goal reached for wh. God made the world; only so is the moral significance of all things revealed unmistakably. Christus Creator is also Christus Consummator. He must reign, till He have put all enemies under His feet.

(2) Resurrection and Immortality.—The doctrine of a resurrection originated with the OT. prophets, first in relation to the nation as a whole, and later to the individual. The idea that individuals wd. rise again first entered into OT. eschatology when religious persecution produced martyrs; as it has been put, "those who died fighting God's battle must not be robbed, when it came, of the joy of victory." In this whole region, the fundamental thought is that of fellowship with God. It constitutes an indissoluble bond, wh. death cannot break. What OT. believers are concerned with is not the mere existence of the spt. beyond death, wh. indeed was never doubted; it was rather life with God and in the light of His face. Hence faith in immortality, when it came to clear consciousness of itself, did so as a corollary or aspect of faith in God.

Here, then, is the bridge leading to NT. doctrine. We see this strikingly in Christ's interview with the Sadducees (Mw. 22.[23ff.]), and in that piercing word with wh. He concludes His answer to their paltry puzzle: "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." In other words, the man to whom God has once given His fellowship possesses and is possessed by Him for ever. When once we have known Him as being to us all that the name God means, we know that immortality is involved in that. It is on this basis that NT. faith in the resurrection is built. It is, indeed, a pre-supposition of belief in the resurrection of Christ Himself, as is shown by St. Peter's words: "God raised up Jesus, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that He shd. be holden of it." In view of the faithfulness of God it was not possible that one like Jesus shd. be relinquished to the grave, and see corruption.

The teaching of Jesus, as reported in the first three Gospels, appears to presuppose a gen. resurrection. The delineation of the Last Judgment, in Mw. 25., in wh. "all nations" are gathered before the Son of Man, is indeed unintelligible save as implying the resurrection of all. In the Fourth Gospel, however, the resurrection of the believer is treated as a part of the bestowment of eternal life; its necessary pre-condition is his sptl. revival, and Jesus represents Himself as having a personal share in effecting it. "No man," He says, "can come unto Me except the Father draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." This makes it difficult to explain the resurrection of the unbeliever, since in his case the pre-condition just named is lacking. But the difficulty is really owing to the fact that the prime concern of faith, its deepest interest, has to do with the resurrection of life, and, under this impulse, lang. is often used as if there were no other. Scrip. tends, in short, to bind up resurrection with a true relationship to God.

At the centre of St. Paul's eschatology stood the resurrection of Jesus Christ, as its reality broke upon him with tremendous force on the way to Damascus. Everafterwards the unseen world was interpreted by him in terms of that all-transforming vision. Christ is the first-fruits of them that sleep; not only so, the resurrection body they are to wear will be like His glorious body. The apostle does not seem to have felt the difficulties which have troubled many as to the ident. of the present with the future body. The sptl. organism we receive will be perfectly fitted for the new life and the new environment; but it has nothing to do with the present material body. "That wh. thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain" (1 Cor. 15.[37]). Like other Scrip. writers, St. Paul deals with the point solely as it concerns believers. He answers difficulties wh. had been felt by Christians about their own destiny, but he does not theorise at large.

Little is said in the NT. regarding the Intermediate State. No vital religious interest seems to have been attached to the subject. Our Lord's words to the thief on the cross plainly state that after death the penitent wd. be with Him, i.e. with God. Further, the NT. use of "sleep" to denote death need not imply that after death there comes a space of unconsciousness, for "a sleeping man does not cease to know himself to be, as dreams sufficiently show us"; but it does imply other ideas, such as repose, continuous existence, and the certainty of waking. Generally, it may be said that apostolic faith overleaps everything between death and resurrection, and hastens on to the goal of reunion with Christ. "Whether we live or die, we are the Lord's." It may be noted further, that in all the Pauline literature there is not a single allusion to the intermediate state of unbelievers. Faith has no interest in expatiating on such a theme.

It is worth noticing that no formal demonstration of immortality is offered by the NT. The tone of the apostles is that of men who by faith know that in Christ they are immortal, and feel no need to buttress an intuitive certainty by logic. Christ was to them a test case; in His experience was exhibited, once for all, the principle on wh. God will go in robbing the grave of its power. There is that in God wh. is stronger than death; it evokes a cert. expectation in the Christian mind; and in the end that expectation will be translated into fact. With what seems the infallibility of common-sense, the NT. represents the future life as life in a body. But it is meaningless to say that that body will be ident. with our present body; some far better thing is promised us, and the NT. enunciates an infinitely more inspiring truth when it declares: "He shall change the body of our humiliation, that it may be like unto the body of His glory."

At this point we may refer to the question of Future Probation; probation, that is, between death and judgment. This is the view that no one will perish who has not had a real opportunity of appropriating the redemption wh. is in Christ; all men are to be brought face to face with Christ, in order that they may deliberately accept or reject Him; and if this has not taken place in this life, it will take place in the next. It is probable that those who hold this theory will always do so not so much upon grounds of Scrip.—for its points of attachment with the NT. are few—as because of their gen. view of the Gospel. We are certainly not encouraged by the NT. to say dogmatically that probation in every case is limited to time. We dare not assert that men to whom Christ has never been worthily presented may not take with them into the unseen such tendencies of char. as, uniting with the effect of Christ's immediate presence, and the consequent revelation of the immeasurable evil of sin, may lead to a change of heart. But neither may we assert that it must be so. And it is a fair question whether, if there be probation for any, there must not be probation for absolutely all. In any case, nothing cd. be more unlike the NT. than a way of thinking upon this subject wh. minimises the importance of moral decisions taken in this world. To throw the emphasis upon the possible opportunities of the future life, is to strike a blow at the ethical solemnity and nobleness of the present.

(3) Judgment and its Issues.—In the teaching of Jesus there occur several allusions to coming judgment. Indeed, "the sternest and most inexorable lang. wh. the NT. contains on this awful subj. is to be found in our Lord's own lips." In proof of this assertion refce. may be made to the passage in the Sermon on the Mount regarding those who claim to have prophesied in Christ's name (Mw. 7.[21-23]), and the picture of the last tribunal in Mw. 25. In the latter passage the apocalyptic scenery is at a minimum. It is an ethical judgment that is portrayed; the object is the moral conduct of persons; the principles applied by the judge are sptl. It is a more difficult question who are the subjects of judgment. Are they all mankind, or Christians, or the heathen? The third of these possible views has, on the whole, most in its favour. St. Paul's dependence on the tradition of our Lord's words is again clear in his belief that the judge, in the final scene, will be Christ Himself. Similarly, the issues on wh. he dwells are always ethical. All men, including believers, will be judged; the fire shall try every man's work; but also it will be part of Christ's righteous judgment—that is, of His fidelity to His word—to bestow the reward promised for obedient service. Scrip., however, gives no support to the common notion that the reward will be equal in every case. Nothing is clearer fm. Jesus' parables of the Talents and the Pounds than that each will be assigned that place and that portion for wh. capacities developed on earth have fitted him.

In regard to those who are not in Christ, three views of the issues of judgment have been held. (a) Universal Restoration.—No one can possibly contend that the gen. drift of the NT. is in favour of this theory. The utmost that can be pleaded is that the Christian hope is occasionally stated in terms so ample as to sugg. the ultimate salvation of all men. So, for example, Rm. 11.[32], "God hath shut up all unto disobedience, that He mt. have mercy upon all"; or 1 Cor. 15.[28], "that God may be all in all." But a more precise exegesis shows these verses to be irrelevant to our problem. More support, unquestionably, not of a logical but of a sptl. kind, may be found in some great OT. texts, such as "He retaineth not His anger for ever, because He delighteth in mercy." On the other hand, a verse like 1 Cor. 1.[18], "The preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness," cannot be evaded. Hence the dogmatic assertion of universal restoration can only be described as a departure fm. NT. relg. The real difficulties of the theory have nothing to do with God's mercy; they have to do with man's freedom. (b) Conditional Immortality.—This is the view that man is not immortal by nature, but only receives the gift of immortality through union with Jesus Christ. When it becomes impossible to separate a man fm. his sin, when he and evil are one, nothing remains but that the evil shd. be annihilated. The doctrine of man's nat. immortality, on the other hand, was no part of the original message, and was introduced in the second or third century. The value of this theory lies in its conviction that life, accdg. to the only sense in wh. a Christian feels it worth while to use the word, is life in Christ. Nor does it necessarily involve the denial of future punishment, but merely of eternal future punishment. What it maintains is that God will not to all eternity tolerate a dead limb in a universe wh. He has redeemed. At some time in the future, He fm. whom life has come will withdraw the gift of life fm. the invincibly wicked. (c) Everlasting Punishment.—The strength of this theory resides in its firm grasp of the persistence of moral char. And to be fair, it must be remembered that its advocates wd. emphasise the fact that the doom of the impenitent is self-chosen. Nothing that God may do, whether in this life, or, if that be conceivable, in the next, can impair man's liberty to choose; for ever and ever he is free, and master of his fate. Moreover, punishment is to be distinguished fm. torture. In conclusion, it may be said that on NT. ground we have to choose between the last two of the views just described. There is a severance of the good fm. the evil, and it is final. There is an eternal life, and an eternal death as its antithesis; but over the precise nat. of final destruction a veil is drawn. In any case, if we desire to gain and keep the NT. perspective, we shall fix our minds, as we look forward, not on the doom of the lost, but on the glory reserved for those who are Christ's at His coming.

ESHCOL. (1) One of the Amorite chiefs who joined Abraham in pursuit of Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.[13], &c.). (2) Vale of E., "Vale of grape clusters" (Nu. 13.[23], &c.). The name prob. lingers in Beit Iskāhel, c. three miles NW. of Hebron. The grapes of this district are still greatly esteemed.

ESHTAOL, a town in the Shephelah, on the border of Judah and Dan (Jo. 15.[33], 19.[41]), near Zorah, between wh. and E. lay Mahaneh-Dan, the home and burying-place of Samson. It is prob. the mod. Ashūa', c. 1½ miles E. of Zorah—Sar'ah.

ESHTEMOA, a priestly city (Jo. 21.[14]; 1 Ch. 6.[57]), in the mountain of Judah (Jo. 15.[50]) wh. is associated with the Calebites (1 Ch. 4.[19]); favourable to David (1 S. 30.[28]) = es Semū'a, a vill. with many ruins fm. Byzantine and Crusading times, nine miles S. of Hebron.

ESTHER, THE BOOK OF. The last of the five Megillōth, "Rolls," the others being Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and Lamentations. It was read at the Feast of Purim, and is an explanation of the institution of that feast.

(1) Contents.—The Persian k. Ahasuerus makes a feast in Susa, during the course of wh. he quarrels with and divorces his queen, Vashti. After some yrs. he desires to put some one in the place of Vashti. A Jewish maiden named Hadassah, who had been brought up by her cousin Mordecai, is, possibly by the connivance of Mordecai, introduced into the seraglio, with the result that she becomes queen. A new name is given to her, and prob. a fictitious parentage devised for her, in order to hide her Jewish origin. Her cousin is able to communicate with her; he makes use of this facility to inform her of a conspiracy agst. Ahasuerus, wh. is thus frustrated. Meantime Haman, the newly appointed vizier, has taken umbrage at Mordecai, and determines on his act. to destroy the whole Jewish nation. Having secured the decree fm. the monarch, he waits but the auspicious day for realising his design; so he has "lots" (purim) cast before him; the lot indicates the 13th day of the 12th month. Mordecai informs E. of the disaster impending over her nation. By her influence over her husband she secures the destruction of Haman, the enemy of her people; by gaining them the right of self-defence she delivers her kinsfolk fm. threatened annihilation.

(2) Language.—In grammar and vocabulary it is late, very like the style of Nehemiah and Ezra.

(3) Date.—Prob. the later yrs. of the Persian rule.

(4) Historicity.—If E. were a romance it wd. not detract fm. its inspiration, but it wd. certainly make a diffc. in interpretation. The main arguments agst. the historicity of E. are disagreements with Herodotus; but the accuracy of the "father of history" is not now unquestioned. The identity of Ahasuerus is a crucial question; the choice is restricted to Darius, Xerxes, or Artaxerxes. The first and last are excluded by dates and char. The char. of Xerxes suits, and also very strikingly the dates. In his third yr., when X. makes the feast of chap. 1., he has just returned fm. the reconquest of Egp., and is beginning his preparations for invading Greece. In his seventh, when Esther is introduced into the harem, he has not long returned fm. that disastrous expedition. In several other points there is an accuracy in regard to the habits and constitution of the Persian court wh. is unlike the Jew; at the same time there are symptoms that Jewish megalomania has influenced a later editor. That E. may be Amestris is not so impossible as some maintain. A Gr. historian relating the story of E. fm. Persian sources wd. represent her as rivalling Amestris in cruelty; and, as we have said above, an ancestry cd. easily be provided.

(5) Canonicity.—The fact that the name of God does not occur, and that fasting is the only religious exercise mentioned, afforded reason of debate among the Rabbins; it led them to remedy the defect by discovering acrostics of the sacred name.

The Alexandrian Jews inserted passages in wh. the Divine Name is frequent, dreams by wh. God makes known the future, and prayers for help. No book has had more influence on the Jews than the "Megillah."* At times, to mark escape fm. disaster wh. threatened the nation, a new "Megillah" has been composed, e.g. in Egp. in 1524 (see Jewish Quarterly, Jan. 1896, pp. 274–288). The theory of Jensen, that E. records the triumph of the Bab. relg. in Elam; that E. and Mordecai are Istar and Marduk, and Haman and Vashti are Elamite deities, has only the accidental resemblance of names in its favour.

ETAM. (1) A town in Judah, fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[6]), named with Bethlehem and Tekoa (cp. LXX, Jo. 15.[59]; Ant. VIII. vii. 3). The name is found in 'Ain 'Atān, at the "Pools of Solomon," three great reservoirs in the valley E. of the Hebron road, two miles SW. of Bethlehem, connected with Jrs. by Pilate's aqueduct. The powerful spring in the heart of the hill is identd. with the "sealed fountain" (SS. 4.[12]). (2) A town in Simeon, prob. = 'Aitūn, NW. of Beersheba. (3) The rock E. (Jg. 15.[8]), in the cleft of wh. Samson dwelt; unidentd.

ETHAM. A station of the Isr. on the edge of the wilderness of Etham, W. of Shur (Ex. 13.[20]; Nu. 33.[6, 8]). The name answers to the Egyptian ḥetem, "fortress." E. may have been the fortress at the eastern end of the Egpn. frontier defences, wh. stretched across the isthmus of Suez.

ETHAN. (1) A wise man whom Solomon excelled (1 K. 4.[31]), to whom the title ascribes Ps. 89.; s. of Ezrah = Zerah (1 Ch. 2.[6]). (2) A descendant of Gershon (1 Ch. 6.[42]). (3) A Merarite Levite, who gave his name to a guild of musicians (1 Ch. 6.[44], &c.).

ETHANIM. See YEAR.

ETHBAAL, k. of Tyre, c. B.C. 885–854, fr. of Jezebel (1 K. 16.[31]), said by Menander to have been a priest of Astarte, who gained the throne by the murder of his predecessor (Jos. Contra Ap. i. 18; "Ithobalos").

* "The Megillah" applied specially to the Bk. of Esther.

ETHIOPIA, ETHIOPIANS. (1) Name and Country.—The Heb. Cush is trd. in the LXX by the Gr. Æthiopia. The Gr. name is of doubtful origin, some deriving it fm. the Gr. aithops, meaning red, but it is doubtful if we have not a native or perhaps an Egpn. name carried over and given a Gr. dress. The land Ethiopia or Cush was situated in the valley of the Nile S. of the first cataract and extending towards the Upper Nile on the W. and the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf on the E. The Gr. term Ethiopia, however, seems to have been vaguely applied to the land S. of Egp., while Cush was restricted to land of the Nile valley. About B.C. 1500 this territory, wh. at a later date came to be called Nubia, was divided into northern and southern provinces, the former called Wawat, the latter Kos, the Heb. Cush, wh. came to be applied to the whole territory.

(2) History.—Ethiopia or Cush during the centuries underwent many political changes, being at one time an independent kdm., and again a dependency of Egp. It was repeatedly invaded by Egpn. ks., and during the earlier dynasties was placed under an Egpn. deputy resident at Naputa. At a later date Ethiopia became an independent kdm. with Meröe as its capital. It was ruled over by ks. who seem to have been little more than the creatures of a priestly aristocracy, while the queen mother exerted an important influence, and several queens of Ethiopia are mentioned. At the time of Isaiah we find Cush regarded as a first-rate power (cp. Is. 7.[18]), and practically identd. with Egp. (Is. 20.[4f.]). In the yr. B.C. 24, Candace, a queen of Ethiopia, invaded Egp., wh. led to the destruction of the capital by the Rm. general Petronius. The refce. in Acts 8.[27] to the eunuch of Candace shows that the kdm. survived this defeat. In the Christian era the name Nubæ or Nobades was given to the tribes of the Nile, and a Christian Nobadian kdm. existed till late in the Middle Ages.

The people of Cush seem to have been a mixed race, consisting for the most part of negroes, among whom reddish brown, probably Hamitic, tribes were mingled.

The Ethiopic Canon, as shown by the Bible of the Abyssinian churches, is more extensive than even that of Alexandria. A large number of the pseudepigrapha, the existence of wh. had been known previously only by references in the Fathers, are in it. But all the received bks. are translated fm. the Gr. The Ethiopic VV. are of value chiefly as helping to fix the text of LXX.

ETHNARCH. See Governor.

EUNICE, a Jewess (Ac. 16.[1]), mr. of Timothy, dr. of Lois; married a Gr. St. Paul mentions her "unfeigned faith" (2 Tm. 1.[5]).

EUNUCH (Heb. ṣarīṣ). Eunuchs were usual adjuncts to an Eastern court, and so are frequently depicted on the slabs of Nineveh. E. were not allowed to enter the congregation of the Lord (Dt. 23.[1]). Frequently E. was used of "court official," as of Potiphar (Gn. 39.[1]), who is called ṣarīṣ. Eunuchs often wielded great influence in high places (Rawlinson, Anct. Mon. iv. 175). In the anct. world they were renowned for their fidelity (Herod viii. 105; Xenophon, Cyr. vii. 5, 60[ff.]). They were common in Pal. at the time of Christ (Ant. XVI. viii. 1; Mw. 19.[12]).

EUODIAS, a female member of the Church of Philippi, at variance with Syntyche (Php. 4.[2]), prob. owing to different views in matters of relg.

EUPHRATES (Heb. phrat, in Sumerian pura, "the water," hence Bab. purat, and Old Persian Uphrat), the principal river of SW. Asia. In OT. usually "the river," as in Ex. 23.[31]; Dt. 11.[24]; 1 K. 4.[24]. The E. rises in Armenia; after flowing SW. it finds its way through the Taurus, and turns to the SE. After a course of 500 miles it is joined by the Tigris at Kurna, and, as Shaṭṭ-el-'Arab, falls into the Persian Gulf. It is one of the four rivers of Paradise (Gn. 2.[14]). One famous ford in anct. times was at Carchemish—mod. Jerabis. For irrigation the water of the E. was conducted in canals all over the Babylonian plains. In former times the two rivers entered the Persian Gulf apart; but the gathering silt has pushed back the seashore and drawn them into one channel.

Crossing the Euphrates

EUROCLYDON. The exact form of the name has been much canvassed; that now generally adopted—cp. WH. and RV.—is Euraquilo, wh. prob. means ENE. Judging by the course taken by the drifting ship, this is the direction whence the tempestuous (lit. "typhonic") wind must have blown (Ac. 27.[14]). This is quite in harmony with mod. experience in the Levant.

EUTYCHUS, a youth of Troas, who, overcome by sleep during a long speech by Paul, fell fm. a window seat in an upper room, and, being taken up dead, was restored to life by the apostle (Ac. 20.[7ff.]).

EVANGELIST, lit. "proclaimer of good news." In the list (Eph. 4.[11]) of those whom God has given to perform special functions in the Church, the E. comes after the Apostle and Prophet, and before the Pastor and Teacher. In the case of Philip, who is called "the E." (Ac. 21.[8]), we have one who was set apart for other work (Ac. 7.[3f.]), who afterwards went fm. place to place, spreading the "good news" of the coming of the Messiah (Ac. 8.[5], &c.), finally settling at Cæsarea, where prob. he still carried on the same work. The higher functions did not exclude that of the E., since both Apostles and Prophets were also bringers of the good news. But the Apostles were possessed of special authority, and the E. cd. not, like them, bestow the Holy Ghost (8.[14ff.]), nor did he enjoy the special inspiration of the Prophet. He simply communicated the good news to those who had not heard it. He was not a Pastor with oversight of a particular flock, nor a Teacher whose business it was to instruct the saints. Timothy, in addition to the charge entrusted to him, cd. also do the work of an E. (1 Tm. 4.[5]).

The name is not found as the title of a distinct official in sub-apostolic times. As the life, works, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, embodied in the four Gospels, came to mean "the Evangel" par excellence, the name E. was applied to the writers, and this use has been common since the time of Œcumenius and Chrysostom.

EVE (Heb. ḥawwāh, "life"), w. of ADAM, fm. whose side she was taken; deceived by the serpent, she led Adam into transgression.

EVIL-MERODACH (Bab. Amil-Marduk), s. and successor of NEBUCHADNEZZAR. In the yr. of his accession he released Jehoiachin, k. of Judah, and assigned him a portion fm. the k.'s table (2 K. 25.[27]). After a reign of two yrs. E. was assassinated by NERGAL-SHAREZER, his br.-in-law.

EXCELLENT. Kratistos is a title of respect used four times (Lk. 1.[3]; Ac. 23.[26], 24.[3], 26.[25]). In the first two cases AV. trs. "most excellent," in the others "most noble"; RV. uniformly "most excellent." In the last three instances it is cert. used as an official title, in addressing the Rm. governors, Felix and Festus. The presumption is that, although it cannot be proved, Theophilus was a man of high rank.

EXODUS, BOOK OF. This name was given to the bk. by the Gr. translators with refce. to the outstanding event it records, the "Departure" of the children of Isr. fm. Egp. In the Heb. canon it is simply denoted by the opening words, "These are the names," or more briefly, "Names," and Jewish writers, when they wish to indicate more precisely its contents, call it "Damages," fm. the legalistic aspect of the latter part of the bk. Although in a manner complete in itself, it is closely related to Genesis and to the succeeding bks. of the Pentateuch of wh. it forms a constituent part. The Bk. of Genesis exhibits the gradual elimination and expansion of a chosen family, wh., as the bk. closes, goes down to Egp. E. shows how this people grew into a nation, and was prepared to enter upon an independent national life. The bk. divides itself natly. into two parts: the first, chaps. 1.–15.[21], tracing the growth and preparation of the people, and their deliverance fm. Egyptian bondage; and the second, chaps. 15.[22]–40., the consolidation of the people with a civil constitution and regulated worship. In the first part we are told how the Isrs. were oppressed in Egp., and how they multiplied in spite of the measures taken to reduce them. We have the birth and upbringing of Moses, his flight, and his call to be the leader of his people; the prolonged struggle for liberty, marked by the plagues, and culminating in the death of the first-born of the Egyptians and the institution of the Passover; the hasty departure and the march to the Red Sea; the destruction of the Egyptian host and the Israelites' triumphal song of deliverance. In the second part are related various incidents on the march to Sinai, where in awful majesty God gives the Law, and the Covenant is ratified as the basis of the nation's constitution. Directions are given for the making of the Tabernacle and the consecration of the priests, followed by the episode of the golden calf, and the renewal of the broken Tables. The construction and erection of the Tabernacle are described, on wh. the cloud of glory descends to symbolise the Divine presence, and to guide the people on their future journeys. There are thus two literary elements in the bk., narrative and legislative; but these are not kept absolutely distinct, for there runs a thread of nar. through the legislative portion, and the institution and regulations of the Passover, for example, come in the middle of the nar. of the deliverance. Moreover, though there is a general progression in the nar., things are not always related in their strict historical order. Thus, in 12.[17], in the institution of the Passover, before the Exodus had taken place, we read: "for in this selfsame day have I brought your hosts out of the land of Egp."; and in 16.[34], before there is any mention of the Tabernacle and the Ark of Testimony, it is said that Aaron laid up a pot of manna before the Testimony to be kept. The following verse adds that "the children of Isr. did eat manna forty yrs., until they came to a land inhabited." These are clear indications that the bk., in its present form, is later than the events wh. it records; and it is the task of criticism to determine, if poss., the time and manner of its composition. Now, seeing that E. forms a constituent part of the Pnt., and exhibits literary features found in other parts of that composite work, mod. critics recognise in it the various "sources" and "redactions" through wh., by a gradual process, the whole PENTATEUCH came into its final form. Thus the older historical sources J. and E., wh. in many places are so closely blended as to be separately indistinguishable, are found in the nar. parts of the bk., while the portions wh. describe the Tabernacle are all assigned to the late priestly writer, P. Besides these, however, there are recognised the additions of redactors before or at the time of the fusion of J. and E., and also additions by a Deuteronomic reviser after JE. had been combined and before the final addition of P. These conclusions are arrived at by critical processes wh. the ordinary reader finds himself not very able to follow, and at not a few points of wh. he will be disposed to make objection. For example, seeing that Moses is so prominent in the bk., and by universal consent was the chief instrument in giving the nation a civil and religious constitution, and that it is distinctly stated that he wrote certain things (17.14, 24.4, 34.27), it is hard to believe, as is asserted, that we cannot be sure that any part of the present bk. came fm. his hand. It is one thing to say that in its final form it is not his work, but quite another thing to say that nothing wh. he said or wrote is preserved in it. And when critics say that the Law, though not expressed in the words of Moses, is conceived in his spirit, one is disposed to ask how the people who showed themselves so incapable of apprehending the spt. at all shd. have achieved this without preserving any authentic record of his spoken or written words. There is also a difficulty in accounting for the so-called Deuteronomic additions (DEUTERONOMY). As to the Tabernacle, it is, no doubt, a remarkable thing that we hear so little of it after the wilderness journey, and strange that so gorgeous an erection shd. pass entirely into oblivion. But surely it wd. be no less incredible that a writer so late as the Exile shd. give so minute a description of a thing wh. never existed —a thing of wh. one must believe he had to construct a model before he cd. give such a concrete description of its parts. The question naturally arises, how far these critical speculations affect the validity of the bk. as a historical record. Some critics, indeed, go so far as to deny the sojourn of the tribes of Isr. in Egp., and reduce Moses to a very shadowy or legendary fig. The more moderate critics, however, assign to Moses a paramount place as a leader and organiser, and the founder of the Law, although not the author of the legislative codes of the Pnt. They also accept as historical facts the sojourn of some tribes, at least, in Egp., their successful issue fm. that country, their wandering in the desert, and their final occupation of Canaan. Some may be disposed to think that the evidence on wh. they accept these facts wd. be sufficient to establish more. Less than that, at all events, cd. scarcely be asserted in the face of the concurrent testimony in the main of the different sources, and the subsequent hist. That hist. finds a great part of its confirmation and explanation fm. this bk. It shows how the Isr., though dwelling in Egp., were not worshippers of the gods of the country, and, though bondmen, had not lost their sense of unity nor the recollection of the faith of their fathers. The bk. clearly teaches that the God who took Isr. into covenant as a nation first showed Himself Lord of nature and mightier than the gods of Egp., a different view fm. that wh. represents Him as simply the god of a single tribe or confederacy of tribes. The bk. also shows the beginning of what the whole subsequent hist. exhibits at length. Moses was the first in the long line of prophets on whom was laid the hard task of reminding a disobedient and gainsaying people of their high calling in God's purpose, and holding up before them a standard of holiness to wh. they were unwilling or unable to rise. JAMES ROBERTSON.

EXODUS, THE. The date of the Exodus of the Isr. fm. Egp. was fixed by Prof. Naville's discovery of the site of Pithom in 1883. Pithom, Egyptian Pa-Tum, "House of Tum" (now Te lel-Maskhuta), proved to have been built by Ramses II., third k. of the 19th dyn. (B.C. 1348–1281, Mahler; 1300–1234, Petrie). Since the Isr. had built it, together with Raamses (Ex. 1.11), for the Pharaoh of the Oppression, the latter must have been Ramses II., and the Pharaoh of the Exodus (Ex. 2.23) will therefore have been his son and successor Meneptah II. The city of Raamses, wh. Petrie idents. with Tel er-Rotâba (Hyksos and Isr. Cities, 1906), was also built by Ramses II., as we learn fm. a papyrus. The 19th dyn. represented the national reaction agst. the Asiatic tendencies of the later Pharaohs of the 18th dyn. They had married Asiatic princesses, and finally Amon-hotep IV. (Khu-n-Aten) had filled his court with foreigners fm. Canaan, had persecuted the orthodox worshippers of Amon, and had endeavoured to force an Asiatic form of faith upon his people. But the attempt had failed; the national party had triumphed, and the new creed and its adherents had been stamped out. The offices of state were again held by natives, and Egyptian armies recovered the lost province of Canaan. The foreigner was expelled fm. Egp. or reduced to public servitude. This was the case with the Isr., whose position in Goshen (Wâdy Tumilât) on the north-eastern border of Egp. made them dangerous in the event of an invasion fm. Asia. Thro' Goshen the enemy cd. penetrate without difficulty into the Delta. The free Bedouin, accdgly., who herded their cattle in Goshen, were made the Pharaoh's serfs, and employed upon the constructions of a k. whose master-passion was bldg., and who, during his long reign of 67 yrs., covered Egp. with cities, temples, and palaces. Even so the serfs multiplied, and further measures were taken to diminish their numbers by destroying the male children. One of these was saved by a dr. of the k., who adopted the boy and gave him the name of Messu (Mosheh), "son," a common Egyptian name at that period, wh. was borne in the reign of Meneptah by a governor of Ethiopia. Moses, on growing up, killed an Egyptian overseer whom he saw oppressing one of his race, and was accdgly. forced to fly beyond the frontiers of Egp. to Midian, where he married the dr. of the High Priest. While here Ramses II. died, and he received commands fm. J". to return to Egp. and deliver the Isr. fm. their bondage. The priest Aaron, who was a skilled orator, was associated with him in his mission, and the Pharaoh, who seems to have been at Zoan (Tanis), was requested to allow his serfs to go three days' journey into the desert and there sacrifice to their God. Meneptah refused the request, the daily task of his Israelite brickmakers was increased, and they were bidden to find for themselves the chopped straw (tibn) wh. was mixed with the clay of the bricks. Again Moses and Aaron appealed to the Pharaoh, and Aaron enforced the appeal by changing his rod into a serpent, a feat, however, wh. was imitated by the Egyptian "magicians." Then followed the ten plagues (see PLAGUES), and at last, when the k.'s own first-born had died in the night along with the first-born of his subjects, the Isr. tribes were dismissed in haste. They fled in the night, after first despoiling their late task-masters, accompanied by their flocks and herds and "a mixed multitude." Hardly were they gone than Meneptah regretted their dismissal; his late serfs were making for the home of the ancestral enemies of Egp., and it wd. be easy to overtake them before they had passed the Shur or "Wall" of fortifications wh. protected Egp. on its Asiatic side, and, after destroying the more independent and dangerous among them, to reduce the rest to their former servitude. A squadron of 600 chariots was therefore sent after them, followed by a body of foot-soldiers. The Isr. had avoided the northern road along the coast fm. Egp. to Pal., as that wd. have led them to Gaza, wh. was still an Egyptian garrison, and they accdgly. took the road towards the mod. Kantara, hoping to be able to slip past the southern end of the Shur. The town of Raamses or Rameses had been their gathering-place; hence they marched to Succoth, Egyptian Thukot, the civil name of Pithom and the district in wh. it stood. Their next stage was Etham, called the Khetem or "Fortress" of Thukot in a 19th dyn. papyrus wh. describes how two runaway slaves had slipped past "the Wall" fm. this point "N. of the Migdol of Meneptah." This is prob. the Migdol or "Tower" of Ex. 14.[1], between wh. and "the sea" the Isr. encamped opposite the Canaanite shrine of Baal-zephon, and before Pi-hahiroth, wh. Naville wd. ident. with the Egyptian Pi-qeḥeret (written Pi-qe-reḥet), a temple on the east side of Pithom. The Isr., however, were not able to escape notice like the two slaves; the Khetem blocked their way to the desert; southward was another desert, and to the E. was the Gulf of Suez, wh. appears at that time to have extended as far N. as Ismailîya. But a strong E. wind blew all night; the shallow waters of "the sea" were driven before it, and before morning the fugitives had safely crossed the dried-up bed, like Alexander's army when marching round the foot of Mount Climax in Pamphylia (Strab. xiv. 3, 9; Arr. i. 27; Plut. Alex. 17). The 600 Egyptian chariots had by this time reached the spot and attempted to follow the Isr., but the wind had fallen, and before they cd. reach the opposite shore the waters returned and swallowed them up. Meneptah was behind with the rest of his army, and lived to a good old age. His mummy, wh. is now in the Cairo Museum, is that of a somewhat corpulent man of over 60 yrs. who had been a sufferer fm. his teeth most of his life. The Isr. now felt themselves safe beyond pursuit, and took " the way of the wilderness of the Yâm Sûph " or Gulf of Aqaba (Nu. 21.[4]; 1 K. 9.[26]). For three days they had to march along an unknown road without finding water, and the water that they then found was bitter.

It is obvious that they cd. not have been as numerous as is represented, 600,000 adult men (Ex. 12.[37]) implying a population of about 2,000,000. Prof. Petrie has ingeniously suggd. (Researches in Sinai, pp. 209–17, London, 1906) that in the census-lists of the Pnt. the word אלף was originally that wh. signifies " clan," " family," not " thousand." This would reduce the numbers to possible proportions, the two census-lists giving totals of 5550 and 5730, wh. is the limit of the population the Sinaitic district can at present support. Goshen wd. not contain a pastoral population of more than 20,000; the Arabian desert or the oasis of Kadesh-barnea wd. support even less.

The Date of the Exodus can be approximately fixed. A letter addressed to Meneptah, now in the British Museum, tells us that in the fourth yr. of his reign the Pharaoh's lands in Goshen were deserted, and consequently some Edomite Bedouin were allowed to feed their cattle there. Three yrs. previously Lower Egp. had been invaded by the Libyans, while Achæans, Lycians, and other northern pirates landed on the coasts of the Delta. The invaders seem to have found allies in the land of Goshen; at all events Meneptah describes Heliopolis as the city he was called upon to defend, and the " tents " of the enemy as being pitched on the banks of the canal wh. passed Heliopolis and watered a district that " was not cultivated, but left as pasture for cattle for the sake of the foreigners, and so abandoned since the time of (his) ancestors." The Exodus wd. have taken place under cover of the invasion. A poem in honour of Meneptah after his repulse of the invaders was found by Petrie at Thebes in 1896. In this the writer says: " Wasted is the land of the Libyans; the land of the Hittites is tranquillised; plundered is the land of Canaan with every evil; carried away is the land of Ashkelon; overpowered is the land of Gezer; the land of Innuam is as a thing of nought. The Israelites (I-s-r-a-lu) are desolated and have no seed, the land of Khar (Southern Palestine) is become like the widows of Egp." Here the Isr. alone are described as without land of their own; they must therefore have already left Goshen and not as yet acquired fresh territory for themselves. That " seed " here means " offspring," as usually in the Egyptian texts, is shown by the additional statement that the kinsfolk of the Isr. had become husbandless. The male seed of Isr., in fact, had been cut off (Ex. 1.[16]). Prof. Petrie has also found (in 1906 at Tel el-Rotâba) the broken tombstone of User-maat-Ra-nekhtu, " chief archer, keeper of the foreigners of Syria in Succoth (Thukot), keeper of the Residency in Succoth " (Hyksos and Israelite Cities, p. 71). As this official lived in the reign of Ramses II., " the foreigners of Syria " wd. have been the Isr.

EZEKIEL. Ezekiel is by no means so interesting a personality as Isaiah or Jeremiah, nor does the Bk. of E. possess anything like so living an interest for the average individual man of the 20th cent. as do the prophecies of Jeremiah, or the great composite work now known as the Bk. of Isaiah.

E. was a priest, and all his interests and sympathies were priestly and ritualistic. Nevertheless E., as an individual, played a most important part in the religious hist. of his nation; and his bk. was one of the most epoch-making in the OT. Canon. It was fm. this priest and fm. this bk. that Judaism got the impulse wh. continued to dominate its development till Christ came.

Fortunately, there neither is nor can be any question as to the authenticity or date of the bk. The text, no doubt, is often very corrupt, and there are occasionally some duplettes such as to make it difficult to say wh. shd. be preferred, or whether, in view of the tendency to repetition so common in men of a priestly cast of mind, both may not be equally genuine (cp. 2.[3-7] and 3.[4-11]).

The bk. itself falls naturally into two equal parts —chaps. 1.–24., the destruction of Isr. as a secular nation; and chaps. 25.–48., the reconstruction of Isr. as a priestly organisation, with a hierarchical constitution.

The destruction of Jrs. is for E., just as for Jeremiah, the keystone of his earlier prophecies. Naturally enough, such ideas as that Jrs., the Holy City, and the Temple, the dwelling-place of J″., shd. be totally destroyed and continue to lie desolate and desecrated, and that J″.'s own peculiar people shd. be driven into exile and be left by Him to live, in shattered fragments, helpless and seemingly uncared for, among the heathen hordes that made up the huge empire of the Babylonian conqueror, wd. appear to most Isrs. to be ideas radically irreligious. But to E. the revelation had come so clearly as to be a rooted conviction that such utter ruin and national death must somehow eventuate in a new life. The breach with the past was complete. Yet the destruction must be but the Divine preparation for a new upbuilding of a regenerated community.

Still, what cd. the new community be wh. J″. was intending to create? The wild and frenzied thoughts wh. each successive national catastrophe aroused among the people of Isr. were voiced by the false prophets, who maintained even to the last that J″. cd. not desert His people, that J″.'s covenant must and wd. stand, and that therefore Isr. must triumph over all her foes. "Peace, peace is around thee, O Jrs.," said these false prophets (cp. chap. 13.). But despair echoed back the wailing cry, "J″. has no eyes for His people now." It was in circumstances such as these that E., a priest of the family of Zadok, was commissioned to prophesy what the final issue even of national extinction wd. be, and that at a time when those who remained true to J″. cd. do nothing but "sigh and cry" ($9.^4$).

When Jrs. was captured in 597, E. was carried off to Bab. along with Jeconiah and the flower of the nation's manhood. When he thus lost home and country, E. cannot have been quite a youth. He was already too well acquainted with Pal. and the neighbouring lands, as is proved by what he wrote in Bab., not to have reached man's estate ere he became an exile. His description of the market-place of Tyre as the Emporium of the World, and all her mercantile glory (chaps. 26.–28.), is so vivid and so detailed that one may almost with certainty conclude that he must have been an eye-witness of the scenes enacted there, the splendour and variety of wh. he describes so picturesquely. He seems likewise to have been familiar with not a few of the cities of Egp. (cp. $30.^{13\text{-}18}$), and all this kge. of men and countries he must have acquired in the days of his freedom. In Bab. he dwelt beside the river Chebar, one of the tributary canals of the Euphrates; and there, in the fifth yr. of k. Jehoiachin's captivity, E. was called to be a prophet, through the word of J″. coming expressly upon him. This happened, therefore, just when Zedekiah was about to rebel agst. Bab. During the next four yrs. the prophecies of E. are very numerous, and he continued to prophesy till the day Nebuchadnezzar began the siege of Jrs. As events were now fulfilling his earlier prophecies to the letter, he then ceased to prophesy, and for a long while thereafter the prophet continued mute. What need for a prophet to speak agst. his own people at a time when J″. Himself was fulfilling what His prophet had already spoken agst. them?

During the time immediately before and after the destruction of Jrs., however, E. published a few prophecies agst. the neighbouring peoples wh. were being also drawn into the mighty maelstrom of Bab.'s imperial policy. When fugitives arrived at Chebar, and brought the news of Jrs.'s fall, in the 12th yr. (we shd. prob. read the 11th yr.) after its first capture, E. again became a prolific writer. Up till then he had always declared the fall of Jrs. to be inevitable. This he explained to be a necessary judgment upon the nation for its rebellious conduct towards J″. Now, on the contrary, he foretold the restoration of the people and the rebuilding of the Temple. The prophet survived the downfall of the Holy City many a long yr. The last great picture wh. he lived to sketch of the national sanctuary is described as belonging to the 25th yr. of "our" Captivity ($40.^1$), and a short prophecy as to Nebuchadnezzar's victory over Egp. is two yrs. later, being dated on New Year's Day of the 27th yr.

E., living as he did in a foreign land, was denied any directly effective action with respect to the fate of his people. No doubt he had a Jewish audience of a kind, as he lived in a Jewish colony, and his fellow-countrymen wd. gratefully appreciate the privilege of having a prophet dwelling among them. Whenever an emergency arose they seem to have willingly asked his advice. Nevertheless that was a very different position fm. what Jeremiah occupied. The latter cd. proclaim J″.'s message to the people in the Temple, or go to the king in person and tell it him face to face. E. was not empowered, like Jeremiah, "to raise up nations and cast them down." But he was commissioned to act as God's messenger to individuals, to act as pastor to the little Jewish community on the Chebar, to exhort the pious and warn the ungodly; and that the responsibilities involved in the faithful discharge of such duties must have lain heavy on the prophet we may legitimately infer fm. the words wh. he himself records as coming fm. the mouth of J″.: "If the wicked die unwarned, his blood will I require at the watchman's hand" ($33.^6$). E. therefore cd. not but be conscious that he himself was such a watchman, and that at his hands the blood of the unwarned wd. be required.

The peculiar nature of E.'s style must be explained by his environment. He is fond of symbolical representations, the interpretation of wh. the reader is left to find out for himself. Moreover, in his loneliness as exile, E.'s own sptl. life was a continual pondering on the mysterious purposes and ways of J″. This induced him to adopt somewhat artistic and even artificial forms of expressions. His prophecies were, fm. the very first, written, not spoken addresses, and these bear the marks of his Babylonian surroundings—e.g. the symbolical figures so characteristic of the religions of the Euphrates valley. When E. quits the allegorical and pictorial, he speaks the simple lang. of daily life; he is not a master of poetic diction such as Isaiah had at his command, but writes plain, unadorned prose, so that his meaning can be easily grasped.

Each of the two equal divisions of the bk. falls into two very unequal sections. The first section of the first half contains but three chaps., wh. describe the manner of E.'s call and the char. of his mission. The second section consists of 21 chaps., and describes under a great variety of figures the destruction of Jrs. and the causes thereof. The first section of the second half consists of eight chaps., and is made up of oracles agst. heathen nations (25.–32.); and the last and most interesting section consists of 16 chaps. mainly descriptive of Isr.'s restoration and its ideal Temple.

In chap. 34. E. affirms that J″. will make " a covenant of peace " with Isr. and set one shepherd over them, even " David, my servant." In chap. 35. we have the antithesis to Isr.'s restoration depicted in Edom's desolation. In " the dry bones " wh. came together, bone to his bone, the prophet gives his most memorable picture of his people's restoration (chap. 37.). In the following chap. E. expressly refers to the prophecies of his predecessors (38.[17]), and declares that even after the breaking of Bab.'s yoke a new war-storm will blow fm. the N., but these invading hordes of Gog shall but serve to enhance, by their signal defeat in the valley of Hamon-Gog, the glory of Isr.'s God (39.). Finally, in the last nine chaps. (40.–48.), we are told how E. was taken in vision to Canaan and shown the ideal Temple with all its measurements and services, and the ideal distribution of the tribes of Isr. in their own land.

What diffc., however, wd. the existence of a Temple make, however magnificent, if it were not to be preserved for ever inviolable ? For the new Temple, therefore, there must be a new Law. The door through wh. the glory of J″. had been seen to enter must remain for ever shut agst. any one who wd. bring pollution upon the Sanctuary. No alien is to be admitted, nor are any Levites to exercise priestly duties there, because they have defiled themselves with idols and must therefore " bear their iniquity." None save the sons of Zadok shall officiate as priests before J″. All around the Temple a part of the land is declared to be holy ground, so that on it the priests and the Levites may live together. To the king also is assigned a definite territory, that he may oppress no man. Then, most wonderful of all, a spring of water streams forth fm. the Temple and pours itself in full flow into the Dead Sea, making even its salt waters sweet ; and by the bank of that river, on this side and on that side, shall grow every tree for meat, and it shall bring forth new fruit every month, and the fruit thereof shall be for meat and the leaf thereof for healing (47.[1-12]). The whole land is divided into twelve portions, one portion for each tribe, and then Jrs. is given its new name, Jehovah Shammah, " J″. is come thither."

The last section of E. shows us how the Exile necessitated the formulation of a new Law. E. stands midway between the early prophets and the men who created the new Jrs. of Ezra and Nehemiah. Being himself a prophet as well as a priest, E. did not merely reiterate the old laws, the inefficiency of wh. had now been unmistakably proved by the destruction of Temple and nation. Consequently, just as his new Temple, while closely resembling Solomon's, is nevertheless in many important respects on a new plan, so his new Law or Torah, while essentially based on, and in harmony with, the old, differs fm. the old in many respects, because E. has been forced by the logic of facts to recognise that the actual condition of the people has made the continuance of the old Law no longer possible. These new ordinances of E. are in part adapted to the conditions then existing in Isr., but, in part, they transcend the limits of nature. The new Temple itself is much after the pattern of Solomon's ; but the lofty mountain in the very middle of the land, and the river, the life-giving waters of wh. issued fm. under the E. threshold of the Temple, are objects wh. the natural Canaan never possessed. Just as we are not to imagine, fm. the first chap., that E. guarantees that we shall see wonderful four-headed beasts beside God, so we are not to infer that a new Temple, built exactly accdg. to the measurements he gives, will one day stand upon a newly-raised mountain in Pal. But as his vision of the four-headed creatures upbearing J″.'s throne is certainly meant to indicate that the glory of the living God will manifest itself to us in wondrous ways far beyond our present powers of apprehension, so his description of the Temple is assuredly intended to sugg. to the reader how ineffably rich in holy majesty and grandeur will be the manifestation of God's presence on earth itself as well as in heaven.

E.'s relation to Jeremiah is very noteworthy. He shows himself well acquainted with Jeremiah's writings, and it is quite possible that E. had in his possession the bk. wh. Jeremiah wrote in Jehoiachin's reign. The parables of the two sisters, Samaria and Jerusalem (Ek. 23.), of the wicked shepherds whom God smites (34.), and the explanation given of the proverb, " The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (18.[2]), are all founded on passages fm. Jeremiah (cp. Jr. 3.[6-12], 23.[1-4], 31.[29]). Nevertheless the individual outlook of these two prophets is altogether different.

Jeremiah's whole aim is so to influence the people that they may, by the tender mercies of their God, live in righteousness and peace. For E., the Temple is to be Isr.'s most precious possession, and his aim is to enable the restored community of Isr. to worship J″. in such strict accordance with priestly ordinances as to retain the Divine favour for evermore.

Jeremiah's teaching culminates in the declaration that God will make a new covenant with His people, when the Ark shall no more be thought of, and neither priest nor prophet be required, because every man shall know the Lord, having the law engraven on the fleshy tablets of the heart.

E.'s teaching culminates in the idea that J″. will build a new Temple and have His people dwelling all around it, a people of consecrated priests. One need not say that there is any contradiction here; but there is certainly a very great difference of conception. In Jeremiah, the prophet far outweighs the priest. In E., the priest far outweighs the prophet.

The former is the forerunner of the Low Church Evangelical, or the Nonconformist, in whose eyes forms of service are as nothing. The latter is the High Church priest, fm. whose thoughts ritual is never for a moment absent. J. A. PATERSON

EZION-GEBER, a station of the Isr. near to Elath (Nu. 33.[35]; Dt. 2.[8]), where maritime expeditions of Solomon and Jehoshaphat were fitted out (1 K. 9.[26], 22.[48], &c.; Ant. VIII. vi. 4). It was therefore a seaport at the head of the Gulf of 'Aqaba. The name may linger in 'Ain el-Ghudyān, some miles fm. the present beach. It is prob., however, that in anct. times the sea reached as far inland as the spring.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH. The yr. B.C. 538, the starting-point of the Bk. of Ez., is one of the most momentous yrs. in the history of the world. When Cyrus, in this yr., captured Bab. and thus put an end for ever to the Bab. Empire, the Aryan race, of wh. Cyrus was representative, asserted its superiority over the Semitic, and all Western Asia lay for the first time prostrate at the feet of an Aryan conqueror. The tide of Persian conquest now flowed fast and far, and was not stemmed till, at Marathon, the European branch of this Indo-European race proved more than a match for the Asiatic branch thereof; and a cent. and a half later the armies of Alexander the Great completed the proof wh. Marathon began. The Seleucidæ soon occupied the throne of Syr.; and in Egp. the Ptolemies displaced the Pharaohs.

Cyrus was as great in statecraft as in war. Hence by his edict permitting the exiled Jews to return to Jrs. and rebuild the Temple of J″. Cyrus achieved a double object. He removed fm. among the population of Bab. an alien element, and he took the likeliest means of securing the lasting gratitude of men and women who had suffered cruelly fm. the Bab. policy of deportation, by settling in Pal. those in whose loyalty he and his successors mt. safely rely. A direct though of course unintended result of this policy on the part of Cyrus was to prepare in Pal. the proper soil in wh. to plant the Christian relg. when in the fulness of time the Messiah shd. come.

While the Bk. of Ez. thus begins with Cyrus, the Bk. of Ne. takes us, at least incidentally, as far as the time of Alexander the Great, for in Ne. 12.[11, 22] Alexander's contemporary, the High Priest Jaddua, is mentioned by name. Jaddua held the office of High Priest fm. B.C. 351–331, and is expressly declared to be three generations later than Eliashib, the High Priest contemporary with N. It is clear, therefore, that though the two bks. are now described respectively as the Bk. of Ez. and the Bk. of Ne., these titles cannot possibly mean that the first was written by E. and the second by N. As a matter of fact, they are not two bks., but one; and contents and style prove that they have been compiled by the same hand as the two Bks. of Ch. not earlier than B.C. 320, and prob. considerably later. It is a very curious fact that 2 Ch. ends with part of the paragraph with wh. the Bk. of Ez. begins; and it is nothing short of extraordinary that the Heb. Bible, of wh. 2 Ch. is the last bk., shd. close abruptly with the middle sentence of a verse wh. is found in its complete form in Ez. 1.[3]. This is a fact of wh., on the traditional theory, it is impossible to give a satisfactory explanation. Moreover, the order of the bks. in the Heb. Bible, viz., Ez., Ne., and 2 Ch., is contrary to chronology. The Bks. of Ez. and Ne. were evidently given these titles in consequence of a tradition having grown up that E. wrote the one and N. wrote the other. This tradition is without foundation, as the facts mentioned above are quite sufficient to prove. Nevertheless the Bk. of Ez. does contain, in the long and important passage written in the 1st pers., authentic extracts fm. E.'s own memoirs; and in like manner the parts of Ne. in the 1st pers. are selections fm. N.'s memoirs; and it is a remarkable fact that the style of N., the cupbearer and the man of action, is more graphic and effective than the style of E., the man of letters, the professional scribe learned in the Law. The passage in Ez. in 1st pers. occurs in the middle of the bk. (chaps. 7.[27]–9.[15]). Ne., on the contrary, begins with one such long passage and ends with three short ones, whereas the middle part of it is written in the 3rd pers. (1st pers. passages in Ne. 1.[1]–7.[5], 12.[27-32, 37-40], 13.[4-31].) There are also two passages in Ez. written in Aramaic, one in each section, viz., Ez. 4.[8]–6.[18] and 7.[12-26]. These Aram. passages include more than mere official documents, and their style and thought prove that the compiler cd. write as easily in Aram. as in Heb., and treated his Aram. authorities with exactly the same freedom as his Heb. sources. Thus 4.[24] (Aram.) clearly refers back to 4.[5] (Heb.), and the Aram. in 6.[1-18] is marked by the same chartcs. of style as the compiler's Heb.; cp. 6.[9] with 1.[2] and 3.[4].

That Ez. and Ne. were originally one bk. is made absolutely cert. by the fact that there is no Massoretic note at the end of Ez. such as the Massoretes invariably put at the end of every bk. wh. they regarded as a complete whole, and that in the Massoretic note at the close of Ne. it is stated that the middle verse of the bk. is Ne. 3.[32]. One can hardly be surprised that both bks. shd. have long been given the name of Ez., when one considers the enduring influence exercised by E.'s life-work over the whole subsequent hist. of his fellow-countrymen. The Old and the New Testaments are the canonical records of a relg. wh. has passed through three clearly marked stages.

The first stage of this religious development may be briefly designated the Religion of Isr. as founded by Moses; the second, Judaism as founded by E.; and the third, Christianity as founded by Jesus of Nazareth. On the Mt. of Transfiguration, no doubt, it was Moses and Elias, not Moses and E., who were privileged to speak with our Lord of the decease He shd. accomplish at Jrs.; but this only proves that Christianity was to be definitely sptl., and was to retain down all the ages of its progress the prophetic element so powerfully present in the teaching both of Moses and of Elijah, but altogether wanting in the intermediate stage of Judaism ushered in by E. the Scribe in the yr. B.C. 444.

Yet does it not look like a contradiction of this to say that the chief work of E. was to make the Pentateuchal laws binding upon the Jewish community, for is not the other name of the Pnt. the Law of Moses? How, then, can the distinction between the work of E. and the work of Moses be so great as is implied in what has just been said? Herein consists the revolution in thought as to the growth and development of OT. relg. wh. has been gradually effected during the last cent. by the researches of Biblical scholars and by the application, to the bks. of the OT., of the historical method of inquiry. The official promulgation of the Law on the 1st day of the 7th month in the yr. B.C. 444 is fully described in Ne. 8.

Till that day no bk. had ever had the power wh. this bk., the Law of God (Ne. 8.[8]), was henceforth to exercise over all Jews until Christ came to destroy the letter thereof, but at the same time to vivify and enlarge the spt. Since, therefore, the climax of E.'s life-work is recorded in the Bk. of Ne., it is clear that the two bks. cannot be treated separately.

The Bk. of Ez. falls most naturally into two sections, (1) Ez. 1.–6.; (2) 7.–10.; and the Bk. of Ne. into three, chaps. 1.–7.[73a], 7.[73b]–10., 11.–13.; the two together thus forming a sort of miniature Pnt., so to speak, just as the Psalter itself is divided into five bks. on the same analogy. These bks. are not continuous hist. but rather a selection of the most important historical incidents connected with the origin of Judaism.

In the first section we are told of the return of the first and largest body of exiles fm. Bab. immediately after the proclamation of the Edict of Cyrus in 538, and of the Dedication of the Altar of Burnt-offering in 537, and the laying of the foundations of the Temple in May 536; then we read of the Samaritan opposition and the consequent delay of all bldg. till 520, when Darius Hystaspis, on being appealed to, searched for the Edict of Cyrus, and on finding it in Achmetha (Ecbatana) gave orders that the bldg. of the Temple shd. proceed. Naturally in this first section E. is never so much as named.

The second section (chaps. 7.–10.) records how E., "a ready scribe in the Law of Moses" and high in favour at the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus, was given permission, in B.C. 458, to lead a second body of Jewish exiles back to Jrs., and was also authorised to institute there whatever religious reforms he mt. consider necessary. Thus between chaps. 6. and 7. there lies an interval of no less than 58 yrs. wh. is passed over in absolute silence, the connecting phrase in 7.[1] being nothing more than the ordinary commonplace "now after these things." This silence is conclusive proof that the editor cd. not have been E. himself, for it is inconceivable that E. cd. have passed over all the events in the 60 yrs. immediately preceding his first visit to Jrs. with such a trite remark. Before a writer can pass so lightly over an interval of 60 yrs., he must himself live at least several generations later. Practically all we know of E. and his life-work is contained in the last four chaps. of Ez. and the eighth chap. of Ne. His journey fm. Bab. to Jrs. occupied exactly four months. He started fm. Bab. on the first day of the first month of B.C. 458, and on the first day of the fifth month he arrived at Jrs.; and after resting three days he proceeded to discharge his duties as Imperial Commissioner and religious benefactor.

Then came the princes of the Jews and voluntarily confessed that the laws agst. intermarriage with foreigners had fallen into such desuetude that some of the chief offenders were princes and rulers, and even priests and Levites. The effect of this confession on E. was such that it must be given in his own words. "When I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonied . . . and I sat astonied until the evening oblation" (9.[3, 4]). The people promised to obey E., who formed a committee to investigate the matter of mixed marriages, with the result that no fewer than 113 Jews, some of them priests, were convicted of having married foreign wives. They all promised to put away these wives, even though they had borne them children, and with this statement the Bk. of Ez. ends abruptly. We hear no more of E. himself or of the result of his reforms till 13 yrs. have passed. Then he is once more at Jrs. in the retinue of Ne., the favourite cupbearer of Artaxerxes, and also the Tirshatha or Governor. Many suppose that E. himself had been Governor till superseded by N., but as there is not the slightest proof that E. was ever at Jrs. in the interval, it is much more natural to suppose that, after effecting the marriage reforms on wh. so much stress is laid in the two last chaps. of Ez., he had returned to his former high position at the court of Artaxerxes. Had E. been all the while at Jrs. it is impossible to believe that the illegal unions so emphatically condemned and severely punished cd. have again become so general as N. on his arrival found them to be. Indeed E. is never mentioned again till after N. had succeeded in rebuilding the walls of Jrs. in the almost incredibly brief space of 52 days (Ne. 6.[15]). But the spur of necessity and the example of fearless enthusiasm such as N. had exhibited can work miracles. It is therefore prob. that N., finding both relg. and morals among the Jews at so low an ebb, may have summoned E. to help him in the practical reforms wh. he had determined to make. However that may be, it is cert. that the greatest day in E.'s life is that described in Ne. 8., when, fm. a pulpit of wood specially erected for the purpose, E. read to the assembled Jews the Law-bk., wh. has, ever since, exerted over the nation for wh. it was written a greater influence than any other national Law-bk. ever published.

Twelve yrs. after this memorable occasion N. paid a second visit to Jrs. and found that his own reforms had been almost as transient in their effect as E.'s. N. therefore showed no mercy to the backsliders, however highly placed or powerful. For example, the High Priest's grandson had married the dr. of Sanballat, the Horonite, "therefore," says N., "I chased him fm. me," a decisive act that had consequences wh. still endure. This son-in-law of Sanballat, named Manasseh, accdg. to Josephus, fled to Samaria, taking with him a copy of the Pnt. Being of priestly descent, he was elected priest by the Samaritans, and set up a temple on Mt. Gerizim as a rival to that on Mt. Zion. Though the Bk. of Ne. seems to end abruptly, yet, in reality, nothing cd. well be more appropriate and inspiring than the last glimpse we are thus privileged to get of the dauntless, energetic N. We see him, as it were, with outspread hands uttering this brief, characteristic prayer, "Remember me, O my God, for good." And has not God hearkened to His faithful servant's prayer, and fulfilled it far beyond his utmost expectation? For wherever the Bible is read, N.'s name is known and honoured by every pious worshipper of N.'s God.

F

FACE. It is by the face that a man is usually recognised, and so the F. comes to be associated in thought with the personality. From old time the F. has been regarded as reflecting the character; while the play and change of features convey a swift expression of thought and emotion. In Heb. 'aph, "the nose," as the most prominent feature, and 'ayin, "eye," as the most expressive, are used by metonymy for "face" (Gn. 3.[19], &c.; Nu. 14.[14], &c.); the usual word is pānīm (pl.; the sing. pāneh is never used). It means lit. the part turned towards one, the front, or surface; hence face, person, or presence. It appears in such phrases as "from the presence of the Lord" (Gn. 3.[8], lit. "from the face"), "before the Lord" (Gn. 10.[9], lit. "in the face of"), "from my sight" (Gn. 23.[3], lit. "from before my face"), "in the forefront" (Ex. 26.[9], lit. "over against the face"). A peculiar use is "table of shewbread" (Nu. 4.[7], lit. "table of the face"). The NT. word is prosōpon. It also stands for "person" (Mw. 22.[16], &c.), "presence" (Ac. 3.[13], &c.), "appearance" (2 Cor. 5.[12], &c.), or "fashion" (Js. 1.[11]). Opsis occurs only once (Jn. 11.[44]), and stoma, "mouth," only in the phrase "face to face" (2 J.[12]; 3 J.[14]).

FAIR HAVENS

Many of the biblical idioms are ident. with our own, e.g. face of the earth, of the waters, of the sky, &c. To seek one's face is to desire his favour; to turn the face to one is like our own "to countenance." To veil the face is a sign of modesty (Gn. 24.[65]); to cover it, of reverence (Ex. 3.[6], &c.) or of mourning (2 S. 19.[4]); to disfigure it, of fasting

(Mw. 6.[16]). To see the king's face is to be admitted to his presence (Est. 1.[14]). To appear before God's face is to be present in the Sanctuary (Ps. 42.[2]). In 1 K. 20.[38] read with RV. " with his head-band over his eyes," instead of AV. " with ashes upon his face."

FAIR HAVENS, kaloi limenes (Ac. 27.[8]), is the mod. Limeonas Kalous, a bay affording indifferent shelter for shipping, on the S. coast of Crete, c. five miles E. of Cape Matala, the most southerly point of the island. See PAUL.

FALLOW-DEER

FALLOW-DEER (Heb. and Arb. yaḥmūr), more correctly "ROEBUCK." The F. is practically unknown in Pal.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT. The Heb. 'ōb is lit. " necromancer," one who professes by magical songs and incantations to summon the spirits of the dead, who are supposed to answer questions as to things hidden from mortals. EV. renders 'ōb " one with a familiar spirit " (Lv. 19.[31], &c.).

FAMILY. For the wider relationships covered by the term in Scrip. see KIN, KINSHIP. This article deals mainly with the family as understood among ourselves, consisting of the parents, children, and dependents of one household.

In the earliest scriptural picture of family life one man is united with one woman, who with their offspring constitute the F. This appears to have been in harmony with the Creator's purpose (see MARRIAGE). But soon polygamy appears (Gn. 4.[19]), and subsequent hist. presents many illustrations of the evils, family discords, and miseries wh. this practice introduced. The strong Oriental desire for a large posterity led to a further slackening of the conjugal ties, and women to whom the rank of wife was not conceded bore children to their master (see CONCUBINE).

It is certain that the Matriarchate once prevailed among the Semites (see Robertson Smith's Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia [2]). Relationship was determined by descent fm. a common mother. A man's heir was not his s., but his uterine br.; failing whom, his uterine sr. The w. did not enter her husband's family, but was visited by her husband in her fr.'s house, the children belonging to the mr.'s F. Some think it prob. that this system prevailed in early Isr., pointing to apparent traces of it in cert. passages. A man must leave fr. and mr. and cleave to his w. (Gn. 2.[24]). Light is cast on the conduct of Judah and Reuben; accdg. to this anct. view there was no affinity between the s. and the mr.-in-law. We can also understand the marriage of half-br. with half-sr. (Gn. 20.[12]; 2 S.13.[13]), since only descent fm. the same mr. constituted prop. affinity, making such marriages illegal. Joseph alone is reckoned the " brother " of Benjamin (Gn. 42.[38], &c.). Eliezer treats with Rebekah's br. Laban, and her mr., not with her fr. Bethuel (Gn. 24.). Gideon reckons his brs. as sons of his mr. (Jg. 8.[19]). There may also be some trace of this anct. system in the hist. of Samson, whose w. remains in her fr.'s house (Jg. 15.[1]).

There is, however, no reason to suppose that in anct. times the prevailing custom in Isr. was different fm. that of later days. The fr. was undisputed head of the F., the w. or wives, children and dependents living under his protection and control. Large powers were vested in him. The w. was legally under his authority. But resourceful women (e.g. Sarah and Rebekah) cd. devise means for getting their own way, while wise prudence and tactfulness secured for the w. honour and influence (Pr. 31.[10ff.]). Her position was greatly strengthened if she were the mr. of many sons. Over the children in anct. times the fr.'s authority was absolute, extending even to the power of life and death (Gn. 22.; Jg. 11.[34], &c.). The marriage of a dr. brought her within the pale of another F., but over the sons the fr.'s authority continued unimpaired till his death. To this day, in Arabia, the fr. does not hesitate to slay his child, if by so doing he may erase a stain fm. the family honour. Even in Pal., despite the restraint of Turkish law, the present writer knew a case in wh., for this reason, a fr. took his dr.'s life.

This power was to some extent modified by the Law. Only on cert. conditions mt. a man sell his dr. as a bond-woman (Ex. 21.[7f.]). The son who struck, cursed, or insulted his parents, was liable to the capital penalty (Ex. 21.[15, 17]; Lv. 20.[9]; Dt. 27.[16]). The parents also were enjoined to report a " stubborn and rebellious son," " a riotous liver and a drunkard," to the elders, who, on the charge being proved, condemned him to death by stoning (Dt. 21.[18-21]).

The birth of a son has fm. old time been an occasion of joy in an Oriental F. The son perpetuates the fr.'s name, and adds to the people's military strength. The man who has his "quiver full of them . . . shall not be ashamed when they speak with their enemies in the gate" (Ps. 127.[5]). No doubt also the desire so strong in the heart of the mod. Arab, to be kindly remembered in the religious thought of his children, may have had something to do with it. "There is a sacrifice for the dead wh. I have seen continued to the third generation. I have seen a sheykh come with devout remembrance to slaughter his sacrifice, and to pray at the heap where his fr. or his fr.'s fr. lies buried; and I have seen such to kiss his hand in passing any time by the place where the sire is sleeping, and breathe out, with almost womanly tenderness, words of blessing and prayer; and this is surely comfort in one's dying, that he will be so long time so kindly had in his children's mind" (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. 240f.). The family joy is shared by friends and neighbours, who assemble to invoke blessings on the child, and to drink maghleh, a hot spiced drink prepared for the occasion. The son as he grows is the apple of the fr.'s eye, and his whims are indulged usually far beyond what is reasonable.

The advent of a girl, on the other hand, is seldom welcome. The feeling was like that of the mod. Arabs. "The woman is not born to manage the sword, but her hand is for the silly distaff; she neither strengthens the ashīra [clan] nor is aught to the increase and bldg. of her fr.'s household, but an unprofitable mouth is added to the hungry eaters of a slender substance, and yrs. long must he wear a busy head for the keeping of a maiden; the end of all is an uncertain bride-money (therewith he buys for her again some household stuff, and it is her dower), when she will go forth as a stranger to another house" (Doughty, op. cit. i. 239f.). There is, however, nothing recorded in Isr. corrspg. to the horrible old Arabian custom of exposing female infants. If a man had only daughters his name mt. perish, and his family possessions pass to another, unless special provision were made to prevent this (Nu. 27.[1ff.]). When a woman became the mr. of sons she received some compensation for earlier slights in the love and honour of her children, through whom she often exercised great influence. This is seen, e.g., in the respect paid to the queen mr. in Isr.

For the most part the mrs. suckled their own children (Is. 49.[15])—see NURSE—and during tender yrs. they were under the care of the mr. and her women. When boyhood was reached the sons passed into the fr.'s charge (2 K. 10.[1, 8]), and by him were instructed in the relg. and hist. of their people, and had the principles of patriotism instilled (Ex. 13.[8]; Dt. 4.[9ff.])—see SCHOOL. The fr. wd. also see that his sons attained proficiency in the work falling to them—tending the flocks and herds, tilling the soil, cultivating the vineyard and the orchard, or following the paternal HANDICRAFT.

Respect and obedience to parents are enjoined and enforced in many passages of Scrip., and it is laid upon parents, not only to rebuke and exhort offending children, but also to inflict corporal punishment (Ex. 20.[12]; Lv. 19.[3]; Pr. 1.[8f.], 10.[17], 17.[10], 29.[17], &c.).

A cert. sacredness attached to the firstborn son. He is mentioned with the firstlings (Ex. 13.[2, 13]). In sparing the Heb. firstborn when those of Egp. were slain, God had established a special claim to their service. But the Levites were chosen and set apart in place of the firstborn of all the families of Isr., on condition that redemption money for these were paid into the sanctuary (Nu. 3.[11ff., 44, 46], &c.). By birthright the position of the firstborn in the F. was one of dignity and honour; and on his fr.'s death he inherited a double portion as compared with what fell to the younger brothers. It is true that, for what seemed to him good reasons, the fr. might put this past the eldest son (see HEIR).

The gēr, "stranger," during his sojourn was counted with the household. The old laws of hospitality made his comfort and safety the care of every member of the F. He mt. become partaker in Isr.'s religious privileges, and eat the Passover with the F., if he were circumcised (Ex. 12.[48], 20.[10], &c.).

Domestic slaves formed an integral part of the F., subject to the authority of the head, and enjoying his protection. One who conformed to the relg. of his master mt. even become his heir (Gn. 24.[12], 15.[3]). The slave mt. marry his master's dr. (1 Ch. 2.[34f.]). It was not unusual for the female slave to become the concubine of her master.

The F. appears originally to have been a social unity, held together by religious ties. There is evidence, e.g. in the ritual of the Passover, that the head of the F. was the priest, regulating the relations of the members of his household with the Deity (Ex. 12., 13.[8ff.]). His esp. was the right of sacrifice. This is also supported by the transference of the name "father" to the priests (Jg. 17.[10], 18.[19]). In historic times we find that clans and tribes had their separate sacrificial feasts, to wh. great importance was attached (1 S. 20.[29]). These at least suggest an older family ritual as their source. Further, the slave became a member of the F. by taking part in its worship. Thus Eliezer, as we have seen, prayed to his master's God (Gn. 24.[12]). Fm. anct. times foreign slaves have been received into the religious society of the F. by the rite of CIRCUMCISION (Benzinger, HA. 136f.).

FAMINE. In Bible lands, fm. very early times, Fs. have occurred at intervals. Some were quite partial, like that in Gn. 12.[10], where Egp. is unaffected; or those of Gn. 26.[1]; 2 K. 8.[1], where Philistia remains untouched, while the higher lands suffer; or that of Ru. 1.[1], wh. blighted Judea, but spared Moab. At times all the neighbouring countries were afflicted together (Gn. 41.[27], &c.).

The most frequent causes of F. were, in Pal., want of rain at the proper season, and in Egp., failure of the Nile overflow. The fertility of Egp. depends entirely upon the rise of the river. A high Nile is the assurance of a plentiful harvest; a low Nile the herald of want. There are records of occasions when, for several successive yrs., the waters have failed to rise, and the agonies to wh. the people were reduced make gruesome reading. The seven yrs., A.D. 1064–1071, afford a terrible illustration. Dead bodies, both human and animal, were consumed with eagerness, and at last no one cd. regard his life as safe.

In Pal. the main springs and streams are too low for any extent of irrigation; the great bulk of the country is watered only by rain, on wh. also the springs are ultimately dependent. If the rains, due in Oct., are long delayed, crops are scanty. If they come not at all, starvation stares the people in the face. The goodwill of Him who controlled the rain was, therefore, of supreme importance. The calamities consequent on its withholding were traced directly to His displeasure (2 S. 21.[1]; Ps. 105.[16], &c.).

F. was also brought about by the devastations of war, and in cities by sieges (2 K. 6.[25]). Some of the most terrible things in hist. are recorded by Josephus in his act. of the sufferings in Jrs. during the siege of Titus (BJ. V. vi.).

A common accompaniment of F., adding to its horror, is pestilence (Mw. 24.[7] AV., &c.).

FAN. See AGRICULTURE.

FARTHING. See MONEY.

FASTING. Abstinence fm. food and drink for long periods appears in Scrip. as a means of expressing grief, designed to excite the compassion of God, with a view to the removal of actual, and the avoidance of threatened calamities, national or personal (Jg. 20.[26]; 2 S. 1.[12], &c.). Cert. days of sorrowful memory in Isr. were set apart for F. (see FASTS), and special occasions were frequent on wh. this exercise was thought becoming. Associated thus with appeal to the Deity, F. came to be regarded as lending special effectiveness to prayer. The man who fasted and prayed ranked as a benefactor; his unwashen, grief-stricken face secured for him the respect and gratitude of his fellows. This tended to outwardness, and led inevitably to the prevailing hypocrisy wh. Jesus so sternly condemned (Mw. 6.[16ff.]).

Of F. as a moral and sptl. discipline there is no sure trace in Scrip.; but such a passage as Dn. 9.[3] may mean that it was used as a help towards the right devotional frame. Jesus possibly, and His followers certainly, as religious Hebs., observed the practices of their people in this as in other respects (Ac. 13.[2], 27.[9]; 2 Cor. 6.[6], &c.). But Scrip. affords no sanction for the ascetic practices found in the churches of later times.

The word "fasting" is no part of the genuine text in Mw. 17.[21]; Mk. 9.[29]; 1 Cor. 7.[5].

FASTS. In the Mosaic Law the DAY OF ATONEMENT alone is marked out as an annual F. (Lv. 16.[29], &c.). On that day the Children of Isr. shd. "afflict their souls." It fell on the tenth day of the seventh month. The people observed cert. Fasts during the Exile, one in the fifth and one in the seventh month (Zc. 7.[5]); to wh. are added in chap. 8.[19] one in the fourth and one in the tenth month. In each of these months there was a day of sorrowful memory for the Jews, wh. may have been the day set apart for humiliation and fasting. On the ninth day of the fourth month of Zedekiah's eleventh yr. Jrs. was taken (Jr. 39.[2], 52.[6f.]). On the tenth day of the fifth month Jrs. was destroyed (Jr. 52.[12ff.]). In the seventh month—day not named—Gedaliah was murdered at Mizpeh, and disaster and dispersion followed for the Jews (Jr. 41.[1ff.]). On the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth yr. the siege of Jrs. began (Jr. 52.[4]).

The F. of the Day of Atonement prescribed in Lv. 16. is not again referred to in the canonical bks. of the OT., but there is a description of the ritual in Sr. 50.[5ff.] It appears as "the feast" in Ac. 27.[9].

Appointed fasts became more frequent in later Judaism. Certain branches of the Christian Church have also set times for FASTING. Neither, however, have anything corrspg. to the annual month of fasting, Ramaḍān, wh. must be observed by all faithful Moslems.

FATHOM. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FEAR. In AV. of the OT. fear sometimes means "terror" or "dread," but for the most part it denotes "reverence." Where it represents the Heb. māgōr, as in Jr. 6.[25], it always means "dread." The most common Heb. term is yirāh, wh. is used in both senses, but most frequently means "reverence," as in Gn. 20.[11], "Surely the F. of God is not in this place"; and Pr. 1.[7], "The F. of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge." But in Dt. 2.[25] it means "dread." Heb. paḥad most generally means "dread," as in Job 4.[14], "F. came upon me and trembling"; and Ps. 31.[11], "I was a F. to my acquaintance." Even in relation to God paḥad means "dread" rather than "reverence": "The F. of God was on all the kingdoms of the countries" (2 Ch. 20.[29]). But occasionally it means "reverence": "There is no F. of God before his eyes" (Ps. 36.[1]). God is even described as the F. (paḥad) of Isaac (Gn. 31.[42]). In NT. the Gr. phobos has most frequently the ordinary meaning "dread" (Mw. 14.[26], 28.[4]; Lk. 8.[37]; Jn. 7.[13]). Sometimes the OT. significance is transferred (2 Cor. 7.[1]; Eph.

5.[21]). John contrasts the OT. attitude with that of the New. "There is no F. in love, but perfect love casteth out F., because F. hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love" (1 Jn. 4.[18]).

FEAST. Fm. of old it has been customary to mark an occasion of joy by calling friends to eat and drink together. This practice the Hebs. shared with other peoples (Gn. 21.[8]; 2 S. 3.[20]; Est. 2.[18]; Lk. 5.[29], &c.). Prob. all feasts, cert. those where an animal was slain for food, partook of a religious char. (see HOSPITALITY). The word mishteh, when trd. BANQUET in EV., prob. refers to cases when drinking predominated. In other cases more of food is suggested. Leḥem (Dn. 5.[1]) is lit. "bread." Deipnon of Mw. 23.[6], &c., is lit. "supper" (see MEALS). Dochē (Lk. 20.[46], 14.[13]) is a "reception" or "entertainment." They furnished opportunities for encounters of wit (Jg. 14.[10ff.]), for enjoyment of music (Is. 5.[12]), and were often scenes of gross excess (1 S. 25.[36]; Jr. 51.[39], &c.).

FEASTS. It will be convenient in this place to give a general sketch of the Sacred Seasons of Isr., reserving a fuller treatment of the more important feasts for separate articles.

To the Hebrews the moon was the "measurer" of time (see YEAR). It passed through its phases in 28 days—the Lunar Month. This was divided into four groups of seven days by the sacred number, seven; and the week of seven days became the basis of all calculations as to times and seasons. Each seventh day, completing the week, was marked as holy. No work might be done; the shewbread was changed; and the daily sacrifices were doubled (see SABBATH).

The New Moon was the occasion of a festival, as the beginning of a month. It was to be a day of gladness, with blowing of trumpets over burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, "for a memorial before your God" (Nu. 10.[10]). It was a day of rest fm. ordinary work (Am. 8.[5]). There are many references to the observance of this festival in Scrip. (1 S. 20.[5]; Ez. 3.[5]; Ps. 81.[3]; Ek. 45.[17], &c.). Sabbaths and New Moons are frequently named together, as being both lunar festivals and rest days. The first day of the seventh month, the beginning of the New Year, was signalised as a "solemn rest . . . a memorial of blowing of trumpets, a holy convocation," when special burnt-offerings were made (Lv. 23.[24f.]).

The appearance of the New Moon, to wh. so much importance attached, was determined by actual observation. Watchers on the hills near Jrs., on seeing it, ran to inform the Sanhedrin, who announced the fact; and by means of beacons on the hilltops the news was flashed to distant places. The Samaritans are credited with the malicious lighting of these fires, so misleading the Jewish communities they were designed to benefit.

The seventh day of the week and the seventh month of the yr. were thus marked as sacred, and the seventh yr. was appointed to be a Sabbath for the land—the Sabbatic Year. The soil was to have rest. The Hebrews were neither to plough, sow, nor reap. What grew of itself was to be left for the poor and for the beasts. The orchards and vineyards were to be untended. There shd. be neither harvest nor vintage. The fruit mt. be used for food only (Ex. 23.[10f.]; Lv. 25.[1-7, 20ff.]). To brother Israelites debts were forgiven (Dt. 15.[1ff.]). Heb. slaves, unless they wished to remain with their masters, were set free (Ex. 21.[2ff.]). The neglect of this law was threatened with disaster, and in the succeeding desolation, while the land lay waste, it shd. enjoy compensation for the Sabbaths of wh. it had been defrauded (Lv. 26.[34f.]; cp. 2 Ch. 36.[21]). At the F. of TABERNACLES, at the beginning of the seventh yr., the law was to be read "before all Isr. in their hearing" (Dt. 31.[10]; cp. Ne. 8.[13-18]). Evidence of its observance in later times is found in Alexander's grant to the Jews of immunity fm. tribute in the seventh yr. (Ant. XI. viii. 5). The like exemption was granted by Julius Cæsar (ib. XIV. x. 6).

The end of the seventh septennium was marked by the Year of Jubilee—the fiftieth yr. (Lv. 25.[8ff.]). The seventh Sabbatic yr. was followed by the great yr. of deliverance, itself also a Sabbatic yr. It was proclaimed throughout the land by sound of trumpet, on the Day of Atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month. All captives were set free, and all property sold since the last Jubilee reverted to the original owner or his heirs. (For the exception of houses in walled cities, and cities of the Levites, see Lv. 25.[29ff.]) See YEAR OF JUBILEE.

There were three great annual Feasts when all male Israelites were required to appear before the Lord their God at the place wh. He shd. choose, viz., the F. of Unleavened Bread, the F. of Harvest (or F. of Weeks, Dt. 16.[16]), and the F. of Tabernacles (Ex. 23.[14ff.]). The first fell at the beginning of harvest, the second at its close, and the third marked the completion of the vintage. They therefore followed the seasons of the solar yr. These Feasts involved pilgrimage to a sacred place. The name, ḥaggīm, is paralleled by the Arb. ḥajj, and is clearly distinguished fm. mō‘ădīm, "sacred seasons."

Only in late times is there evidence that these Feasts were regularly observed. It is true that times of national peace, good government, and order wd. be most favourable to their observance. But there were periods in the hist. when these conditions prevailed; and we must not too readily conclude fm. silence regarding them, that they were neglected. It is almost in an aside that we hear of Elkanah going up once a yr. to Shiloh (1 S. 1.[3]).

The PASSOVER commemorated the deliverance fm. Egp., when God passed over the houses of Isr. but the first-born of the Egyptians perished (Ex. 12.). It fell on the 14th day of the first month, and the F. of Unleavened Bread began on the 15th, lasting for seven days (Lv. 23.[5ff.]; Nu. 28.[16ff.]; cp. Ant. III. x. 5). The Passover clearly partook of a sacrificial char. (Ex. 12.[27], &c.), and was distinct in origin fm. the F. of Unleavened Bread; yet it was perhaps natural that the two falling so closely together shd. in the end be identified, so we find the Passover described as the first day of the F. of Unleavened Bread (Mk. 14.[12]). This F. is said to commemorate the haste with wh. Isr. left Egp. when there was no time to bake with leaven (Dt. 16.[3]). It is also clearly associated with the beginning of harvest (Dt. 16.[8f.]; Lv. 23.[6ff.]). On the first and last days of the F. was "an holy convocation," when all servile work was forbidden (Lv. 23.[7f.]). On the second day a sheaf of the first-fruits was presented as a wave-offering; and as a burnt-offering a male lamb of the first yr., with its appropriate meal and drink offerings (Lv. 23.[10-14]). During the F., in addition to the "continual burnt-offerings" (Nu. 28.[23]), there was a daily burnt-offering of two young bullocks, one ram, seven he lambs of the first yr., with their respective meal and drink offerings, and one he goat for a sin offering (Nu. 29.[2ff.]).

The F. of Harvest (Ex. 23.[16]), or of Weeks (Ex. 34.[22]), or of PENTECOST (Ac. 2.[1], &c.), was held fifty days after the F. of Unleavened Bread (Lv. 23.[15ff.]). It lasted but one day, and marked the end of the harvest. It was a day of holy convocation (Lv. 23.[21]). As the wave-offering of a sheaf was made at the beginning, so at the close of harvest the wave-offering consisted of two loaves of leavened bread, baked with fine flour, as first-fruits (Lv. 23.[17]). Other offerings are specified (Lv. 23.[18ff.]; Dt. 16.[10]). The observance of this F. is not recorded in the OT. It was popular in NT. times (Ac. 2.[1], 20.[16]; 1 Cor. 16.[8]; cp. BJ. II. iii. 1).

The F. of TABERNACLES, or of Ingathering (Ex. 23.[16]), began on the 15th day of the 7th month, and lasted to the 21st. On the 22nd was a day of holy convocation—"the great day of the F." (Jn. 7.[37]). It commemorated the people's dwelling in booths in the wilderness (Lv. 23.[42f.]). It was a festival of great joy, signalising the complete ingathering of the earth's annual produce. (For the sacrifices and offerings prescribed, see Nu. 29.[12ff.]) During the F. the people left their houses and occupied booths covered with the foliage of trees. This practice was in abeyance fm. the days of Joshua until its revival by Ezra (Ne. 8.[14]). But evidence is not wanting that the F. itself was observed (1 K. 8.[2]; 2 Ch. 5.[3], 7.[8]; cp. Zc. 14.[16ff.]). Jeroboam seems to have appointed this F. in his kdm. on the 15th day of the eighth month, prob. to suit a later harvest in the N. (1 K. 12.[32]).

Feasts of later institution and less importance were PURIM and the DEDICATION. Purim, or "Mordecai's Day" (2 M. 15.[36]), commemorated the deliverance of the Jews fm. the schemes of Haman, and the downfall of that arch-foe (Est. 9.[20-32]). The name means "lots," referring in mockery to the means by wh. Haman thought he had discovered a lucky day for his great enterprise (Est. 3.[7]). The F. was held on the 14th and 15th days of the twelfth month, and may be the F. alluded to in Jn. 5.[1]. It is naturally a very joyful F., and it is celebrated to this day by the Jews with hilarious good cheer.

MODERN FEAST: JEWS AT SYNAGOGUE OF RABBI MEIR, TIBERIAS

The F. of the Dedication dated fm. the cleansing and reconsecration of the Temple by Judas Maccabæus after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes. It lasted for eight days, beginning on the 25th day of the ninth month. This also was a joyful F., the palm branches carried by the worshippers symbolising the jubilation of their minds. All signs of mourning, whether public or private, had to be suppressed during the F. It is referred to in Jn. 10.[22] (cp. Ant. XII. vii. 7).

Josephus (BJ. II. xvii. 6) speaks of the festival of wood-carrying (cp. Ne. 10.[34], 13.[51]). Other festivals of small moment are mentioned in 1 E. 9.[50ff.]; 1 M. 7.[49], 13.[50ff.]

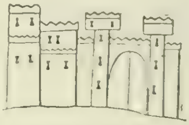
rabbis, and there to hold high festival. One of the most popular of these " feasts " is held at the Synagogue of ben-Yochai at Meirōn, over against Ṣafed. Quite an illumination is often made at night by the burning of precious shawls and silks which have been steeped in oil. They are burned on pillars c. 4 ft. high, with saucer-like hollows on the top. This is done to the accompaniment of singing and dancing. Similar scenes are enacted at the Synagogue of Rabbi Meir.

FELIX, Procurator of Judea fm. A.D. 52 to 60. He was br. of Pallas the favourite of Claudius, therefore Gr. by birth. Fm. the representations of Tacitus and Jos., lust, greed, and cruelty were the characteristics of his rule. Thro' the arts of Simon Magus he wiled away Drusilla fm. her husband. Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) calls Drusilla granddr. of Antony and Cleopatra. By Claudius Lysias Paul is sent to his tribunal. Altho' Paul was vehemently accused, F., " having more perfect knowledge " of Christianity, did not condemn him, but postponed decision in the hope of being bribed. F. knew the Christian sect was numerous, and therefore mt. be successfully " squeezed." As the bribe was not forthcoming, he " left Paul bound." Tacitus' summary of his rule is: "With lust and cruelty he exercised the power of a k. in the spt. of a slave." As the death of Claudius had deprived his br. Pallas of influence F. on his recall to Rm. disappears fm. hist.

FENCE. Where it applies to cities or strongholds, " fenced " = " fortified." In 2 S. 23.[7] " fenced " = " armed," lit. " full," mālē ; in Is. 5.[2] = " digged " ; in Jb. 10.[11] = " intertwined." Gādēr (Nu. 22.[24] ; Ps. 62.[3]) is a wall or Hedge.

FENCED CITIES (Heb. 'arē mibtzār, RV. " fortified cities," Nu. 32.[17], &c.). While unwalled collections of dwellings were " villages," those surrounded by a wall were " cities." The ramparts of cities were originally of earth, the gates were prob. defended by stone towers (as in Gezer and Lachish, PEFQ.). In the historic period, as seen by the Egp. and Asyr. monuments, the fortifications were of stone. There were genly. towers at intervals, sometimes rampart within rampart.



Assyrian Castle (Numrud Obelisk)

FERRET (Heb. 'ănāqāh, RV. " gecko," LXX μυγαλή, "shrew-mouse," Lv. 11.[30]). As the ferret is unknown in Pal., the RV. is prob. right. The Gecko is a pretty lizard wh. utters a sharp cry, whence its name.

Fetters: Assyrian

FETTER. (1) Kebel, an iron chain (Ps. 105.[18], 149.[8]). (2) Zēq, used only in pl., ziqqīm, fm. zānaq, "to bind," a synonym for kebel (Ps. 149.[8]; Is. 45.[14], "chains," &c.). (3) Nĕḥōsheth, a chain of copper, or perhaps bronze (Jg. 16.[21]; 2 S. 3.[34], &c.). The fettered prisoner in the E. has a chain attached to his waist, with strong rings at the ends, wh. are fastened round his ankles. The NT. pedē was prob. used in the same way.

FETTER: EGYPTIAN

FESTUS (PORCIUS), successor of FELIX as procurator of Judea (Ac. 24.[27], &c.). Paul was examined before him, and it was fm. F.'s proposal that he shd. be tried at Jrs. that Paul appealed to Cæsar. The character of F., as it appears in Ac. and Jos., is on the whole good; F. represents the higher type of Rm. official. He died in the yr. following his appointment, and was succeeded by Albinus.

FEVER. See DISEASES.

FIELD. The most common Heb. word is sādeh, Aram. bar (Dn. 2.[38], &c.), wh. is quite general, denoting now a definitely marked bit of land (Gn. 23.[9], &c.), and again the open country (25.[29], &c.). In NT. agros (Mw. 13.[24], &c.) is the cultivated land near town or vill. Chōra (Jn. 4.[35]; Js. 5.[4]) may be the open country, while chōrion (Ac. 1.[18], &c.) is a definitely limited piece of land—"a little space."

FIG, FIG TREE. The F. T. is a common feature in the Pal. landscape (Dt. 8.[8]; Nu. 13.[23]; Ne. 13.[15]; Mw. 7.[16], &c.). Several varieties were cutivated, and the fruit, fresh and dried (1 S. 25.[18]), is an important element in the native diet. It must of course be distinguished fm. that of the SYCAMORE. A man sits under his vine and F. T. in time of rest and peace (Mi. 4.[4], &c.). The failure or destruction of the F. betokens wide disaster (Jr. 8.[13]; Ho. 2.[12], &c.). Its budding is among the first signs of spring (SS. 2.[13]; Lk. 21.[29f.]). The young fruit forms; then comes a rush of leaves. The earliest fruit is ripe about the beginning of June (Ho. 9.[10]; Is. 28.[4], &c.). Fs. were used as a plaster in cert. troubles (2 K. 20.[7], &c.).

The lesson of the withered F. T. (Mw. 21.[19], &c.) is obvious. Jesus may have thought it poss. that a few winter Fs. mt. still cling to the twigs. But whether or not, the new fruit shd. have been set, before the leaves expanded. He found no fruit at all. The leafy, barren F. T. symbolises the fair profession, whose pretensions are hollow.

FIR. Bĕrōsh is prob. = cypress (sempervirens). It grows plentifully in the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon (1 K. 5.[8]; 2 Ch. 2.[8]; Is. 37.[24]). For bldg. purposes it is more highly valued than cedar, being specially prized for its strength, colouring, and aromatic qualities. Its straight stem, with irregular horizontal branches, reaches a goodly height (Ho. 14.[8]), and it is serviceable for all the purposes associated with the F. in Scrip.: for flooring, doors, ceiling, and rafters (1 K. 6.[5, 34]; 2 Ch. 3.[5]; SS. 1.[17]). It is also used in bldg. ships (Ek. 27.[5]). In 2 S. 6.[5] a slight alteration of the text brings it into harmony with 1 Ch. 13.[8], wh. is certly. correct. We shd. therefore read "with all their might, with songs, &c.," instead of "with all manner of instruments made of F. wood," &c.

FIRE. For the various uses of F. a good concordance is a sufficient guide. For its connection with offerings, see SACRIFICE. It is frequently associated with the presence of God (Ex. 3.[2]; Dt. 4.[36]; Ps. 105.[39], &c.). The descent of F. marked an acceptable offering (Jg. 6.[21]; 1 Ch. 21.[26], &c.). "F. fm. before the Lord," "the F. of God" (Lv. 10.[2]; Jb. 1.[16]), is lightning. F. appears in Scrip. as serving all the purposes common among ourselves—cooking, warming the house, refining metal; as a purifying agent, and as a destroyer of obnoxious things. For the material of F. see FUEL.

FIRST-FRUITS. Canaan was J″.'s land, Isr. were J″.'s possession, His slaves; in token of this the Isr. presented before God the first and best of the produce of his threshing-floor, wine-fat, and oil-press, the firstlings of his flocks and herds, and redeemed his own first-born. There were two Heb. names given to F., rē' shîth and bikkūrîm; the distinction, somewhat indefinite, between them was that while the first was to some extent the result of human labour, the second was the direct product of nature. Besides the gen. claim to F. (Ex. 22.[29]) there were three seasons on wh. they were offered: (a) On the day after the Passover a sheaf of barley was waved before the altar (Lv. 23.[11]); after this the harvest mt. be begun. (b) At Pentecost two loaves of leavened bread made fm. the new flour were waved before the altar (Lv. 23.[15-17]). (c) The Feast of Ingathering in Tishri (Sept.), when the F. of the Vintage mt. be offered (Lv. 23.[39]). There were besides a cake of the first dough (Nu. 15.[19-21]) and a basket of the F. of the land. These were individual offerings (Dt. 26.[2-11]). The consecration of the first-born (Ex. 13.[12-15]) was of the same nat. Most of these offerings, either by enactment or by custom, were presented in the Temple and given to the Priests. In the northern kdm. the prophet had the place of the priest; F. are brought to ELISHA (2 K. 4.[42]). Besides the annual offerings of F. there was the consecration of the fourth yr.'s fruit of a tree; the first three yrs. were regarded as "uncircumcised."

FISH. There is no specific name for any kind of "fish" either in OT. or NT.; the only distinction is clean and unclean, having fins and scales or being without them. It seems to have been recognised in addition that the fish of "the great sea" were difft. fm. those of the lakes and rivers of Pal. and Asyr. (Ek. 47.[10]). In the Sea of Galilee the fish often go in shoals, small but of great density (PEFQ. Jan. 1908 [Masterman]); see FISHING. The most palatable fish in the Sea of Galilee is the musht. Another (Clarias macracanthus), wh. haunts the mud bottoms, mt. easily be mistaken for a serpent (Mw. 7.[10]; Lk. 11.[11]).

FISHES FOUND IN THE WATERS OF THE JORDAN VALLEY
The first is a deep-water fish found only in the Sea of Galilee. The second is found in the Sea of Galilee and Lake Ḥûleh. Both are called musht by the fishermen.

FISH-GATE. See JERUSALEM.

FISHING. Nothing is said of this pursuit in anct. times in the streams and lakes of Pal. Fm. the meagre directions regarding fish (Lv. 11.[9ff.]) we may infer that they were not a common article of diet. The "companions" (Jb. 41.[6]) are Phœnician fisher-partners, who supplied Isrs. with their fish (Ne. 13.[16]). The fishermen of Is. 19.[8] are Egpn., and the articles of the fisher's outfit mentioned in OT. are Egpn. or Phœnician: the drag-net with lead sinkers on the lower edge (Is. 19.[8]; Hb. 1.[16]); the casting-net (Ek. 26.[5]; Hb. 1.[16]); the line and hook (ḥakkāh, ṣīr tzinnah, Jb. 41.[1]; Is. 19.[8]; Am. 4.[2]; Hb. 1.[15]); the harpoon (Jb. 41.[7] "fish spear"). In NT. there is ample reference to F. in the Sea of Galilee. Such names as Bethsaida, "Fisher home," and Tarichæa, "place of fish salting," attest the prosperity of the calling (cp. Mw. 4.[18ff.]; Mk. 1.[16]; Lk. 5.[2]; Jn. 21.[3-7]). The anct. methods, boats, hooks and nets, may be seen in use on the Sea of Galilee to-day. Favourite F. places are at 'Ain el-Fulīyeh, N. of Tiberias, eṭ-Ṭābgha, and the neck of the Jordan, where it enters the sea. A tax is levied by the Government on fish taken in Gennesaret, and a rent is paid to the Sultan for the fishing in the Waters of Merom.

FISH POOLS (SS. 7.[4]) is an error. Read with RV. simply "pools." The phrase "all that make sluices and ponds for fish" (Is. 19.[10]) shd. read "all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul."

FITCHES. The word kussemeth occurs thrice (Ex. 9.[32], AV. "rye," RV. "spelt"; Is. 28.[25], AV. "rye," RV. "spelt"; Ek. 4.[9], AV. "fitches," RV. and AVm. "spelt"). It corrsps. to the Arb. kir- senneh. Qetzah (Is. 28.[25, 27]) is the plant called "black cummin" (Nigella sativa), with pale blue or white flowers, the seeds of wh. are often used for a flavouring in bread.

FLAG. (1) 'Āḥū (Jb. 8.[11]) is parallel to gōme, "rush." In Gn. 41.[2, 18], it is trd. "meadow," RV. "reed grass." It is a gen. term wh. may cover various forms of luxuriant herbage. (2) Ṣūph (Ex. 2.[3-5]; Is. 19.[6]), the sedge in the river, and (Jh. 2.[5]) weeds in the sea. Yam Ṣūph is the usual name of the Red Sea.

FLAGON. In the AV. F., in four of the five cases in wh. it occurs, trs. ashīshāh, wh. really means "raisin-cakes," the rendering in RV. In the fifth case F. trs. nĕbel (Is. 22.[24]), in wh. the RV. agrees: nĕbel means usly. a musical instrument of the lyre species.

FLAX. This is the plant pishtah, the stalks of wh. were steeped in water to rot away the pulp, dried (Jo. 2.[6]), hackled, and the fibres, pishtīm, spun into thread, of wh. various kinds of LINEN were woven. A few fibres twisted together formed a wick (Is. 42.[3]; cp. Mw. 12.[20]). It has long been cultivated in the E. (Ex. 9.[31], &c.).

FLEA, an insect pest of the E. twice used by DAVID as the symbol of the contemptible (1 S. 24.[14], 26.[20]). The common F. is plentiful in Pal., esp. in the hotter districts; but the annoyance it causes breeds disgust rather than contempt.

FISHING IN THE SEA OF GALILEE: DRAWING THE NET ASHORE

FLESH (Heb. bāsār, Gr. sarx). In Heb. the term sometimes denotes the soft part of the frame, as contrasted with the hard, the bone: e.g. "your bone and your flesh" (Jg. 9.[2]); so with the specialised parts, e.g. "all his flesh with his head, &c." (Lv. 4.[11]); again, it stands for the whole body, e.g. "yet in my F. shall I see God" (Jb. 19.[26]). It may denote animated nature as a whole, esp. when preceded by the word "all," e.g. "all F. died that moved upon the earth" (Gn. 7.[21]). In this connection, however, it is more gen. used for "humanity," e.g. "All F. had corrupted its way" (Gn. 6.[12]), "shall all F. come to worship" (Is. 66.[23]). In such passages as Gn. 6.[3], "for that he also is F.," and Is. 31.[3], "their horses are F. and not spirit," it symbolises weakness. There is no suggestion that the body as such is evil. Our physical nature represents moral weakness rather than actual wickedness; a liability to yield to temptation, and so to "corrupting their way." The phrase wh. appears in English as "nigh of kin" (Lv. 25.[49], &c.) is in Heb. literally "remainder of his F." The most common LXX tr. of bāsār is sarx, except where F. is referred to as food, and then it is usually kreas, wh. corresponds to the NT. usage (Rm. 14.[21]; 1 Cor. 8.[13]). Sarx occurs in NT. in nearly the same senses as bāsār in

MENDING THE NETS ON THE SHORE AT TIBERIAS. (See p. 196.)

OT. (Lk. 24.[39]; 1 Cor. 15.[39]; Mw. 16.[17]; Rm. 8.[3]). It is to be observed, however, that, especially in the writings of St. Paul, F. is regarded as that part of human nature in wh. sin resides: "in me, that is in my F., dwelleth no good thing" (Rm. 7.[18]); "the carnal mind (the mind of the flesh) is enmity agst. God" (8.[7]). This does not refer merely to sins of sensuality, as in Gal. 5.[19]. Hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, &c., are works of the F., as well as "adultery, fornication, uncleanness." See SOUL AND SPIRIT.

FLIES. (1) The house fly (Heb. zĕbūb, Ec. 10.[1]; Is. 7.[18]). (2) The Heb. 'ārōb is used only of the "fly" of the Egpn. plague (Ex. 8.[21]; Ps. 78.[45], 105.[31]); it is not cert. whether a peculiar kind of fly is referred to, or whether it is flying insects of all kinds. The cockroach has been suggd.

FLINT (Heb. ḥallāmīsh). Altho' AV. and RV. so tr., the correctness of the rendering may be doubted, as in every instance (Dt. 8.[15], 32.[13]; Jb. 28.[9]; Ps. 114.[8]; Is. 50.[7]) a massive rock is implied, a form in wh. F. is rarely found.

FLOOD (Heb. mabbūl, Gr. kataklusmos). The act. of the Noachian F. is found in Gn. 6.[1]–8.[22]. Critically the act. is divided between J. and P. All flesh have corrupted their way before J″., and He determines to destroy all life fm. the face of the ground. Noah alone finds favour with J″. (J.). Noah is commanded to build an ARK (tēbāh); the length is to be 300 cubits, the breadth 50, and the depth 30. Into it he is to gather pairs of all creatures that lived upon the land with all manner of "food that is eaten"; because God is about to bring a F. of waters upon the earth (P.). Into the Ark, so constructed, Noah is commanded to enter with his w., his sons, and his sons' wives, and pairs of all living creatures. There is a variation introduced; clean beasts and birds are to be brought by sevens (Gn. 7.[2]; cp. 6.[19], J.). When Noah had entered into the Ark "the fountains of the great deep were broken up and the windows of heaven were opened." For 40 days and 40 nights it rained, and the earth was submerged, while the Ark floated: for 150 days the waters prevailed upon the earth; the mountains were overtopped by 15 cubits. Then God remembered Noah, and for another 150 days the waters receded and the Ark grounded among the peaks of ARARAT; at the expiry of 40 days thereafter Noah sends out a raven and a dove; the raven remains outside, but the dove returns to the Ark. After another week he sends out the dove again: it returns, but with a leaf of olive in its beak. At the end of seven days more he sends the dove out a third time, and now it does not return. At length, at the end of a yr. and ten days, God told Noah to leave the Ark, and the living creatures with him. After Noah had descended fm. the Ark he offered sacrifices to J″., whereupon, smelling the sweet savour, J″. promised no more to destroy the earth with a F. The Ark had grounded, as above, on Mt. Ararat.

That the nar. is composite is argued (a) fm. the frequent repetitions: but these are to be found in all nars. of primitive peoples, a simple device to secure unity; (b) fm. alleged discrepancies, most of wh. are capable of reasonable explanation.

It is assumed by some authorities, e.g. Zimmern, that the Heb. nar. has been "borrowed" fm. the Bab., accdg. to wh. cert. of the great gods determine to bring a F. upon the earth to destroy mankind and all pertaining to them. Ea, however, has a favour for Par-na-pishtim, and warns him to forsake all his possessions and save his life by building an Ark. We have an elaborate act. of its construction: its length is 600 cubits (Smith), its height and depth 120; a mast (accdg. to another rendering, "a rudder") is provided. Disobeying the command to forsake all his possessions, he takes into the Ark his flocks and herds, his slaves male and female, his silver and gold. The rain begins to fall, accompanied by thunder and tempest, and in seven days the mountains are covered. On the seventh day Par-na-pishtim looks out and sees the desolation; presumably after an interval he sends out a dove wh. returns to him; then a swallow wh. also returns; last of all he sends a raven wh. does not return. Thereafter Par-na-pishtim leaves the Ark and offers a sacrifice round wh. the gods cluster like flies. In the council of the gods wh. follows it is determined that not again shall the earth be destroyed by a F.

The points of resemblance between the two acts. are numerous and obvious. In both there is a divine determination to destroy mankind; in both there is one individual who finds favour, and by divine sugg. builds an Ark into wh. he brings his family; in both the inhabitant of the Ark tests the state of the earth by sending out birds; in both a dove and a raven are sent; in both cases the abandonment of the Ark is consecrated by a sacrifice wh. proves acceptable to Deity, and is followed by a promise that the earth shd. never again be destroyed by a F.

Although the resemblances are undeniable, the diffcs. are many and striking. Polytheism is prominent in the Bab. act. even to ludicrousness, over agst. the restrained monotheism of the Heb. nar. The Bab. Ark is much larger than that of Noah; about 20 times its cubic content. While Noah takes into the Ark only his w., his sons, and his sons' wives, Par-na-pishtim takes not only his immediate family but his flocks and slaves; nay, over and above, craftsmen, and silver and gold, and seed of all kinds. While both send out birds as scouts, Noah sends only two birds; he sends the dove and the raven together at first; when the latter did not return he sent the dove twice, at intervals of a week. Par-na-pishtim again sends out a dove wh. returns, a swallow wh. returns also, and a raven wh. does not return. These two acts. appear to be too discrepant for either to be borrowed fm. the other directly.

There remains the question, Wh. is the more primitive? The presence and prominence of an elaborate polytheism is a sign of the relative recency of the Bab. nar. It also has a greater length and possesses a greater multiplicity of features, wh. is a further evidence of recency; the tendency always is to add features to every traditional nar. (comp. the earliest form of "The Battle of Otterburn" with the latest of "Chevy Chace"). Some of the features added, suggd. by the habits of a quasi-maritime people, wd. be useless, or even harmful in the circumstances supposed: e.g. Par-na-pishtim provides a mast: a mast wd. be easily provided that wd. be effective on the small raft-like boats used on the Euphrates, but wd. not be procurable of a size to suit his enormous Ark; and if procured wd. be in the highest degree dangerous to such a cranky craft. It moreover served no purpose, as the obj. was simply to keep afloat. The other trn. of the term, "rudder," is liable to the same objections, save that of danger; it too is a feature added fm. custom in defiance of the purpose of the Ark.

We mt. refer to the obvious fact that the Bab. form of the legend implies a complicated state of society, in wh. there are slaves, cattle, artisans, gold and silver; whereas nothing of the kind is to be found in the Heb. nar. Moreover all these additions are, like the "mast" and the "rudder," derived fm. custom, but contradict the state of matters supposed. How cd. the distinction of ranks implied in the mention of "slaves" and "artisans" be maintained in the desolated world? What purpose wd. the silver and gold serve when of necessity all idea of property wd. be in abeyance? The other alternative is that the Heb. starting with Bab. legend arrived at the Biblical by the omission of these features wh. contradicted the implied purpose of the Ark, or the circumstances resulting fm. the F. This wd. imply a power of philosophical analysis, unexampled in a people otherwise so undeveloped as the Hebs. If a prophet by inspiration did attain this point of philosophic insight, he wd. only with difficulty persuade his countrymen to abandon the more elaborate story with wh. they had been accustomed, and traces of his struggles wd. be left on the nar. This difficulty is only increased if we regard the Biblical nar. as the result of the combination of two similar nars. wh. differed on unimportant features. The balance of probability is in favour of the Heb. form being the more primitive.

The fact that the tradition of a universal deluge is very widespread renders it at least prob. that at some remote period such a catastrophe did occur. Some of the phenomena of the "Glacial Period" show that it was much more sudden in its onslaught and much shorter in its duration than we have commonly been wont to suppose. If fm. any reason, either fm. battery by a huge cloud of aerolites, or fm. an enormous and widespread eruption fm. within, the earth's northern cap of palæocrystic ice were broken up, a vast tidal wave wd. be generated that wd. cover the whole of the northern hemisphere with ice. Such an occurrence wd. be designated by those that survived it as the "breaking up of the fountains of the great deep." It seems impossible to approximate to the date at wh. this event may have occurred.

FLOUR. See Food.

A Stretch of Flowers, with Mount of Beatitudes

FLOWERS come with the spring in Pal. with wonderful profusion and beauty; plain and hillside are glorious with marvellously blended colours. Coming swiftly, they also swiftly fade, and so they are an apt emblem of what is lovely but frail and transient (Mw. 6.[28ff.]; Ps. 103.[15], &c.). A single afternoon of burning E. wind will often lay in the dust all the splendours of the mountain-side.

FLUTE (Aram. mashrôqîtha', Dn. 3.[5, 7, 10, 15]), a musical instrument akin to our F. or flageolet.

FODDER. The word b'ĕlîl is trd. "F." (Jb. 6.[5]), "corn" (Jb. 24.[6], RV. "provender," AVm. "mingled corn"), and "provender" (Is. 30.[24]). F. consists of grain of various kinds, with wh. the cattle are fed (cp. Jg. 19.[21]).

FOLD (Heb. gedērāh, usly. pl., Nu. 32.[16]), a place walled in, into wh. a flock of sheep may be led at night to guard them fm. wild beasts or robbers. AV. also trs. Hedges, RV. Fences (Jr. 49.[3].) In NT. (Jn. 10.[16]) the word used is aulē, also rendered "palace" (Mw. 26.[58]). In Jn. 10.[16b], "F." is a mistranslation; RV. more correctly trs. "flock."

FOOD. Accdg. to the nars. of Gn. man lived at first entirely on vegetable food (1.[29], 2.[16]); and it is not till after the flood that animal food is expressly mentioned (9.[3]). The keeping of sheep (4.[2]) and the offering of animal sacrifices (v. 4), however, almost necessarily imply the use of their flesh as food: the permission to Noah must therefore be regarded rather as a confirmation of an antecedent practice than the institution of a new one. The Biblical record thus corrsps. with what we gather fm. other sources with regard to man's early hist.: his nearest relations among the lower animals are vegetable feeders; but the earliest remains known to archæology reveal him as a hunter and fisher.

A strictly vegetarian diet appears again in Dn. 1.[8-16]; no doubt the objection of the Jews to the "k.'s meat" was that they cd. not eat flesh food, killed and prepared as it was for a heathen monarch's court, without ceremonial defilement. It is none the less striking to meet with this warm commendation of a vegetarian diet in the anct. records.

The diet of the Jews appears to have consisted mainly of vegetable food (grains, pulses, fruits, &c.), with milk and its products. Flesh was used mainly by the rich, and on festal occasions.

The grains used were chiefly wheat and barley. The former was more esteemed (2 K. 7.[1]; Rv. 6.[6]; Ps. 81.[16]); the latter was accordingly the food of the poorer classes, and was used, as are oats in northern countries, to feed the beasts of burden (1 K. 4.[28]). The barley came to maturity before the wheat (Ex. 9.[31ff.]; Ru. 1.[22], 2.[23]), and the barley harvest was used as a date in the yr. (2 S. 21.[9]), like the wheat harvest (Ex. 34.[22]).

The other grains mentioned are spelt and millet. The former, a coarse corn resembling wheat, appears as fitches (Ek. 4.[9], AV.), and rye (Ex. 9.[32]; Is. 28.[25]). The latter is only mentioned in Ek. 4.[9].

The grain was sometimes eaten raw (Mw. 12.[1]), often roasted, for speed and convenience: this is the "parched corn" frequently mentioned (e.g. Ru. 2.[14]; 1 S. 17.[17], 25.[18]); but usually made into bread or cakes.

The grain was sometimes pounded in a mortar (Nu. 11.[8]; Pr. 27.[22]), but usually ground in a handmill (Mw. 24.[41]) by the women of the household, by slaves (Ex. 11.[5]), or by captives (Jg. 16.[21]).

The flour or meal was made into unleavened bread or cakes when a hurried meal had to be prepared (Jg. 6.[19]; 1 S. 28.[24]); this is one of the particulars, therefore, by wh. the Passover supper recalls the Israelites' hasty departure fm. Egp. The bread in ordinary use was leavened. Bread was the main food of the people, the "staff of life." even more than with us: the word is often employed to express all that is used as food (e.g. Gn. 18.[5-8], 43.[31-34]), and "bread and water" mean all that is needed to sustain life (Dt. 23.[4]; Is. 33.[16]). The word is, of course, often used figly., esp. in the NT.

Of the pulses, beans are mentioned in 2 S. 17.[28] and Ek. 4.[9] with lentils. The latter appear as a crop in 2 S. 23.[11], and as the main constituent of Jacob's "mess of pottage" in Gn. 25.[34]. The pulse of Dn. 1.[12, 16] prob. includes more than we genly. mean by the term; it seems to stand for vegetable food in gen.

The fruits most often mentioned and most prized are grapes and figs. Both were very commonly cultivated (1 K. 4.[25]). At the present day the vine is less common in Pal. as compared with other fruit-trees than in anct. times, because of the Mohammedan prohibition of the use of wine. Both grapes and figs were dried, and in this condition formed a portable and convenient food (1 S. 25.[18]; 1 Ch. 12.[40]). The juice of grapes was boiled down into a thick syrup; this and a similar syrup prepared fm. dates were used as we use sugar, and formed one of the staple exports of Pal. It is these syrups that are meant in several passages where our VV. have "honey" (e.g. Gn. 43.[11]; Ek. 27.[17]).

One of the most important crops of Pal. in anct. times, and still at the present day, is the olive. It is eaten as a relish with other food, but its most important function is to furnish the oil wh. is indispensable to the people for cooking, for giving light at night, and for other purposes. The very frequent refces. in the OT. to the tree and its cultivation indicate its importance: oil is mentioned as another of the products exported fm. Pal. (1 K. 5.[11]; Ek. 27.[17]). See OLIVE TREE.

Dates must have been largely used; the (date) palm is often referred to, and in Jl. 1.[12] among the fruit-trees. It is singular that the fruit is nowhere mentioned (except 2 Ch. 31.[5], AVm., an alternative not retained in RV.).

Pomegranates are several times mentioned; they were one of the fruits brought by the spies fm. the Promised Land (Nu. 13.[23]). They suggd. the ornamentation of the border of the High Priest's robe; the handsome flowers of the tree are bell-shaped, and are prob. represented by the bells (Ex. 28.[34]).

There has been much controversy regarding the apple of the Bible: it has been regarded by some as the quince, by others as the citron; but the apple does grow in Pal.; its Arabic name is closely akin to the Heb. word, and it seems poss. that it may be the fruit referred to (Pr. 25.[11]; SS. 2.[5]). See APPLE.

Almonds and (pistachio) nuts are mentioned together in Gn. 43.[11]; both are much grown in Pal., little in Egp. The "garden of nuts" (SS. 6.[11]) was a walnut orchard.

The sycamore is a large tree common in Pal.; into it Zacchæus climbed to see Jesus pass (Lk. 19.[4]). The fruit, wh. grows in clusters fm. the trunk and larger branches, is a small and insipid fig. It is still plucked and eaten only by the poor (Am. 7.[14]).

"The cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick" of Nu. 11.[5] are prob. the same plants we know under these names. 2 K. 4.[39] shows that some form of wild gourd must have been eaten, for wh. on this occasion a poisonous plant was mistaken. The tree called mulberry in our versions was prob. not what we know under that name; perhaps not a fruit-tree at all.

In Jb. 30.[4] mallows are spoken of as a food of the poor in time of famine; this plant cannot be cert. identd. The juniper roots in the same verse were prob. used as fuel for cooking. The "husks wh. the swine did eat" (Lk. 15.[16]) were the fleshy pods of the carob or locust-tree, still used in some countries to feed swine. They were not the locusts St. John the Baptist ate (Mw. 3.[4]).

The bitter herbs of the Passover feast (Ex. 12.[8]) were such plants as are now used in salads; their exact nature is uncertain.

The condiments used with food, "mint, anise, and cummin" (Mw. 23.[23]), included also spices brought fm. the E.

Manna.—The food of the Children of Isr. in the wilderness (Ex. 16., &c.) has been identd. by various authors with one or other of several sweet exudations fm. trees and shrubs growing in Arabia and the neighbouring countries, wh. are collected and used for food by the inhabitants. None of them occurs in anything like sufficient quantity to sustain the present population, much less to answer the requirements of the Scrip. nar.; and there is no proof that any of them contains the constituents required to support life for a prolonged period. Nothing but a miraculous provision can explain the record.

Animal Foods.—Among quadrupeds, the clean animals, those permitted as food, were strictly limited to such as are cloven-footed and chew the cud (Lv. 11.[3f.]), that is to what we now know as ruminants; cattle, sheep, goats, and the wild animals allied to them (Dt. 14.[4f.]). The camel, however, wh. is now classed with the ruminants, was unclean. The domestic swine is a notoriously filthy feeder, and its flesh, when imperfectly cooked, is very often responsible for the transmission of parasitic diseases to man: some modern states have been at much pains to try to prevent these diseases by methods far less direct and effective than that of Moses. The reason for the prohibition of such clean feeders as the hare and the coney is not so clear.

The flesh of the calf seems to have been the most esteemed, and was used by the wealthy to do honour to guests (Gn. 18.[7]; Lk. 15.[23]). A kid was similarly employed by those in poorer circumstances (Jg. 6.[19], 13.[15]; Lk. 15.[29]).

There is a long list of unclean birds (including bats) both in Lv. 11. and Dt. 14.; but the clean birds are not specified. The forbidden birds, so far as they can be identd., are all, except the ostrich and some species of bat, forms wh. live on animal food. Those eaten seem to have been all vegetable feeders. We have mention of turtle-doves and pigeons (Lv. 1.[14], &c.), wh. are abundant in Pal.; of quails (Nu. 11.[31]); of partridges as hunted, and therefore considered eatable (1 S. 26.[20]); of "fatted fowl" (1 K. 4.[23]), poss. ducks and geese; and in the NT. of domestic poultry (Mw. 23.[37]; Mk. 13.[35]). The last are believed to have been introduced fm. India through Bab.; they may be the "fowls" prepared for Nehemiah (5.[18]). Eggs were also eaten; the eggs of wild birds in earlier times (see Dt. 22.[6]); prob. hens' eggs in our Lord's day (Lk. 11.[12]). There is no law on the point, but prob. only the eggs of clean birds were used.

Of fish, those that have fins and scales are allowed: no particular kind of fish is anywhere named in the Bible; but their capture and their cultivation were well known (SS. 7.[4]; Is. 19.[8, 10]). The active and important fishery in the Sea of Galilee in our Lord's time is familiar fm. many refcs. in the NT.

The only other animals permitted are the locust and some allied insects (Lv. 11.[22]); the only mention of their use is in the case of John the Baptist (Mw. 3.[4]).

Milk and its products formed a very important part of the diet: consider, e.g., the frequent description of Pal. as "a land flowing with milk and honey." Not only cows' milk (1 S. 6.[7]; 2 S. 17.[29]), but that of camels (Gn. 32.[15]), sheep (Dt. 32.[14]; 1 Cor. 9.[7]), and goats (Pr. 27.[27]) was used. The last seems, fm. the refc. given, to have been considered the best.

Besides fresh milk, sour or fermented milk was drunk: it is much used by many Eastern nations, and under the names of Koumiss and Kephir is becoming familiar in this country as a nutritious and very easily digestible form of nourishment. It is to be understood in most of the passages where our trs. speak of "butter"; see esp. Jg. 4.[19], 5.[25]. Fermented milk wd. be a most suitable and refreshing drink for a tired and thirsty man: butter is not kept in a bottle nor used as a drink in the E. any more than with us. Butter is meant in Pr. 30.[33]; it is made in a skin bottle, and the process is much more analogous than our churning to "wringing the nose." Cheese is referred to by Job (10.[10]); and is mentioned among provisions for military expeditions (1 S. 17.[18]; 2 S. 17.[29]).

Honey in and fm. the honeycomb was abundant, and was used as we use sugar (for the fruit syrup, also called honey in our versions, see above). Cp. Dt. 32.[13]; SS. 5.[1]; Mw. 3.[4]; Lk. 24.[42]; and esp. the incidents related of Samson (Jg. 14.) and Jonathan (1 S. 14.).

The salt used in the E. was, and still is, mixed with a large quantity of insoluble impurities; when it has been affected by damp it does not dissolve away entirely, but "loses its savour," and the residue is utterly useless (Mw. 5.[13]). It seems to have had the same significance as it now has among the Arabs. Those who have eaten salt together are bound to befriend and help each other to the utmost of their power for ever afterwards (Nu. 18.[19]; 2 Ch. 13.[5]; Ez. 4.[14]).

There are some remarkable prohibitions with regard to food, besides those referring to unclean animals. The chief of these is the prohibition of blood. It is found in Gn. 9.[4], is several times repeated in Lv. and Dt., and recurs in the NT. (Ac. 15.[20], &c.; see also 1 S. 14.[32-34]; Ek. 33.[25]). The reasons given are that "the blood is the life," and that "it is the blood that maketh atonement by reason of the life" (Lv. 17.[10-14], RV.; Dt. 12.[23]).

Fat is also forbidden (Lv. 3.[17], 7.[23-27]). The prohibition is expressed only with regard to sacrificial animals, and is thus much less absolute than that regarding blood (cp. vv. 23 and 26). It is a remarkable provision; for a diet including meat and excluding fat is found with us not a very wholesome one. The large place of milk and of olive oil in the dietary of the East prob. made up the deficiency.

There is also a prohibition wh. has given rise to much discussion: "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk." It occurs thrice, and with much emphasis (Ex. 23.[19], 34.[26]; Dt. 14.[21]). It has been construed by the mod. Jews to forbid the use of meat and milk at the same meal. A kid stewed in milk is a favourite dish with the Arabs to this day; it may originally have been connected with heathen sacrifices or magical rites. It is difficult otherwise to understand the emphatic banning of this special dish.

Cooking.—Boiling seems to have been the common method of cooking (Gn. 25.[29]; 1 S. 2.[13]; 2 K. 4.[38]); but meat was often roasted (Ex. 12.[8]; Pr. 12.[27]; Is. 44.[16]), and in many passages where cooking is mentioned, there is nothing to indicate the process used. We have glimpses of elaborate kitchen arrangements in the anct. royal courts (Gn. 40.[2, 16, 17]; 1 S. 8.[13]), but much of the cooking recorded is that of sacrifices (Ex. 29.[31]; 2 Ch. 35.[13f.]). The baking of bread and cakes is often mentioned; in Jeremiah's day the bakers were numerous enough in Jrs. to occupy a street (37.[21]), hence named Baker Street (?).

The regular meals were in general two, one about the middle of the day (Gn. 43.[16, 25]; Ru. 2.[14]; Ac. 10.[9, 10]), and one in the evening (Lk. 17.[7f.], 24.[29f.]), after the day's work was done. Eating in the morning seems to have been regarded as a vicious habit (Ec. 10.[16]; cp. Ac. 2.[15]). Hospitality demanded that a meal shd. be prepared for guests at any time (e.g. Gn. 18.[1-8], 19.[1-3]; Jg. 13.[15]). Entertainments were given at either of the principal meals (Lk. 14.[12]), but chiefly at the evening meal (Mk. 6.[21]; Lk. 14.[16, 24]). Most of the feasts mentioned in the OT. were religious festivals; but birthdays (Gn. 40.[20]; Mw. 14.[6]), weddings (Jg. 14.[10]; Mw. 22.[2f.]), the making of treaties (Gen. 26.[30f.]), and many other occasions were celebrated by feasts. These sometimes lasted a week (Jg. 14.[12]; Est. 1.[10]), as did the great relgs. festivals (Lv. 23.[6, 34]).

Where the attitude assumed at meals is specified, it is usly. "sitting at meat": at least in more primitive conditions and among the humbler classes the seat was the ground, as it is now. The only mention of any other seat (kings' thrones excepted) is in 2 K. 4.[10], where a stool is provided for the prophet Elisha. In later times, and among the wealthy, a reclining posture was adopted (Est. 7.[8]; Am. 6.[4]; Jn. 13.[25]). In our Lord's time this position was usual, and "sitting" in our version of the NT. sometimes stands for Greek words wh. clearly mean reclining.

The food was prob. often set upon the ground; but we read of tables very frequently, fm. that of Adonibezek (Jg. 1.[7]) onwards (e.g. 2 S. 9.[7]; 1 K. 13.[20]; Ps. 23.[5], 128.[3]; Lk. 16.[21]).

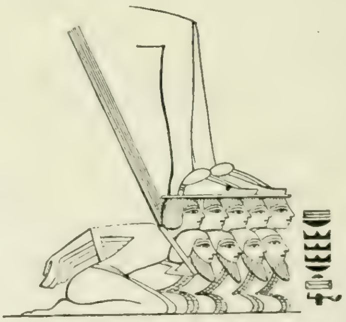
The use of knives and forks at meals was unknown; the meat as well as the bread was taken in the fingers. Hence a necessity for the washing of hands of wh. we know nothing fm. our experience in this country; but the custom was made a burden by the elaboration of the Jewish ritual in our Lord's time (Mk. 7.[3, 4]). The food was genly. taken fm. a dish common to all that were eating together, and often dipped in a sauce or relish (Ru. 2.[14]; Jn. 13.[26]). Sometimes, however, a special dish was sent to an honoured guest (Gn. 43.[34]; 1 S. 9.[23f.]).

Water was the common beverage, but wine was often drunk. R. A. LUNDIE.

FOOL (Heb. (1) 'ĕwīl, (2) kĕsīl, (3) nābāl), FOLLY, FOOLISHNESS (Heb. 'iwweleth, keṣel, nĕbālāh). The characteristic of all these is the implied presence of the element of moral evil. Altho' the distinctions are not decisive, yet (1) seems most associated with "impiety" (Ps. 107.[17]), and (3) with sexual immorality (2 S. 13.[12]). Poss. this connotation explains Mw. 5.[22].

FOOT. Orientals leave their shoes at the door of the sanctuary (Ex. 3.[5]) lest any defilement adhering to them shd. be carried within. For the same reason the Moslem steps out of his shoes on to his prayer carpet. On entering a private house also the outer shoes are put off, poss. fm. some primitive thought of the sanctity of the dwelling. Washing a guest's feet is a kindly act of great refreshment to one who has suffered fm. the heat and the chafing of the sand (Lk. 7.[38, 44], &c.). Footmen were infantry, as distinguished fm. horsemen and charioteers (Nu. 11.[21]; 2 S. 8.[4]; 1 Ch. 19.[18]). To be trodden under foot was to be utterly subdued (Is. 14.[25], &c.).

FOOTSTOOL. The literal F. appears only twice in Scrip., in 2 Ch. 9.[18] ("a F. of gold," Heb.



KING MAKES HIS ENEMIES HIS FOOTSTOOL

kebesh) and Js. 2.[3] ("here under my F."). The Gr. word is hupopodion. The F. is used to indicate absolute subjection: "Until I make thine enemies thy F." (Ps. 110.[1]); a passage quoted five times in NT. An instance of the practice here referred to is found in Jo. 10.[24]. The earth also is described as God's F. (Is. 66.[1]; quoted Ac. 7.[49]).

FORD. See JORDAN.

FOREHEAD. On the F., as the most prominent part of the person, symbols are worn (Ex. 28.[38], &c.), and marks are placed (Rv. 7.[3], 9.[4], &c.). On the F. the Jews bind a phylactery in prayer. The unveiled F. of the harlot proclaims immodesty (Jr. 3.[3]). Hardness of F. means obstinacy (Ek. 3.[8]). In Ek. 16.[12] read with RV. "a ring upon thy nose."

FOREIGNER, also STRANGER, SOJOURNER (Heb. gēr, zūr, nokrī). In primitive times, when nationality was regarded as derived fm. kinship actual or putative, cert. religious privileges and ritual duties were associated with it. The reception of a F. into the kin or nation was proclaimed by his participation in the family sacrifice or ritual of religious worship. In these respects Isr. does not seem to have been nearly as strict as were the Hellenic races. When Isr. came up out of Egp. "a mixed multitude" (Ex. 12.[38]) were allowed to join them: all through their pre-captivity hist. Kenites, Kenazites, Jerahmeelites, &c., races that seem of Arabian or Edomite origin, act along with Isr. Not till the time of Ezra is the exclusion of the F. made absolute (Ne. 13.[3]). The Pauline use of the terms is founded, not on the Heb., but on the Hellenic use.

FORESKIN. See Circumcision.

FOREST. The refcs. to woods and Fs. in Scrip. warrant the inference that large tracts of W. Pal., now bare, were clothed with trees in anct. times. These have disappeared fm. the higher and more open spaces, and such as remain are gathered largely in the valleys. On the E. of Jordan, esp. in the land of Gilead, there are still fine Fs. mainly of oak and terebinth, while in Mt. Lebanon considerable wooded tracts and traces of the Fs. of antiquity are found. The growth of trees to replace those that are cut down is hindered by the industry of charcoal burners, and by the goats, wh. destroy unhindered the fresh young shoots. As late as the middle of last cent. the slopes of Tabor boasted a covering of great oaks, poss. a remnant of the Wood of Ephraim (Jo. 17.[15]). To-day only a few giants over the mountain break the monotony of the brushwood. The most common word for F. is ya'ar. It may, however, like Arb. wa'r, signify a stony region (Is. 21.[13]), or a district covered with wild undergrowth, as opposed to the cultivated land (Is. 32.[15], &c.). Pardēs (Ne. 2.[8]) is prop. an enclosed park.

FORNICATION. See Crimes and Penalties.

FORTRESS. See Fenced Cities.

FORTUNATUS, a Corinthian Christian who, with Stephanas and Achaicus, visited St. Paul (1 Cor. 16.[17]). If, as some think, he was a son of Stephanas, he would then be a young man, and may be ident. with the F. mentioned by Clement (Ad. Cor. 65.[1]).

FOUNTAIN. The name 'ain, "eye," given to the F. by the Arabs (Heb. 'ayin), betokens the estimation in wh. the water springs are held. They are centres of life, beauty, and fruitfulness, in a land with scanty water supplies. Access to the springs is a condition of prosperity (Jo. 15.[9]): it is the condition of existence to the flockmaster and his charges. The water of the F., "living water" (Jn. 4.[10], &c.), as contrasted with that collected in cistern or well, has always been highly prized for drinking and domestic purposes. Notable Fs. in W. Pal. are, that at the "Pools of Solomon," in the heart of the hill, poss. = "the sealed F." (SS. 4.[12]); 'Ain es-Sulṭān or Elisha's F. at Jericho; 'Ain Jalūd, poss. = the well of Harod, at Jezreel; the strong spring at eṭ-Ṭābgha (Heptapegon), on the N. shore of the Sea of Galilee; and the great Fs. at the roots of Hermon, Tell el-Qāḍy, Bāniās, and Ḥasbeiyah, whence rise the waters of Jordan. Copious hot springs are found at Tiberias, and in the Yarmuk valley, wh. are visited by multitudes in search of healing and health. The hot springs of Calirrhoē, in Wādy Zerqā Ma'īn, were visited by Herod the Gt. before his death. See further Water.

FOWLER (Ps. 124.[7]; Ho. 9.[8]), one who catches birds by means of snares; a method common now in the East.

FOX (Heb. shu'āl). In OT. there is no distinction between the F. and the jackal; in some cases Fs. are meant, e.g. Ne. 4.[3]; in others, where we have the pl., it is the jackal that is intended. In Jg. 15.[4] it is clearly the jackal; there wd. be comparatively little difficulty in trapping a pack of them; the flame wd. make them flee frantically (Tristram, Fauna and Flora; Wood, Bible Animals). In NT. the Gr. ἀλώπηξ is the F. (Lk. 13.[32]). Both F. and jackal are great enemies of the vine-growers (SS. 2.[15]), working no little havoc in the vineyards.

Modern Palestinian Fox

FRANKINCENSE (lĕbōnah), an ingredient in the sacred incense (Ex. 30.[34], &c.). It corrsps. to the Arb. lubān, the fragrant gum of the Boswellia Serrata, a tree plentiful in Central and S. India. It was brought into Pal. by the Arabian merchants (Is. 60.[6], RV.; Jr. 6.[20], RV.), and was among the gifts offered by the wise men (Mw. 2.[11]).

FRIEND in EV. stands for 'ohēb (fm. 'āhab, "to love"), in wh., as in its Gr. equivalent, philos (Mw. 11.[19]), the element of affection is prominent (2 S. 19.[6]; 2 Ch. 20.[7], &c.); mērē'a (Gn. 26.[26], &c.), rē'a (Gn. 38.[12]; Ex. 33.[11]), and rē'eh (2 S. 15.[37]; 1 K. 4.[5]), fm. rā'āh, "to tend," "to delight in," where companionship and neighbourly intercourse are mainly suggd. The classical Heb. instance of friendship is that between David and Jonathan, wh., in beauty and pathos, is unsurpassed by any in profane Lit. Friendship passed fm. fathers to children (Pr. 27.[10]), like the guest-friendship of other peoples (see Hospitality). Friends may be more faithful than even one's own blood relations (Pr. 18.[24]), but reproof is a matter requiring delicate and tactful handling (27.[6]). Proportioned to the intimacy of the friendship will be the pain caused by the faithlessness or cruelty of those whom we have trusted (Jb. 6.[14, 27]; Ps. 41.[9]). Into the intimacy of friendship God is pleased to receive His servants (2 Ch. 20.[7]; Js. 2.[23], &c.), and Jesus calls His chosen ones His friends (Jn. 15.[13]). One of the most beautiful things said of Jesus, uttered by His enemies, describes Him as the "friend of publicans and sinners" (Mw. 11.[19], &c.). The King's F. was prob. an official title of the k.'s chief counsellor (1 K. 4.[5]). For Bridegroom's F., see Marriage.

FRINGES. The objects thus designated wd. be better named tassels. They are described under two different names, tzītzith (Nu. 15.[38f.]) and gedhilīm (Dt. 22.[12]). The former designation really means flower, and was applied to the tassels because they were looked upon as being related to the garment just as the flower is to the plant. The latter name has refc. to the manner of construction, and is derived fm. a root signifying "to twist." It does not necessarily mean enlargement, as has been supposed, but that thought may, by a play on the words, be introduced. The command for their use evidently arose out of the case of Sabbath-breaking recorded in Nu. 15.[32-36], wh. rabbinical tradition says occurred in the wilderness of Sinai, and it was intended to be a constant warning of the punishment that wd. follow broken laws. Fm. its being linked with "all the commandments of the Lord," the Jews regard the law of tzītzith as of peculiar sanctity, and they unite it, therefore, numerically with the 613 precepts gathered by the scribes fm. the Pnt., making up this number in the case of the tassels fm. the numerical value of the name, together with eight for the cords and five for the knots contained in each. Rabbinical Judaism has many regulations as to their construction and attachment. They were required to be of wool, attached by a cord of blue through two holes in the garment, and to be at least of one finger length. All the rules were evidently intended to prevent their being lost or cut short. They are attached to the four corners of the prayer-cloth (talith), and by the more orthodox they are also worn continuously on an under garment. Among those excommunicated fm. heaven is the Jew "who has no tzītzith on his garment" (Pesachim, 113[b]). The prayer, "Hear, O Israel," is forbidden without them, and so the prayer of thanksgiving for them precedes it, and during its repetition there is a demonstrative kissing of the corners of the talith. As a part of the fulfilling of all righteousness these tassels were worn by our Lord Himself, and it was one of these, with its reputed sanctity, that the woman with the issue of blood ventured to touch (Mw. 9.[20]). In connection with their ostentation in things religious, the Pharisees made them large and conspicuous (Mw. 23.[5]). Continually before the eyes during the times of prayer, dressing, and undressing, they were an ever-present memorial and warning, and they are calculated to show us that material reminders of religious obligations are not excluded fm. Scrip. Wm. M. Christie.

FROG (Heb. tzĕphardē'a [Ex. 8.[2-14]], Gr. batrachus [Rv. 16.[13]]). The edible frog is common in Pal. and Egp. The frog haunts the marshes and spots where water is to be found: hence the Oriental saying that the voice of the frog is music to the ear of the thirsty man.

FRONTLETS. See Phylacteries.

FROST. The Heb. word ḥănāmāl, so trd. in Ps. 78.[47], is of uncertain meaning. Altho' LXX and Vlg. render it as "frost," this can hardly be correct, as frost is unknown in Egypt. Gesenius suggests "ants," comparing it with Arb. namal. Qeraḥ is lit. "ice," so called because of its smoothness (from qāraḥ, "to make smooth"). In Gn. 31.[40] it stands for cold. RV. substitutes "ice" in Jb. 37.[10], but retains "frost" in Jr. 36.[30].

FRUIT. The most usual word in Heb. is perī, Gr. karpos. F. is an important part of food in Pal. The grape and fig abounded in anct. times. In the proverbial picture of happy rural contentment, each man sits under his own vine and fig tree (1 K. 4.[25], &c.). The olive also has been plentiful fm. old time, esp. in Galilee. Apples, pomegranates, mulberries, dates, &c., still flourish along with the citron, quince, lemon, orange, &c. Only in the fifth yr. was the F. of a young tree regarded as eatable (Lv. 19.[25]). To this day, even in the bitterest war, care is taken, as far as poss., to preserve the F. trees (Dt. 20.[19f.]). In later times the F. was taxed (1 M. 10.[30]). F. is used fig. for reward (Is. 3.[10]), conduct (Mw. 7.[16], &c.), the result of the Holy Spirit's work (Eph. 5.[9]), &c.

FUEL (Heb. 'oklāh, ma'aceleth, " food " [of fire], Ek. 15.[4]; Is. 9.[5]). In Pal. to-day four kinds of F. are used: ḥaṭab, " branches of trees "; qarāmī, " roots or stumps of trees "; faḥam, " charcoal "; and dried dung-cakes. These wd. in all probability be in ordinary use in Bible times. Coal in Scrip. always means " charcoal."

FULLER, FULLER'S FIELD. In OT. the word is part. Qal. (2 K. 18.[17]; Is. 7.[3], &c.) or Piel (Ml. 3.[2]) of khābas, lit. " to wash clothes by trampling "; NT. gnapheus (Mk. 9.[3]). The fulling of new, and the washing of old clothes, was pursued in anct. times in Egp. (WAE. ii. 106) and other countries. Cert. alkaline substances served as soap. The clothes were trampled, or pounded with pieces of wood, in large tubs with water, and then stretched in the sun. The unpleasant odour, and the quantity of water employed, led to the work being done outside the city. For F.'s Well see EN-ROGEL. The F.'s Field, where Rabshakeh delivered the message of Sennacherib, was prob. on the N., whence only the city mt. be approached by any considerable company.

FURNACE. There are four words so rendered in EV. (1) 'Attūn (Aram.), into wh. the Heb. youths were cast (Dn. 3.[6], &c.). This was prob. a large smelting F. The youths seem to have been cast in fm. the top, while the k. must have looked in fm. below. (2) Kibshān may have been a lime-kiln (Ex. 9.[8], &c.). (3) Kūr, a smelting furnace, used in refining metals (Dt. 4.[20], &c.). (4) 'Alīl, a crucible. (5) Tannūr, prob. a baker's oven (Lv. 2.[4]; Ho. 7.[4]).

G

GAAL was leader of the revolutionary party in Shechem, consisting of natives and idolatrous Isrs., who rose agst. Abimelech, intending to overthrow the house of Gideon, and re-establish pagan rule. Abimelech, recalled by his officer Zebul, stamped out the rebellion, and banished G. and his brethren (Jg. 9.[26f.]).

GAASH. A mountain in the territory of Ephraim on the N. side of wh. lay TIMNATH SERAH, where Joshua was buried (Jo. 24.[30]; Jg. 2.[9]). The brooks or valleys (naḥalē) of Gaash, whence came Hiddai (2 S. 23.[30]) or Hurai (1 Ch. 11.[32]), one of David's heroes, are prob. to be sought in the same neighbourhood.

GABBATHA, the place where Pilate's judgment-seat was erected when he pronounced final sentence on Christ, called " the Pavement, but in Heb. Gabbatha " (Jn. 19.[13]; another rdg. " Gabatha "). The Aram. (not Heb.) word, however, does not mean " pavement," but either " bald forehead " (Aram. gabbaḥtā) or " hill " (gaba'tā). Perhaps even " back " or " bulwark " (Aram. gabbā; cp. Jb. 13.[12]) mt. be possible, although the fem. form, gabbethā, is unknown. " Pavement " in the Gosp. is not a tr. but a description of the locality. It was a paved place, or square. Its position depends on that assigned to Pilate's prætorium (see JERUSALEM). The sentence had to be pronounced in the open air. A platform was erected on wh. the judge took his seat. The Gr. bēma (RV. " judgment-seat," Mw. 27.[19]; Jn. 19.[13]) means the platform, not the chair of the judge. G. H. DALMAN.

GABRIEL (" Hero of God "), one of the two Archangels named in Scrip. His function is that of a revealer of Divine will: to Daniel (Dn. 8.[16]), to Zacharias (Lk. 1.[19]), to Mary (Lk. 1.[26]). In the Enoch bks., chaps. 9., 40., 70., G. is one of four angels of the " Presence." See ANGELS.

GAD, a deity, prob. of Bab. origin = Gr. Tuchē, identd. with the planet Jupiter, the Gt. Fortuna of the Arabs. That he was reverenced by the anct. Syrs. is sufficiently attested by Gn. 30.[1] (RV. " Fortunate ": we shd. prob. read " Fortune is come "), and such place-names as Baal-gad and Migdol-gad. Among the later Isrs. it is evidenced by the clan name Azgad, " Gad is strong " (Ez. 2.[12]; Ne. 7.[17]), and by the practice of the Bab. Jews, who prepared a table to Gad, i.e. served him with offerings known as lectisternia (cp. Jr. 7.[18], 51.[44]), in wh. tables were spread as for a banquet to the gods.

GAD ("Fortune"), seventh s. of Jacob, born of Zilpah (Gn. 30.[11]). In Gn. 49.[19] there is a play in Heb. upon the name, as if it meant "marauding band"; Gad gĕdūd yĕgūdennu, wăhū yagūd ʿāqēb, lit. "Gad, a troop shall troop upon him, but he shall troop upon their heel" (Driver, ad loc.). This is in allusion to the brave and warlike character of the tribe. Plundering bands wd. come upon him to their destruction (cp. Dt. 33.[20]). Almost nothing is recorded of his personal hist. Seven sons were born to him before leaving Can. (Gn. 46.[16]; cp. Nu. 26.[15ff.]). For the strength of the tribe see NUMBERS. In the desert march G. was placed in the camp of Reuben, on the S. of the Tabernacle (Nu. 2.[14]). The prince of G. was Eliasaph, s. of Deuel (Nu. 1.[14]) or Reuel (2.[14]). G. was represented among the spies by Geuel, s. of Machi (13.[15]).

When Isr. had taken the fine pasture land E. of Jordan, G. and Reuben, still flock-masters as their fathers had been, besought Moses to give it to them. Their request was granted on condition that, leaving their children and non-combatants there, they shd. themselves cross Jordan and assist their brethren to conquer W. Pal. (Nu. 32.). This accomplished, they returned to the E., rearing the great altar in the Jordan Valley, wh. shd. witness to the unity of the tribes, despite the natl. barrier between them (Jo. 22.).

The whole land E. of Jordan was occupied by these two tribes and the half tribe of Manasseh, at the conquest or subsequently; Reuben being in the S., and Manasseh in the N. Nu. 32.[34ff.] (JE.) makes Arnon the S. border of G.; but vv. 16ff. assign cities in the district N. of Arnon to Reuben. Jo. 13.[25] (P.) clearly makes Wādy Ḥesbān the S. border. In the former passage the Jabbok may be the N. boundary; in the latter G. reaches to the Sea of Chinnereth. The difficulty of determining the boundaries is greatly increased by the fact that, so far, comparatively few places E. of Jordan have been identd. with any certy. It is prob. too that, exposed as they were to attacks fm., and liable to be involved in strife with, surrounding peoples, the boundaries of the tribes frequently changed (1 Ch. 5.[18f.]). We may take it that the bulk of GILEAD passed into the hands of G. In some cases G. is practically = Gilead (Jg. 5.[17]). Ramoth in Gilead, the City of Refuge, was in G. (Jo. 20.[8]). This city, with Mahanaim, Heshbon, and Jazer, were given to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. 6.[80ff.]).

A fine type of manhood seems to have been developed on these uplands, strong, fearless, warlike (1 Ch. 12.[14ff.]). Among the heroes of the tribe we shd. prob. reckon JEPHTHAH (Jg. 11.[34]; cp. Jo. 13.[26]) and ELIJAH THE TISHBITE. To G. the Isrs. fled for refuge fm. the Phil. (1 S. 13.[7]); and here Elijah found shelter fm. Jezebel (1 K. 17.[3,5]; see CHERITH). In G. the partisans of the house of Saul made their abortive rally (2 S. 2.[8]). To G. David retreated in the rebellion of Absalom (17.[27]). Fm. 1 K. 12.[25] we gather that G. joined Jeroboam. Moab appears thereafter to have recovered some of her anct. possessions in this territory, wh. were taken again by Omri, and once more recovered by Mesha (Moabite Stone).

This district was the main theatre of the prolonged and bitter struggle with the Syrs., Ramoth in Gilead figuring prominently in the war; and its inhabitants were among the first to be carried into captivity by Asyr. (2 K. 15.[29]; 1 Ch. 5.[26]).

GAD, the prophet (1 S. 22.[5]), a follower of David, his seer and counsellor (2 S. 24.[11], &c.), who also wrote a hist. of David's reign (1 Ch. 29.[29]).

GAD, RIVER OF (2 S. 24.[5] AV., lit. "torrent valley towards G."). This is certy. the Arnon (cp. Jo. 13.[9, 16], &c.).

GADARA: RUINS OF THEATRE

GADARA, the city of the Gadarenes (Mk. 5.[1]; Lk. 8.[26, 37]) = mod. M'Qeis or Umm Qeis. It stands on a height above Wādy Yarmuk, S. of the hot springs, c. 6 miles SE. of the Sea of Galilee. The ruins are of great extent, and include two theatres, and a Basilika wh. occupied the site of an anct. temple. A paved road connected the city with Ḍerʿah, and a great aqueduct has been traced to the pool of el-Khab, c. 20 miles N. of Ḍerʿah. To the E. are many rock tombs, some used as corn stores, others as dwellings, closed by stone doors with ornamental carving. To these the name of Jedur (Gadara) still clings. The view on all sides is magnificent, including the rising slopes of Jaulān to Hermon, and beyond the blue waters of the sea in their deep bed, the breezy uplands of Galilee.

G. is first mentioned as restored by Pompey and set free (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7). This implies an earlier Jewish rule. But the G. taken by Alex. Jannæus, and called by Josephus (BJ. IV. vii. 3) the capital of Peræa, is prob. = Jedūr, near es-Salṭ (Guthe, KB. s.v.; Buhl, GAP. 255). To G. belonged a wide district bordering on the Sea of Galilee. The owners of the swine (Mk. 5.[11], &c.) may have been correctly called Gadarenes, as occupying a subordinate town in the territory of G. It was a member of the Decapolis. In B.C. 30 it was given to Herod the Gt. by Augustus, and at his death it resumed its status as a free city under the Empire.

GAIUS. Four men so named are mentioned in NT. Nothing further is known of them (Ac. 19.[29], 20.[4]; 1 Cor. 1.[14]; Rm. 16.[23]; 3 J.[1]).

GALATIA. In the third cent. B.C. warrior tribes, who had migrated eastwards fm. Gaul, entered Asia Minor and made themselves masters of a large part of the country. They lived a nomadic life, roaming over the land with their flocks and herds, plundering and laying waste. When not engaged in warlike expeditions on their own behalf they enlisted as mercenaries in the service of Asiatic princes. Some 40 yrs. after their arrival in Asia Minor their power received an effectual check at the hands of Attalos I., King of Pergamos, and fm. that time onwards they were confined to a tract of country in the heart of Asia Minor, some 200 miles long fm. E. to W., and 100 miles wide fm. N. to S. This territory, wh. was inhabited by a Phrygian population, was henceforth called Galatia. In this country the Gauls lived as a dominant military aristocracy among the far more numerous native Phrygians, whom they prob. employed as serfs to till the land. The chief cities of the country were Ancyra (in the centre), Tavium (in the east), and Germa and Pessinus (in the west), the population of wh., even in later days, was only to a very slight extent Gaulish in origin, the majority being Greek-speaking Phrygians engaged in trade.

The territory of the Gauls passed under the power of the kdm. of Pontus about the end of the second cent. B.C., but at the close (B.C. 71) of the Mithridatic wars, in wh. the Gauls fought on the side of Rm. agst. Mithridates, King of Pontus, Galatia received its independence under three rulers, the most powerful of whom (Deiotarus) was eventually recognised as King of Galatia. On the death of the Galatian king, Amyntas, in B.C. 25, the kdm. of Galatia passed into the hands of Rm., when a new province —the province of Galatia—was formed, comprising among other districts not only Galatia proper in the north, but parts of Phrygia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia to the south.

It is important to have this sketch of the fortunes of Galatia in mind in order to determine the difficult question as to the destination of the Epistle to the Galatians. After the formation of the province Galatia had a double significance, according as it was used in the narrow local sense to denote the territory of the Gaulish tribes (Galatia proper or North Galatia), or in the wider Roman-official sense as the name of the complex of territories united under one provincial governor (Province of Galatia). Similarly the name Galatians mt. be applied either to the inhabitants of North Galatia or to the inhabitants of any other part of the province. From this difference of meaning has arisen the difficulty of deciding the locality of the churches to wh. the Epistle to the Galatians was sent. What may be called the traditional view is that St. Paul wrote his epistle to churches in Galatia proper, wh. were founded during the second missionary journey, on a visit to the country shortly referred to in Ac. 16.[6]: "They went through Phrygia and Galatic territory." This view, wh. is known as the North Galatian theory, is still held by the majority of scholars, although in recent years an increasing number have given their adherence to the view that "the churches of Galatia" are to be sought in the southern part of the province, in Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, wh. St. Paul evangelised on his first missionary journey (Ac. 13., 14.). This is known as the South Galatian theory. In the absence of unanimity on the matter it will be desirable to give shortly the chief reasons wh. weigh with those who take opposing views.

To take the South Galatian theory first: (1) It has been alleged and widely accepted that the habitual practice of St. Paul was to use the Roman-official nomenclature in describing the districts in wh. he had planted churches. That is to say, he wrote of the churches founded by him under the name of the province in wh. they were situated. Thus we read of "the churches of Asia" (1 Cor. 16.[19]), "the first fruits of Achaia" (1 Cor. 16.[15]), "the brethren wh. are in all Macedonia" (1 Th. 4.[10]). This exclusive use of the provincial names by St. Paul (if true) does not in itself prove that the churches addressed in the epistle were the churches of South Galatia, for the name of the province wd. of course be appropriate to churches in North Galatia as well, but it makes it indubitably clear that St. Paul might have called the Christians in Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe "Galatians," and might have addressed their churches as "the churches of Galatia." This being so, (2) it seems on the face of it more prob. that the epistle was written to the churches of South Galatia, of whose planting we have a full account in Ac. 13., 14., than to churches in Galatia proper of wh. Acts makes no mention. Further, (3) it cannot but strike one as very strange that, if the epistle was addressed to Christians in Galatia proper, St. Paul shd. have made not the slightest reference in any of his letters to the important churches in South Galatia. (4) As finally clinching the matter, it is contended that St. Paul was never in North Galatia at all, and that the passage in Ac. 16.[6], wh. has usually been understood as mentioning a visit to that district, speaks only of a journey through "the Phrygian and Galatic region," wh., rightly interpreted, means the district in wh. Pisidian Antioch and Iconium were situated—the territory wh. was "geographically Phrygia, but politically Galatia."

These grounds, to wh. others not so plausible might be added, constitute a strong case in favour of finding the destination of St. Paul's epistle in South Galatia, and if the last-mentioned contention cd. be substantiated there wd. be, of course, an end to the debate. There are, however, weighty reasons wh. tell in favour of the traditional view that the epistle was written to churches in Galatia proper. (1) It is not altogether certain that St. Paul always uses the Roman-official provincial names. (2) In Ac. 16.[4] we read of St. Paul's visitation of the South Galatian churches, and 16.[5] evidently concludes the account of this stage of the journey ("so the churches were strengthened . . .") and prepares for a further stage. On the most natural reading of the passage the churches visited must be all the four churches in South Galatia (Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, Antioch). Accordingly, when we read in Ac. 16.[6] that "they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia" (or rather "Phrygia and Galatic territory") we conclude that this describes the new stage of the journey on wh. St. Paul and his companions entered, and refers to districts other than those already traversed. This being so, it is natural to interpret "Galatic territory" as indicating Galatia proper. (The expression "Galatic territory" wd. be chosen deliberately by Luke instead of "Galatia" because of the ambiguity of the latter name.) (3) This conclusion is confirmed by the natural interpretation of Ac. 16.[6],* that it was because he was "forbidden by the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia" that St. Paul went through Phrygia and Galatic territory. With his work in South Galatia completed, the apostle purposed breaking new ground by evangelising in the province of Asia; but as this course was forbidden him, he changed his plans and "passed through Phrygia and Galatic territory." This cannot surely mean that he retraced his steps and journeyed through South Galatia. Most naturally it may be taken to mean that he continued his journey in a new direction, wh. led him to Galatia proper. And finally, (4) the statement wh. St. Paul makes in Gal. 4.[13], that it was on account of an illness that he first preached the Gospel among the Galatians, is difficult to harmonise with the account given in Ac. 13., 14. of the planting of churches in South Galatia. On the other hand, St. Paul's illness may be alluded to in Ac. 16.[6], in the refusal given by the Holy Spirit to allow him to preach in Asia.

On the whole, the evidence must be pronounced indecisive, although the balance of probabilities leans towards the traditional view that the Galatia of St. Paul's epistle is the territory of Galatia proper, first visited by the apostle on his second missionary journey. In the western part of that district we may suppose that St. Paul, during his convalescence, founded a few churches close to one another, prob. in Pessinus and its neighbourhood, where Greek was spoken. A long journey wh. wd. have embraced Ancyra and Tavium is not to be thought of. That Luke in Ac. 16.[6] makes only the barest mention of the visit to North Galatia, and gives no account of the planting of churches where St. Paul was received with such enthusiasm (Gal. 4.[14]), is certainly strange; it may be surmised, however, that the brief notice is due to the fact that the historian's thoughts were at this stage concentrated on the West and on the extension of Christianity fm. Asia to Europe.

GALATIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. (1) Authenticity.—That the Epistle to the Galatians was written by the apostle Paul is recognised by all but a small handful of scholars who on the most arbitrary grounds deny that we have any letters of St. Paul at all. The genuineness of the epistle is placed beyond challenge by its own char. The thought throughout is suffused by so deep an emotion, and the authority of the apostle is a matter of such vital concern, that it is impossible to regard the idea that another than St. Paul is the author as anything else than an extravagance of criticism.

(2) The Readers of the Epistle.—The epistle was addressed to a group of churches—the churches of Galatia—evidently so closely connected that they cd. be regarded for all practical purposes as one religious community. Where these churches were situated has already been discussed in the foregoing article (Galatia), and although the question cannot be looked upon as finally settled, the greater body of expert opinion is in favour of the view that the persons to whom the letter was sent were the members of churches in North Galatia. The destination of the epistle is, however, of comparatively small moment. All that need be said further in this connection is that the persons addressed were for the most part Gentile Christians (4.8), with possibly a slight admixture of Christians who formerly had been Jews. On the North Galatian view there is no reason for believing that the churches were composed to any appreciable extent of those of Gaulish descent ; the fickleness of the Galatians so frequently adduced as an indication of the Celtic temperament, was more characteristic of the native Phrygian population wh. inhabited the territory of Galatia.

* Supporters of the South Galatian theory for the most part maintain that in the Greek of Ac. 16.[6], "the sequence of the verbs is also the sequence of time," and translate, "they went through . . . they were forbidden . . ."—a strained if not impossible interpretation.

(3) The Occasion of the Epistle.—In the Galatian churches, wh. had received the Gospel fm. St. Paul with enthusiasm, and had continued in it for a time with great steadfastness (5.7), emissaries of the Judaistic party in the Church had set to work, with the result that the Galatian Christians were being carried away fm. their spiritual faith, and were returning to " the weak and beggarly elements " of a ceremonial religion (5.3). The leader of the false teachers was evidently a man of outstanding authority and personal distinction, and under his direction the agitation agst. the Pauline Gospel had been carried on with such power and persuasiveness that the apostasy of his converts seemed to the apostle to be the action of men under a spell (3.1). The burden of the teaching of St. Paul's Judaistic opponents was that the fulfilment of the Mosaic law was necessary for salvation. The Gospel wh. they preached they declared to be the true Gospel, completing what St. Paul had begun. The righteousness wh. was of faith was good enough for a beginning, but the promise of a perfect salvation was only to those who attained the complete righteousness by a strict observance of the requirements of the Mosaic law, in particular of circumcision (5.2ff.), and Jewish festivals and seasons (4.10). It is prob. that in itself this insistence on rites and outward observances made a strong appeal to the sympathies of the Galatian Christians who had been nurtured in a ceremonial religion ; and the Judaistic teachers pressed home their advantage by denying that St. Paul had any real authority. He was in the strict sense, so they declared, no apostle at all ; whatever authority he possessed he had received fm. the original apostles who were the authoritative teachers of the Church. And this, they affirmed, St. Paul had himself recognised when at the Council of Jrs. he had submitted his teaching to the apostles for their approval (2.2). Along with the denial of St. Paul's authority went a bitter personal attack on the apostle. Base motives were ascribed to him ; in his work he was swayed by self-interest and a desire to stand well in the eyes of men (1.10), and even in important matters he was charged with inconsistency on the ground that he enjoined circumcision when it suited him (5.11).

It is poss. that the Judaising opponents of the apostle had been active before his second visit to Galatia (Ac. 18.23). But if that was so, at that visit any impression wh. they had made was apparently destroyed. The subsequent rapid falling away of his converts came upon St. Paul as a complete and painful surprise (1.6). It was on hearing of this that the apostle wrote the letter. The stern tone in wh. he addressed his converts, breaking at one point into affectionate appeal and remonstrance (4.12ff.), and the hot indignation wh. he poured on the heads of his opponents, reveal how serious a view St. Paul took of the situation.

(4) The Purpose and Contents of the Epistle.—It was in fact a crisis of the gravest magnitude, in wh. the existence of Christianity as a spiritual religion was at stake. St. Paul threw the whole strength of his nature into the task of counteracting the influence wh. not only imperilled his own work but wd., if unchecked, have bound the faith of the new-born Christian Church in the fetters of Judaism. It was important, considering the nature of the attack to wh. he had been exposed, to establish his authority as a preacher of the Gospel, and to this St. Paul first addressed himself. After a brief address and greeting (1.1-5), and a reference to the position of matters in terms of indignant expostulation (1.6-10), St. Paul proceeded to demonstrate by a survey of historical facts that he had not received his Gospel and apostolic authority fm. the original apostles. This first main section of the epistle extends fm. 1.11–2.21. It recounts the story of his conversion and his three yrs. sojourn in Arabia, followed by a flying visit to Jrs., and makes clear that in this preliminary period, before he entered on his work, he was not dependent on others for his conception of the Gospel (1.13-20). Then after a missionary activity of 14 yrs., in wh. he had a place in the Church as an authoritative teacher, he had an opportunity afforded him of laying his Gospel before his brethren in Jrs., and the "pillars" of the Church, far fm. differing fm. him in any essential matter, acknowledged his right to be the apostle to the Gentiles (1.21–2.10). And, most convincing proof of all that he did not hold his apostolic authority by the will of men, he had withstood Peter to the face and rebuked him for his inconsistent conduct (2.11-21). With the third chapter begins the second main section of the epistle, in which St. Paul deals argumentatively with the questions at issue, and proves that the freedom of the Christian Gospel is inconsistent with the obligation to observe the Mosaic law (3.1–5.12). He first reminds his converts that they had received the Spirit not by the works of the law but by faith (3.1-5), and adduces the case of Abraham to prove that the promises of salvation are attached to faith (3.5-18). The law in its nature was temporary and preparatory, suited for a state of pupilage and designed as a means for leading men to Christ; but with Christ's coming, the law having served its end, men were through Christ delivered fm. the bondage of the law and introduced into the freedom of sons and heirs of God (3.19–4.7). That the Galatians who had known God shd. seek the service of the law was to return to a bondage similar to that in wh. they lived when they were heathen (4.8-11). At this point the argument is interrupted by a passage in wh. mingle entreaty and affectionate concern—an appeal to the Galatians for their old loyalty's sake to renounce their new allegiance (4.12-20), after wh. the apostle proceeds to show by a reference to the hist. of Ishmael and Isaac—allegorically interpreted—that the freedom of Christ is absolutely incompatible with a legalistic manner of life, and that they who wd. be justified by the law have fallen away fm. grace (4.21–5.6). The section closes with words wh. are intended to impress upon the Galatians the peril of their position, and with a passionate outburst against those who had seduced them (5.7-12). The final main section of the epistle is devoted to the practical aim of making clear that the freedom of Christ leaves no place for moral laxity—a charge wh., no doubt, was advanced by St. Paul's opponents—but imposes moral obligations of the highest kind (5.13–6.10). The epistle concludes with a short postscript written by the apostle's own hand, whose effect must have been like "a thunderstorm clearing the air," in wh. St. Paul gives a last earnest word of warning, a warm confession of his faith in Christ crucified, and an abrupt and sharp demand that he who was so unmistakably Christ's servant should no longer be interfered with. A short benediction brings the letter to a close.

(5) The Date of the Epistle.—On the view, considered to be the more probable one, that the churches addressed were the churches in North Galatia, the date of the epistle can be determined with approximate accuracy. As a notice in the epistle implies ("Ye know that because of an infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you the former time": 4.13), St. Paul had paid two visits to the Galatians before the writing of the epistle, and the reference to their sudden apostasy makes it certain that the second visit was quite recent when the letter was written. As we learn fm. Ac. 18.23, St. Paul's second visit to the Galatians took place on the third missionary journey immediately before his sojourn in Ephesus, and we are accordingly led to the conclusion that the epistle was written early in the period of the Ephesian residence, about the yr. 55. In all probability it was written before the two epistles to Corinth and the epistle to Rome, wh. belong to the same period. On the South Galatian theory the date must be placed somewhat earlier, during the apostle's residence at Corinth (Ac. 18.1-17), or when he was at Antioch (Ac. 18.22) before the commencement of the third missionary journey.

(6) The Significance of the Epistle.—If, as is likely, 1 Corinthians was written after the Epistle to the Galatians, we gather fm. the reference in 1 Cor. 16.1 that the Christians in Galatia had been won back to St. Paul and his Gospel. The Epistle to the Romans bears witness to the same effect. For while it deals with the same issue as the Epistle to the Galatians, the exposition is calm and measured—a very strong contrast to the passionate tone of Galatians and its sharp dialectic. The battle for Christian freedom had, in fact, been fought out to a victorious conclusion on Galatian soil. Thenceforth the issue, wherever it was raised, was never doubtful. The epistle is, however, something more than a writing dealing with a controversy of a bygone day; it is for all time the charter of Christian freedom "not only fm. the Mosaic law but fm. every yoke that is imposed upon the religious life as an external condition of salvation without reference to any inner necessity of the soul." The Epistle to the Galatians furnished Luther with his weapons in the battle for freedom at the Reformation. A. F. FINDLAY.

GALBANUM, an ingredient in the sacred incense (Ex. 30.34; cp. Sr. 24.21), Arb. qinnah. It is a gum derived fm. an umbelliferous plant, not cert. identd. Alone, the odour is unpleasant; in anct. times it was used to keep away snakes and gnats.

GALEED, fm. Heb. gal, "a heap of stones," and 'ēd, "a witness" (Gn. 31.47). Here prob. is suggested a derivation of the name GILEAD. The association of inanimate objs. with events, as witnesses, was not uncommon in the anct. world.

GALILEE, Heb. gālīl or gālīlāh, lit. "circuit" or "district," applied originally to a tract in Mt. Naphtali (Jo. 20.7, 21.32), but came to cover a wider region, Cabul, in Asher, being among the cities "in G." given by Solomon to Hiram (1 K. 9.11). The victory of Joshua (11.), and later that of Barak (Jg. 4.), assured the supremacy of Isr.; and cert. towns within the district—Abel Beth Maacha and Dan (2 S. 20.18, LXX)—were noted as the homes of pure Israelitish religious customs: yet the old inhabitants, Amorites and Hivites who had come S. fm. the heights of Lebanon, continued, at least to the time of Solomon, to hold many of the towns (supra). This may act. for the full name "G. of the Nations" (Is. 9.[1]).

G. lay to the N. and W. of the Sea of G., bounded on the S. by the plain of el-Baṭṭauf. The N. boundary is uncert. Benhadad I. of Syr. overran the country (1 K. 15.[20]). It suffered in the strife between Hazael and Benhadad his s., and Jehoahaz and Jeroboam II. (2 K. 10.[23], 13.[22], 14.[25ff.]). With the transportation of its people by Tiglath-pileser III., the captivity of the N. kdm. began (2 K. 15.[29]). That this opened the way for a larger infusion of heathen blood is not open to doubt; but there was still a proportion of Isrs. in the population (2 Ch. 30.[10f.]).

After the Exile, and the defection of Samaria, G. appears as the most northerly of the three provinces of W. Pal. Its S. border runs along the S. edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and its N. boundary is the tremendous gorge of the Litāny, wh. shears it off fm. the mass of Lebanon. Lower G. stretched fm. Esdraelon to the plain of er-Rāmeh. The steep wall of the N. mountains formed a natl. boundary beyond wh. lay Upper G. The Jordan and the Sea of G. were the E. boundaries, but we cannot now determine the limits on the W. (BJ. II. xx. 6; III. iii. 1ff.). Guthe, Sanday, and others wrongly assume that G. included Gamala. See BETHSAIDA.

The purely Jewish population of G. in post-Exilic times continued small, and in B.C. 165 Simon the Maccabee, with 3000 men, rescued them fm. their threatening neighbours, and conducted the entire community to Judea (1 M. 5.[14ff.]). They appear soon to have returned in considerable numbers (Ant. XIII. xii. 4, 5). The methods of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus doubtless secured large accessions to Judaism fm. the mixed peoples of G. (ib. ix. 1; xi. 3), and in Rm. times the population was mainly Jewish. This mingling of races sufficiently acts. for the distinction in dialect (Mk. 14.[70], &c.) and the freedom fm. Pharisaic tyranny wh. brought upon the province the contempt of the Judeans (Jn. 1.[46], 7.[52]). But among the peasant farmers who tilled the rich valleys and tended the orchards and olive groves of G., a fine spt. of patriotism and high courage was developed. They formed the main strength of the Jewish armies in the bitter struggles for independence wh. marked the evening of the nation's life.

Herod the Gt., then a youth of 25, was military governor of G. in B.C. 47. Later it became part of his kdm. On his death, B.C. 4, it was given to Antipas, who ruled in G. all the days of Jesus. He was banished c. A.D. 40, and G. was added to the dominions of Agrippa I. After his death, A.D. 44 (Ac. 12.[21ff.]), an interval of Rm. rule followed, and then part of G. was given to Agrippa II., who held his position through all the stormy period to A.D. 100, fighting agst. his own countrymen. In A.D. 66 the two Gs. and Gamala, the strongest city in the N., were entrusted to the command of Josephus, in the patriotic interest; but in spite of the heroic resistance offered, the overwhelming strength of Rm. under Vespasian soon brought the struggle to an end.

In the early Rm. period Sepphoris (Diocæsarea) was the chief city of G., but this distinction passed to the new city, TIBERIAS, built by Antipas on the lake shore; and here the Sanhedrin, after a brief sojourn in various Galilean towns, found its final home. Here the Mishna was reduced to writing, and the Jrs. Talmud was compiled.

G. comprises rich and varied scenery, mountain, valley and plain, with much that is picturesque and beautiful. The Sea, "the eye of G.," the "sapphire in a setting of emerald," lends a peculiar charm to its surroundings, reflecting in its calm depths the white-robed form of Gt. Hermon. Her children have ever been among the most industrious and enterprising in Pal., and her produce, esp. her oil, has long been famous. Although the numbers given by Josephus may be exaggerated (c. 3,000,000), there is no doubt that G. supported a very large population. In this land nearly the whole life of Jesus was spent; and it is worthy of note that eleven of His chosen twelve were Galileans. See ASHER, JEZREEL, NAPHTALI, and ZEBULUN.

GALILEE, MOUNTAIN IN, where the disciples met Jesus by appointment after His resurrection and heard fm. His lips the missionaries' marching orders (Mw. 28.[16]). Certainty is impossible here, but Jebel Qan'ān, a bold height E. of Safed, overlooking Gennesaret, and the scenes of the Galilean ministry, with its spacious view of the land, in its length and breadth, wd. be a fit place for that memorable interview, and its far-reaching commission.

GALILEE, SEA OF (Mw. 4.[18], &c.), called Sea of Chinnereth (Nu. 34.[11], &c.), Lake of Gennesaret (Lk. 5.[1]) or of Tiberias (Jn. 6.[1], 21.[1]). The sea lies in the bottom of the Jordan Valley, c. 680 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. It is c. 13 miles long. Fm. el-Mejdel to the mouth of Wādy Semakh it is over 7½ miles broad, narrowing towards the S. The water is clear and sweet. The natives prize it as light and pleasant, but they will not drink fm. the Jordan. Fish of many kinds abound, and may be seen at times, esp. near the warm springs, in vast shoals. The hills to E. and W. rise to a height of c. 2000 ft. To the N. lies the great mass of Mt. Naphtali. A strip of plain runs round the edge of the sea. On the E. it narrows N. of Wādy Fīq, where the mountains drop precipitously on the beach: then it widens into the marshy plain of el-Bateiḥa, through wh. the Jordan enters the sea. At 'Ain et-Tīneh the cliff projects into the water.

Thence the plain of GENNESARET sweeps round S.W. to el-Mejdel, where lofty crags rise steeply fm. the shore. At Tiberias, again, there is a small crescent-shaped plain. Limestone is the prevailing formation, overlaid with lava; and the hot springs at Tiberias, 'Ain el-Fulīyeh and eṭ-Ṭābgha, are reminders of the volcanic character of the region. The surrounding soil is extraordinarily fertile. The heat, pouring down into the valley, and reflected fm. the opposing steeps, is often terrible, esp. in E. wind—the dry sirocco. But a soft air stirs fm. the sea, esp. at evening; and the whole atmosphere is frequently changed and freshened by the storms that break down with amazing fury fm. the uplands, through the deep valleys (Mk. 4.^{37}; Jn. 6.^{18}).

TIBERIAS ON SEA OF GALILEE

In the time of Jesus the sea was the centre of a great and prosperous population. The remains of their splendid cities lie on slope and height around, and the land once well cultivated is now the grazing ground of the nomads. Fishing was then a flourishing industry, and the export of cured fish seems to have been profitable (Strabo, XVI. ii. 45). Over 20 boats' crews are engaged in fishing to-day, using still the anct. gear.

SEA OF GALILEE LOOKING TO NW. FROM THE OPEN SEA

Much of our Lord's ministry is inseparably linked with the blue waters of G., whence He called the chief members of His disciple band. John, in his boyhood and young manhood, was familiar with this beautiful lake. Often he had seen it smooth as polished glass in the grey dawn, reflecting in its clear depths every wrinkle of its guardian hills, and the flush of oleander on the shore. He had seen it kindled almost to unearthly splendours by the bright shafts of the morning over the dark brows of Bashan. Is it fanciful to suppose that this furnished the material for his "sea of glass mingled with fire"? (Rv. 15.^{2}). If fm. the middle of the sea one has seen the shining glory of Hermon, thrusting his crystal battlements high into the royal blue of the N. sky, he can hardly doubt whence came the suggestion for "the great white throne" (Rv. 20.^{11}).

The lake has also laid its spell upon minds untouched by these associations: witness the local Jewish belief, that for any one drowned in its waters, a special place is reserved in Paradise, very near to the throne: and the expectation that when Messiah comes He will rise fm. the lake.

GALL. (1) Mĕrērāh, or mĕrōrāh, "bitterness" (Dt. 32.^{32}), used of the "bile" or "gall," because of its bitterness (Jb. 16.^{13}, 20.^{25}). The ancts. thought that serpents' poison was the G. (Jb. 20.^{14}). (2) Rōsh, "head," a plant bearing a bitter head (Dt. 29.^{18}, &c.; Ho. 10.^{4}, EV. "hemlock"); most prob. the poppy is intended. The G., cholē, mingled with vinegar for our Lord (Mw. 27.^{34}), is ident. with the "myrrh" of Mk. 15.^{23}. It was usual to give the victim wine mixed with frankincense to drink, before crucifixion; the effect being to deaden the pain. "Myrrh" is fm. the same root as mĕrōrāh, and also means "bitterness."

GALLERIES, the tr. of two Heb. words. (1) 'Attīq (Ek. 41.^{16}, 42.^{5}, LXX στοά, περίστυλον), prob. a colonnade. (2) Rahat (SS. 7.^{5}); RV. renders "tresses," a preferable tr. The dark locks of the "prince's dr." captivated the k.

GALLIO, " Deputy (proconsul) of Achæa " (Ac. 18.[12]) at the time of Paul's residence in CORINTH. He was br. of Seneca the Philosopher, who extols his disposition. When Paul was brought before his judgment-seat by the Jews, he dismissed the case contemptuously. When the populace, taking their cue fm. the governor, beat Sosthenes the Jew, G. did not interfere; this attitude of G. helped the establishment of the Church in Corinth. After his br. had (A.D. 65) been compelled to commit suicide G. was spared a little while, but soon also perished.

GAMALIEL. (1) S. of Pedahzur, prince of Manasseh (Nu. 1.[10], &c.). (2) A Jewish Rabbi of distinguished eminence in the first days of the apostles. He appears to have been grandson of the famous Hillel. He is generally referred to in Jewish Lit. as " Gamaliel the Elder," and is thus distinguished fm. his own grandson, Gamaliel II., whose name does not appear in Scrip. The impression made by G. on his age, confirmed by what is recorded of him, was that of a man deeply learned in the law, singularly open-minded, tolerant, and just. His interference on behalf of the apostles (Ac. 5.[27ff.]) quite accords with his char. He was the Jewish instructor of St. Paul (Ac. 22.[3]). The Mishna records that " when he died the honour [outward respect] of the Torah ceased, and purity and piety became extinct " (Sotah, xv. 18; quoted in Jw. En. s.v.). The favour shown to the apostles no doubt accounts for the belief at a later time that G. was secretly a Christian (Clem. Recog. i. 65). There is no reason to question his loyalty to the Jewish faith.

GAMES. In the OT. references to games are almost entirely awanting. This does not, however, warrant us in drawing far-reaching conclusions regarding the serious habits of the people. It should be borne in mind that among the Hebrews religious ceremonies were frequently so joyful and sensuous in their nature as to satisfy the instinctive desire for mirth and recreative pleasures. That the children of the Hebrew people had their games as children have in other lands might have been assumed even in the absence of any allusion, but there is an explicit reference in Zechariah's picture of the restored Jerusalem: " The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof " (Zc. 8.[5]). The instinct of imitation plays a large part in the diversions of children, and that this was the case in Palestine is borne out by the words of Jesus (Mw. 11.[16, 17]; Lk. 7.[31, 32]), where the Jews are compared to petulant children who refuse to join their playmates at their games of weddings and funerals. It is interesting to note that the words both of Zechariah and Jesus speak of the streets and open market-place as the scene of the children's games. A trustworthy reference to the amusements of children in the villages of Palestine is to be found in the Apocryphal Gospel of Thomas, where we read that the Jewish children diverted themselves by modelling in wet clay and by making dams to keep back streams of running water (chap. 2.). It has also been ingeniously suggested that the horseplay indulged in towards Jesus (Lk. 22.[64]) was a sort of " Blind Man's Buff," probably played by children, in which one was blindfolded and, when touched or slapped, was asked to guess who struck him. Dancing was an amusement engaged in both by the young (Jb. 21.[11]) and by grown-up people, although in the case of the latter it was indulged in most commonly in connection with religious ceremonies (cp. Ex. 15.[20f.]; Jg. 21.[19ff.]; 2 S. 6.[14]).

Unlike the Greeks, the Hebrews did not to any great extent cultivate manly sports and exercises. It is a fair inference, however, from several passages that these were not altogether unknown. In Jg. 20.[16] we read that the tribe of Benjamin was famous for its expert slingers in war, and the reference in that passage, as well as considerations of a general kind, entitle us to believe that the practice of the sling was indulged in by way of sport. The same may be said of archery. The use of the bow was of course primarily for military purposes, but shooting at a mark must have been a customary recreation (cp. 1 S. 20.[20]; L. 3.[12]). Beyond these exercises, however, which had their origin in military training, there is no reference to manly sports in the OT. Gymnastic training and athletic exercises (among which throwing the discus is specially mentioned) were first introduced among the Jews in B.C. 174 by Jason, a Grecising High Priest, but his action was most repugnant to the stricter spirits among the people (2 M. 4.[7-17]).

THE STADIUM

Lighter diversions, not strictly to be regarded as games, were music and singing, story-telling, and the giving of riddles.

In the NT., beyond the reference to the amusements of children mentioned above, the passages relating to games contain metaphorical allusions to the well-known Greco-Roman athletic contests. There is one reference to the venationes or contests in which trained men (bestiarii, venatores) fought with wild beasts (1 Cor. 15.[32]), and although the passage has been understood by some competent scholars as indicating that St. Paul was exposed in the arena to the attack of wild animals, it is generally regarded as a figurative allusion to the mob-violence through which, at Ephesus, the apostle was in danger of his life. The account given in Acts 19. of the apostle's experience at Ephesus makes reference to the Asiarchs ("certain of the chief of Asia," v. 31), the High Priests of the imperial cult or Roman state-religion, who had to maintain the dignity of their office by providing at their own expense gladiatorial and other games. With the exception of one or two allusions to boxing (1 Cor. 9.[26], "so fight I, not as one that beateth the air"; 2 Tm. 4.[7]), the NT. references to Greek games are exclusively confined to the foot-race, the most important of all the athletic contests. Allusions of a general kind are to be found in Acts 13.[25], 20.[24]; 2 Th. 3.[1] ("that the word may run"); Gal. 2.[2], 5.[7]; Php. 2.[16]; 2 Tm. 4.[7]. More extended references are contained in 1 Cor. 9.[24-27]; Php. 3.[12-14]; He. 12.[1, 2]; and in these we see reflected all the details and circumstances of a Greek foot-race. There are allusions to (1) the training necessary for the contest (1 Cor. 9.[25, 27]); (2) the stadion or race-course (1 Cor. 9.[24], "they which run in a race-course"); (3) the summons given by a herald to the competitors (1 Cor. 9.[27], "when I have preached to others," i.e. called others to the contest); (4) the stripping for the race in which the runners ran naked (He. 12.[1], "laying aside every encumbrance and the sin that hampers us"); (5) the concentration of the runner (1 Cor. 9.[24], "so run that ye may obtain"; 1 Cor. 9.[26], "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly"; Php. 3.[13, 14]; He. 12.[2], "looking (away from everything else) unto Jesus"); (6) the need of endurance or staying power (He. 12.[1], "run with patience"); (7) the joy of victory (Ac. 20.[24]); (8) the prize awarded to the winner (1 Cor. 9.[25], where the enduring reward of the Christian life is contrasted with the perishableness of the wreath of olive or pine given to the victor in the foot-race; Php. 3.[14]; 2 Tm. 2.[5], 4.[8]); (9) the spectators who sat round the stadion on seats rising tier upon tier (He. 12.[1]; 1 Cor. 4.[9]); and (10) the judge, whose chief characteristic should be fairness (2 Tm. 4.[1]), who disqualified dishonourable competitors (1 Cor. 9.[27], "lest I myself should be a castaway," i.e. disqualified for not observing the rules), and who was stationed in the full sight of the runners at the goal to award the prize (He. 12.[2]; Php. 3.[14]).

The widespread interest in games, which amounted to a passion in Greco-Roman times, explains the frequency with which St. Paul makes use of the image of the foot-race to impress on his converts the self-discipline and the wholeheartedness which were necessary for living the Christian life. The metaphor was one calculated to make a popular and forcible appeal, and it is noteworthy that the most sustained application of it is found in one of the letters to the Church at Corinth, in the vicinity of which were held every two years the famous Isthmian Games. GAMMADIM (Ek. 27.[11]). LXX gives phulakes, "guards," but the name of a people, or inhabitants of some place, se s to be intended. Guthe suggs. Qāmid el-Lauz in the Baqa' (KB. s.v.).

GARDEN stands for Heb. gan, gannah, "enclosure," and pardēs, a word of Persian origin, and used in mod. Armenian for "pleasure ground" or "garden." The terms are somewhat elastic, like the Arb. jannah and bustān, wh. cover vegetable Gs. as well as orchards, &c. The G. was usually fenced around to protect it fm. marauders, animal and human (SS. 4.12). Water is the wizard that works wonders in Pal. Wherever it is found the G. prospers, by the bank of the stream (Nu. 24.6), near the perennial spring (SS. 4.15), or hard by the cistern or great reservoir, whence the water, captured in the rainy season, is led in runlets to the roots of tree and plant. Without water the G. perishes (Is. 1.30). The G. is planted, of course, with a view to utility (Jr. 29.5), and a great variety of fruit is grown in the orchards of Pal.: flowers also, of wh. Orientals are very fond, and vegetables; while grain is sometimes sown in the spaces between the trees.

Gs. in old times were favourite resorts of idolaters (Is. 65.3; Ba. 16.70). The Oriental loves to stroll in the G. (SS. 6.2; Est. 7.7, &c.). One who has escaped fm. the flats, e.g. of the plain of Acre, with its fierce heat and dusty ways, into the shade of the great G., el-Bahjeh, with its cool water and delicious fruit, can understand why the Moslem Paradise is dreamed of as el-Jannah, "the G." par excellence. See Eden, Paradise. The natives often sleep under the fruit-trees. The Gs. on Olivet attracted Jesus and His disciples. He was wont to go thither with the dying day (Mk. 11.19, RV.; Lk. 21.37), and there the traitor found Him (Jn. 18.1, 26). In a tomb made in a G., accdg. to anct. practice (2 K. 21.18, &c.), His body was laid to rest (Jn. 19.41).

GAREB. (1) One of David's heroes, "the Ithrite," i.e. prob. native of Jattir (2 S. 23.38; 1 Ch. 11.40). (2) A hill, unident., prob. W. of Jrs. (Jr. 31.39).

GARLICK, a condiment very popular in Egp. (Nu. 11.5; cp. Herod. ii. 125). It is used all over the E. The Arabs put it into the buttermilk wh. they drink, believing it to possess excellent tonic qualities.

GARNER. Grain is not stored in the E. until it is threshed and winnowed. The apothēkē (Mw. 3.12; Lk. 3.17 "garner"; Mw. 6.26, 13.30; Lk. 12.18, 24 "Barn") in Rm. times was prob. a bldg. of some kind. But the immemorial usage of the E. has been to conceal the grain in carefully prepared pits or caves, wh., being perfectly dry, will preserve it for yrs. It thus escaped, as far as poss., the attentions of the tax-gatherer as well as of the robber—not always easily distinguished in the E. (Jr. 41.8).

Raising Wheat from a Cistern-like Garner

GATE (Heb. sha'ar), the entrance to walled towns. For purposes of protection the gates were sometimes placed in the basement of a tower, or were specially fortified by flanking towers. They closed with two leaves (dalĕthōth, Jg. 16.3). Watchmen were set in the towers over the G.; sometimes there was a chamber over the G. (2 S. 18.33). Anciently in the open space in front of the G. was the market, where the people fm. the country brought wares for sale. As there was frequently an outer and an inner G. the space between was utilised for the meeting of the elders of the town as judges (Gn. 23.[10]; Ru. 4.[1]).

It is the Crusaders' "Blanchegarde," a position of great strength, S. of Wādy es-Sunṭ.

GATH, a royal city of the Phil., not taken by Isr. (Jo. 13.[3]). It was the scene of many desperate encounters, and remained a thorn in the side of Isr. down to the close of the monarchy (2 S. 21.[20]; 1 K. 2.[39]; 2 Ch. 26.[6], &c.). It was the home of Goliath, wh. makes the reported visit of David (1 S. 21.[10ff.]) appear madness indeed. The Ark was taken fm. Ashdod to G., and thence despatched to Ekron (1 S. 5.[8]). Fm. the battle in the Vale of Elah, the Phil. fled to G. (17.[52]). It was taken by David (1 Ch. 18.[1]) and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[8]). It fell also to Hazael, k. of Syr. (2 K. 12.[17]), but it was still in Phil. hands when Uzziah "brake down the wall" (2 Ch. 26.[6]). Thereafter it disappears fm.

GATH-HEPHER ("Winepress of the pit"), the home of Jonah, lay on the boundary of Zebulun (Jo. 19.[13]; 2 K. 14.[25]). Jerome (Com. on Jonah) places it on the Tiberias road, two miles fm. GAZA, still called by its anct. name, Ghuzzeh, lies on a hill three miles fm. the sea, c. 40 miles S. of Jaffa. The population is variously estimated at 16,000 (Baedeker) to 35,000 (Guthe). The main industries are the culture of silk, weaving, and pottery. Numerous wells supply abundance of fresh water. Luxuriant gardens and great stretches

G. marked the S. boundary of the Can. (Gn. 10.[19]), of Joshua's conquest (10.[41]), and of Solomon's dominion (1 K. 4.[24]). Judah, to whom it was allotted, failed to take G. (Jg. 1.[18], LXX, 15.[47], 3.[3]). It figures prominently in the story of Samson (Jg. 16.). In the strife between Asyr. and Egp. G. suffered much, fm. its capture by Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 734) to its overthrow by Pharaoh, prob. Necho (B.C. 610–594, Jr. 47.[1]). It fell in succession to Bab. (B.C. 605), the Persians, Alex. the Gt. (Ant. XI. viii. 3). Taken by Antiochus III., under whom it became a thoroughly Gr. city, it was besieged by Jonathan the Maccabee (1 M. 11.[61f.]; Ant. XIII. v. 5) and destroyed by Jannæus (ib. xiii. 3). It was declared free by Pompey, B.C. 62, and rebuilt, prob. on a site nearer the sea, by Gabinius (ib. XIV. iv. 4, v. 3); and the new city enjoyed great prosperity. It was given, B.C. 30, to Herod the Gt., and at his death was added to the province of Syr. (ib. XV. vii. 3; XVII. xi. 4). It is mentioned (Ac. 8.[26]) as " desert ": this prob. refers to the old city. It was destroyed, A.D. 66, by rebellious Jews (BJ. II. xviii. 1). That it was little harmed by this " destruction " is shown by many evidences of its continued prosperity. It was captured by Abu Bekr's general, 'Amr ibn el-'Ās, A.D. 634. It was taken but not fortified by the Crusaders, and reverted to the Moslems after the battle of Ḥaṭṭīn, A.D. 1170.

G. stood over agst. Michmash (mod. Mukhmās), S. of the gorge Wādy Suweinīt, and is prob. ident. with Jeba', less than a mile fm. the valley, the passage of wh. it commands. Fortified by Asa (1 K. 15.[22]), it is mentioned by Isaiah (10.[28ff.]). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[31]; Ez. 2.[26]). The proximity of Gibeah led to occasional confusion of the names (Jg. 20.[10, 25]; 1 S. 13.[2, 16]). (2) A fortress between Samaria and Scythopolis (Jth. 3.[10]), poss. = Jeba'a, 3½ miles N. of Sebastiyeh.

GENEALOGY (Heb. yāḥas). Although mention of G. is post-Exilic, yet there must have been Gs. before the Exile in order that they mt. be available after it. When Ezra introduced more exclusive ideas as to the privileges of Israelite descent, natly. Gs. became more important; especial attention appears to have been given to the Priestly and Royal tables of descent; the case of the "children of Barzillai" (Ne. 7.[64]) is in point. To understand the value to be attached to the anct. Gs. we must remember the ideas prevalent. Even now a slave, it mt. be a Nubian, purchased into a tribe in youth wd. be regarded as descended fm. the tribal ancestor. Hence the Israelite tribes are not to be looked upon as descended fm. Jacob. Prob. the great mass were the offspring of his slaves or of those possessed by his sons. Only the princes of the tribes cd. really regard the name-father of the tribe as their ancestor. The influence of Levirate marriage and adoption have to be considered; accdg. to these a man mt. figure in two if not three Gs. Post-Exilic Gs. seem to have been accurately kept (Jos. con. Ap. I. 7). In regard to the Gs. in Gn. they have difft. historic value; the links in the Gs. of the sons of Jacob may be taken as approximately correct. In the case of the earlier lists only the more outstanding names wd. be recorded. Gn. 10. is a record of what was believed as to ethnological affinities; modified to some extent by geography. As to the yet earlier table we are scarcely in a position to come to a final conclusion. We cannot tell the antiquity of writing, nor when clay tablets were first used for writing on. The accurate keeping of the Gs. rendered such interpolations as that in Ne. 12.[11] readily possible. Fm. CHRONICLES we learn that interspersed with the steps in the Gs. there were notes historical and other, wh. in some cases have occasioned mistakes, e.g. 1 Ch. 25.[4], in wh. a verse of a Ps. is split into proper names; these blunders imply documents wh. have been misread. No traces seem to have been found as yet either in Egp. or Asyr. of a system of registration of births.

Genealogy of our Lord.—The diffces. between the G. of our Lord as given in Mw. 1. and that in Lk. 3. meet the most casual reader. The diffce. of order is the least important, tho' that wh. is first to be observed—from David downward the steps differ except at two points. While Mw.'s G. is carried through Solomon and Lk.'s through Nathan, at the date of the return from the Captivity there are two names of father and son identical in both Gs., Salathiel and Zorobabel, and Joseph is represented as the son of Jacob in Mw. 1.[16], and of Heli in Lk. 3.[23]. Various theories have been advanced to harmonise them. The most plausible, on the whole, is that while Mw. gives the legal G. through Joseph, Lk. gives that of Mary, wh. is the true natural G. of Jesus. As Mary was one of a family of daughters, she wd. have to marry within her own kin; therefore in all probability she was, like her husband, of David's descent. Salathiel and Zorobabel in Mw. and Lk. must be taken as different individuals; and Joseph, while son of Jacob, was son-in-law of Heli. In reading the law at the Passover, if there be no son of the house, the eldest son-in-law takes the place.

Another theory is that both give, as they ostensibly do, the genealogy of Joseph, and differences are explained by adoptions, occurring at two distinct steps. If the prophecy (Jr. 22.[30]) that Jechoniah was to be childless is to be taken literally, Shealtiel (Salathiel) was his adopted son. Again, natural descent from Zerubbabel (Zorobabel) terminated in Jacob, son of Matthan, who adopted his kinsman Joseph, son of Heli.

Matthew, then, gives the legal, while Luke gives the natural, descent of Joseph.

The main difficulty of this method of harmonising the two genealogies is that it seems to imply that our Lord need not have been of Davidic descent. But as Mary had no brothers, she would be obliged to marry into her father's family. Therefore, independently of the genealogies, it is evident that our Lord would be of Davidic descent.

GENERATION (Heb. dôr, "a cycle"), a somewhat indefinite period of time; etymologically it has no connection with steps of descent, altho' usage appears to assume this meaning (see Dt. 23.[3, 8]). At times G. means a century (Gn. 15.[13], cp. [16]). G. also means those that were contemporaries, e.g. Ex. 1.[6]. This meaning may explain how G. came to mean a century; fm. the birth of the oldest of the contemporaries of a great man to the death of the youngest wd. be approximately a hundred years. In NT. G. (Gr. gennēma) means "offspring" (Mw. 3.[7] and parallels), "G. of vipers." Occasionally G. means a "class," e.g. Ps. 14.[5], "G. of the Righteous" (cp. Pr. 30.[11f.]).

GENESIS (Heb. bĕrēshīth, fm. the opening word), the first bk. in the Pentateuch (the Torah). Contents.—(1) Creation of the world and man; man placed in Eden (Creation), chaps. 1. and 2. (2) The fall; Cain and Abel; genealogies of the lines of Cain and Seth, chaps. 3.–5. (3) The Flood; the blessing of Noah; the division of the races of mankind; the building of Babel; genealogy fm. Seth to Abraham, chaps. 6.–11. (4) Hist. of Abraham to the Marriage of Isaac, chaps. 12.–24. (5) Isaac, to the departure of Jacob to Padan-Aram, chaps. 25.–27. (6) Hist. of Jacob to the death of Isaac; with genealogies of Esau, chaps. 28.–36. (7) The hist. of Joseph, chaps. 37.–50. G. is thus an Introduction leading up to the legislative portions of the Pentateuch. The hist. becomes more and more detailed till the descent into Egp. Four-fifths of the bk. are occupied with the hist. of the Patriarchs; more than the half dealing with the details of the hist. of Jacob and his family. G. is thus primarily founded, as was the hist. of Rome, on the hist. of a family.

Sources.—While Myth (Parable) and Legend (Tradition) have had a share in supplying the materials of G., we must not forget that writing was practised by regular scribes long before the call of Abraham, so that records of events may quite possibly have been preserved by being stamped on clay tablets. The act. of Creation must be due either to Imagination or Revelation: unless we are prepared to deny the possibility of the latter we must regard it as psychologically the more probable. We have seen in studying Creation and the Flood that the Heb. form of these stories is the more primitive, and that all races, in the earliest form of their respective religions, were monotheistic. Whichever the source, poetry must have been the vehicle; therefore the Truth was symbolic, not literal.

It shd. be noted that in the act. of Creation, the scene is portrayed as it mt. be supposed to present itself to a human eye. If that is taken as granted most of the objections (i.e. the appearance of the stars after the plants) are rendered pointless.

In Legend there is present a certain colouring, like that introduced into microscopic anatomical sections, to give distinctness to the parts.

The objections urged that some of the events are imposs. are often due to failure to realise the actual state of matters in primitive times. For example, when Gunkel declares the defeat of Chedorlaomer and his confederates by Abraham and his 318 servants to be imposs., he forgets, first, that the army of Chedorlaomer and those with him was prob. not more than 10,000 men; next, that in addition to the servants of Abraham there were the men of his Hittite allies, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; each of whom wd. have a following nearly as large as that of Abraham: he forgets the effect of surprise on a half-disciplined army.

Structure.—Gunkel notes a clearly marked distinction between the legends wh. regard mankind as a whole, and those wh. apply only to the Abrahamic race, i.e. Gn. 1.[1]–11.[32], as compared with the chaps. following. The common Critical position, wh. this somewhat oversets, is that there was a Judean document characterised by a preference for "Jehovah" (JHWH) as the name of God: this, it is alleged, was composed about B.C. 850, that is to say, while Jehoshaphat was k.; this is called J. According to some, about the same time there was compiled in the Northern, Ephraimite kdm. another document, whose writer preferred "Elohim" (God) as the name of Deity; this document is called E. Some date E. 200 yrs. later, during the reign of Manasseh: an unlikely date.

A more improbable idea is that J[2]. (a Judean writer on the lines of the earlier Jehovist) wrote at this date, when Manasseh was promoting idolatry and putting down Jehovism by persecution. In the reign of Josiah, B.C. 630, it is alleged that Deuteronomy was "discovered" (there is no evidence to restrict the "Bk. of the Law" in 2 K. 22.[8] to Dt.); about the same time a writer imbued with the spt. of the Deuteronomic reformation over-wrote the documents of J. and E., wh. had prob. now been combined in JE. In Bab., under the influence of Ezekiel, about B.C. 500, some priest went over the Torah, making extensive additions. This was the "Law" promulgated by Ezra; even to it there were additions made.

We venture to say that such a process of modifications, interpolations, and redactions is unexampled in any other literature, and shd. therefore be accepted only on the strongest evidence. That the Pnt. is composite as a whole, and that G. by itself is so also, is apparently certain; but the Critical hypothesis of its composition now in favour is, to say the least, doubtful. One defect in the Critical Theory is its failure to recognise the diffc. in structure between G. and the rest of the Pnt. Besides differing very considerably in vocabulary, there are in G. formulæ recurrent that are not in the after bks., e.g. " the book of the generations of," wh. introduces genealogies or parallel accounts.

Dr. Driver's idea, that by this formula "the narrative of G. is cast into a framework or scheme," is mistaken; were it so G. wd. begin with this formula, wh. it does not. Against it also is the great inequality of the sections; e.g. the 5th section contains 17 vv., whereas the next contains 12 chaps. and portions of other two; the 7th section contains 7 vv., while the 8th consists of 10½ chaps.; the 9th is only 8 vv., the 10th 35 vv., whereas the 11th occupies 14 chaps. It wd. almost seem as if Dr. Driver concealed fm. himself the incorrectness of his view. In his paradigm (LOT. pp. 5, 6) he gives no indication that the formula is not present at the beginning of the 1st chap., nor that it appears in 2.[4]; he is equally reticent as to the fact that two of these so-called sections occur in the 36th chap.

On the other hand, the phrase " the LORD (or God) spake unto . . . saying," so frequent in the middle bks. of the Pnt., is rare in G. All this indicates that G. had a different literary hist.

Date.—Without assuming the Mosaic authorship we shall endeavour to discover what traces we have of the kge. of the nars. in G. in the earlier prophets, Amos and Hosea. Amos knew of the destruction of Sodom (4.[11]); Hosea knew of the hist. of Jacob (12.[3-5]). The passages referred to are mainly drawn fm. J[2]., except one or two sentences in regard to Bethel, wh. are attributed to E.; but J[2]. is dated long after the fall of the Northern Kdm. The way both authors assume in their auditors an intimate acquaintance with the hist. of G. implies that the bk. had been long known. The episode of chap. 14. (AMRAPHEL, ARIOCH, CHEDORLAOMER, TIDAL) is relegated to late in the time of the Exile. Singularly enough, the names of all these ks. have appeared in the monuments, and are found to be contemporaries; and approximately of the date of Abraham. No one who has studied specimens of Midrash wd. anticipate such accuracy; the truth is that glaring anachronisms are generally present. It is utterly agst. the doctrine of chances that a Jew, laying aside NIMROD whom he had to hand, shd. invent four names, with one exception, unlike any names elsewhere in Scrip., and that these shd. turn out to be those of monarchs contemporary with each other (see ISRAEL). It is simpler to imagine the nar. drawn fm. clay tablets preserved among the Isrs., or it mt. be among the Hittites of Hebron. Of course there is no record of the overthrow preserved. It seems prob. that the empire of Hammurabi (AMRAPHEL) began with the defeat of the allies at Damascus, wh. broke the supremacy of Chedorlaomer. The compilation of G. may be due to the literary activity of the prophetic schools of the days of SAMUEL. There has been a process of editing, but its extent cannot be determined.

Historicity.—As we have seen, the opening chaps. of G. may be looked upon as parabolic, while, in respect of the latter portion, the legendary element may be present, colouring the bald facts. In regard to the hist. of Joseph the destruction of the records of the Hyksos Kings by the dynasties that succeeded them renders the want of all refc. to him of little probative force. Gunkel's objns. (Legends of Genesis) to the historicity of G. are not of much val., e.g. " a world-conquering army cannot be conquered by 318 men"; but the army of the Mesopotamian allies wd. probably be little more than 10,000 strong, and Abraham's allies wd. not unlikely have each as large a following as he, and then there was the effect of surprise and night attack. The odds at Marathon were probably greater agst. the Greeks than agst. Abraham at Damascus, and the Greeks had not the advantage of surprise. He objects to the silence of the act. during the residence of Isr. in Egp., but Jewish history is silent concerning a nearly equal period during the Persian supremacy.

GENNESARET, LAKE OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

GENNESARET, LAND OF (Mw. 14.[34]; Mk. 6.[53]), is the mod. Ghuweir, Little Ghōr, wh. stretches, crescent-like, fm. el-Mejdel to 'Ain et-Tīneh, along the NW. shore of the sea, in length c. three miles, and in average breadth c. a mile. The land, now largely neglected, is of marvellous fertility, and in anct. times it was the scene of a perfect " rivalry of Nat.," all kinds of fruit and garden produce vieing with each other in luxuriance (BJ. III. x. 8). The writers of the Talmud are no less enthusiastic (Pesachim, 8[b], Megillah, 6[a], Bereshith Rabba, quoted by Edersheim, LTJ. ii. 5). Water fm. the great fountain at ṭ Ṭābgha was carried by an aqueduct round the promontory of Tell 'Areimeh for use in the N.E. of the plain. The streams fm. Wādy el-'Amūd, 'Ain el-Madowwerah, er-Rubadīyeh, and Wādy el-Ḥamām are abundant through most of the yr. CAPERNAUM stood in or near this plain; prob. also BETHSAIDA. In this and the surrounding country much of the earthly ministry of Jesus was exercised.

GENTILE (Heb. Gōīm, Gr. ethnē), other races as distinguished fm. Israelites (Gn. 10.[5], &c.). Every race has a tendency to segregate itself, as may to some extent be seen among mod. nations. The Gr. called all non-Hellenic races "Barbarians." This exclusiveness had to a large degree a religious meaning. The religious function in regard to the world made it of advantage that they shd. maintain it. It was intensified under Ezra by way of reaction agst. the earlier tendency so prominent among the Isr. to conform themselves to the nations round about.

It is the glory of Christianity that it has refused to acknowledge such lines of distinction, declaring that God "made of one blood all nations of men" (Ac. 17.[26]); and that in Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek. The apostle who made the greatest impression on the world was assigned his sphere of labour among the Gentiles.

GERAH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

GERAR is prob. the mod. Kh. Umm Jerār, c. 6½ miles S. of Gaza. It was on the S. border of Can. (Gn. 10.[19]). It was the seat of the Phil. k. Abimelech, visited by Abraham and Isaac (Gn. 20.[1], 26.[1]). It was a place with good pasture land (1 Ch. 4.[39], read G. for "Gedor"). It is noted on the way fm. Pal. to Egp. (2 Ch. 14.[12ff.]). Cp. Robinson, BRP. i. 189, ii. 43; Thomson, LB. ii. 530.

GERASA is referred to in Scrip. only in the rdg. "Gerasenes" (Mk. 5.[1]; Lk. 8.[26], RV., "Gadarenes," AV.; Mw. 8.[28], "Gadarenes," RV., "Gergesenes," AV.). Among the various rdgs. that best attested for Mw. is "Gadarenes"; for Mk. and Lk. "Gerasenes." G. is undoubtedly represented today by the ruin Kersa, near the E. shore of the Sea of Galilee, just S. of Wādy Semakh. The present writer is familiar with the slopes wh., between here and Wādy Fīq, descend steeply almost on the beach, and with the burial caves in the upper reaches. This scene in all particulars suits the nar. But why shd. the people be called "Gadarenes"? G. was prob. within the district of Gadara (not the capital of the Peræa; see GADARA), wh. may have extended along the lake shore (Jos. Vit. 9f.). The inhabitants, in that case, mt. with propriety be called either Gadarenes, as occupying the land of the mother city, or Gerasenes, as living in G.

For the great and splendid city in the Decapolis see Schürer, HJP. II. i. 116ff.). It is represented by the ruins of Jerash, until lately the best preserved of all the ruins E. of Jordan. It lies 20 miles E. of the river, 4½ miles N. of Wādy Zerqā. For description see Ewing, Arab and Druze at Home, 145ff.

GERIZIM, MT., the mod. Jebel eṭ-Ṭōr, stands S. of the pass of Nāblūs, the anct. Shechem, over agst. EBAL. It is 2849 ft. high. G. appears in connection with the reading of the law to the people (Dt. 11.[29], 27.[12]; Jo. 8.[33]), and again in the story of Jotham (Jg. 9.[7]), who seems to have spoken his parable fm. one of the lower cliffs. The main interest of the mountain to-day is derived fm. its association with the SAMARITANS, the whole community, c. 200 souls, now living in Nāblus, at its base. Their schismatic temple was built on the mountain c. B.C. 432 (Ryle, The Canon of the OT. 91f.). It was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 129. The rivalry between Jrs. and G. was still keen in the time of Jesus (Jn. 4.[20ff.]). To this day the Samaritans yearly celebrate the Passover on the mountain. The holy places shown by them on G. include the place where Abhm. offered Isaac; Bethel (Kh. Lauzeh); the site of the tabernacle; the twelve stones and altar referred to in Dt. 27.[4ff], where they read "G." for "Ebal." On the summit to the N.

are the ruins of a church, and of Justinian's fortress. The slopes to the W. are terraced and cultivated. Abundant springs rise under the N. slopes and fill the valley with fertility.

GERSHOM, s. of Moses (Ex. 2.[22]), ancestor of Jonathan, priest of Dan (Jg. 18.[30], instead of "Manasseh" we shd. read "Moses").

GERSHON, eldest s. of Levi (Ex. 6.[16]; Nu. 3.[17]), fr. of Libni and Shimei (Ex. 6.[17]). Gershonites, descts. of G.: in the wilderness their duty was to carry the Tabernacle, its curtains, coverings, and the hangings of the Court (Nu. 4.[24ff.]). They had 13 cities assigned them in Galilee and Eastern Manasseh (Jo. 21.[6]).

GESHEM, the Arb. ally of Sanballat and Tobiah in their opposition to Nehemiah (Ne. 2.[19], 6.[1, 2]), prob. sheikh of an Arb. tribe in the S. of Judah.

GESHUR, a small Aram. state, on the W. border of Bashan, S. of Hermon (Dt. 3.[14]; Jo. 12.[5], 13.[11], &c.). It retained its independence (13.[13]). The Geshurites captured the cities of Jair (1 Ch. 2.[23], RV.). David married Maacah, dr. of Talmai, k. of G. (2 S. 3.[3]), to whom her s. Absalom fled for refuge after the murder of Amnon (13.[37]). In 2 S. 2.[9] we shd. prob. read, with Vlg. and Syr., "Geshurites" for "Ashurites." A second G. seems to be indicated in Philistia (Jo. 13.[2]; 1 S. 27.[8], LXX B. omits G.) of wh. nothing further is known.

GESTURE in the Orient might almost be described as a language in itself. We are so easily offended by awkward or inappropriate gesture that we have almost entirely discarded it, trusting to tone or emphasis to convey our meaning. To the more emotional Oriental apt and expressive gesture comes almost as second nature: and the ideas are few for wh. he cannot find effective utterance in this way. By its aid doubtful phrases become luminous, and the spoken word is invested with fresh meaning. A grimace, a tilt of the head, a motion of the hand, a shrug of the shoulder, are often eloquent. The Bible, as an Oriental book, is full of references to gestures (see Salutation). Men fall prostrate, bend down the body, or bow the head in token of reverence, homage, and worship (Gn. 50.[18]; Ek. 11.[13]; 1 K. 1.[16]; Est. 3.[2]; Gn. 24.[48]; 2 K. 5.[18], &c.). The like significance attaches to bowing the knee (Eph. 3.[14]; Php. 2.[10], &c.). Much meaning is thrown into a glance of the eye (Jb. 22.[26]; Mk. 3.[5]; Lk. 22.[61]), a curl of the lip (Ps. 22.[7]), a movement of the head (2 K. 19.[21]; Mw. 15.[29], &c.). To shake off one's feet or garments the dust of a place means that we renounce all connection with it (Mk. 6.[11], &c.). St. Paul and Barnabas thus declared their severance from the Jews of Antioch in Pisidia, and denial of all responsibility for them (Ac. 13.[51]). A man accused of, or questioned regarding some deed, will take the lapel of his garment between his finger and thumb, and by shaking it gently, indicate either his innocence, or his entire ignorance of the matter. To rend the clothes is a sign of distress and alarm (Gn. 37.[29], &c.), of grief (Jg. 11.[35]), of penitence (1 K. 21.[27]; Jl. 2.[13]). Clapping the hands and dancing are familiar expressions of joy and triumph. To spit upon one, or to spit in his face, is a mark of utter contempt (Dt. 25.[9]; Jb. 30.[10]; Mk. 15.[19], &c.).

GETHSEMANE, a garden on the Mt. of Olives, E. of the ravine Kidron, where on His last night Jesus prayed and was betrayed (Mw. 26.[36]; Mk. 14.[32]; Lk. 22.[39]; Jn. 18.[1]). In the fourth cent. tradition laid the scene of the betrayal near the mod. "Cave of the Agony," at the foot of the Mt. of Olives, N. of the road to Bethany, and the place of Christ's prayer higher up, on the slope of the mountain, near prob. S. of the road, not far fm. the Latin "Garden of G." As the Tomb of the Virgin, near the Cave of the Agony, was included in "Gethsemane," tradition seems to have known this as a name attached to the foot of the mountain, to the N., not only of the road leading nearly SE. over the summit to Bethany, but also of the road wh. ascends due E., and afterwards, branching, descends by two paths to Jericho. One garden cd. not have comprised land on both sides of these important and anct. highways. In the absence of any reason for such comprehensive significance, it is not even likely that the local name covered so much. There is no reason, therefore, to place the scene of Christ's prayer S. of these roads. If Jesus first left the majority of His disciples, and then even the chosen three (so Mw. 26.[36f.]; Mk. 14.[32f.]—Lk. 22.[40f.] speaks only of the disciples as a whole), His intention clearly was to retire where He might be undisturbed by any, even by the traitor, until He shd. be ready. He would therefore seek for the most secluded spot. This cd. not be found to the S. or E. hard by important public roads, least of all where "Gethsemane" is now shown; but rather to the N. where no road followed the valley, or crossed over the mountain. Here only cd. there be a "garden," and on the lower terrace of the mountain a denser plantation of olives, with perhaps a sprinkling of fig and carob trees, was possible. It seems prob. that, as the oldest tradition has it, Jesus met the traitor just at the division of the road beyond the ravine. Here, as in the case of Golgotha and Akeldama, the question is not whether a gospel site has always been known, but whether a local name might be preserved until an independent Christian tradition took form.

In the MSS. the name appears as Gethsemani, Gethsemane, Gessemani, and Gesamani. It is Heb., not Aram., and means either "press of oils" (= gath shemānīn, gath shemānē) or, if the ending shd. be Gr., "oil-press" (= gath shemen) or "valley of fatness" (= gē shemānīn, cp. Is. 28.[4]; Dalman, Grammatik des jüdisch-palästinischen Aramäisch[2], p. 191). In the last case clearly a place called "a fat valley" cd. only be at the foot of the mountain. The name wd. quite suitably apply to the part of the Kidron Valley immediately N. of the main road fm. Jrs. If, however, the first is correct, we must assume that there was actually an oil-press in the garden; and it is noteworthy that the so-called "Cave of the Agony" in Gethsemane possesses the features of the caves used for oil-presses. The tomb found in G. was identd. with that of the Virgin, perhaps in consequence of the belief that the garden belonged to John Mark (Ac. 12.[12]), in whose house Mary was supposed to have lived.

GEZER, a Canaanite city whose k., Horam, came to assist Lachish (Jo. 10.[33]). Although there is no mention of the capture of G. immediately on the destruction of Horam and his people, it is reckoned among the cities wh. had been taken by the Isr. (Jo. 12.[12]). The Canaanites seem to have regained possession of it shortly after, for it is mentioned as a city fm. wh. Ephraim did not drive out the Canaanites (Jo. 16.[10]; Jg. 1.[29]); it was allotted to the Levites (Jo. 21.[21]). Earlier than the date of the conquest of Canaan by Isr. Thothmes had conquered G., and later it is referred to in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. The next notice of G. is when it is mentioned as the limit of David's pursuit of the Philistines after the battle of Rephaim (2 S. 5.[25]; 1 Ch. 14.[16]); there seems to have been a conflict at G. with the Phil., apparently at a subsequent date (1 Ch. 20.[4]); from these it wd. seem that G. belonged then to the Phil. In the days of Solomon it was captured by Pharaoh, and given as a dowry to his dr. when she married Solomon. It wd. seem that G. was also called Gob (cp. 2 S. 21.[18] with 1 Ch. 20.[4]).

PEF. Drawing Limit of Gezer

In 1874 Clermont-Ganneau, by discovering two stones marked tahum Gezer, confirmed a previous conjecture of his as to the site of G. Since then extensive excavations have been carried on under the direction of Mr. R. A. S. Macalister wh. have revealed a primitive city beneath the city of the Canaanites; and also the structure of G. in its various periods. As in all primitive cities there was a High Place with an altar; near it was a row of standing stones. There was evidence of human sacrifice; sometimes the victims wd. seem to have been eaten. A sacred cave was discovered wh. Mr. Macalister thinks was used to manufacture oracular responses. The walls of G. even in the Canaanite period were of stone, and more formidable than the earthen ramparts that surrounded many of the contemporary towns. Two fragments of contract tablets inscribed in cuneiform have been found. As the governor of the city, who signs as a witness, bears an Egyptian name, Mr. Macalister argues that on the death of Solomon G. had reverted to the Egyptians. This seems unlikely, as the tablet is dated B.C. 649 or 651, during the reign of Manasseh of Judah, and what is of more importance, during that of Asshur-bani-pal, who held Egp. as a subject territory. The use of the Asyr. language and the cuneiform character points rather to subjection to Asyr.

Mr. Macalister has traced practically the whole course of the outer wall wh. protected G. from about B.C. 1500 till B.C. 100. Its total length he estimates "at about 4500 ft., wh. is rather more than one-third the length of the modern wall of Jrs." (PEFQ. Jany. 1905). This enables us to realise how small in size an important city and fortress in ancient times might be.

GIANTS (Heb. nĕphîlîm, Gn. 6.[4]; Nu. 13.[33]; rĕphaîm, Dt. 2.[11]; Jo. 12.[4]: the latter also trd. "dead" in Pr. 2.[18]; Is. 14.[9], &c.). Immigrant races tend to magnify the differences between them and their predecessors, and regard them either as Gs. or dwarfs. The Isr. regarded the Emim, the Zamzumim, and the Anakim as Gs. Fm. the nar. in Gn. 6. the first of the Heb. words, nĕphîlîm, has been derived fm. nāphal, "to fall," as if it meant "the fallen ones"; a similar etymology mt. be proposed for rĕphaîm. Rāphāh, accdg. to Ges., means "to throw down," then "to be remiss." The Isr. were prob., like the Jews, a small race, hence if the Anakim were taller than the average they wd. regard them as gigantic, and, as such, supernatural. While the narrative in Gn. 6.[1-4] has assumed a legendary form in the ordinary Jewish interpretation wh. is found in Enoch, the historic truth may be merely an intermarriage between two differing races. We know too little of the nature of angels, or of the possible relationships of spirit and material organism, to dogmatise as to what is impossible. The Anakim must have been immigrants to Hebron at a comparatively late date, as Abraham does not meet them during his residence at Mamre; nor do Isaac or Jacob encounter them. They may have been refugees from Moab or Ammon.

It is distinct fm. the neighbouring Geba (Is. 10.[29]), with wh. it is sometimes confused. The story in Jg. 19. puts G. near the great N. highway between Jrs. and Ramah, not far fm. the junction with the road to Geba (Jg. 20.[31]). In v. 33 for Maareh-geba we shd. prob. read "fm. the W. of Geba." It is not a place name. Josephus (BJ. V. ii. 1) speaks of "Gabaothsaul," 30 stadia N. of Jrs. All this seems to point to a site on Teleil el-Fūl, an artificial mound with few ruins above ground, c. four miles N. of Jrs. Saul belonged to G. (1 S. 10.[26]), whence it is called

"G. of Saul" (11.[4]; Is. 10.[29]). It is prob. = "G. of God" (1 S. 10.[5], RVm.). Fm. this point Saul directed the battle agst. the Phil. (13., 14.), and here Rizpah guarded the bodies of his unfortunate sons (2 S. 21.[7ff.]). Gibeath (Heb. gibe'ath, st. const. of gib'ah, "hill of") appears as the first element in cert. place names: (1) G.-hā'arālōth, "hill of the foreskins" (Jo. 5.[3]). (2) G.-Phinehas, the burial-place of Eleazar, in Mt. Ephraim: unident. (Jo. 24.[33]). (3) G.-hammōreh (see MOREH). (4) G.-hā Elohīm = Gibeah 2. (5) G.-hā Hachīlah (see HACHILAH). GIBEON, a Hivite city whose inhabitants deceived Joshua, made a league with Isr., and secured the safety of their allies in three other cities (Jo. 9.). It was a position of great strength. Moved by jealousy of its good fortune, the rest of the Cans. rose to destroy it. Apprised of this, Joshua made a night march fm. Gilgal, certainly by Wādy Suweimīt, surprised the confederates and drove them headlong down the pass of Bethhoron (Jo. 10.). The site must be that of the mod. el-Jib, 5½ miles N. of Jrs. It stands on the N. end of a double hill, not far S. of the pass wh. goes down by the Bethhorons, opening into the Vale of Aijalon. There are numerous springs, and a great reservoir hewn fm. the rock to the SW. of the vill., wh. is doubtless "the pool of G." (2 S. 2.[13]; Jr. 41.[12]; Ant. V. i. 17). Saul, for some unexplained reason, slew many of the inhabitants, an outrage avenged by David (2 S. 21.[1ff.]). Here Joab defeated Abner (2.[12ff.]). David defeated the Phil. (5.[25], for "Geba" read "G."; cp. 1 Ch. 14.[16]). By the "great stone," not otherwise known, Joab murdered Amasa (2 S. 20.[8]). Here stood the great sanctuary in wh. Solomon dreamed his famous dream, and offered sacrifice (1 K. 3.[4ff.], cp. 9.[2]; 2 Ch. 1.[3, 13]; cp. 1 Ch. 16.[39], 21.[29]). G. was in the portion of Benj. (Jo. 18.[25]), and was allotted to the children of Aaron (21.[17]). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 3.[7]).

GIBLITES. See GEBAL.

GIDEON ("feller"), s. of Joash the Abiezerite, of Ophrah, an unident. city in Manasseh (Jg. 6.[11]). Accdg. to the present text (Jg. 6.[11]–8.[32]) G. was called by an angel to deliver Isr. fm. the Midianites, and a sign convinced him of the divine origin of the command. He outraged the altar of Baal, cut down the Asherah, the sacred pole that stood by it, and sacrificed a bullock to J″. As this resulted in no injury to him, Baal's impotence was inferred. The name Jerubbaal is referred to this event ("Let Baal plead," EVm.). The children of the E. in vast hordes crossed the Jordan, swarmed up the vale of Jezreel, and filled all the plain with their black tents and camels. Abiezer, his own clan, Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun and Naphtali, gathered at his call, and, encouraged by the sign of the fleece, he advanced agst. the foe. He pitched by the Well of Harod. There, of 32,000 men, 22,000 turned back afraid, and of the 10,000 remaining, only 300 were ultimately chosen to fight. Encouraged by a dream, he sent his men to three sides of the camp of the enemy lying towards the hill Moreh, and raised a night alarm, so demoralising the Midianites that they slaughtered each other in their headlong flight. The torch lit and thrust into a jar wd. smoulder; the jar broken, the torch, whirled round the head, wd. burst into a bright flame. The rally of the Ephraimites at the fords of Jordan, the capture and slaughter of Oreb and Zeeb, the judicious and conciliatory handling of the complaining Ephraimites, the pursuit and capture of the kings Zebah and Zalmunnah, and the punishment of the men of Succoth and Peniel, brought the career of victory to a close. He judged Isr. 40 yrs.; but while "the land had rest" ease and comfort seem to have corrupted him, and, dedicating the gold taken as booty to idolatrous purposes, he prepared the way for a new declension of the people.

G. is called Jerubbesheth in 2 S. 11.[21], the element "Baal" being mutilated, to show contempt for that heathen deity.

The writer has made use of more than one existing account in preparing the story of G. See the careful article in HDB. s.v.

GIER-EAGLE (Heb. rāḥām = Arb. rakhm), the Egyptian vulture, wh. shares with the dog the office of scavenger in the East. RV. trs. by G. peres, regarding it as equivalent to "Lammergeier." See Eagle.

GIFT. The word has genly. in Scrip. the meaning it has among ourselves; only in the Orient Gs. are seldom disinterested: a quid pro quo is usually expected. Gs. made to the wealthy and powerful are almost always in the nat. of "a sprat to catch a mackerel." To bring Gs. or presents to a monarch betokened submission (Ps. 69.[29ff.], 72.[10], &c.); or "Gs." mt. be another name for tribute (2 S. 8.[2, 6], &c.). Cert. offerings are called Gs. (2 Ch. 32.[23]; see Corban, Sacrifice). Gs. may be bribes, either to expedite or to prevent justice. The Arb. bakhshīsh has the same ambiguity. In NT. dōron has usually the common meaning: anathēma (Lk. 21.[5]) is lit. "a votive offering set up in a temple," and refers to Herod's lavish Gs.: charisma is a sptl. endowment bestowed by God, to be used for the advantage of the Church (1 Cor. 7.[7], &c.).

GIHON. See Eden.

GIHON, a place below the city of David where Solomon was anointed k. (1 K. 1.[33, 38, 39]). Hezekiah stopped the upper issue (RV. "spring") of the waters of G. and led them down to the W. side of the city of David (2 Ch. 32.[30]; cp. Sr. 48.[17]). Gihon, lit. "bursting forth," is evidently a spring E. of the city of David, a conduit leading its waters to the W. (see Shiloah). It is ident. with 'ain umm ed-daraj, "the spring of the stairs," to wh. one descends by a long staircase. It is an intermittent spring, the water rushing forth at intervals with great power. It may once have had an open outflow towards the valley. Warren (1867) discovered an approach to the spring fm. above, by a subterranean passage and shaft, where the water, wh. had been led deeper into the mountain by a tunnel, cd. be drawn up with a rope running through a ring. When this approach was made is unknown. The objects found in the passage by Warren do not point to a very anct. date, but they may be of later origin. The brittle nature of the rock prob. soon made the approach dangerous, so that it fell into disuse.

GILBOA. The mountain (1 S. 28.[4], 29.[1], 31.[1, 8, 10]; 2 S. 1.[21]) can be no other than Jebel Fuqū'a, within easy distance of Shunem, Endor, Jezreel, and Bethshan. The mountain rises S. of the vale of Jezreel, and runs S. along the edge of Esdraleon until it merges in the hills of Samaria, the E. slopes falling into the Jordan Valley. Its highest point is c. 1700 ft. above the sea. If a place is meant by G. in 1 S. 28.[4] it is prob. the mod. Jelbōn, on the slope E. of Jenīn. The main formation is limestone, with here and there basalt. The higher reaches are bare and sterile, but the soil in the hollows is very fertile. See Kishon, Well of Harod.

GILEAD. (1) Mount G. appears in Gn. 31.[21, 23]; Dt. 3.[12]; SS. 4.[1]. The name Jebel Jil'ād is confined now to a height between the Jabbok and es-Salṭ. But it certainly signified the whole land of G. as seen fm. the W. of Jordan. A Mount G. is mentioned in Jg. 7.[3]. This is prob. ident. with the N. part of Mt. Gilboa. There seems to be a reminiscence of this in the name of the great spring, 'Ain Jalūd, rising at its base. (2) The city G. (Ho. 6.[8]; prob. also Jg. 10.[17]) may be represented by the ruin Jil'ād, five miles N. of es-Salt. (3) Sometimes G. stands for the whole country E. of Jordan (Gn. 37.[25]; Jo. 22.[9, 13], &c.), but genly. it denotes the land between the Yarmuk on the N.

and Wādy Ḥesbān on the S. (Dt. 3.[10]; 2 K. 10.[33]). The Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerqa) cut off the kdm. of Sihon fm. that of Og (Dt. 3.[16]). G. was divided between Manasseh and Gad, Mahanaim, N. of the Jabbok, being given to the latter (Jo. 13.[24, 30]). The boundaries, however, were not permanently fixed (1 Ch. 5.[11]; cp. Jg. 5.[17]). Fm. the Yarmuk to Nahr ez-Zerqa is now known as 'Ajlūn, under the government of Irbid. Fm. ez-Zerqa to the Arnon is el-Belqā, under es-Salt. The prevailing formation of the region is limestone, contrasting with the basalt of Moab and Bashan. There are great stretches of oak forest. The terebinth, the olive, and other trees grow luxuriantly, and many of the hills wh. diversify the landscape are wooded to the top. The great Wādys contain water all the yr. It affords splendid pasture land (SS. 6.[5]), and the desire of the Arabs to preserve it has hindered cultivation. While not so rich as the volcanic soil N. and S., wherever it is tilled the land yields excellent returns. See Ramoth G., Jabesh G., Peræa.

GILGAL was the first halting-place of Isr. W. of Jordan (Jo. 4.[19]) where the 12 stones were set up (v. 20), whence the name "a circle of stones" was derived. It remained for a time the base of operations for the conquest (5.[10], 9.[6], 10.[7], &c.). It was in the circuit of Samuel (1 S. 7.[16]); here was enacted the tragedy of 1 S. 15., and here Judah met David on his return fm. Mahanaim (2 S. 19.[15]). Fm. its associations we need not be surprised that it became a famous sanctuary (Ho. 4.[15], &c.; Am. 4.[4]; Mi. 6.[5]). The site is prob. marked by Birket Jiljūliyeh, a ruin and reservoir, with anct. remains, 8½ miles fm. Jericho, and three miles fm. Jordan. Guthe wd. ident. with this the G. of 2 K. 2.[1]. Buhl (GAP. 202) argues for Juleijel, three miles S. of E. fm. Nāblūs. It is over agst. Ebal and Gerizim (Dt. 11.[30]), and fm. it the prophets wd. "go down" to Bethel (2 K. 2.[2]). Guthe thinks "the 'Arabah" (RV.) shows that the writer of Dt. 11. had G. in the Jordan Valley in his mind; while LXX in 2 K. 2.[2] has simply "came" to Bethel. But the order in wh. the cities are named seem to require a G. in the mountain. This mt. be either Juleijel or Jiljīlia, two miles W. of Sinjil, and seven miles N. of Bethel. In Jo. 15.[7] we shd. prob. understand some conspicuous circle of stones. In Jo. 12.[23] read with LXX "Galilee" for G.

GILOH, the native place of Ahithophel (2 S. 15.[12], 23.[34]). It may be either Beit Jāla, 1¼ mile NW. of Bethlehem, or Kh. Jāla, six miles N. of Hebron. G. (Jo. 15.[51]), in the S. of Judah, is not ident.

GLASS (RV. Jb. 28.[17], Heb. zekôkîth, AV. "crystal"; Gr. ὕαλος, Rv. 21.[18]; adj. ὑάλινος, Rv. 4.[6]). This well-known substance was manufactured very early; the process of glass-blowing is portrayed in the tomb of Tih in Saqqara, dated the 5th dyn. It was long believed that glass was discovered, casually, on the seashore of Pal., not far fm. Acre, through the melting of the sand under a fire (Pliny, NH. xxxvi. 191). It must be noted that the material "glass" had nothing to do with LOOKING-GLASSES in Scrip. These were of polished metal. See SEA OF GLASS.

GLEANING. The corners of the field, and the G. of the harvest and of the vintage, were to be left for the poor of the people. It is a kindly provision observed to this day in the Orient.

GLEDE (Heb. rā'āh, Dt. 14.[13]), a bird of prey, unclean. In Lv. 11.[13] we find dā'āh (AV. "vulture"); fm. the fact that in LXX both words are trd. γύψ it is prob. there is a mistake in one or other passage; mistakes wd. be easy fm. the likeness between ר and ד.

THE PEREGRINE FALCON OR GLEDE

GLORY (Heb. kābōd, Gr. δόξα), general admiration; magnificence, as that wh. induces admiration (Ex. 28.[40]; Mw. 6.[29]), used of the human spirit (Ps. 16.[9], 57.[8]). Divine G. is adoring wonder in contemplating the Divine attributes (Ps. 104.[31]). It is most frequently used for the SHEKINAH, the "pillar of cloud and fire" that accompanied Isr. in the Wilderness and appeared over the ARK (Ex. 24.[16]). But it applies to any visible token of God's presence (Ek. 8.[4]). The NT. use is practically one with that of OT.

GOAD (1 S. 13.[21], &c.; Ac. 26.[14], RV.), a long tapered rod with a sharp nail projecting fm. the smaller end, with wh. the oxen are spurred and guided in the furrow. On the other end is a broad blade, to remove earth clinging to the plough. In skilful hands it mt. be a formidable weapon (Jg. 3.[31]).

GOAT (Heb. 'ēz, "G." generically, or sometimes "she-goat," Gn. 15.[9], 31.[38]; 'attūd, Nu. 7.[17]; tzaphīr, Dn. 8.[5]; sa'īr, Lv. 16.[7], "he-G."), one of the earliest domesticated animals. The hair is used to make a rough cloth; of the skin, churns, and wine and water bottles are made. It was much used for sacrifices and also for food (see SCAPE-GOAT). In Mw. 25.[32] the G. (eriphos) is the symbol of the wicked as distinct fm. the good. In Pal. Gs. and sheep go together in herds under one shepherd. The Gs. in Pal. are black, of the long-eared variety.

WILD GOAT (NIMRUD)

The wild or mountain goats (Heb. yĕʿēlīm, 1 S. 24.[2]; Jb. 39.[1]: Ps. 104.[18]) are animals naturally wary, with extremely keen sense of sight and smell, and ordinarily very difficult to approach. But the mother goat is accustomed to hide her kid in some safe recess in the mountains, while she roams in search of food. Hunters mark the spot, and concealing themselves near by, easily take her on her return. Many think this was the game hunted by Esau (Gn. 25.[27]).

GOD. In the Bible man's kge. of God is uniformly conceived as being the outcome of His self-revelation. He manifests Himself to men, and they see and know Him. Not merely is the inquiry nowhere made as to what God is apart from, or behind, this self-disclosure, but the possibility that His hidden being may differ fm. what is revealed does not present itself. It is assumed that He makes Himself known to men as He really is.

Scrip. contains not so much a formal doctrine of the Divine essence, as rather a hist. of what God has done to redeem the world. We are given, not information about God, but a picture of His working for human salvation, specially in the fortunes of Isr. and supremely in the presence and work of Jesus Christ. We ought not, therefore, to expect that the idea of God should remain exactly the same from the first page of the Bible to the last. If revelation is inwoven in the texture of human hist. it will of course be an advancing thing; and the conception of God animating it will become always higher, richer, and more spiritual. There is nothing strange in the fact that the idea of God has grown. Every one of our ideas has grown; each sprang once fm. humble origins, and has had a long evolution in the past. Why the loftiest of them all shd. form an exception to this rule is hard to see. But the conception of God is no more discredited by this fact of its development than, say, the conception of number. When at first men flung out their minds at the great supramundane reality, they of course used ideas that were exceedingly imperfect; but the light has grown, and esp. through the influence of Jesus men's minds have been led into an ever worthier agreement with the inexhaustible truth. The faint streaks of dawn have brightened, more and more, into the full shining of noon-day.

The OT. takes the existence of God for granted in the first verse of Genesis. There is no thought of proving His reality. The prophets know that God has spoken to them; the speculative question of His being therefore cd. not occur. Even the fool, whom Ps. 14. describes as saying that there is no God, is to be conceived less as guilty of speculative negation than as what we shd. call a practical atheist. His belief is but his manner of life becoming articulate.

All the prophets appear to regard the Exodus as the great redemptive interposition by wh. Jehovah for the first time made Isr. His people, and Himself their God. Fm. the beginning moral elements had a place in the conception of J″., though the purging out of ingredients we shd. now call pagan was a long wavering process. Thus at first J″. was not God alone, but only God of Isr., confined to a specific dwelling-place; other gods ruled alongside of Him, in other lands. But fm. the first His superiority to all other gods was exultantly affirmed, and by degrees this passed into a recognition alike of the unity and of the universality of God. Here the prophets led the way. In His dealings with Isr. and with their own lives they found clear proof that He is Holy Love, intent on the spiritual education of His people, and that His sway covers the whole earth. It is helpful to regard the prophets as having each contributed individual elements to the complete idea. Amos, for example, taught that God is righteousness; Hosea that He is unwearied love; Isaiah that He is the transcendent and universal Lord, with absolute claims on human service. In Jeremiah the relation of God to the single soul is dwelt upon, and in Ezekiel His sublime self-existence. This brief characterisation does not, of course, imply that a prophet may not be quite aware of aspects of the Divine char. on wh. he fails to insist. All these aspects—righteousness, love, transcendence, care for the individual—may be illustrated abundantly fm. the Psalms.

ARABIAN IBEX OR BEDEN: THE WILD GOAT OF SCRIPTURE

The God of Isr. is a spiritual being, high and lifted up above things of earth and sense. "The heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool" (Is. 66.[1]). His nature is ethical, demanding consecrated purity of heart and rectitude of life in His people: "Be ye holy, for I am holy" (Lv. 11.[44]). He also maintains a continual intercourse with men, speaking to them in ways that can be understood, and directing their lives. There is no suggn. in Scrip., as so often in non-biblical religions, of a Deity so remote and transcendent that He needs intermediate beings through whom to conduct His relations with the world. So really does He reveal Himself within human experience, that figures and principles drawn fm. the life of men are freely applied to Him; it is said, for example, that the Lord has made bare His holy arm, or that He repented of having made Saul king. But these figures convey a real kge. of His mind; they are not merely symbolical. When it is said for instance, "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God," it is meant that He is such that His servants must serve Him only. However metaphorically His relations to men are described, they are real relations. Indeed His char. is viewed almost wholly in the light of His attitude towards men, as when He is said to think upon the poor and needy, to look not on the outward appearance but on the heart, or to have no respect of persons. The intensely ethical nat. of these relations to men is exhibited in the fact that He consigned His chosen people to exile, rather than compromise the holiness of His providential government; while yet in His wise love purposing to gather again a purified remnant. The loftiest conception of God within the OT. is found in Deuteronomy and the second part of Isaiah. And it scarcely needs saying explicitly that His personality is everywhere assumed. In Him perfect self-consciousness and perfect self-determination are united. These abstract terms, indeed, only express truths wh. are put far more vividly in phrases born directly in the religious consciousness, as when it is said that God is the Lord who made heaven and earth, that He is the Shepherd of His people, &c.

Does the OT. give to God the name "Father"? There are some half-dozen passages, unquestionably, in wh. the name occurs. So in Dt. 32.[6] it is asked: "Is He not thy Father that hath bought thee?" with wh. we may compare Jr. 3.[4]: "Wilt thou not fm. this time cry unto Me, My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth?" (cp. also Is. 63.[16], 64.[8]; Ml. 1.[6], 2.[10]). But, in the first place, this thought of Him does not really dominate the Heb. conception of God, wh. is influenced rather by the overpowering fear of His holiness, or the feeling of His remote sublimity. God is King more than Father, and it has been pointed out that "in the passage in the prophetic writings where the ideal of humanity rises to the highest and grandest point, the term used is not Son but Servant" (Is. 52.[13ff.]). And further, even so the Fatherhood of God defines His relationship not to men or man as such, but to His chosen covenant people, Isr. His Fatherhood is insisted on precisely in those passages of expostulation where His faithful and unmerited compassion is being set over agst. the persistent ingratitude of the people. Even in Ps. 103.[13], the mind of the writer permits him to say no more than that the pity of the Lord is like that of a fr. to his children.

It is here that we find a quite new element in the teaching and life of Jesus Christ. Jesus taught no new God, as Mohammed did centuries later; but He taught a new truth about the ancient God of Isr.; and this novelty may be briefly comprehended in the statement that He proclaimed the Fatherhood of God with a depth and sweep of meaning, as well as a liberty and joy, wh. are absolute and final. He made no attempt to furnish a conception of God wh. science could employ. And He shows no disinclination to describe God by terms now styled "anthropomorphic"; drawn, that is, fm. the life and experiences of humanity. He employs such human metaphors freely, though He employs only the most spiritual. God sees, knows, wills, accdg. to Jesus; nay more, He is perfect holiness, perfect love. Father, in short, is His true name. Let it be noted, however, that this revelation of God is given not merely, or perhaps even mainly, in words. It is given rather in Jesus' personal attitude to sinners. Through Jesus' mercy to her, the fallen woman in Simon's house became aware of the mercy of God Himself. She was able somehow to feel that for her Jesus was the door of entrance into life; in Him God said to her aching heart: "I am thy salvation." It is fm. such incidents in the Gospels, such extracts fm. real life, that we best perceive wherein lay the newness of Jesus' disclosure of the Eternal. There had never been anything like it in the world before. In Jesus, and His treatment of men, it was made known for the first time that God loves and seeks every sinful man, in spite of his sin; and that He will reckon no cost too great to pay for his recovery. To have declared this, and to have enabled the lost to believe it, is the crown that will never be taken from Jesus' head. He thus put God wholly within men's reach, and made Him sure to them as faithfully and unchangeably Redeemer. All national limitations have definitely dropped off; the Father's love, the Father's promises, encircle all the world. He is ready to be Father even to those who thrust Him away, vainly trying to exclude Him fm. their lives. In all this Jesus was conscious of revealing God perfectly; and indeed it is obvious that divine revelation can go no further, since all that sinners need to know is already told.

Behind the fatherly relationship of God to men, as we can see, there stood uniformly God's unique relationship to Jesus; He Himself was, in an unshared sense, the Son, and God was His Father. God and He belonged together in a fashion so deep and high that human speech can only faintly sugg. its import. Indeed it was in virtue of this, His own unparalleled intimacy with God, that Jesus was able to declare with finality the mind of the Father toward sinful men. And what the Fatherhood of God implies we see by careful study of the Sonship of Jesus. The one answers to the other, part to part. Jesus as Son is exponent of God as Father. And here once more our kge. of the fact is derived less fm. Jesus' words than fm. what we are permitted to see of His inner life of fellowship with God, as revealed outwardly in action or demeanour.

Hence for the writers of the NT. the distinctive name of God comes to be "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." To think of God and Christ apart fm. each other is now impossible. All that they know about Jesus Christ—His life, His passion, His death, His resurrection, His ascension to glory—has become to them a clear glass through wh. they look up into the very heart of God.

The NT. hardly contains any attempt to define God. Perhaps what comes nearer a definition than any other passage is Jesus' saying to the woman of Samaria "God is spirit" (Jn. 4.[24]), not "God is a spirit," as in our version. What the word is meant to convey is not so much the Divine personality as rather the nat. or essence of God: His incorporeal being, that needs no temple, and may be worshipped anywhere. Another incipient definition is the great Johannine word twice repeated, "God is love" (1 Jn. 4.[8, 16]). Nothing like this, for emphasis and absoluteness of tone, is to be found in the sacred bks. of any other relg. But it is important to note that to the apostles the love of God is not a necessary truth of reason. It is not something wh. can be deduced fm. the very idea of Godhead. On the contrary, it is a truth of inestimable preciousness wh. has come to them in a definite way, and the certainty of wh. is based upon definite historic facts. In other words it is a revealed truth; revealed, however, not by being spoken fm. heaven, but by being manifested before men's eyes in the life and death of Jesus. This is clear fm. one or two great apostolic utterances. "Herein was the love of God manifested in our case," says St. John, "that God hath sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we mt. live through Him" (1 Jn. 4.[9]). And St. Paul strikes the same note: "God commendeth His own love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rm. 5.[8]). The student of physical nat. cd. not have said "God is love" with absolute unreserve. If cert. facts appear to evidence the Divine love, others are as obviously agst. it. It is because the apostles have received a convincing and overwhelming revelation of it that the love of God has become axiomatic for their minds; and that revelation, as is shown by many texts like those just quoted, shines out pre-eminently fm. the Cross on wh. Jesus died a death for sin. In the Cross, as the supreme disclosure of His mind and char., God's love became once for all real, present, and sure to their souls; and thenceforth they knew that neither height nor depth, nor any other creature, was able to separate them fm. the love of God wh. is in Christ Jesus.

This is not the place at wh. to consider the biblical doctrine of Christ's Person; but it is obvious that, if we agree with all the greatest Christian minds of all the centuries in asserting the essential and inherent Deity of our Lord, this will produce a change in, or an addition to, the doctrine of God we mt. hold otherwise. What we believe about Christ will give new content to our idea of God. At least this was so in the case of apostolic writers. As it has been put: "They did not cease to be monotheists when they became preachers of Christ, but they instinctively conceived God in a way in wh. the old revelation had not taught them to conceive Him." As a result of their experience of Christ, and of the new life received through the Spirit, they came to see distinctions in the Divine nat. previously unsuspected by the believing mind. And what they say about God fm. this point of view is usually treated under the NT. doctrine of the Trinity.

In this doctrine, wh. is put forward more incidentally than of set purpose, two features are worth noting. In the first place, it is in no sense a speculative doctrine. There is nothing merely philosophical about it; it does not consist in, or come out of, the logical manipulation of ideas. On the contrary, it was because apostolic men had found God in Christ, and had the Divine life conveyed to them in the Holy Spirit, that they felt obliged to gather these certainties into a new and richer view of God. In the second place, we are not dependent for a doctrine of the Trinity on isolated verses of the NT. Undoubtedly verses may be quoted wh. prove that as Trinitarians we stand in the true line of descent fm. the apostles; but, over and beyond this, we are given a clear look for ourselves at the facts on wh. the statements made in these verses are based. We may say, indeed, that the doctrine of God's triune being is present in solution throughout the Epp. and Gospels as a whole.

The apostles seem to have recognised the significance of the new truth only by degrees. Thus it has been pointed out that in the Epp. we find an alternation between Two Divine Names and Three; 2 Cor., for example, wh. opens with a double salutation, closes with the full Trinitarian benediction. But in reality the Third Name is implied even where it is not specifically mentioned. It is only through the Spirit that the grace and peace manifested in Christ become ours. We have a right to say, therefore, that whether early Christian writers speak of God, or of God the Father and the Son, or of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, they virtually mean the same thing.

A typical expression of the NT. view of the Trinity is 2 Cor. 13.[14]: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." That is fm. a letter dated some quarter of a cent. after the resurrection, and St. Paul evidently assumes that his readers will have no difficulty in understanding him. We may note how the very order in wh. the Names occur—first Christ, then God, finally the Spirit—suggs. that it is through the historic revelation given in Christ that believers know God. If it were not for the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God wd. still be an unknown thing. Similarly, it is in the Spirit that the love of God becomes the realised possession of Christian men, hence the "communion of the Holy Ghost" natly. comes last. Other passages in wh. the same naive and spontaneous view of the Trinity finds expression are 1 Cor. 12.[4-6]; Rom. 8.[9-11]; Eph. 2.[18]. The last of these reads: "Through Him (Christ) we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father," with the clear implication that it is only in Christ, and through the teaching of the Spirit, that the Fatherhood of God is made sure to us. Hence it is a mistake, accdg. to the NT., to speak as though God were revealed in nature as Father, or as though the speculative intelligence, working with abstract ideas, had a right to predicate Fatherhood of the Absolute, the unity of being out of wh. everything is supposed to rise, and into wh. it is supposed to flow back. On the contrary, our conception of God as Father is something wh. we owe directly to the historic Christ; in Jesus' own words: "No man knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him." There are other indications that not merely the Son, but the Spirit, forms an integral part of the one Divine agency, the living God, by whom our salvation is accomplished. Let any one read Rm. 8.[9-17] carefully, and he will be impressed by the way in wh. God, Christ, and the Spirit belong together indissociably, and the experiences of the redeemed man are referred now to one, now to another, without embarrassment. These three do not represent the Deity, a man, and an influence, casually linked together; they are the one indivisible God of salvation, personally revealed in Christ, and personally communicated in the Spirit. Similarly, in the parting words of Jesus in the upper room, it is the Father who, in response to the prayer of the Son, gives the Spirit to abide with the disciples for ever. Through this Spirit, the disciples are told, they will know that the Son is in the Father, and that between them and the Son exists a personal fellowship of life. The Father sends the Spirit in the Son's name; of this sending the Son is mediating cause; the Spirit testifies of the Son and carries on His work to still greater issues. As it is put (Jn. 15.[26]) in lang. that is typical of the whole: "When the Paraclete is come, whom I will send unto you fm. the Father." Thus all three are represented, here and genly. throughout the NT., as constituting one active principle and source of redemption, as conjointly entering into, and expressing, the inward life of the Godhead. Not that this in any way abrogates the subordination of Son and Spirit wh. is often hinted at in the NT. writings. Thus Christ points to the Father as having conferred on Him power to have life in Himself; and again, the purpose of the Spirit's being given is that He may glorify the Son. Always the Father is the fount and origin of Godhead. This being assumed, however, all three belong intrinsically to each other, and are intelligible only in and through each other.

We cannot say, it is true, that the doctrine of the Trinity, as it is familiar in later Church doctrine, is expressly stated in the NT. The apostles do not use the abstractions and technicalities of theory wh. came to prevail. Their attitude to the realities of faith is too direct for that. St. Paul makes no attempt to explain speculatively how Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one God; as it has been expressed, "he simply records and enforces what were to him the facts of spiritual experience." The same thing may be said of St. John. Apostolic statements are rather the seed than the full growth of articulated doctrine, hence it is a mistake to press their doctrinal implications too far. They were not written fm. the same point of view as later creeds.

Nevertheless it is poss. to see that the existence of personal distinctions in the Godhead, to wh. the NT. points, makes it an easier thing for us to conceive some most essential aspects of the Divine life. Take, for example, the aspect of self-consciousness. Thought implies a duality of subj. and obj., and if in God it be eternally perfect, it wd. seem to demand an eternal Object answering fully to the thinking Subject, that God may know Himself completely. Or consider, again, what is involved in the statement that God is will, in eternal and perfect action. It is the essence of will to produce, and, at its highest, to realise itself in another will, capable of giving back a resonance of its energies ; this also is a point at wh. our intelligence welcomes the suggn. of the Christian revelation, that within the oneness of the Divine nat. there is found a duality, a variety of personal distinctions. And finally, the very idea of love, wh., in the NT., constitutes the core and substance of the Divine life, is unthinkable as existing in a lonely unit. Love in God can never have been a mere potentiality, " sleeping until it woke to shed its beneficence upon an obj. other than itself." An unbeginning and perfect obj. there must have been, in that ineffable and transcendent life, a Lover and a Loved, if the nat. of God is to be conceived as by its very essence a scene of self-enjoyment and self-manifestation. Love such as His can be adequately received and returned only by One who is Himself not less than God. Or, to sum up all in a word, Fatherhood in God cannot be an acquired attribute ; to view it as the creation of time is to strike at its very life. It is essentially constituted by relations ; hist. and experience, as they are centred in Jesus Christ, and the new life conveyed to men by His Spirit, give us a clear view of what these relations actually are ; therefore, in spite of the felt poverty of human conceptions and human words, we must nevertheless conclude that Father and Son, and no less the Spirit, through whom we grasp both, represent eternal facts, intrinsic relationships, without wh. the Godhead cd. not be. So to conceive the matter, in the light of the revelation in Christ, is our surest defence agst. the paralysing suspicion that God, after all, may be only loveless thought, or abstract substance, or mere almighty energy. Only so is Fatherhood the essence of God ; or rather, as we may put it otherwise, Father-Sonship, in an indivisible unity. In this way we can enter into the amazing sacrifice for our redemption of wh. announcement is made in the simple words : " God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son " ; " Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though He was rich, yet for your sakes He became poor." We see into the heart of God, we know the last and highest truth concerning Him, when we perceive that He Himself has stooped down to bless us in His Son.

GOG (Ek. 38.2f.), prince of the land of Magog, Meshech and Tubal. G. has been identified with Gyges. There seems to be some connection between Magog and the Islands of the Ionian Sea (Ek. 39.6) : their usual identification with Lydia seems plausible—only Meshech and Tubal suggest a Scythian rather than a Lydian affinity.

GOLAN, a city of Manasseh in Bashan, the most northerly of the Cities of Refuge E. of the Jordan (Dt. 4.43 ; Jo. 20.8), given to the Gershonite Levites (Jo. 21.27 ; 1 Ch. 6.71) : unident. Sahem el-Jaulān has been suggd. It is a small vill. with extensive ruins, in the open country, 17 miles E. of the Sea of Galilee. The natives claim it as the anct. capital of the country. See Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 91ff. ; Ewing, PEFQ., 1895, 174f. The old name now belongs to the district el-Jaulān, wh. stretches fm. the roots of Hermon to the Yarmuk, bounded on the W. by the Jordan, and on the E. by the Ruqqād. Where cultivated, the volcanic soil is very fruitful. It is a popular grazing ground of the Arabs in summer.

Golden Baskets from Ancient Egyptian Tomb

GOLD (Heb. zāhāb). The value of this metal was early recognised (Gn. 2.11). Apart fm. Scrip. the oldest ornaments preserved to us are of gold, no doubt owing to its indestructible char. These ornaments are often in the form of rings, bracelets, &c. (Gn. 24.22). The Isr. on leaving Egp. seem to have carried with them great quantities of gold. Even after the destruction of the golden Calf (Ex. 32.2ff.) they were still able to supply what was required for the vessels and furniture of the Tabernacle (Ex. 35.22). A wedge of G. tempted the cupidity of Achan (Jo. 7.21). Gold figured largely in the furniture of the Temple (1 K. 6.20ff.), and its abundance in Jrs. was a point in the splendour of Solomon (2 Ch. 1.15). The refining of G. is a symbol of the purifying of char. by adversity (Jb. 23.10).

Idols may at times have been made of G. (Is. 46.6), but more commonly it may have been spread over a core of inferior value (Is. 40.19) ; see Ephod. Generally G. may be taken as a symbol of preciousness (Rv. 21.18, &c.). It is further to be noted that gold was among the gifts presented to Jesus by the wise men. See Magi.

GOLGOTHA, the place where Jesus was crucified (Mw. 27.33 ; Mk. 15.22 ; Lk. 23.33 ; Jn. 19.17), and, as His tomb was near (Jn. 19.41f.), even buried. As a place of execution and of tombs it was outside of, but near to the city (Jn. 19.20), and beside a public road (Mw. 27.39 ; Mk. 15.29). We may infer that it was not far fm. the prætorium as the place of judgment. While it is not called a hill, the name G., if rightly trd. "skull," may have been due to some natural feature suggesting a skull. Christian tradition (Athanasius, Ambrosius; cp. Cyprianus, Origines, and others) related that, accdg. to Jewish belief, Adam's skull was found there. This has no support in Jewish Lit. When the Emperor Constantine, A.D. 326, ordered the place of our Saviour's resurrection to be purified fm. pagan abomination, there was no doubt about the locality. It had been marked by a temple of Aphrodite, erected not far fm. the centre of Ælia Capitolina, W. of the main street. We now know that at least two sepulchres were found: one with slide loculi, and another with only one bench loculus. The latter was taken to be Joseph of Arimathæa's "new tomb" (Mw.

27.[60]; Lk. 23.[53]; Jn. 19.[41]), apparently because it was unfinished, and corresponded better to the description of Jn. 20.[7, 12]. There it is assumed that the body rested on an open bench loculus at the side of the tomb. The slide loculi were small tunnels running into the wall of the burial chamber, into which bodies were pushed. To the NW. of these two there is a third tomb, with three bench loculi, perhaps of later origin.

It was thought sufficient proof of authenticity that a tomb, corresponding with the biblical description, was found at the place indicated by tradition. That trustworthy tradition was possible cannot be denied. The Gospels prove that the first Christian Church had a definite opinion regarding the locality, and led every Christian, whether visiting Jrs. or resident there, to ask for it. The Christian reverence for the tombs of the martyrs, already in vogue about A.D. 150, would ensure a special interest in the tomb of Christ. The exact site of the garden with Joseph's tomb may not have been known for a time; but G., the name of the whole locality, wd. be familiar to all who were acquainted with local names, even if they cared nothing for the tomb of Christ. It is poss. that, as Eusebius says, the temple of Aphrodite, wh. may have been associated with the veneration of Adonis, had been intentionally built on the spot sacred to Christian remembrance. The temple wd. then presuppose living tradition. In any case it cast strong light upon the assured confidence of the tradition that, in the midst of a city surrounded by hundreds of rock tombs, it pointed to a place where no tomb could be seen. We are free to doubt whether the authentic tomb was found, if, indeed, it were still in existence; but we must have strong and well-grounded objections if we decline to accept the general situation so clearly indicated.

Eusebius, writing (A.D. 337) his life of Constantine, speaks of the sepulchre, but of neither G. nor the cross. Cyril of Jrs., who preached only ten yrs. later in Constantine's Church, calls the Basilica the "Martyrion" (Catech. xiv. 6). He knows that it is in or on G. (ib. iv. 10, xiii. 22, 26), that G. is visible as an outstanding rock (ib. xiii. 39), and that the true cross has been found (ib. iv. 10, x. 19). If Eusebius is silent about these things, he must have been doubtful whether the site of the crucifixion and the cross had really been discovered. This we can understand. There was no proof that the rocky slope E. of the tomb was G., that the crucifixion took place at a spot on it only 120 ft. fm. the tomb, and that wood found in an adjoining cistern was the true cross.

In view of all this, we may say that the space enclosed by Constantine's edifice can only generally indicate the direction in wh. tradition at this time pointed. And the direction fully answers all reasonable demands. The rock-hewn tombs, wh. cannot be dated before Hellenistic times, prove that the place was outside Herod's Jrs. Schick and others, for a time, mistakenly believed that the moat of the "second wall" had been found, running S. and E. of this site. But even if the "second wall," as some pretend, ran 100 ft. W. of the tomb excavated in the time of Constantine, this wd. not prove the tradition erroneous, but only that excavation did not hit the exact spot. The "gate of the gardens" led in the direction indicated by tradition; so gardens were found there. An important public road, leading northward fm. the old city, passed in the same direction. If Pilate's prætorium were Herod's palace, no place cd. be found nearer, or more easily accessible. Here, at a corner formed by two walls, in public ground available for the purpose, it was quite natural for the execution to take place. The garden with the tomb wd. be further fm. the wall, to westward. If, as we believe for reasons not connected with this question, the "second wall" followed the line of the great market street of mod. Jrs. and Ælia Capitolina, the only poss. objection to the locality now shown in the Church of the Sepulchre wd. be the close proximity of cross and tomb. But the cross may quite well have stood 200 ft. to eastward, between the wall and the road to the N. And we must remember that the gardens and tombs were there before the crucifixion.

If, as the Gospels assume, the old name of G. is = Aram. golgothā, "skull" or "vertex," some prominent rock or knoll may have borne a resemblance to a human head, or the upper part of it. But a derivation fm. gal go'thā, "the heap of Goa," is quite as defensible fm. a linguistic point of view. In this case Goa may just be the name of the spur to wh. the traditional place belongs (cp. Jr. 31.[39], and JERUSALEM). In either case, as is customary with Oriental place names, G. may have covered a wide area, while taken from some conspicuous feature within it. Possibly, therefore, the whole eastern slope of the NW. hill, over agst. the GABBATHA on the SW. hill, bore the name of G.

If the indications of local tradition be left out of account, there are several sites NW. and E. of Jrs. wh. mt. in some degree meet the conditions; but the fancy wh. has lately fixed upon a hill to the N. of the city as G., and on a Byzantine tomb at the foot of it as the sepulchre of Christ, has nothing in common with historical and archæological science.

GOLIATH, the Phil. giant of Gath, whom the stripling David slew (1 S. 17.). Elhanan, one of David's heroes, is said also to have killed a "G. the Gittite," i.e. "of Gath" (2 S. 21.[19]). Accdg. to the Chronicler, he was the br. of G. (1 Ch. 20.[5]). The impression made by the conflict of David with G. on the mind of the E. is reflected in many stories, Jewish and Arabian, wh. glorify the prowess of David.

GOSHEN. The limits of this land cannot now be determined with cert. It clearly lay on the E. border of the Delta, and was first reached by Jacob on his journey fm. Pal. to Egp. (Gn. 46.[28]). It was good pasture land, and here Jacob and his family were settled, with their flocks and herds (Gn. 47.[6]). It seems also to have produced abundantly cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlick (Nu. 11.[5]). The later Jews identd. it with the Arab nome, the district adjoining Syr. LXX trs. gē Gesem Arabias (Gn. 45.[10], 46.[34]; cp. Jth. 1.[9, 10], gē Gesem). "Gesem" is prob. = Qes or Qesem, of the Ptolemaic nome lists, capital of the 20th nome, and apparently ident. with Per-Sopd, the mod. Saft el-Henneh. Poss. a second capital was intended, and Qes may be = Fāqūs, eight miles E. of Abu Kebīr. We may with some confidence say that G. lay to the E. of the canal Abu el-Menegge, the W. border running fm. Belbeis to Fāqūs, including the Wādy Tumīlāt. GOSPELS, THE. The problems connected with the study of the Gospels are of amazing extent, and of the greatest complexity. They are also of the highest interest. The religious interest is of the most absorbing kind. For the Gospels are the very citadel of the Christian Faith; as the great Figure whose life and work they depict, and whose sayings they record, is the obj. of the Christian Faith, and the source of the Christian life. The main interest, then, for the Christian is this, whether the Gospels give us a true and trustworthy act. of what the Master was, of what He did, and of what He said. Did He make those claims on the allegiance of men wh. the Gospels ascribe to Him? did He do these works for men, and endure these sufferings for them, wh. the Gospels affirm He did? and did He really occupy that unique position in hist., as the Mediator between God and man, wh. is the foundation claim for Him wh. the Gospels make? The issue is the most important ever raised for the Christian Church, and it is raised now as it never was raised before.

It is not our purpose here to sketch the hist. of critical opinion on the Gospels, since the rise of historical criticism. It has been done many times, and fm. various points of view. Broadly, the issue formerly raised, and discussed with such energy fm. the time of Baur and Strauss to the end of the 19th cent., may be said to relate to the Gospel documents as a whole. When, and by whom, were the Gospels written? Were they documents of the first cent. or of the second? Were they trustworthy accounts by eye-witnesses, or by those who received the testimony of eye-witnesses and recorded them? Or were they compilations of the second cent.? Various answers were given to these questions wh. need not be recorded here. After prolonged discussion the extreme views wh. set the Gospels down as products of the second cent. were very largely departed fm., and a large number of scholars agreed with the verdict of Harnack that all the documents of the NT., with one or two exceptions, were documents of the first cent. To make them later was to be guilty of an anachronism. That long controversy may be said to close with a victory for the traditional position. Every student is aware of the fact that there is still a number of scholars who do not agree with Harnack; readers of the recent Dutch school, and of the Encyclopædia Biblica, need not be reminded of that fact; but we do not propose to deal with these views here, as they are a school whose adherents are daily decreasing.

Supposing, then, that the Synoptic Gospels are documents of the first cent., and that the fourth Gospel dates fm. the end of the first, or the beginning of the second cent., what is the present situation? Is the controversy ended? Can one take up these Gospels and read them with the belief that in them he has trustworthy acts. of Jesus, of what He said, of what He did, and of His position and function in the universe? The question is not easily answered. A whole series of questions has emerged in connection with the problem, and answers to them are given of the most various kind. Take the Gospels as we have them: the question is now asked, Through what processes has the material gone ere it reached the form in wh. it is now embodied in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John? What are the sources of the Gospels?

In the study of this great question there is one thing wh. ought to be remembered by all students, whatever their predilections may be. In the second cent. there exists an organised Christian Church, consisting of many individual churches, ranging throughout the Rm. Empire, and characterised by cert. definite beliefs, founded on documents wh. it regards as authoritative and sacred. Of these documents the Gospels are not the least authoritative or sacred. Rather they seem to be the most fundamental of all, and all the other documents seem to be explicative or interpretative of them. While the Gospels form the norm and rule of Christian life, and while the life of the Church is fostered and nourished by them, yet the Church existed before the Gospels came into their present form. Yet at the beginning of the second cent. the life of the Church depended on the documents of the NT., and ever since the Church, in her highest and best moments, has found that her life depended on the appropriation of the spirit of the NT. Down through the cents. the Church has found in them a constant source of life, thought, and action, and these documents have formed a perennial source of reformation and strength. While the Christian society existed before the NT. took shape as Lit., yet fm. the time of the appearance of the NT. the life of the Church has depended on its appropriation of it, and obedience to it.

In the second cent., then, and ever since, the existence of the NT. is a fact of the highest importance for the life of the Church and for the hist. of the world. The NT. has been one of the chief factors in human hist. How did it come into existence? and what are its sources? Jesus Himself left no writings. He did not commit His sayings to writing, nor did He give to His disciples a body of laws, or a series of commands. In fact He wrote nothing. Yet within a hundred yrs. there grew up a unique Lit., the highest type of wh. is the NT. Limiting our view to our proper subj., how did the Gospels arise? and having arisen, what dependence can we place on them as the sources of our kge. of Jesus?

Clearly there is here a proper subj. of historical inquiry. It is clearly the duty of historical criticism to examine the documents wh. are the authoritative documents for a period of the world's hist. Looking, then, at the Gospels with the view of ascertaining the truth, what do we find? In the Synoptic Gospels we have striking agreements and striking diffcs. What these agreements and diffcs. are cannot be specified within our limits. But they are obvious to all readers of the Gospels, and have always been recognised. They have been the main difficulties in the way of a harmonistic act. of the life of Jesus. As we study the Gospels some things seem clear. We find that most of the second Gospel is contained in the first and the third Gospels; we find that the first and third Gospels have agreements in common in material wh. is not contained in the second Gospel. In short, the first and third Gospels seem to have used the second as one of their sources, for they are in agreement with it with regard to the story of the baptism of our Lord, the ministry in Galilee, the last week at Jrs., the passion, and the discovery of the empty tomb. But there seems to be a second source (reconstructed by Harnack in his work, The Sayings of Jesus), wh. may have been oral or written, consisting mainly of sayings or discourses of Jesus. This recognition of two main sources of the first and third Gospels seems to command something like universal consent. Though suggd. first in connection with a suggn. as to the meaning of the word "logia," wh. is not strictly true, yet it is supported by so much relevant evidence that it may be accepted as pointing towards a true conclusion.

This conclusion, however, does not carry us very far. For the further question immediately arises as to the processes by wh. these two sources themselves came into being. The Christian Church, in its earliest form, was a Church wh. arose out of the apostolic teaching, influence, and example at Jrs. It was founded on apostolic testimony as to the life, char., and teaching of Jesus Christ. It told of what He had done, of what He, in the belief of the apostles, was—of His person and of His work. The earlier chapters of the Acts of the Apostles enable us to see how the first converts were altogether dependent on the witness of the apostles. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship" (Ac. 2.[42]). The doctrine consisted of reminiscences of the life of Jesus of Nazareth, of agreements between these facts and the OT. prophecy, and of interpretations of facts and prophecy for the edification of the infant Church. That the facts of the life of Jesus, specially of His death and resurrection, formed a constant element of apostolic teaching, we know fm. 1 Cor. 15.[1-8]. That there went with the story of Jesus and His works a constant refce. to the OT. we also know fm. the speeches of Peter and of Paul, and also fm. their epistles. Thus the first instruction bestowed on the Church was oral. There were no written documents. The apostles gave themselves to the ministry of the word, but it was a spoken word. While the apostles and the Church were together in Jrs., and constant refce. might be made to them by the Church, the absence of written documents wd. not be felt. So for some yrs. they abode together, and the disciples were instructed by the apostles in the facts of the life of Christ and in the right interpretation of these facts. For a time the instruction was oral, and the propagation of the faith was also oral. But as Christian converts returned to their homes fm. Jrs. they carried with them some kge. both of the facts and of their interpretation. It seems evident that there were bodies of Christians in various cities of the Rm. Empire before what may be called the apostolic mission really began. For the churches at Antioch and at Rome, to take only these examples, arose fm. the zeal and energy of private Christians. If this is so, then what wd. be the Gospel wh. they taught? Clearly so much as they cd. remember of the teaching of the apostles, and of what they had heard in the catechetical classes at Jrs. Clearly also we must take into act. the thirst for greater acquaintance with the facts of the life of the Saviour, their curiosity as to His manner of life, His sayings, and their desire to conform their lives to His precepts. Act. must be taken also of that constant tendency in human nat., illustrated both by children and by grown-up people, to wit, the desire, when once a story is heard, to insist that it shd. be told again in exactly the same words, and in the same sequence. Hearers are impatient of variations in the telling of a story. Memory is very tenacious and very conservative.

Oral teaching wd. tend towards a fixed form. The apostles, beginning with the significance of the death of Christ, and of His resurrection and its meaning, wd. natly. lay stress in the first place on the events of the passion week, on the crucifixion, on the burial, and on the resurrection. These were the significant facts, and on the act. of these all the three Synoptic Gospels are in essential agreement. That the stress was laid on these events we know fm. the apostolic teaching recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. These acts. wd. thus soon take a fixed form, and the first converts wd. carry these acts. rooted in their memory, ready to be told to whomsoever wd. listen. Refce. mt. be made to the example of Paul, to wh. refce. has been made already.

The fixedness of oral teaching wd. soon take a wider range than the record of the passion week, the crucifixion, and the resurrection. It wd. extend backwards to other events, and incidents of the life of Jesus. One thing is evident as we read the three Gospels, namely, that most of the incidents are hung on a geographical thread. We follow Jesus in His journeyings, and as we follow we find that many of His sayings are represented as spoken in the course of cert. journeys. In all three, for example, the healing of the woman with the issue of blood is represented as occurring in the course of the walk towards the house of Jairus, and the explanation is that it happened so. There are many other illustrations of the same fact. In short, as we follow the journeys of our Lord through Galilee, through Samaria, down the E. of the Jordan, or fm. Jericho to Jrs., we find the natl. string on wh. the Gospels, in the historical part of them, is constructed. Still further, as Professor Burkitt has so well shown in The Gospel History and its Transmission, in the chap. entitled "Jesus in Exile," in the itinerary recorded in Mark 6. the parts avoided by Jesus and His company are the dominions of Herod Antipas. Fm. this fact Professor Burkitt draws many striking inferences. What we are here concerned with is the light wh. the fact throws on the traditional origin of the material embodied in the Gospels. The apostles told the disciples what they remembered of the doings and sayings of the Lord. They remembered more easily as they recalled the journeys, and what had happened during these itineraries. This is genly. the way in wh. memory works. Things said by our friends, things wh. happened as we travelled with them, come back vividly as we recall the place and time when they were said or done.

During the period while the teaching of the Church was orally conducted, and while the eyewitnesses were at hand to testify, the need for a written record was not clamant. But the expansion of the Church, and its settlement in Gentile cities, wd. speedily quicken the demand for a more permanent form of the Gospel message. No doubt memory acts the more surely the more we trust it. Oral tradition and oral teaching do more wonderful things than we dream of, who depend so much on the printed page, and on notes for our work. It is surprising to us to learn how much may be carried in the memory, and how easily it can carry lengthened books correctly on its tablets. It is not likely that the Jrs. Church wd. have any written Gospels, while the apostles were together there. Yet the need wd. speedily arise in Samaria, in Antioch, and in the other churches of the first half of the first cent. Notes wd. be written, sections of the life wd. find a written form. The Story of the Passion wd. be one of the first to be written.

It may well be that many sayings of the Lord, and many isolated doings of His, may have been in separate and detached circulation. Parts of the Gospels may have been in a written shape, some in this Church and some in that. Our present Gospels may be a selection of the material afloat in the separate churches, and the evangelists may have chosen so much of these materials as seemed to fall in with their main purpose.

It is therefore necessary to take into act. the action of the memory of the apostles, the action of memory and of mind in oral tradition, and the idiosyncrasies of the editors of the various Gospels, if we are to have a true and adequate act. of the phenomena manifested in them. It ought to be remembered, however, that there were many opportunities of making the infant Church acquainted with the substance of the oral Gospel. There were the classes for catechetical instruction, and in particular there was the weekly assembly on the Lord's Day. No doubt the OT. continued to be read in the assemblies of the Christian Church, but the recitation of the story of the life, death, and resurrection of our Lord wd. soon have a prominent place in the readings, or, at least, in the exhortations of the sanctuary. Repeated week after week, enlarged as new messengers came round fm. the mother Church, or fm. sister churches, the body of reminiscences wd. soon amount to a considerable bulk. How soon or how late the oral Gospel came to be written we may not well determine. The process may have been continuous, until the material reached the position described by Luke in his prologue. But however great the material may have been, it was ruled by the test that each part of it must be authenticated by refce. to the testimony of those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.

It is time, however, to ask the main question, wh. is pressed so ardently in various circles nowadays. It is contended that but little dependence can be placed on the record of our Lord's sayings as these are recorded in the Gospels in our possession. For it is alleged that these were written, not because they were said by Him, but because the Church thought they ought to have been said. The Gospels were written not for the sake of truth, but for edification. The needs of the Church were the determining element in the selection of topics, and in the statement of what mt. have been appropriately said or done by the Lord in any set of circumstances. Thus the conclusion is that fm. any saying or doing of our Lord recorded in the Gospels we must make allowance for the idealising tendency of the Church, and her desire to exalt her Lord, and her determination to change any saying, or to eliminate any act. of Him, wh. wd. seem to detract fm. His high merit, or fm. the place He filled in the mind of the Church. Only these sayings can be histly. true, wh. convey hints of weakness, of imperfection, and these were allowed to remain only because they were overlooked. Thus fm. the idealising tendency of the Church, and fm. the selection of what is required for the needs of the Church, it is contended that we have really no act. of histl. events or of histl. sayings in the Gospels: we have only homilies, things not histly. true, only things wh. the Church found to be needful for her edification.

Again, many are good enough to trace for us the elements wh. helped to enable the Church to construct the great Figure wh. meets the reader of the Gospels, as he turns over their pages. These elements are very numerous, and various. In fact they are too numerous to be noticed in this short article. But the main source, insisted on by Baur and Strauss, and by many writers since their time, is to be found in the OT., and esp. in the Messianic prophecies of the OT. It may be well to say something of this contention. It may be remarked genly. that the heroes of the nations bear a national aspect, and are subj. to national limitations. The heroes of Homer are Greeks, and all the heroes of Greek hist. are Greek in their excellence and in their limitations. Roman, Indian, Persian, Teutonic, English, Scottish, American heroes, held up for the admiration and imitation of their respective nationalities, are each of them intensely national, and so limited, they scarcely appeal to other nationalities. It wd. take too much space adequately to illustrate this principle and its bearing on the matter in hand. Let one read the 11th chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews and note the heroes of faith mentioned there. He will find that all these heroes are Jews, and have charcts. of Jews. But the Jesus, Who is the last of that series, is universal. He is the One who alone can be described as the Author and Finisher of faith; the One who is neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian nor Scythian, because He is all of them. He is the universal human ideal, because He is the Real Man in whom humanity attained its true ideal. Because He is universal all nations may find and have found their ideal in Him. For after criticism of the Gospels has done its work, and after only a poor residuum has been left, when the critic faces the problem of the fact of Christ, of His influence, of His place in hist., and so on, then we find the Figure again growing under the hand of the critic until it attains somewhat of the stature of the Gospel as it was before it had passed under the levelling roller of the critic.

So the question arises, How did the infant Church construct that heroic and universal Figure? We know something about that early Church, and something of their limitations. Something has been found out about the Jews of the time of our Lord, of their patriotism, of their narrowness, of their intense fanaticism, of their exclusiveness: how did they transcend all these and other limitations, and give to the world the universal Figure depicted in the Gospels? There is no answer by the critics to this question. Then as to the influence of the OT. on the making of the New, and as to the influence of current Messianic expectations on the Messiahism of the New, a calm investigation proves that the Messiahism of the Jews in the time of Christ and the Messiahism of the NT. have nothing in common but the name. No doubt the kdm. of God in the OT. has many features realised in the kdm. of God in the NT. But it is to be observed that the features of the kdm. common to the idea in both testaments are precisely those wh. had no part in the current Jewish conception. For the Jewish conception was external, temporal, limited to the outward dominion of Jew over Gentile, and to their consequent freedom fm. oppression and fm. sorrow. In their pictures of the kdm. of God, outward, temporal conditions filled their whole horizon, and no room was left for those spiritual qualities wh. are the essential elements of the NT. picture.

Instead, therefore, of the OT. conception giving rise to that of the New, we have to reverse the process ere we reach the truth. The advent of Christ gave rise to a new reading and interpretation of the OT. So powerful was the impression made on the disciples by the personality of Jesus, by His whole demeanour, by His teaching, His life, death, and resurrection, that they saw all things in His light. The OT., familiar to them fm. their youth, took on a new form, colour, and meaning. The hidden meaning of many sptl. passages leaped to light, and it was to them as if an obscuring veil had fallen fm. their faces. They found a meaning, unseen by Jewish eyes, in the fig. of the Suffering Servant of the Lord, and Psalms like the twenty-second glowed with a fresh significance. Under this new light they read the Scriptures, and found them luminous with the presence of their Master. The Epistle to the Hebrews may be read as a treatise on the theme, "How to find Jesus in the OT." Instead, then, of the thesis that the OT. helped to form the portrait of Jesus wh. is present in the Gospels, the contrary thesis may safely be maintained, that the Jesus of the Gospels compelled His disciples to read the OT. in a new way. His Figure made the NT.; it also dominated the OT., as it was read by the Christians. The very difficulty wh. we now have in our attempts to vindicate the Christian interpretation of many OT. passages is a testimony to the fact here insisted on. If these interpretations seem to us to be somewhat strained, or to have an artificial meaning imposed on them, that is an additional testimony to the dominating influence of Jesus over the minds of His disciples.

In truth readers of the Gospels can never break away fm. the commanding influence of that transcendent Figure. He rules it fm. beginning to end. Looked at fm. any point of view, the difficulty of that Figure being the creation of the idealising tendencies of the early Church becomes ever greater. The early Church cd. never have created that great and impressive char. It was contrary to every Jewish ideal, was unlike every char. wh. the Gentiles delighted to honour. The only explanation of the matter is that He was real, for no race, and no individual, cd. have invented Him.

As for the consideration, so often insisted on, that the Gospel story, incident and saying, was dominated in its construction by the needs of the Church, that contention has simply to be reversed. The needs of the Church were really created by Jesus Christ Himself. They simply were not, until He came and made them. For the need of the Church arose out of the fact that the Church as a whole, and the individual Christian within the Church, was a new creation, suited to a new environment, and both the Christian and His environment were the creation of Christ, the result of His action. The needs were new needs, and the unsearchable riches of Christ were the supply of those new needs. Christ made the needs, the needs did not make Christ.

It seemed best in this genl. article to limit ourselves to the enunciation of broad and genl. principles, and to state broadly the issues involved in the controversy. Literary and other critical questions can be better treated in connection with the separate Gospels (see arts. MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE, JOHN). As to the fourth Gospel, it has so many problems peculiar to itself that they must be treated separately. It professes to be the work of an eye-witness. Its treatment of its topic is that of an eye-witness, and is different fm. the calm, objective, impersonal treatment of the Synoptic Gospels, in wh. the personality of the editors is ever in the background. GOURD (Jh. 4.[6ff.]). This is most likely the "bottle G." called by the Arabs qar'ah. It is frequently trained over trellis work, when its broad leaves make pleasant shade. It grows very rapidly, but when injured, e.g. by a slug gnawing the bark, it seems almost to collapse. The rind of the fruit, when emptied of seeds, is used for bottles. The castor-oil plant, favoured by Guthe (KB. s.v.), is out of the question. The wild Gs. (2 K. 4.[39]) are prob. the fruit of the colocynth, Arb. ḥondol, wh. creeps along the ground, and trails, vine-like, over bush and plant. Its melon-shaped fruit is c. 3 in diameter. It contains smooth seeds embedded in bitter, poisonous pulp.

GOVERNMENT. When Isr. came out of Egp., and prob. during their residence there, each tribe was under its own "prince" (nasī); presumably "families" and "houses" would be under rulers also (allūphīm, Zc. 12.[5]). When they settled in Pal. the princedom fell into abeyance, and the G. was exercised by the ELDERS (Jo. 8.[33]; 1 S. 4.[3]) of Isr.; each tribe had its Elders (2 S. 19.[11]); the most prominent in the ordinary G. were the Elders of the Cities. Every CITY had towns and villages under it, reckoned its "daughters." While by these G. was ordinarily administered, fm. time to time JUDGES (shōphĕṭīm) were raised up as deliverers (Jg. 2.[16ff.]; Ps. 2.[10], &c.); moved by Divine inspiration they performed some heroic deed and the people followed them (e.g. GIDEON), and they "judged Isr." The kind of authority exercised, and its extent, is quite uncertain. Dissatisfaction with the conduct of Samuel's sons led to the establishment of the kingship. The k. was the viceregent of Jehovah (JHWH), and the first k. was selected under Divine guidance, first by SAMUEL, then by lot before the people. DAVID was likewise chosen by God, through the instrumentality of Samuel; prophetic choice intervened to select Jeroboam and Jehu. What precisely were the limitations to the kingly authority implied in the "manner (mishpāṭ) of the kingdom" cannot be determined. Latterly the kingship passed fm. fr. to s., though not by primogeniture. The power of the k. depended on his personal char. and following. Towards the end of the Southern Kdm. the princes play a prominent part in the government; the k. professing himself impotent as agst. them (Jr. 38.[5]). After the return fm. Bab., the kingship having ceased, the authority of the High Priest increased, and the supreme power under the Persians seems to have been exercised by him. Under the later Maccabæans kingship was revived. See ELDER, SANHEDRIN, ROME.

GOVERNOR. While there are several words meaning "ruler," occasionally trd. "G." in AV., if by G. is meant "viceroy" the OT. word is peḥāh (1 K. 10.[15]; Ne. 2.[7]; Ez. 5.[3]). They were officials of the Assyrian and Persian Empires. Sagnīn, wh. occurs only in Dn., may have the same meaning. In the NT. "G." represents the Gr. hegemôn, the Gr. name given to the Procurator—a subordinate governor, as PILATE over Judea in subordination to the Governor of Syria.

GOZAN, a province of the Asyr. Empire on the Haboras (Khabur), to wh. the Isr. of the Northern kdm. were deported (2 K. 19.[12]) by Sargon. In Asyr. inscrs. it is gusannu; Ptolemy calls it Gauzanitis.

"grass"), "herb" (2 K. 19.[26], &c.). (2) Ḥatzīr, "leeks" (Nu. 11.[5]), "grass" (1 K. 18.[5]), "herb" (Jb. 8.[12]), "hay" (Pr. 27.[25]). (3) Yereq, "green thing" (Ex. 10.[15]), "grass" (Nu. 22.[4]), &c. (4) 'Ēseb, "herb" (Gn. 1.[11]), "grass" (Dt. 11.[15], &c.). In NT. χόρτος includes flowers as well as "grass" (Mw. 6.[30]); it is trd. "blade" (13.[26]) and "hay" (1 Cor. 3.[12]). Grass in the sense of pasture lasting through the year is unknown in Pal. It is seen only in the spring months; with the advance of summer it is withered up, and disappears. This makes the grass an apt emblem of human life in its transiency (Is. 40.[6]; Js. 1.[10], &c.).

GREECE, GREEKS (HELLENISM). (1) Name. The words Greece and Greeks are the names wh. the Latin peoples applied to Hellas and its inhabitants. In the OT. Javan is the name given specially to Ionia, but also to Greece as a whole. In Jl. 3.[6] the "men of Javan" is trd. "the Grecians," where "Greeks" or "Ionians" wd. be more correct. In the NT. "Grecian" is to be distinguished from "Greek." A "Grecian" was a Jew, genly. of the Diaspora, who spoke the Gr. lang. and had adopted Gr. customs and modes of thought, though perhaps the Greeks of the fourth Gospel are rather Greek-speaking Jews than pure Greeks. The word "Greek" in the mouth of Jews came to have a secondary meaning. The Greeks divided the world into Greeks and Barbarians, the Jews made the division into Jews and Greeks. Thus Greek came to be the name applied to every heathen, and in the NT. we have both this usage and the more classical one. "Greek," meaning simply Gentile or uncircumcised, occurs Gal. 3.[28]; Mk. 7.[26]; and also "Greek" as opposed to "Barbarian" is found in Rm. 1.[14]; Col. 3.[11], while "Greece" is used as equivalent to "Hellas" in the old classical sense and distinguished from Macedonia in Ac. 20.[2].

(2) Influence of Greece on Israel.—Unless modern conjecture, wh. regards the Phil. as identical with the Pelasgi, who founded Mycene and thus Greeks be correct, Isr. did not come into contact with Greece till the time of Alexander the Great. Alexander and his successors sought to extend the Gr. lang. and influence into the conquered provinces of Asia, Syria, and Egp. They founded many colonies, particularly Alexandria, where many Jews settled and acquired the Gr. lang., while retaining their own relg. A proof of the great influence Gr. thought came to have on the Jews beyond Pal. is seen not only in the fact that the OT. was trd. into Gr., and that the Apocrypha, for the most part, and the NT. were written in Gr., but also in the evidence of Gr. ideas in the LXX tr. itself. Thus e.g. in Heb. we read "Enoch walked with God," which in the LXX is deprived of its anthropomorphic colouring and becomes "Enoch pleased God." In Pal., surrounded by Greek-speaking peoples and visited frequently by Greek-speaking Jews, the Gr. influence became ever stronger, and was only partially retarded by the conservative movement under the Maccabæans. At the time of Jesus it is not unlikely that many Jews of Pal. were bilingual, speaking both Gr. and Aram. The conclusion that Jesus spoke Greek, while not unlikely, cannot be proved from such passages as Mk. 7.[24]; Jn. 7.[35], 12.[20]. He undoubtedly knew a few Gr. words, and was at least able to read the inscr. on the coin (Mw. 22.[20f.]). On the other hand, Gr. terms for coins, weights, and measures had to a large extent displaced the old Heb. terms. The crowd at the cross seems to have been mainly composed of Gr.-speaking Jews, otherwise they could not have misunderstood the cry: "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani," while the Jews in Jrs. were agreeably surprised when Paul addressed them in Aram. (Ac. 22.[2]).

(3) Greek Thought and the Bible.—Influences of Gr. thought on the OT. are practically non-existent, with the prob. exception of Ecclesiastes, who seems to have been dimly acquainted with the Epicurean philosophy (cp. Ec. 2.[24]) and also with the Aristotelian doctrine of the mean (cp. Ec. 7.[16]). The Apocrypha shows more signs of Gr. influence, particularly in the Wisdom of Solomon, which seeks to combine the Heb. doctrine of wisdom and principles of Gr. philosophy. In the NT. the Synoptics and particularly the words of Jesus show no traces of Gr. influence. The prologue of the fourth Gospel, as well as the enthusiasm of the writer for the truth, and his dualistic opposition of God and the world, show traces of Hellenistic influence. Paul, while undoubtedly acquainted with Gr. thought, is affected only on minor points by Gr. speculation (cp. arts. PAUL, JOHN).

GRECIANS in Jl. 3.[6] is AV. tr. of bĕnē hayyevānīm (RV. "sons of the Grs.") = Greeks. In NT. (Ac. 6.[1] 9.[29]) G. means the Gr.-speaking Jews, i.e. the Jews of the dispersion, as distinguished fm. those retaining their Semitic tongue. In Ac. 11.[20] RV. gives "Greeks."

GREEK, LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. As Palestine was a bilingual country our Lord may have spoken Greek and Aramaic with equal facility. At the same time writings composed in the Aramaic lang. appear to underlie the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke. Aram. or Heb. documents may also have been employed in Acts 1.–12. and in parts of the bk. of Revelation. The view is held by some scholars that the Epp. of St. James and St. Peter were translated from Aram. originals; but for this hypothesis there is no valid evidence. Apart fm. these exceptions, real or conjectural, the NT. was written fm. the first in Gr.

The Gr. of the NT. is the κοινή or "common" Gr. wh. was current in the eastern half of the Rm. Empire. As a result of the conquests of Alexander, the Gr. civilisation, and with it the Gr. lang., had been imposed on Egp. and on the various countries of Asia Minor. The language thus adopted was different, however, in many important respects fm. that of the great Classical period. Its groundwork was Attic, or rather the mixture of Attic and Ionic wh. had grown up around the Ægean Sea in the days of the Athenian supremacy. This mixed dialect became further modified by the influence of other Gr. dialects and of the native langs. of the conquered peoples. During the three centuries wh. had elapsed since Alexander it had also been developing itself fm. within. New words had been added to satisfy new requirements. Grammatical forms had been simplified, and exceptions brought into line with the prevailing rules. The numerous particles wh. were characteristic of anct. Gr. had been largely discarded. Prepositional phrases were used to express relations wh. had formerly been defined by case alone. Words and forms peculiar to poetry were adopted into common speech. The classical syntax was broken up and was replaced by a loose co-ordination of the several clauses in the sentence. In these ways, and in many others, the κοινή marked the first stage of the process whereby a new lang. was gradually evolved out of anct. Gr.

The extant Lit. of the period does not represent, except in a limited measure, the lang. that was actually in use. Literary modes of expression are always more or less artificial; and this was eminently the case in Gr. composition of the sub-classical age. Grammar, style, vocabulary had all been fixed several centuries before by the great Attic models, and later writers made it their aim to conform as nearly as poss. to the correct Attic usage. Although they only half succeeded, their lang. was a literary dialect, barely intelligible to the mass of uneducated men. The writers of the NT. belonged to the people, and wrote for the people. We do not expect fm. them an academic diction, such as we find in Plutarch, Lucian, and other contemporary authors. Their Gr. has to be considered in its relation to the actual spoken lang. of the first cent.

It was taken for granted, until recent yrs., that the NT. was written not so much in a lang. as in a patois, compounded largely of Semitic idiom. Its authors were admittedly Jews, and their Gr., alike in its gen. char. and in matters of detail, is in marked contrast to that of any other extant writing. The theory passed without question that they wrote as foreigners, endeavouring to express themselves in a medium of speech with wh. they were imperfectly acquainted. So recently as 1889 a great scholar like Hatch (Essays in Biblical Gr., p. 11) cd. describe the lang. of our NT. as a lang. by itself, an exotic Jewish dialect wh. required to be interpreted accdg. to its own peculiar rules.

This view has been entirely changed in consequence of the discoveries of the last few yrs. Excavations in Egp. have yielded a large and ever-increasing mass of familiar letters, household accounts and memoranda, commercial and civic documents, wh. obviously reflect the common lang. of the people. By means of these papyri and potsherds, dating fm. various periods between the third cent. B.C. to the sixth cent. A.D., we have been enabled to get behind the conventional Gr. of the extant Lit. It is true that they serve as evidence only for the Egyptian dialect, wh. may have been, in some respects, peculiar; but the results obtained fm. them have been substantially confirmed by the inscrs. recently discovered at Pergamum and Magnesia. There is good reason for concluding, with Thumb, Deissmann, and other careful investigators, that the κοινή was marked by few dialectical differences. The free communication wh. had been established among the various provinces of the Rm. Empire had led to a common type of lang., and the variations were confined almost wholly to accent and pronunciation.

The study of the papyri has disclosed a remarkable coincidence between the Gr. employed in them and that of the NT. There is the same loose construction of sentence, the same deviation fm. classical usage in the forms of the verb and the meanings assigned to prepositions. Idioms wh. were once regarded as unmistakably Semitic are now seen to have been customary in the Gr. of every-day life (cp. ὄνομα, where the "name" signifies the "person"; ἐνώπιον, "in the face of," instead of the simple "before"). Even more striking is the occurrence, in the ordinary speech of the time, of many religious and ecclesiastical words wh. seemed to be the peculiar product of Christianity. Thus κύριος (= "Lord") was a name frequently given to heathen deities, and formed its adjective κυριακός, as in the NT.; ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος ("bishop" and "elder") were words taken over fm. the organisation of heathen cults. It is more than prob. that the closer sifting of the papyri will reveal some equivalent to almost every word or phrase wh. has been hitherto set down as an innovation of NT. Gr. We are learning to acknowledge that the lang. of the sacred writers was not a jargon invented by themselves, but was nothing more or less than the ordinary spoken lang. of the Hellenic world. It is the contemporary Lit. wh. represents an artificial dialect; while the NT. is composed in the living tongue.

Hebraic elements are undoubtedly present, but they affect not so much the lang. in the narrower sense, as the gen. structure and colouring of the style. In all the writings we can observe a tendency to parallelism—the literary form in wh. Heb. thought natly. expressed itself when it became impassioned. In the accounts of our Lord's teaching, more esp., we meet not only with constant parallelism, but with apologue, aphorism, and other modes of speech characteristic of the East. But the Hebraic element in the various bks. is chiefly due to the direct influence of the OT. Scrip. The writers are all familiar with the OT., and quote it continually, either in entire sentences or in single words and phrases. Their quotations are usually made fm. the Septuagint version, in wh. there was little attempt to render the Heb. original in idiomatic Gr. Apart fm. literal quotations they allow their lang. to be modified, in a large degree, by the Septuagint. They delight in turns of expression wh. had become consecrated by frequent use in Scrip. They employ many terms in the sense attached to them by the translators of the Bible, and not in the sense wh. they bore in ordinary Gr. A contemporary reader wd. at once recognise a foreign element in their lang., but he wd. not set it down to any want of acquaintance with the lang. as commonly spoken. He wd. be affected much as we ourselves are in reading a bk. saturated with Scrip. phraseology, although evidently written by an Englishman of our own day.

When we have made allowance for the inevitable influence of the Bible on NT. Gr., the traces of Semitic idiom become exceedingly few. They are found (1) in words directly borrowed from Heb. or Aram. (e.g. 'Αββᾶ, 'αμήν, γέεννα, πάσχα, σάββατα); (2) in the frequent use of Hebraic formulæ, esp. in narration ("he answered, saying," "and it came to pass"); (3) in a few isolated expressions to wh. neither the Lit. nor the papyri have yet offered any parallels, and wh. may provisionally be classed as Hebraic. It must be remembered, however, that even these may be brought within the scope of normal Gr. usage, in the light of further discovery.

The NT. is the work of a number of writers, and the lang. of each one of them has its own peculiar char. St. Luke and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews are the most correct, when judged by the accepted standards of literary Gr., in their choice of words; and sometimes in the structure of their sentences they betray some affinity with the Atticising authors of their time. St. Paul is the greatest writer as well as the greatest thinker of the NT. His style is marked by a wonderful resourcefulness and flexibility; and if it were not for the traditional theory that he wrote in an arbitrary dialect, he wd. long ago have been recognised as a great master of lang. The Johannine writings are the least versatile in expression; but in all of them the constant repetition of the same ideas in the same unvaried and simple terms is evidently intentional. In spite, however, of many inevitable differences, due to its composite authorship, our NT. exhibits throughout the same broad linguistic features; and these are accounted for, not by the Jewish origin or imperfect culture of the writers, but by the fact that they all employed the spoken as distinguished fm. the merely literary lang.

This fact is no doubt to be explained fm. the circumstances of the Church in the first cent. Christianity had made its converts, almost exclusively, among the poorer classes, to wh. the more cultivated modes of speech were unfamiliar. They required to be addressed in the lang. of every-day life, before the message of the apostles cd. make its due appeal to them. In the next cent. Christianity had ceased to be a merely popular movement, and the writers of the Church conformed to the usages of the conventional literary style. It is no matter for regret that this was impracticable in the earlier period. The Gr. of the NT., however rude and incorrect when tried by classical standards, was the living tongue, and lent itself, as only the living tongue cd. do, to the utterance of heartfelt thought. All the more because it had never previously been used in Lit., it enabled the sacred writers to express themselves with a splendid boldness and spontaneity. They were not bound down to any stereotyped rules. They worked with a lang. wh. was still in the making, and cd. mould it, with entire freedom, to the purposes of the new revelation.

In one sense, therefore, the NT. is written in a separate lang. Christianity, like every great spiritual movement, impressed a new char. on the ordinary forms of speech. It brought with it a wealth of new ideas wh. it sought to express by means of existing words; but in this process the words acquired a fresh significance. The Gr. of the NT. was something very different fm. either the literary or spoken Gr. of the time. It was different also fm. the Gr. of the Church Fathers, for while they took over much of the new vocabulary, they made no further attempt to develop the resources of the vulgar tongue. The NT. stands by itself, the one monument in Lit. of the living vernacular Gr. of the first cent. As our kge. of the popular lang. increases, we may expect that not a few of the problems in its interpretation will be solved. But we must always take account of the new spt. wh. reacted on the lang. and shaped it to higher and finer issues.

HABAKKUK, eighth of the Minor Prophets, was a contemporary of Jeremiah, but of his personal life we have no cert. information. His prophecy is concerned with the rise of the Chaldeans to power, and he was already familiar with their methods of warfare and their success. In B.C. 625 the Chaldeans became independent of Asyr., in 607 Nineveh fell, and in 605 Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, defeated Necho of Egp. at Carchemish. A few yrs. later the Chaldeans invaded Judah. The prophecy of H. belongs to the latter part of this period, and deals with the religious problems raised by the speedy success of this terrible power. The bk. describes the state of Judah, where crime and lawlessness are rampant, and yet J″. seems unwilling to interfere (1.[1-4]). To the prophet J″. declares that the Chaldean power is a Divine instrument for the punishing of iniquity. The Chaldeans are a bitter and hasty people, and are here described as overmastering all the difficulties of opposition. They make a god of their might and scoff at kings and princes, but J″. makes use of them (1.[5-11]). Jeremiah had accepted the view that the Chaldeans were simply the instrument of J″., and he continually preached patience under the affliction. This, however, does not satisfy the inquiring mind of H., but only raises a new problem.

How can the righteous J″. use as His instrument, for any purpose whatever, a people who swallow up those more righteous than themselves, and who worship no power, other than the might of their own hands ? They spare not to slay the nations, regardless of God or man (1.[12-17]). H. reveals an intimate acquaintance with the doings of the Chaldeans, wh. is evidently the result of immediate kge. At the beginning of their career, it mt. still be poss. to consider them as the messengers of J″. appointed to punish sinners, and H. had at first accepted this view (1.[5]) ; but now their great power for evil, and their evident disregard of any Divine purpose, caused him perplexity. The prophet takes his place, figuratively, upon his watch-tower, to await the answer to his " complaint," or his questioning of the ways of God (2.[1]). He is told to write the answer on tablets, that it may be easily read and preserved, for its full meaning will only be known later. It is to the effect that the Chaldeans, being puffed up and unrighteous, bring their own destruction upon themselves, but the just shall live by their faithfulness (2.[4]). In spite of apparent contradictions, let the righteous only remain steadfast and retain their loyalty to God, for in that alone is life: let them wait for His explanation. " Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not delay " (2.[3]). Then the prophet denounces the Chaldeans in a series of " Woes " (2.[5-20]), supposed to be uttered by the vanquished nations. They are directed agst. their ungovernable passion and violence (vv. 5–8), agst. their insatiable desire to conquer wh. only hastens their own doom (vv. 9–11), agst. their cruel and iniquitous treatment of the vanquished cities (vv. 12–14), agst. their debasing influence upon the conquered (vv. 15–17), and agst. their foolish idolatry (vv. 18–20).

Great diffc. of opinion exists among critics as to the proper order of the verses in these chapters, and various ingenious rearrangements have been suggd. Budde has an interesting theory, and one wh. has gained important adherents, that the passage 1.[2-4] refers to the Asyrs., the oppressors of Judah, whom the Chaldeans overcame, instead of the usual interpretation given above, wh. takes the passage as referring to the sins of Judah itself.

Chap. 3. is very difft. fm. the first two, consisting of a poem of great poetic beauty, wh. places its author high in rank among the poets of the OT. It contains a prayer that J″. wd. renew the great work He had done in the past. The poet pictures J″. appearing in majesty to punish His enemies, and for the salvation of His own people. The imagery is drawn fm. the story of the Exodus, an event repeatedly referred to by the prophets as a signal manifestation of the hand of J″. After impressively describing the effect of this theophany, which is alarming even to those who fear Him, the chap. ends with a noble passage, expressing calm confidence in God, and a triumphant assurance that J″. is his strength, even though all the blessings of earth were denied him. JOHN DAVIDSON.

HABERGEON. This is the antique designation of the " cuirass " or " coat of mail." The latter is the tr. adopted by RV. in Ex. 28.[32], 39.[23]; 2 Ch. 26.[14]; Ne. 4.[16]. In Jb. 41.[26], RV. has " pointed shafts." The coat of mail might be of leather, or of metal scales.

HABOR (2 K. 17.[6], 18.[11]), a river to the banks of wh. the exiles of the Northern Kdm. were deported ; it is identified with the Khābūr, a tributary of the Euphrates.

HACHILAH, a hill near the wilderness of Ziph, a hiding-place of David, and once the site of Saul's camp (1 S. 23.[19], 26.[1, 3]). Ziph is the mod. Tell ez-Zif, S. of Hebron.

HADAD. (1) The successor of Husham on the throne of Edom (Gn. 36.[35]), who " smote Midian in the field of Moab," and reigned in the city Avith. (2) An adversary of Solomon, " of the king's seed in Edom," who as " a little child " was rescued from the fate that befell the males in Edom at the hands of Joab, and carried into Egp., where he found favour with the Pharaoh and married the queen's sr.* When the old warrior king, David, died, he ventured back to Edom. What success he achieved in his efforts to free his country from the power of Isr. we do not know (1 K. 11.$^{14-28}$). (3) In Gn. 36.^{39}, for " Hadar " we shd. prob. read " Hadad," with Psh. and cert. Massoretic and Sam. MSS., thus agreeing with 1 Ch. 1.^{50}.

HADAD-EZER (2 S. 8.$^{3-12}$), K. of ZOBA, conquered by DAVID ; called in 1 Ch. 18.^{3} Hadar-ezer. He assisted the Ammonites, but his forces were defeated by JOAB, and he was finally subdued by David at Helam (2 S. 10.$^{6-19}$).

HADADRIMMON (Ze. 12.^{11}), thought to be the place of mourning over Josiah's death (2 K. 23.^{29}; 2 Ch. 35.$^{22ff.}$), and genly. identd. with Rummâneh, a small vill. seven miles NW. of Jenîn.

HADID (Ez. 2.^{33}, &c.), prob. = " Adida " (1 M. 12.^{38}, 13.^{13}), corrspg. to mod. Ḥadîtheh, c. three miles NE. of Lydda.

HADRACH (Zc. 9.^{1}), the name of a district near Damascus, apparently ident. with "Hatarikka" of the Asyr. inscrs., wh. place it to the N. of Mt. Lebanon.

HAGAR (" flight "), Sarah's Egpn. handmaid (Gn. 16.^{1}), accdg. to the custom of the time, her own private property. Despairing of offspring herself, Sarah gave H. to Abraham, following the practice of the land of their origin (Laws of Ḥammurabi, 144–7), the children of the handmaid being reckoned to the mistress. Sarah's jealousy, H.'s pride, and the ensuing trials for Abraham, as well as for the handmaid and her s., are very true to human nat. Unable to endure Sarah's oppression, H. fled, but the " angel of the Lord " met her, promised a great posterity for her s. (see ISHMAEL), and sent her back. Meanwhile God's promise of a s. to Sarah having been fulfilled (Gn. 21.), the Egyptian and her boy became an eyesore to the jealous wife, and at her instigation, but also with the approval of God, they were finally sent away by Abraham. Again the angel of God intervened to preserve them in the thirsty wilderness (vv. 17ff.). H. took a w. of her own countrywomen for her s. She ranks as the great ancestress of the Ishmaelite tribes. The Moslem Arabs claim, indeed, that she was the legitimate w. of Abraham, and that Ishmael, as the first-born, secured the lion's share of the inheritance. She died and was buried, they say, in the holy city of Mecca.

Hagarenes, Hagarites, or Hagrites, RV. (1 Ch. 5.^{10,} &c. ; Ps. 83.^{6}), a nomad tribe of the Syrian desert, attacked and pillaged by the Reubenites in the time of Saul. Prob. they counted their descent fm. Hagar. They may be identl. with the " sons of Agar " (Ba. 3.^{23}). Jaziz, David's flockmaster, was of this tribe (1 Ch. 27.^{31}).

HAGGAI, tenth of the Minor Prophets, and one of the exiles who returned fm. Bab. with Zerubbabel and Joshua, inspired the people with a new enthusiasm for the rebldg. of the Temple. The captivity had ended in B.C. 536, when Cyrus, k. of Persia, now the master of Bab., gave the exiles permission to return. At first they contented themselves with laying the foundation of the Temple and setting up the altar of burnt-offering (Ez. 3.), for they had learned to dispense with the sanctuary during the captivity, without injury to the religious life of the people. Moreover, the eagerness of their hostile neighbours to accuse them of rebellion agst. the over-lord wd. help to chill the ardour of the Jews. The murder of Cambyses and the accession of Darius had been the occasion of a wide revolt among the peoples subj. to the Persian rule ; and, as in the past, the prophets came forward to translate the events of hist. into the lang. of the purpose of J″. In B.C. 520, the second year of Darius, H., supported by Zechariah, uttered the Divine command to rebuild the Temple, declaring that they cd. not hope for the favour of J″. till this first duty was fulfilled. The news of the upheaval within the Persian empire aroused in H. the hope of the fall of the heathen empires, and the coming of the Messianic Age. He declared that, if the Temple were completed, J″. wd. come with mercy and blessing.

The four prophecies of H. belong to the one yr., B.C. 520. In chap. 1. he appeals to governor and High Priest to make a beginning of bldg. the Temple. The slackness of the people had not been caused by their poverty, for they had built for themselves " panelled " houses, while J″.'s house lay waste. There had been times of drought, and crops were failing ; wages were small, and they quickly vanished, as if put in a bag full of holes. All this was the punishment of their neglect of an obvious duty. Let them restore the Lord's house and He wd. again have pleasure in them. It was rare that a prophet saw such immediate fruit of his ministry. H. had delivered his prophecy on the 1st day of the 6th month, and on the 24th day the work was begun.

In the 2nd prophecy, on the 21st day of the 7th month (2.$^{1-9}$), H. encourages those who had seen the former Temple, and who now felt the impossibility of building anything like it. He tells them that the best is yet to be, and that the latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former.

The 3rd prophecy (2.$^{10-19}$) was delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month, and in it H. develops the thought that all their ills have arisen fm. neglect of the Temple; but, now that it is being built, the blessing of J″. will be given.

* The recent sugg. that H. fled to Mitzri, a district W. of Edom, and not to Mitzraim, the Egypt so well known to hist., is without reasonable support.

The 4th prophecy (2.[20-23]) is addressed, on the same day, to Zerubbabel, of the house of David; and a promise is given of Divine favour and protection in the day when J″. will destroy the strength of the nations.

H. has little of the fire and poetic power of most of the prophets, but he makes his appeal and gives his promises in a plain, direct way wh. wins assent; and he has the power of arousing enthusiasm in his hearers for the cause wh. is near his heart. In four yrs. the bldg. of the Temple was completed.

John Davidson.

HAGGITH, w. of David, mr. of Adonijah (2 S. 3.[4], &c.).

HAIL (Heb. bārād, Gr. chalaza) is usual during the winter in Pal., when it seldom does damage. In spring, and later, it sometimes works great havoc on the crops and fruit (Ex. 9.[25]; Ps. 78.[47]). It is often accompanied by thunder (Ex. 9.[23]; Ps. 148.[8]; Rv. 8.[7], &c.). At times the great hail-stones are a danger to life (Ex. 9.[18]; Jo. 10.[11], &c.). About the year 1890, a hail-storm broke over Galilee, in wh. many goats were killed on Mt. Carmel, the hail-stones in one instance piercing the window shutters of a house like musket balls. The present writer was caught in a hail-storm in June 1898, when riding on the shore N. of Sidon, and carried for weeks painful marks of the hail-stones, wh. seemed to be c. ½ in. in diameter. H. was used as a symbol of the judgment of God (Rv. 8.[7], 11.[19], 16.[21]), and was an instrument with wh. He chastised His people (Ps. 105.[32]; Hg. 2.[17], &c.).

HAIR. Among the Semites and other primitive peoples an importance, strange to us, attached to the H. Part of a person's life was held to reside in it. This sheds light on customs connected with the H. wh. were otherwise unintelligible. Altho' the practice has varied fm. age to age, prob. some attempt was always made to distinguish the sexes by the manner of wearing the H. In NT. times the man's H. was cut short; the woman's grew long (1 Cor. 11.[15]; cp. Is. 3.[24]; Ek. 16.[7]). In earlier days men seem to have let their H. grow longer. Solomon's youthful horsemen produced striking effects by sprinkling gold dust on their long H. (Ant. VIII. vii. 3; cp. SS. 5.[2, 11]). The Arab men to this day wear the H. in long plaits. Long H. marked the Asyrs. (Herod. i. 195). The Egpns. shaved clean (Gn. 41.[14]), but wore false H. plentifully (WAE. ii. 324, &c.). The barber is mentioned Ek. 5.[1] Illustrations of the attention given to the H. are found in 2 S. 14.[26]; 2 K. 9.[30]; Is. 3.[24]; Jr. 7.[29]; 1 Tm. 2.[9], &c. Combs are not named in Scrip., but were doubtless familiar in Pal. as in Egp. (WAE. ii. 349). Metallic ornaments were worn in the H. (Is. 3.[18]), as coins and tiny bells adorn the locks of Oriental beauties still. Herod the Gt. dyed his H. (Ant. XVI. viii. 1). The Hebs. do not seem to have used wigs. To pluck the H. (Ez. 9.[3]), or leave it untended (2 S. 19.[24]; Is. 15.[2], &c.), was a sign of grief (see Mourning). To mishandle the H. of another is to inflict deep indignity (2 S. 10.[4ff.]; Is. 7.[20], 50.[6], &c.). A woman was humiliated by the untying of her H. (Nu. 5.[18], RV.; cp. Lk. 7.[38]). It was forbidden to follow the heathen practice of cutting the corners, i.e. the locks on the temples, at puberty. Hence, by a curious perversion of the prohibition, the love-locks, so carefully preserved by pious Jews to-day.

As among the Arabs, the man under a vow, the Nazirite, might not cut his H. until the vow was accomplished (Nu. 6.[5ff.]; Jg. 13.[5]; 1 S. 1.[11]). Among anct. peoples, offerings of H. meant really offering of part of the life. To get a portion of a man's H. was to possess some mysterious connection with him wh. even death did not end (RS.[2] 324ff.; Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. 118, 146). Swearing by the H. or beard is connected with the same superstition (Mw. 5.[36]). The change of the captive slave-girl's condition is marked by shaving the H. (Dt. 21.[12]).

White H. is held in reverence (Pr. 16.[31]; Ws. 2.[10], &c.) as a mark of old age An offence is aggravated if it bring sorrow on grey H. (Gn. 42.[38]). H. "like pure wool" is an element expressing the Divine majesty of the Ancient of Days (Dn. 7.[9]; cp. Rv. 1.[14]). See LEPROSY.

HALAH. See CALAH.

HALAK (Heb. hā-hār hehālāk). Instead of Mt. H. we shd. prob. read "the smooth" or "bare mountain" (Jo. 11.[17], 12.[7]), marking the S. boundary of the land conquered by Joshua: unident.

HALHUL, a city in Judah named with Bethzur (Jo. 15.[58]) = mod. Ḥalḥul, an important vill. near Beit Ṣūr, four miles N. of Hebron. There is a good spring, rock-hewn tombs, and remains of anct. bldgs.

HALI, a town on the border of Asher and Zebulun (Jo. 19.[25]), poss. = mod. Khirbet 'Alya, c. 13 miles NE. of Acre.

HALLELUJAH, "Praise Jehovah (JHWH)," a doxology found at the beginning (Pss. 111., 112.) or end (Pss. 104., 105., &c.) of certain Psalms, and at both beginning and end of others (Pss. 106., 135., 146., 147., 148., &c.). In Ps. 135. it also opens v. 3. Pss. 113.–118., in wh. the phrase is of frequent occurrence, are sung together as one composition by the Jews on the night of the Passover, and are called the "Hallel of Egypt." In the Psalms the word is always translated "Praise ye the Lord." In Rv. it is trltd. fm. the Gr. Allelouia.

HAM, s. of NOAH (Gn. 5.[32], 9.[18ff.]), fr. of CUSH, MIZRAIM, PHUT, and CANAAN. The name suggests a connection with the root ḥāmam, "to be hot"; it is also connected with the native name of Egypt, Khemi. H. is regarded as the progenitor of the Southern races; the only exception being the CANAANITES. The incident (Gn. 9.[22]), as the curse of Noah is directed against Canaan, not Ham, may indicate a confusion in the nar.; prob. Canaan, not H., was guilty. The incident may point to the licentious character of the Canaanites.

HAMAN, s. of Hammedatha, vizier and favourite of AHASUERUS. Enraged at the refusal of Mordecai, the cousin of ESTHER, to do him reverence, he sought revenge in the destruction of the whole Jewish people. His plots were frustrated, and the fate he had devised for Mordecai was meted to himself. H. is called an Agagite (Est. 3.[1]), that is, a desct. of Agag, k. of Amalek, whom Samuel hewed in pieces before the Lord (1 S. 15.[33]). In LXX he is called a "Bougean," a name which points to another reading. When the bk. of Esther is read in the synagogue at the feast of Purim, whenever the name of H. occurs the Jews express their hatred of him by stamping with their feet and spitting. See PURIM.

HAMATH. The entering in of H. is mentioned as the most northerly point visited by the spies (Nu. 13.[21], RV.), and frequently as the N. limit of Isr.'s territory (Jg. 3.[3], &c.). This is prob. the great depression between the N. end of Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains, affording easy passage fm. the coast to the plain of the Orontes (BRP. iii. 568f.; LB. iii. 297). The city H. lay c. forty miles further N., on the banks of the Orontes. It is now represented by Ḥamāh, a town of some 60,000 inhabitants (Baedeker), under the governor of Damascus.

H. was the capital of a kdm., the boundaries of wh. are unknown. K. Toi was on friendly terms with David (2 S. 8.[9f.]). It was taken by Jero-

The cuneiform inscrs. show that the Asyrs. attached great importance to H. Men fm. H. were settled in Samaria (2 K. 17.[24]). The Greeks changed the name to Epiphania, but the old name lived in the mouth of the natives, and, with the Arab conquest, resumed its place. The castle stood on an eminence to the N. The river flowing through the town is spanned by four bridges. Water fm. the deep bed is raised for the gardens by means of huge wheels, wh. are driven by the force of the current. Here were found cert. inscrs. supposed to be Hittite. Hamath Zobah (2 Ch. 8.[3]) may poss. be identl. with this, or it may have been so called to distinguish it fm. H. the Gt.; but no site answering to it has been discovered.

HAMMATH, "hot spring" (Jo. 19.[35]; Ant. XVIII. ii. 3; BJ. IV. i. 3), a city of Naphtali = mod. el-Ḥammām, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles S. of Tiberias, on the seashore. The spring supplying the large public bath has a temperature of 140° Fah. Patients fm. all quarters, esp. Jews, visit the baths, wh. are reputed good for rheumatic and other complaints. H. is prob. = Hammon (1 Ch. 6.[76]) and Hammath Dor (Jo. 21.[32]).

HAMOR ("he ass"), prince of Shechem, fm. whose "sons" Jacob purchased the "parcel of ground" wh. was before the city (Gn. 33.[18ff.]). H. perished in the massacre by Jacob's sons (see DINAH). The old nobility of Shechem in later times were known as "the sons of H." (Jg. 9.[28]).

HAMUTAL (2 K. 23.[31], 24.[18]; Jr. 52.[1]), w. of Josiah, mr. of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah.

HANAMEL, cousin of Jeremiah, fm. whom the prophet in prison bought the field at Anathoth when the fall of Jrs. was imminent, believing that the land would again be possessed by Isr. (Jr. 32.[7ff.]).

HANANEL, a tower on the wall. See JERUSALEM.

HANANI. Of the men who bore this name in Scrip. we need mention only H. the br. of Nehemiah—i.e. poss. a relative—who came to "Shushan the palace" fm. Jrs., telling a sad story of the condition of things there (1.[2]). To him, along with HANANIAH, "governor of the castle," Nehemiah subsequently entrusted "the charge over Jerusalem" (7.[2]).

HANANIAH ("J″. has been gracious"). (1) A "patriot" who opposed the policy of Jeremiah, prophesying that within two yrs. Jeconiah wd. return fm. Bab. with the captives of Judah, and the sacred vessels of the Temple (Jr. 28.[1f.]). He died within two months of Jeremiah's denunciation. (2) One of Daniel's companions (see SHADRACH). (3) A man of importance in Nehemiah's time, governor of the castle, and one of the commanders of the city (Ne. 7.[2]). The name is frequent in OT.

HAND (Heb. yad, "the open H.," kaph, "the closed H.," Gr. cheir). "At hand" is = Heb. qarōb, and Gr. engus, "near" (Is. 13.[6]; Mw. 26.[18], &c.). Yāmīn, "right hand," and semōl, "left hand," are used for "North" and "South" respectively; directions being fixed with the face to the E. Sometimes yad = "monument" (1 S. 15.[12]; 2 S. 18.[18]; Is. 56.[5]). "Hand" = "power" (Dt. 2.[15], 4.[34]), "protection" and "care" (Ez. 7.[6], &c.; cp. Jn. 10.[28f.]), "inspiration" (Ek. 8.[1], &c.).

The raised Hs. denote prayer (Ex. 17.[11], &c.). To lift the H. is = "to vow" (Gn. 14.[22], &c.). Washing the Hs. protests innocence (Dt. 21.[6]; Mw. 27.[24], &c.). To pour water on another's Hs. is to be his servant (2 K. 3.[11]). "Clean Hs." = innocence (Ps. 18.[20], &c.). Blessing is conveyed and sin transferred by LAYING ON OF HANDS (Gn. 48.[14]; Lv. 16.[21], &c.). To fill the Hs. was to consecrate to the priesthood (Ex. 28.[41], &c.). In conspiracy men join H. in H. The place of honour is at the right H. (Ps. 110.[1]; Lk. 22.[69]; Rm. 8.[34]; cp. Ps. 109.[31]).

HANDBREADTH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HANDICRAFTS. While certain occupations were held in some contempt, altho' regarded as necessary (e.g. that of the tanner), the general attitude of the anct. Hebs. to work was one of respect. To them there was nothing incongruous in the thought of a workman being called by the Lord to his craft, and filled by His Spirit with wisdom and skill (Ex. 31.[1ff.]). Even so in later days great Rabbis, such as Hillel, followed their trades without compromising their dignity. Not to teach a youth some trade was looked on as equivalent to teaching him to be a thief. Apostolic precept and practice were equally wholesome (Ac. 18.[3]; 1 Cor. 4.[12]; 1 Th. 4.[11]; 2 Th. 3.[10], &c.). Jesus Himself conformed to this custom (Mk. 6.[3]), thus conferring a new dignity upon toil.

The words commonly used in Heb. for artificer or craftsman are derived fm. the root ḥrsh, "to cut." Ḥārāsh is the usual form, and the trade is defined by the addition of the material in wh. the artificer works; e.g. worker in wood = carpenter; worker in stone = mason, &c.

No doubt in primitive times each man made his own weapons. The importance attaching to means of attack and of self-defence wd. ensure the early development of the Armourer. His craft wd. be among the first applied to working in metal. The "smith" is the armourer in 1 S. 13.[19], and prob. also in 2 K. 24.[14, 16], &c. The Baker appears in Egp. in Joseph's day (Gn. 40.[1]). Hosea (7.[4, 6]) is familiar with his methods. In Jrs. the bakers gave their name to the street where they practised their calling (Jr. 37.[21]); see BREAD, OVEN. The Barber is mentioned only in Ek. 5.[1], but his craft was familiar (see HAIR). The Carpenter's trade must be distinguished from the mere taskwork of the "hewer of wood" (Jo. 9.[21]), who prob. only gathered firewood. It comprised all kinds of skilled work in wood for buildings, furniture, and ornamentation. He also carves wooden idols (Is. 40.[20], 41.[7], 44.[13], &c.). In the last-quoted verse several of the carpenter's tools are named: the measuring line; the pencil (Heb. sered), wh. Kimchi thinks was red chalk; prob. it was a metal stylus—cp. Arb. sarād, "an awl"; the plane, lit. "graving tool"; and compasses. Axe, Saw, and Hammer are mentioned elsewhere. The carpenter in Jesus' time wd., like his mod. successors, make ploughs, yokes, &c., for the Galilean farmers. He knew the importance of well-fitting yokes (Mw. 11.[29f.]). Cheesemakers were so numerous as to give their name to a valley. Poss., however, cheesemongers may be intended (see Jerusalem). The Cook (ṭabbāḥ) is in Heb. synonymous with "executioner" and "slaughterer," showing that it was his duty to kill the beasts to be used for food (1 S. 9.[23f.]). The art of the Dyer was practised (see Dyeing). The Embroiderer's art is frequently referred to. He wrought in blue and purple and scarlet and fine linen, apparently using also threads of gold (Ex. 35.[35], 38.[23], 39.[1ff.], &c.). The Engraver cut designs and lettering on precious stones (Ex. 28.[9ff.], 31.[4], &c.). Graven images were probably cast, and finished with graving tools. Graven stones (Ac. 17.[29]) are the work of the sculptor. The precious metals were wrought and adapted to many purposes, esp. those of ornament, fm. very early times; but the name of the Goldsmith, as practising his craft, occurs only thrice, and then as a maker of images (Is. 40.[19], 41.[7], 46.[6]). The goldsmiths, apparently a trade guild, are mentioned as taking part in repairing the walls of Jrs. under Nehemiah (3.[32]). "Jewels" (EV.) of silver and gold were, of course, made by the goldsmith, so that, in old English usage, the goldsmith was the Jeweller. Now this word denotes the worker and dealer in precious stones. Mason in EV. is applied to those who quarry and dress stones (1 Ch. 22.[2], &c.) as well as to those who actually build them (1 Ch. 14.[1], &c.). Of the marvellous stone cutting and building of ancient days illustrations may be seen in Baalbek. In the W. wall of the Temple of the Sun are three stones of over 60 ft. in length, at a height of 19 ft. from the foundation, while a giant still lies in the quarries wh. measures 71 ft. × 14 ft. × 13 ft. Its weight may be about 1500 tons. Of stoneworkers' tools there are mentioned the axe (1 K. 6.[7]), a tool mentioned in the Siloam inscription, prob. a pick; the hammer, maqqābāh, prob. a smaller hammer used in dressing stones (1 K. 6.[7]), and paṭṭīsh, wh. may be a heavy implement used in the quarry (Jr. 23.[29]); the measuring reed (Ek. 40.[3], &c.), and the plummet (2 K. 21.[13], &c.). David had a plan (EV. "pattern") made for the buildings to be undertaken by Solomon (1 Ch. 28.[11]), and prob. it was customary in all important structures for the builders to work from a plan (cp. He. 11.[10], AV. "builder," RV. "architect"). The Miller is not named, but see Mill, Millstone. Perfumers are called "confectionaries" in AV. (see Perfume). The art of working various metals was known fm. very early times, and the handiwork of the Smith frequently appears (Gn. 4.[22]; 1 S. 13.[19], &c.). The anct. Hebs. understood the methods of melting (Jg. 17.[4]) and refining (Pr. 17.[3]; Zc. 13.[9], &c.) metals. Iron was for the most part wrought when red hot (Is. 44.[12], &c.), but it also might be melted (Ek. 22.[20]). Mention is made of blowing the smith's fire with bellows (Is. 54.[16]; Jr. 6.[29]); the anvil (Is. 41.[7]); the hammer and tongs (Is. 44.[12]); and solder (41.[7]). Spinning, Weaving, and making of Tents in anct. as in mod. times would be largely in the hands of the women. In NT. times Tentmaking was a special trade, followed, among others, by the apostle Paul (Ac. 18.[3]). See also Fuller, Linen, Potter, Tanner. Other occupations are treated under their own names.

Carpenters at Work

a, piece of dark wood applied to one of ordinary quality, b; c, adze; e, ruler; f, right angle; g, box. 2. Something is being ground; i, glue pot on fire; j, piece of glass. 3. Glue applied with brush.

In mod. Damascus we have a picture of anct. conditions in the gathering of those who follow a particular craft in one street or bazaar, e.g. the street of the saddlers, the bazaar of the goldsmiths, &c. (cp. Ne. 11.[35]; Jr. 37.[21]; BJ. V. viii. 1). This circumstance wd. facilitate the formation of something like trade unions, for defence and promotion of their mutual interests, wh. seem to have existed fm. early times, e.g. that of the goldsmiths (Ne. 3.[8, 12]) and of the silversmiths (Ac. 19.[24]).

HANDKERCHIEF. As the name soudarion, a word borrowed fm. the Latin, indicates, this was a small cloth carried for the purpose of wiping off perspiration (Ac. 19.[12]).

HANES, a city in Egp. (Is. 30.[4]), prob. to be identified with Heracleopolis (Egpn. Hnēs), near ZOAN; the connection suggs. a city wh. was the seat of government. Tg. Jn. has TAHPANHES; the LXX has read hinnam as they tr. matēn, "in vain," the final mem being read instead of semech; the confusion may have been made by the Massoretic scribes.

HANGING, AV. (Heb. māsāk), a curtain of "blue and purple, and scarlet and fine twined linen wrought with needlework," wh. served as a door to the TABERNACLE (Ex. 26.[36]); also a similar curtain wh. covered the entrance into the "Court" round the TABERNACLE (Ex. 27.[16]).

In the three cases in wh. this word occurs elsewhere than in the Pentateuch it is trd. "covering," e.g. 2 S. 17.[19]. RV. has instead of H. "screen," a rendering which has the disadvantage that it suggests, not anything of the nature of a portière, but a fixed structure of wood, metal, or stone, e.g. an altar screen.

Hangings (Heb. qĕlā'īm), the linen curtains wh., suspended fm. pillars, formed the boundary of the Tabernacle Court and marked it off fm. the rest of the camp (Ex. 27.[12]).

In 1 K. 6.[34] the Heb. word occurs, and is rendered "leaves" (of folding doors) as if it had been tzĕlā'īm, since clearly there has been a scribal blunder. In 2 K. 23.[7] H. represents another Heb. word, bottīm, "houses," EVm. "tents."

HANNAH, w. of ELKANAH, mr. of SAMUEL (1 S. 1.[2ff.]).

HANNATHON (Jo. 19.[14]), a town on the N. boundary of Zebulun, poss. = Kefr 'Anān, c. three miles E. of er-Rāmeh.

HANUN, k. of the Ammonites, s. of Nahash, whose insult to David's messengers brought disastrous war upon his people (2 S. 10[1ff.]; 1 Ch. 19.[1ff.]). For others see Ne. 3.[13, 30].

HAPHRAIM, a town in Issachar (Jo. 19.[19]). OEJ. idents. H. with Afarea, six Rm. miles N. of Legio, mod. Khān el-Lejjūn. This corrsps. with mod. El-Ferrīyeh, an anct. site with notable tombs.

HARA, the name of a place not mentioned elsewhere, to wh. the Assyrians are said to have carried captives of Isr. (1 Ch. 5.[26]). The text is prob. corrupt. Poss. we shd. read hārē, "mountains," i.e. the mountains of Media (cp. 2 K. 17.[6], 18.[11], LXX). MT. of these last passages gives 'ārē mādāi, "cities of the Medes."

HARAN. (1) S. of Terah, br. of Abram, and fr. of Lot (Gn. 11.[26]). (2) S. of Caleb (1 Ch. 2.[46]). (3) S. of Shemei (1 Ch. 23.[9]).

HARAN, a very anct. city SE. of Edessa, on the river Belias, a tributary of the Euphrates. Hither came Terah with his family (Gn. 11.[31]). Hence, after his fr.'s death, Abram set out (12.[1ff.]). Tradition places the meeting of Rebekah and Eliezer at a well near H. (24.[15]). It was the home of Laban, Nahor's grandson (27.[43]), and therefore prob. that of his and Rebekah's fr. Bethuel. It was taken by Asyr., and is often mentioned in cuneiform inscrs. Ezekiel names it as a centre of trade (27.[23]). It was long a seat of Moon-worship.

HARBONA, one of the chamberlains (eunuchs) of Ahasuerus (Est. 1.[10]); he suggd. that Haman shd. be hanged on the gallows he made for Mordecai (Est. 7.[9]); the LXX attributes the suggn. to Bougathan.

HARE (Heb. arnebeth), declared unclean because, although it chewed the cud, it did not divide the hoof (Lv. 11.[6], &c.). Its apparent chewing of the cud is the grinding of the teeth together to prevent them growing too long. There are several species of H. in Pal. The Moslems reckon it good for food.

HARETH, RV. HERETH (1 S. 22.[5]), a forest in Judah, poss. ident. with Horesh (1 S. 23.[15] RVm.), near Ziph, now Khirbet Khoreisā, S. of Tell ez-Zif. Conder suggests Kharās, seven miles NW. of Hebron.

HARLOT. From the beginning of Hist. the H. (Heb. zōnāh, qĕdēshah, Gr. pornē) appears, plying her unholy and seductive arts (Gn. 38.; Pr. 6.[24]; Is. 23.[16]; Lk. 15.[30], &c.). The term "strange woman" (Pr. 6.[24], &c.; cp. 1 K. 11.[1]) perhaps indicates that in Isr. they were mainly foreigners. The law was severe only as regards violation of the marriage sanctities (Lv. 19.[29]; Dt. 22.[28ff.]). The one exception applies to the priest's dr. (Lv. 21.[9]). The reason for this will appear immediately. The H. and her children were debarred fm. social rights (Dt. 23.[2]; Jg. 11.[1]; Mw. 21.[32]; Jn. 8.[41], &c.).

The heathen sanctuaries throughout Syria were scenes of the most horrible debauchery. The obscene deities personifying nature's reproductive powers were thus worshipped, both men and women prostituting themselves to this service. This sheds clear light upon Lv. 21.[9], and on the prohibition of Dt. 23.[17]. The danger to Isr. is obvious. The idolatries into wh. the people fell were all too literally what the prophets called them (Am. 2.[7]; Ho. 4.[13], &c.). The bitterness of the Bab. captivity finally extracted the evil virus fm. the nation's veins. In later times the Church had to struggle for its very life against the same evil (Ac. 15.[20, 29]; Rm. 1.[24ff.]; 1 Cor. 6.[9ff.]; Gal. 5.[19], &c.).

HAR-MAGEDON (RV.), ARMAGEDDON (AV.). The name occurs only in Rv. 16.[16]. H. is to be the scene of the final battle between the powers of darkness and God, on "the great day of God Almighty." H. is the Gr. form of the Heb. har mĕgiddōn, "the mountains of Megiddo," the heights in the neighbourhood of MEGIDDO, on the SW. edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. Witnesses as they had been for cents. of the fierce tides of battle rolling in the plain, it was not unnatural, in apocalyptic vision, to associate them with the last decisive conflict of opposing hosts.

HARNESS, a shirt of mail formed of metal scales on a basis of cloth. See ARMOUR.

39.[10], where it is trd. "to harrow." It may have been done by cross ploughing. The word hārītz, trd. "harrow" (2 S. 12.[31]; 1 Ch. 20.[3]), prob. denotes some sharp instrument such as pick or mattock. Then poss. we shd. read with RVm., making the necessary change, "put them to saws and to mattocks of iron, and to axes of iron, and made them labour at the brick mould" (H. P. Smith, Samuel, ad loc.), i.e. he reduced them to what, for people of their kind, was a peculiarly galling form of slavery.

HARSITH. See JERUSALEM.

WELL OF HAROD

HAROD, THE WELL OF, at wh. Gideon proved his soldiers, is prob. ident. with 'Ain Jalūd, on the edge of the Vale of Jezreel, under the N. declivity of Mt. Gilboa. It is a strong spring of sweet water rising in a cave. It gathers in a pool and then flows E'ward to the Jordan.

HAROSHETH, the town whence Sisera marched to battle with Barak (Jg. 4.[2, 13, 16]), therefore prob. W. of Esdraelon. El-Harithīyeh, a vill. on the edge of the oak forest, N. of Carmel and the Kishon, overlooking the plain of Acre, is commonly identd. with H.

HARP (Heb. kinnōr), a stringed musical instrument portrayed on the Asyr. bas-reliefs, and on the Egpn. wall paintings. See MUSIC.

MACHINE USED AS HARROW IN EGYPT

HARROW. There is no evidence that the H. was used by the anct. Hebs. It was not known in Egp. (WAE. ii. 395). The word sādad is twice rendered "to break the clods" (Is. 28.[24]; Ho. 10.[11]). The operation is evidently the same as that in Jb.

HART, HIND (Heb. 'ayyāl, 'ayyālāh), the male and female of the fallow deer. It is still met with in Pal., but it must have been common when it formed part of the daily provision for Solomon's table (1 K. 4.[23]). It is specified as clean (Dt. 12.[15], &c.). It corresponds to the Arb. 'iyyal, and is still an object of eager chase. Ps. 42.[1] speaks of its longing for water; SS. 2.[9], &c., prob. allude to its gracefulness and speed; while Is. 35.[6] refers to its powers of leaping. The Hind appears in the superscription to Ps. 22., in what may be the name of a tune, "the H. of the morning" (EVm.). Often in the dawning day it may be seen, like the gazelle, near to stream or fountain. It is sure of foot (2 S. 22.[34] = Ps. 18.[33]). It seeks remote and inaccessible places to calve (Jb. 39.[1]; Ps. 29.[9]). In dearth of pasture it may forsake its young (Jr. 14.[5]). The reading, "Naphtali is a hind let loose" (Gn. 49.[21]), is due to corruption of the text.

HATACH, RV. HATHACH, a eunuch, attendant upon Esther the queen, and the medium of communication between her and Mordecia (Est. 4.[5], &c.).

HAURAN, in Ek. 47.[16, 18], is the district lying between Damascus and Gilead, reaching fm. the Jordan to the Mountain of Bashan. It included the mod. Jaulān and part of the country S. of the Yarmuk, as well as the region now known as H. Fm. the rolling breadths of Southern Jaulān, torn by deep watercourses, the land rises gradually, with many dark hills, cones of extinct volcanoes, to the steeps of Hermon. The E. boundary of the Jaulān is Nahr er-Ruqqād, beyond wh. lies the great hollow,

Haurān: Modern Dwellers in the Mountain

50 miles long by 45 broad, containing some of the finest grain-growing land in the world. This applies esp. to en-Nuqrah, "the cavity," in the S. El-Lejā' is sterile and rocky (see Argob). El-Jebel is the range wh. separates the Ḥaurān fm. the eastern desert, with Ṣalkhad on the ridge to the S. The mountain and the E. of el-Lejā' are now occupied by the Druzes, who came fm. Lebanon after the massacres in 1860. The mountain is popularly called Jebel ed-Druze. It is well wooded, with many vineyards, while the lower slopes are very fertile.

The ruins of Bozrah, Ṣalkhad, Qanawāt, and other great cities, show that the province was once the scene of high civilisation, with a numerous and prosperous population. The Rms. took the N. part in B.C. 64. In A.D. 106 the Nabatæans, who till then had held the S., were overcome, and the province of Arabia was formed, with Bozrah as its capital. Evil days, wh. still continue, began with the Moslem conquest, A.D. 632. Many inscrs. have been found among the ruins of temples and public buildings; the latest in wh. mention is made of a Christian building was found by Ewing in el-Kufr (PEFQ., July 1895, inscr. No. 150). Many of the houses in the Ḥaurān are built entirely of stone; doors and windows being closed with stone slabs, often elaborately carved, and swung with great skill. Prob. these are not earlier than the beginning of our era; but the substructions and underground dwellings found in the district may be very anct.

HAVEN (Heb. ḥūph, "shore," or "beach," Gn. 49.[13]; māhōz, "refuge," or "port," Ps. 107.[30]). The Hebs. were not a sea-going people. The seaboard was held mainly by the Phil. and the Phœnicians. Zebulun may have reached the sea at Mt. Carmel—some think ḥūph may survive in mod. Ḥaifa—and its N. border approached Zidon. The H. at Ezion Geber was for a time in the hands of Isr. (1 K. 9.[26], 22.[48], &c.). There was no good nat. H. on the Mediterranean coast; but there are remains of artificial structures at Gaza, Jaffa, Cæsarea, Acre, Tyre and Sidon, wh. afforded shelter to such vessels as the ancients used. See also Fair Havens.

Hawk or Kestrel

HAVILAH. (1) In the description of Eden (Gn. 2.[11]), a land compassed by the river Pison, rich in gold, bdellium, and onyx. (2) Two districts in Arabia, one inhabited by Shemites (sons of Joktan, Gn. 10.[29], 25.[18]); and the other by Hamites (Cushites, Gn. 10.[7]). Niebuhr found two regions in S. Arabia bearing the name Khaulan; Glaser, on the other hand, wd. assign both Havilahs to N. Arabia.

HAVOTH JAIR ("the encampments," or "tent villages of Jair"). We cannot certainly ident. the district intended. The name havvoth points to a land of nomads; but as Moore (Judges) suggests, with the change to settled life it mt. be transferred to more permanent buildings. It is placed in Gilead (Nu. 32.[41]; Jg. 10.[4]); it is identd. with Argob and Bashan (Dt. 3.[4, 13ff.]), fm. wh. again it is clearly distinguished (1 K. 4.[13]). Guthe (KB.) thinks it may be the eastern or nomadic, as distinguished fm. the western or settled part of Jair's possession in Gilead (cp. Buhl, GAP., 79f., 118). See also Jair.

HAWK (Heb. netz), declared unclean (Lv. 11.[16];

Dt. 14.[15]). As in both cases the H. is followed by the phrase "after his kind," all species of that genus are included.

HAY (AV. Pr. 27.[25]; Is. 15.[6]; EV. 1 Cor. 3.[12]). The tr. is misleading. H. is never made in the East. Read uniformly "grass."

HAZAEL, an official in the court of Benhadad II., k. of Syria, whom God commissioned ELIJAH to anoint as successor to that monarch (1 K. 19.[15]). The commission was carried out by ELISHA (2 K. 8.[7ff.]), and he secured the throne by the murder of his master (v. 15). He carried on successful war with the contemporary kings of Isr., Jehoram, Jehu, and Jehoahaz. His name appears in the inscrs. of Shalmaneser, who claims to have defeated him. We may, however, doubt the completeness of the Asyr. victories, as the conflict had to be renewed again and again. He was succeeded by his s. Benhadad III. His reign prob. extended fm. c. B.C. 850 to 815.

HAZAR is the first element in many place names. (1) H. Addar, on the S. border of Can. (Nu. 34.[4]), poss. = HEZRON (Jo. 15.[3]). (2) H. Enan (Nu. 34.[9f.]; Ek 47.[17], 48.[1], "H.-enon"), on the N. border of Isr.: unidentd. (3) H. Gaddah (Jo. 15.[27]), placed by OEJ. (s.v. "Gadda") on the extreme boundary of Daroma, overlooking the Dead Sea; poss. = Masada (BJ. VII. viii. 1ff.). (4) H. or Hazer (RV.) Hatticon = H. Enon (Davidson on Ezekiel, 47.[16f.]). (5) Hazarmaveth, s. of Joktan (Gn. 10.[26]; 1 Ch. 1.[20]), whose name attached to a clan in S. Arabia. It survives in the mod. Ḥadramaut, a mountainous and fruitful district E. of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscrs. prove that in anct. times a great civilisation flourished there. (6) H. Shual, in the S. of Judah (Jo. 15.[28], &c.), reckoned to Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[28]), prob. = Tell es-Sāweh, 12 miles E. of Beersheba. (7) H. Susah (Jo. 19.[5] = 1 Ch. 4.[31], Heb. "Susim"), in Simeon: unidentd.

HAZAZON-TAMAR, "pruning of the palm" (Gn. 14.[7], AV. Hazezon-tamar, 2 Ch. 20.[2]). See EN-GEDI.

HAZEL (Gn. 30.[37], Heb. lūz) = ALMOND, RV.

HAZERIM (Dt. 2.[23]), read with RV. "villages."

HAZEROTH (Nu. 11.[35], &c.), a station in the desert wanderings commonly identd. with 'Ain Ḥadrah, a fountain in Wādy Ḥadrah, to the left of the main road fm. Jebel Mousa to 'Aqaba. The same place may be meant in Dt. 1.[1].

HAZOR. (1) The royal city of Jabin, formerly head of the neighbouring kdms., captured and destroyed by Joshua (11.[1ff.]). Fortified by Solomon (1 K. 9.[15]), it was taken by Tiglath-pileser III. (2 K. 15.[29]). It was in Naphtali (Jo. 19.[36]), S. of Kedesh (1 M. 11.[63, 73]), above the lake Semechonitis (Ant. V. v. 1) = el-Ḥūleh. The name seems to linger in Jebel and Merj el-Ḥadīreh, in the uplands, c. five miles W. of el-Ḥūleh. (2) A town in the S. of Judah (Jo. 15.[23]). (3) A town identd. with HEZRON (ib. 15.[25]). (4) A town in Benjamin (Ne. 11.[33]), poss. = Khirbet Ḥazzūr, c. one mile E. of Neby Samwīl. (5) A place in Arabia: unidentd. (Jr. 49.[28, 33]).

HAZOR-HADATTAH, "the new H." (Jo. 15.[25]). The text is doubtful. The name is omitted by LXX B.

HEAD. The term is used figuratively to signify the fr. or chief person in a family, tribe, &c. (Ex. 6.[14], 18.[25]; Nu. 1.[16]; Jo. 14.[1]; Eph. 5.[23], &c.); the chief city of a district (Jo. 11.[10]); the source, or beginning of a river, &c. (Gn. 2.[10], &c.); the top of a thing, e.g. a ladder (Gn. 28.[12]); the armed end of a tool or weapon, e.g. an axe (lit. "iron," Dt. 19.[5]), or spear (1 S. 17.[7], lit. "blade"). The H. is also used as a symbol of the man: to lift up a man's H. is to raise him fm. humiliation, e.g. out of prison to honour (Gn. 40.[20], &c.); to lift up the H. is to boast (Jb. 10.[15]), to recover fm. disaster (Jg. 8.[28], &c.), and to be refreshed (Ps. 110.[7]). To cover one's H. is to guard him fm. danger (Ps. 140.[7]). To smite or wound the H. is to destroy (Ps. 68.[21], &c.). The supreme importance of the H. doubtless led to the laying hands on it in blessing (Gn. 48.[14], &c.), and subsequently in ordination. In confessing sin hands were laid on the H. of the animal for sacrifice (Ex. 29.[15], &c.). The Jews swore by the H. (Mw. 5.[36]). The results of a man's evil deeds come on his own H. (2 S. 1.[16], &c.). The H. was often cut fm. an enemy slain in battle, and exposed as a trophy in the temple of the victor's god (1 S. 17.[51]; 1 Ch. 10.[10], &c.). Contempt and mockery are expressed by shaking the H. (Ps. 44.[14], 109.[25]; Mw. 27.[39], &c.). See also ANOINTING, MOURNING, NAZIRITE.

HEART. While the H. cd. not have for the anct. Hebs. the significance it possesses since the discovery of the circulation of the blood, it was recognised as an organ of central importance for the life of man; and greater value attached to it than to head or brain. It was regarded as the source of what is deepest and most influential in moulding char. and directing conduct. It was the organ of the activities by us associated with the intellect, affection, and will, e.g. of understanding (Jb. 34.[10]), kge. (1 K. 4.[29]), reflection (Hg. 1.[5]), memory (1 S. 21.[12]), purpose (1 K. 8.[18]), desire (Pr. 6.[25]), conscience (Jb. 27.[6]). We see therefore what is meant by God looking on the H. (1 S. 16.[7]), and the doctrine of Jesus that the H. determines the char. of the life (Mw. 12.[34], &c.). A change of H. (Ek. 36.[26]) means a renewal of the whole man.

HEARTH represents several Heb. words. (1) 'Aḥ, a vessel in wh. a charcoal fire is carried to heat apartments; in this Jehoiakin burned Jere-miah's roll (Jr. 36.[23]). It prob. resembled the Arb. tannūr, wh. may be of clay or metal, with a wide mouth. It is commonly set in a hollow in the middle of the floor, a practice that appears to be ancient. (2) Kīnōr, lit. " a fire pan " (Zc. 12.[6], RV.); it is frequently rendered " basin " or " laver " (Ex. 30.[18, 28], &c.). (3) Mōqēd (Ps. 102.[3]) may be a " fire-brand," or poss. " fire-place," fm. the root yāqad, " to burn." (4) 'Arī'ēl (Ek. 43.[18]) prob. means " hearth of God " (AV. " altar," RV. " hearth "). In Gn. 18.[6], AV. inserts the words " upon the hearth," to complete the definition of 'ūgōth, cakes wh. are baked by laying the dough on the H. fm. wh. the hot embers have been swept, and then drawing the embers over it.

HEATH (Heb. 'ar'ar, 'aro'er = Arabic 'ar'ar), a species of juniper found in the Edom range. There are no heaths in the desert (Jr. 17.[6], 48.[6]).

HEATHEN (gōyīm, " nations ") on Heb. lips always meant non-Isrs. (Lv. 25.[44], &c.), generally hostile to Isr., as servants of other gods.

HEAVEN (Heb. shāmayim, Aram. shamayin, Gr. οὐρανός, most frequently in pl. οὐρανοί). The Heb. word being in pl. (not dual), implies the idea of more than one H.; there was the H. of the clouds (1 K. 18.[45]), of the birds (Gn. 7.[23]); above this was the " firmament of H." (rāqīa'). It was regarded as a crystal sphere in wh. the sun, moon, and stars had their abode (Ps. 8.[3]). There is a yet loftier H. in wh. God is regarded as specially dwelling and specially manifesting Himself (Ps. 11.[4]; Dt. 26.[15]; 1 K. 8.[30]). There is no attempt to describe H. in the OT.; the angels are indicated as dwelling in H. (Jb. 1.[6], 2.[1]; 1 K. 22.[19]). In the Enoch bks. there is a great increase in the amount and definiteness of ideas concerning H. In the Apc. we have the NT. aspect of H. The ideas have yet greater definiteness. H. is presented in symbols that wd. be especially intelligible in Pal.; it is a city with a river through streets shaded with fruit trees; these streets are paved with gold, the gates are of pearl, and its foundations of precious stones; there is the sea of glass mingled with fire, and the Great White Throne. The most prominent distinction between the H. of the OT. and that of the NT. as seen in Rv. is the prominence given to the moral, " And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie " (Rv. 21.[27]). No longer are angels the only inhabitants, it is the redeemed fm. among men that are the most prominent: " They that are written in the Lamb's book of Life." The spirituality of the Johannean H. is implied in the statement: " The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." The idea of a multiplicity of Heavens was common among the Hebs., and is so far countenanced by the apostle Paul (2 Cor. 12.[2]).

HEAVE-OFFERING (SACRIFICE).

HEBER. (1) The ancestor of the Heberites (Gn. 46.[17]; Nu. 26.[45]), a clan of Asher. (2) The nomad Kenite who, being " at peace " with Jabin, moved fm. S. Pal. to the country of his ally (Jg. 4.[11]). In his tent Jael murdered Sisera. (3) A Calebite (1 Ch. 4.[18]). (4) A Benjamite (1 Ch. 8.[17]).

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. (1) Title.—This writing of the NT. bears in the best MSS. only the title " To the Hebrews." In all probability the original title given by the author was lost, and later transcribers gave this description to the work, influenced either by tradition or by the contents of the epistle itself. The writing has a strong local colouring, and was most likely addressed to a particular church and had a definite title; but it cannot be proved that the epistle bore the title " To the Laodiceans " or " To the Alexandrians," as has been suggested. The best MSS. do not give the remark found in the end of the English translation, " Written from Italy by Timothy."

(2) The First Readers.—We have little beyond the epistle itself to guide us in determining to whom the epistle was addressed. The transcribers regard the readers as Hebrews. The name Hebrew was used in a narrower and a wider sense. It was used to distinguish Jews from Gentiles (cp. 2 Cor. 11.[22]; Php. 3.[5]), but it was also applied to Jews of Pal. who spoke Aramaic in contrast to Greek-speaking Jews of the dispersion. As far as the inscription is concerned, all that we can gather is that the epistle was in the earliest times regarded as addressed to Christians of Jewish extraction, while the local colouring, and the absence of any refce. to Gentile members of the Church, would lead us to conclude that the epistle was directed to a church where Hebrew Christians largely predominated. Such has been the view held almost universally in the Church till a very recent date. Lately, however, the view has been brought forward, that those addressed were not of Jewish birth. It has been said that the writer regards Christianity as a continuous development of Judaism, and holds that all Christian believers are children of Abraham and heirs of the promises. It is contended that the exhortations given in the epistle do not sugg. that the people were in danger of falling back into Jewish ceremonialism, but rather of falling fm. all faith in God, judgment, and immortality (cp. 3.[12], 6.[1f.]), while the arguments fm. the OT. are no more prominent than those we find in other epistles addressed to Gentiles, e.g. the Epistle to the Galatians.

This view seems, however, quite untenable. The whole teaching of the epistle, the arguments and illustrations adduced, presuppose so intimate a knowledge of Jewish ideas, and such a familiarity on the part of the readers with the OT. Scrip., that we feel that had the readers been Gentiles they cd. not have understood the writing. We cannot but think with Westcott that this idea of Schürer, Weizäcker, Pfleiderer, Von Soden, and others, is little else than an "ingenious paradox."

But while it seems certain that the first readers were Christians of Jewish descent, it is difficult to fix on any particular body of Christians which suits all the details mentioned in the epistle. There are no traces of heathen converts among the people addressed. They had been converted to Christianity at a particular date by apostolic missionaries who had heard Christ Himself (cp. 2.[3]), and had performed signs and wonders (2.[4]; cp. also 10.[32]). They had evidently been converted long before the epistle was written. Their teachers had passed away (13.[7]), and they had had an eventful hist., passing through a period of persecution (10.[32]). Their early zeal had now waned (6.[10], 10.[34]). They forsook the worship of God (10.[25]), and were in danger of apostasy (2.[3], 10.[29]). The enthusiasm of their first love had passed. They had endured the spoiling of their goods and persecution fm. their own countrymen (10.[34]), but now they were counting the cost, and inclined to draw back. Individuals had, it seems, done so (12.[13-17]), and the church was in need of encouragement to faith, patience, and endurance.

(3) Place.—Where, in the anct. world, was such a community to be found? Various suggestions have been made. The refce. in the text, "they of Italy" (13.[24]), may imply either that the epistle was written in Italy, and that the writer sends the greetings of the church where he lived, or on the other hand, that the letter was addressed to a community in Italy, and the author was accompanied by Italian Christians who joined in greeting their brethren.

Accordingly Rome has been suggested as the destination of the epistle. This view has been supported by the fact that Clement of Rome at an early date was acquainted with the epistle. But Rome does not seem to suit the conditions. There may have been a synagogue of Christian Jews in Rome even after the expulsion of the Jews fm. Rome by the emperor Claudius, but the conception of Judaism and the OT. religion, as centring in sacrificial and priestly ordinances, seems to sugg. some place where Judaism wd. present itself with practical force under this aspect. Nor does it seem possible that the words of the epistle cd. be used of the Church of Rome at whatever date the epistle was written. In all probability the Roman Church was founded by the settling of Christian believers in Rome, and not by apostolic missionaries (cp. 2.[3]), while it could hardly be said of a church that had suffered under Nero, "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood" (12.[4]), and the description of the losses of the Hebrews (10.[33]) is, to say the least, a very mild way of describing the terrors of the Neronic persecution.

If it be necessary to assume that the people addressed were largely influenced by and intimately connected with Jewish ceremonial worship, two wide alternatives seem to meet the case. Either the epistle was addressed to a church of Syria or Pal., where the people were acquainted with the ritual of the Temple in Jrs., or it was sent to a community in Egp. where the worship of the Jewish temple in Leontopolis bulked largely in men's minds. Accordingly both Jrs. and Alexandria have been suggested as the destination of the epistle. Jrs. itself, however, is on various grounds impossible. The people there had, unlike the readers of our epistle, heard Christ Himself (cp. 2.[3]). They had endured martyrdom for the faith (cp. 12.[4]). It is unlikely that a writer cd., to a Jrs. audience, dispose so lightly of the whole of the OT. ritual as "standing in meats and drinks and divers washings" (9.[10]), and as "weak and unprofitable" (7.[18]). Nor can we believe that an audience in Jrs. wd. have been so much interested in Timothy (cp. 13.[23]).

The attempts to show that the epistle was addressed to Alexandria are not any more successful. The Jewish temple in Leontopolis may have been known to the writer, but his refces. regarding sacrifices apply rather to the tabernacle of Moses than to any existing temple either in Egp. or Pal. Alexandrian writers never sugg. that the epistle was addressed to them. On the whole the question must be left unsettled, but the conditions seem best satisfied by assuming that the epistle was destined for some Jewish Christian community in the East; and perhaps Antioch might suit the conditions best, as the church there was undoubtedly composed for the most part of Heb. Christians who spoke Gr., and was founded by apostolic missionaries who left Jrs. on the death of Stephen.

(4) Author.—Regarding the authorship of the epistle a like uncertainty obtains. Three traditions on the subject are to be found in the Church of the early centuries.

(a) The Roman tradition consistently maintains that the epistle was not the work of St. Paul.

(b) In North Africa we find the view that the author was Barnabas.

(c) In Alexandria the opinion prevailed that Paul was the author. Even in Alexandria, however, the difficulty of this view was felt by the fathers of the Church. Thus Clement tries to account for the difference in language and style from the accepted Pauline epistles, by assuming that the epistle was written by Paul in Heb. and translated by Luke, while Pantænus, who regards the work as Pauline, ingeniously seeks to account for the omission of the apostle's name.

By the time of Augustine the Alexandrian tradition had prevailed, and the epistle had come to be regarded as the work of St. Paul, and this view was held till the Reformation, when it was rejected by Erasmus, Luther, and Calvin. Luther suggested that the writer might be Apollos.

We can say with certainty that Paul was not the author. The weakness of the tradition is at once apparent, while the style, thought, and lang. are not Pauline. The writer is a master of pure idiomatic Gr. He delights in rhythmical sentences, pointed antitheses, and rhetorical effect. He sees the end of his argument clearly before him, and never turns aside fm. his main purpose, as is so usual in the Pauline dialectic. Paul's method of quotation fm. the OT. differs entirely fm. that of our author. The former quotes frequently direct fm. the Heb., and introduces his quotation with the phrase "as it is written," or "the Scrip. saith." The latter quotes always fm. the LXX, even when it differs entirely fm. the Heb. original, and his introductory phrases are, "He saith" (1.[5, 6, 7, 13]), or "some one somewhere testifieth" (2.[6]), or "as the Holy Spirit saith" (3.[7]), or "He testifieth" (7.[17]), phrases never used by Paul. Other essential diffces. occur in the construction of sentences and in the use of particles, wh., along with the marked diffces. in the mode of thought, show clearly that Paul cd. not have been the author.

Who, then, was the writer? It seems clear that he was a Hellenistic Jew, as he only quotes fm. the LXX and is a thorough master of the Greek lang. He was a student of the OT. as well as of Alexandrian philosophy, and is well acquainted with the ideas of Philo. He was also, however, a student of Paul, and had prob. read the Epistle to the Romans. His thought on the great subjects of the Christian faith is in harmony with that of St. Paul, but he writes fm. a different standpoint. While Paul regards Judaism as a system of law, the writer to the Hebrews regards it as a system of worship, while there are also traces of a radical diffce. in the nature of the religious experience of the two men. Paul passed to the new by an abrupt breaking with the old; the author of our epistle passes to the new by a gradual transition, and regards the new as the completion of the old. Some have imagined that the name of a writer of such outstanding ability as our author cd. not but be found in the NT., and various suggestions have been made, as Luke, Timothy, Priscilla, &c. Apollos, as Luther suggested, "an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures," may have been the author, though much might be said for the North African tradition wh. makes Barnabas the writer. It seems cert. that Barnabas did write an epistle, while it is certain that the so-called Epistle of Barnabas was not by his hand. Barnabas was a Levite, and naturally wd. be interested in ceremonial worship; although, on the other hand, it is doubtful if Barnabas cd. write 2.[3], and the description given of him in Acts 11.[24] does not sugg. that he was a man of any great ability.

(5) Date.—The epistle was evidently written to meet a great crisis wh. seems impending. The day of judgment is approaching (10.[25]). The epistle contains no mention of the fall of Jrs., wh., in view of the writer's argument, wd. be difficult to understand, had that event already taken place. We may date the epistle between A.D. 68 and 70, a view wh. also seems to be indicated by the mention of forty yrs. during wh. Isr. saw God's works (3.[9]). Forty yrs. fm. the beginning of the Church wd. bring us to the yr. 70, or thereby. Others, however, suppose that the fall of Jrs. was the reason wh. led the writer to show the imperfect nature of Jewish ordinances wh. had now ceased.

(6) Teaching of the Epistle.—The aim of the writer was to warn and encourage those Christians who, owing to the stress of the times, were inclined to fall away fm. their allegiance to Christ. With this in view he sets himself to prove the finality and the perfection of the Christian religion, and its superiority to Judaism. Christianity is the substance of wh. Judaism is but the type and shadow. It is the religion of free access to God, by means of an ever-living Mediator. It is the religion of the new covenant, wh. excels and supersedes the old. This new covenant has been brought in by Jesus Christ, and the writer seeks to show its superiority to the old by a series of contrasts. Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, is contrasted with the mediators of the old dispensation. He is superior (1) to the prophets, by whom God spoke of old; (2) to the angels, the ministers of the old dispensation; (3) to Moses; (4) to Aaron. He is the Son as opposed to the servants. He is the High Priest of the ideal, the Melchizedek type. His priesthood is universal, sovereign, eternal. But the work of this great High Priest is also perfect and final. The sacrifice He offered, in that He offered Himself through an eternal spirit to God, is a sacrifice of abiding efficacy and permanent value. It is able to cleanse the conscience fm. dead works to serve the living God. Nor does it need, like the sacrifices of old, to be repeated yr. by yr. By one offering He hath perfected for ever those that are sanctified. This Bearer of the new covenant is perfect in Himself as the Son. He was perfected by suffering. He is the perfect High Priest, the perfect Mediator and Intercessor, who, after He had offered a perfect sacrifice, entered into heaven itself, there to make intercession for us, just as the High Priest of old entered into the Holy Place once every yr. to make annual intercession for the people. Christ the perfect Intercessor makes "continual intercession for us." Fm. such a consideration of the perfect Mediator and His final and perfected work the writer goes on to appeal to the Hebrews to hold fast their profession. He shows how, by coming to the throne of grace, they may find help for every time of need. He gives a list of those who through faith overcame, and calls on his readers, being surrounded with such a cloud of witnesses, to run with patience the race that is set before them, to live the life of faith looking unto Jesus. The changing things of time, the passing away of earthly teachers, ought to teach them faith in Jesus Christ, who is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. The epistle closes with a chapter on the common duties of the Christian life.

HEBRON ranks as one of the oldest cities in the world, having been built seven yrs. before Zoan (Nu. 13.[22]; BJ. IV. ix. 7). It is represented by the mod. Khalīl er-Rahmān, "Friend of the Compassionate," i.e. Abraham (2 Ch. 20.[7]; Is. 41.[8]; Js. 2.[23]), genly. contracted to el-Khalīl. It is one of the few cities in Pal. built in a hollow. It lies in the upper end of the Vale that runs S'ward, c. 19 miles S. of Jrs. It is a typical Palestinian town, with some 20,000 inhabitants, of whom about 18,000 are Moslems, reputed fanatical; the rest are Jews. Vineyards are numerous on the slopes, and Hebron grapes are highly esteemed. The industries of glass-blowing and the making of skin "bottles" are pursued; there is also a considerable market. It is the meeting-place of four great roads: fm. Jrs., fm. Gaza, fm. Egp. by way of Beersheba, and fm. the Red Sea by the Arabah. It is the first town offering rest and security to travellers fm. the desert. The connection of H. with the patriarchs lends it a sacred char. It is one of the "holy cities" of the Jews, and is no less venerated by the Moslems. Over the traditional cave of Machpelah, where lies the dust of Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob, stands the famous mosque, carefully guarded by the Mohammedans. The site was formerly occupied by a Christian church. It is surrounded by a high wall, the lower part of wh. is of great antiquity. In recent yrs. a hospital has been established by the United Free Church of Scotland.

Hebron

The Vale of H., or Mamre (Gn. 37.[14]), opens in a fruitful plain to W'ward, where, by certain oaks, Abraham pitched his tent (13.[18], 14.[13], &c.). An oak long shown as that of Abraham died within the last few yrs. Rāmet el-Khalīl, two miles N. of H., is marked by the foundation of a large bldg., and a little further N. is the place called Beit el-Khalīl.

Two anct. pools are formed in the bed of the valley, W. of the mod. town, beside the lower and larger of wh. prob. the mangled bodies of Ishbosheth's murderers were exposed (2 S. 4.[12]). Qaṣr Hebrūn, on the W. slope, is identd. by the Jews with the tomb of Abner, in wh. was buried Ishbosheth's head (2 S. 3.[32], 4.[12]).

The cave was in Machpelah, a portion of land "before," i.e. E. of Mamre, wh. is H. (Gn. 23.[17, 19]). The anct. city therefore probably lay W. of the Vale. This inference is supported by ruins of great antiquity on the hill, er-Rumeideh, over agst. the mod. city.

As the act. stands, Joshua took H. and destroyed it (Jo. 10.[36f.], 14.[12ff.], 15.[13ff.]), certain of the old inhabitants being left. They were driven out by Caleb, to whom H. was given. The city was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Jo. 21.[11]) and made a City of Refuge (20.[7]). It shared the spoil of the Amalekites (1 S. 30.[31]). Here David reigned over Judah 7½ yrs. (2 S. 2.[11]), and was finally anointed over Isr. (5.[3]). H. was the rallying point in Absalom's rebellion (15.[7ff.]). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[10]) and reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[25]). Later it fell into the hands of the Edomites, fm. whom it was taken by Judas (1 M. 5.[65]; Ant. XII. viii. 6).

H. was so called fm. the Khabiri of the Tel el-Amarna Tablets (Hommel, Anct. Heb. Trad. 234), where the anct. name, Kirjath-arba, appears in the form of "Rūbūti" = "Roba'ot." The old inhabitants were of the giant race of Anak (Nu. 13.[22], &c.), of whom, accdg. to one rdg., Arba was the greatest. The text is suspicious. It is more natl. to take the name as given with the article (Gn. 35.[27]; Ne. 11.[25]), Q. hā'arba, "town of the four." Guthe (KB. s.v.) suggests the four roads. It poss. refers to a confederacy of four clans, of wh. the town was the centre. See Eshcol.

HEDGE. The terms so trd. denote an enclosure or fence, wh. may be of stone, with thorns fixed on the top, or entirely of thorns. A very common H. in mod. Pal. is of prickly pear.

HEIFER (Heb. 'eglāh, pārāh, the former the more usual), a young cow used for agricultural purposes, for treading out corn (Ho. 10.[11]) and ploughing (Jg. 14.[18]). Ritually the ashes of a "Red H." (pārāh) were used for the purification of one unclean through contact with the dead (Nu. 19.[2f.]). In the case of a murdered body being found, and no evidence being procurable as to the murderer, the elders of the nearest city purged themselves by slaying a H. (Dt. 21.[1ff.]). When Abraham made his covenant with God a H. was one of the animals slain and divided (Gn. 15.[9ff.]).

HEIR. In early Isr. all questions of transfer of property and succession were settled by anct. custom. The will as a written instrument does not appear till late, under Gr. and Rm. influences. The rule seems to have been that the firstborn s. by a legitimate w. (Gn. 21.[9ff.], &c.) succeeded to the position and responsibilities of the fr., taking a double share of his possessions as compared with what fell to younger sons. The rule was prob. subj. to many exceptions, since it was found necessary to restrain the fr. fm. giving to the son of a favourite w. the honour wh. custom regarded as rightly belonging to another (Dt. 21.[15ff.]). Cases are recorded in wh. the firstborn was deposed by the fr., and a younger son put in his place, e.g. the displacement of Esau, Reuben, and Manasseh. Ahithophel (2 S. 17.[23]) and others arranged the disposition of their property. Upon the H. devolved the duty of providing for his fr.'s wives and other women, his fr.'s property, now regarded as belonging to him. The children of concubines mt., if the fr. pleased, share the inheritance with the legitimate children; otherwise Sarah's anxiety wd. have been unreasonable (Gn. 21.[10]). Prob. the fr. usually discharged any felt responsibility for them by gifts during his life (Gn. 25.[6]); but, if he chose, they and their mr. mt. be simply sent away (Gn. 21.[14]). Legitimate children mt. do this after the fr.'s death (Jg. 11.[1ff.]). In some cases drs. were given a share (Jb. 42.[15]). Failing male heirs, the dr. mt. be married even to a slave in hope of obtaining a son (1 Ch. 2.[34f.]), the fr. being or becoming a member of the w.'s clan, to keep the family inheritance in its hands (Nu. 36.[6ff.]). Failing drs., a man's br. heired him; failing brs., his uncle; failing uncles, his nearest kinsman (Nu. 27.[5ff.]).

Succession to the throne rested ultimately on the people's will; but in ordinary circumstances the k. cd. appoint his heir, usually, but not always, his eldest son (2 Ch. 21.[3]; 1 K. 1.[30]).

HELAM, the city where David defeated the Syrians under Hadarezer (2 S. 10.[15ff.]). Guthe suggests Ḥalab, Aleppo.

HELBAH, an unidentd. town in the lot of Asher (Jg. 1.[31]).

HELBON, a place famed for its wine (Ek. 27.[18]) = mod. Ḥalbūn, 13 miles N. of Damascus, still noted for the excellence of its grapes.

HELDAI. (1) The captain of the guard in the Temple for the twelfth month (1 Ch. 27.[15]). He is called "the Netophathite," and may poss. be identical with Heleb (2 S. 23.[29]), or Heled (1 Ch. 11.[30]), son of Baanah, one of David's heroes. (2) One of a company who returned fm. the Captivity, fm. whom Zechariah was directed to take silver and gold, to make of these a crown, and set it on the head of Joshua, the High Priest. This was to be a memorial of the men who furnished the precious metals (Zc. 6.[10ff.]). Helem (v. 14) is a scribal error for Heldai.

HELEPH, an unidentd. town on the border of Naphtali (Jo. 19.[33]).

HELKATH, an unidentd. city allotted to the Levites in the territory of Asher (Jo. 19.[25], 21.[31]). For H. in 1 Ch. 6.[75] stands Hukok.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM ("field of sword edges"), the scene of battle near Gibeon (2 S. 2.[16]). Some read with LXX ח׳ הַצֹּדִים, "field of the crafty," i.e. "of the ambush."

HELL. As in Middle English H. meant "the state of the dead," the translators of AV. have used it freely to represent the Heb. shĕ'ōl and the Gr. ᾅδης. Occasionally shĕ'ōl is trd. "grave." In the OT. there is no distinct indication of the possession of any definite ideas in regard to the future punishment of the wicked; though not a few phrases in the Prophets point toward it (Is. 30.[33], &c.). With the rise of Apocalyptic, Jewish ideas concerning H. attained greater clearness. Especially is this the case in respect to the Enoch bks.; in that collection there is more than one description of the place of the lost; in Enoch it is specially prepared for the fallen angels (cp. Mw. 25.[41]). In the NT. there is a clearly marked distinction between the state of the dead (RV. "Hades") and the place of punishment (RV. "Gehenna"). It is to be noted that with the exception of Js. 3.[6] all the instances occur in the words of our Lord. The other NT. phrases are "outer darkness," "everlasting (Gr. aionios) fire," "everlasting punishment" (Gr. kolasin aionion); these are found in the Synoptics; in Rv. "the lake burning with fire and brimstone" is the phrase used by John.

It is a singular result of the action of one man that the desecration by Josiah of the place where his grandfr. had set up the image of Molech affords the word of execration to Mohammedans fm. Calcutta to Mogador.

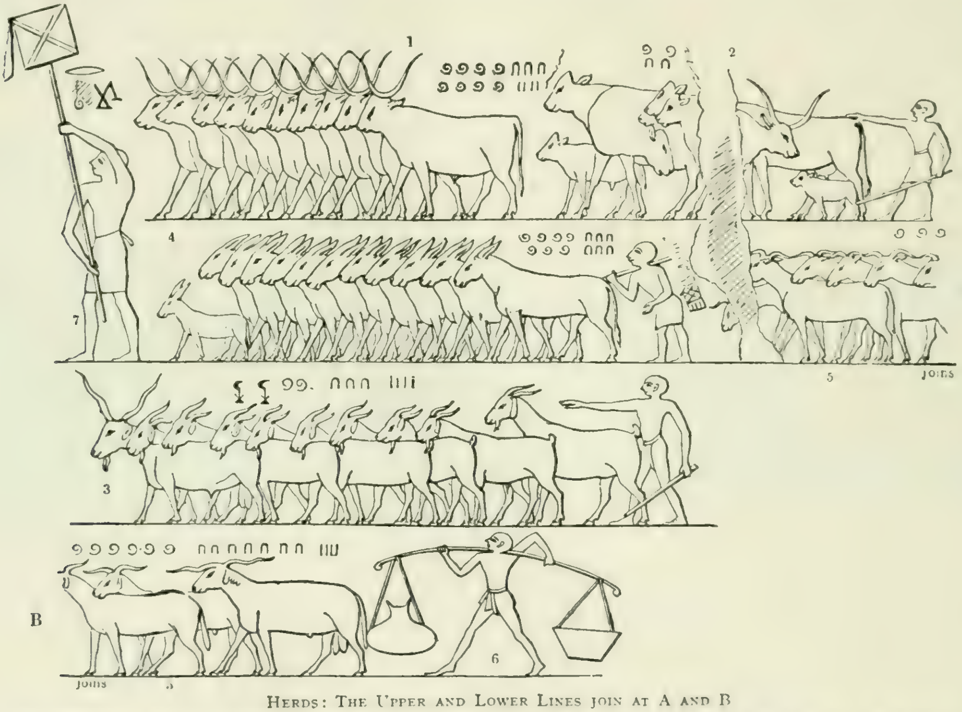
HEMAN. (1) One of the wise men of Solomon's time (1 K. 4.[31]) mentioned as of the tribe of Judah, with his brs. Ethan, Calcol, and Dara (Darda), sons of Zerah (1 Ch. 2.[6]). (2) One of David's singers, a Levite (1 Ch. 15.[17, 19], &c.), to whom Ps. 88. is ascribed by the superscription. From his mention with Ethan some think he may be identl. with (1).



Herds: The Upper and Lower Lines join at A and B

1. Long-horned oxen, with number above, 834. 2. Cows with calves, 220. 3. 3234 goats. 4. 760 asses. 5. 974 sheep. 6 represents man carrying calves in baskets. 7. Shepherd gives amount to steward.

HEMLOCK occurs only twice in AV. (1) La'ănāh (Am. 6.[12]), RV. Wormwood. (2) Rōsh (Ho. 10.[4]), RV. Gall.

HEN. See Cock.

HENA (2 K. 18.[34], 19.[13]; Is. 37.[13]), a Syrian town conquered by Asyr.: unidentd. Hommel (HDB.) thinks it may be a divine name, identical with the star name Al-han'a.

HEPHER. (1) An unidentd. Can. city named with Tappuah and Aphek. (2) A district in the neighbourhood of Socoh (1 K. 4.[10]). (3) A Gileadite son of Manasseh, fr. of Zelophehad and the Hepherites (Nu. 26.[32f.], 27.[1]; Jo. 17.[2f.]). See also 1 Ch. 4.[6], 11.[36].

HEPHZI-BAH ("in her is my delight"). (1) Mr. of Manasseh, k. of Judah (2 K. 21.[1]). (2) The name to be borne by restored Jerusalem in Messiah's day (Is. 62.[4]).

HERALD (Heb. kārōz, "a crier"), only used in Dn. 3.[4] of one who makes a proclamation. Of the H. in the Gr. or Rm. sense there is no trace among the Jews.

HERD. The commonest Heb. word for this is bāqār, "an ox" (Gn. 13.[5]; Ex. 10.[9]); more rarely miqneh, "possession," is used (Gn. 47.[17]), and 'ēder, "flock" (Jl. 1.[18]). Herdman (Heb. bōqēr, Am. 7.[14]; rā'āh, Gn. 13.[7]; 1 S. 21.[7]). Fm. the fact that cattle were so largely the wealth of the Israelite the H. was a prominent person, as may be seen in the story of Doeg.

It ought to be noted that Driver, following Graetz, wd. read rātzīm, "runners," in the title of Doeg instead of rā'īm, herdmen (1 S. 21.[7]). The diffce. in Heb. writing is small, רצים for רעים.

HERES. (1) Heb. har ḥereṣ (Jg. 1.[35]), a place in Dan, named with Aijalon and Shaalbim, therefore poss. a city. Ḥereṣ = Shemesh, "sun"; some have thought it another name for Beth-shemesh. (2) The ascent of H. (Jg. 8.[13], RV.): unidentd. The text is questionable. See Timnath Heres.

HERESY (Gr. haeresis). In the NT. this word means definitely a religious "sect." It is so trd. referring to the Pharisees, Sadducees, &c. (Ac. 5.[17], 15.[5], 26.[5]). It is applied to the community of Christians (24.[5], 28.[22]), or the "way," according to St. Paul, wh. his enemies called "a sect" (24.[14] RV.). Within the Church the sectarian spirit early manifested itself in "factions" (1 Cor. 11.[19] RV.). This is among the "works of the flesh" against wh. the Galatians are warned (Gal. 5.[20]). The damnable or destructive heresies (RVm. "sects of perdition") of 2 P. 2.[1] approach nearer to the later ecclesiastical meaning. The "heresies," however, are still within the Church, and are due to the introduction of false doctrine wh. emboldens men to follow "lascivious doings," thus bringing the truth into disrepute, and ensuring their own swift destruction.

HERMAS (abbreviated form of Hermodorus or Hermogenes), a Christian greeted by Paul (Rm. 16.[14]). In primitive times he was believed to have written The Shepherd, a work then regarded as of Scriptural authority. This, however, is untenable. He refers to Clement (B.C. 90–100) as his contemporary. The Muratorian Fragment makes him br. of Pius, and dates the writing c. A.D. 139. No certainty is possible.

HERMES, a Christian at Rome saluted by Paul (Rm. 16.[14]). Many slaves bore this name. H. may have been attached to the emperor's establishment.

HERMOGENES, mentioned by Paul (2 Tm. 1.[15]) as having with Phygellus turned away fm. him.

HERMON, MOUNT, in wh. the Antilebanon range culminates to the S., rises 9200 ft. above the sea, dominating all the land of Pal. Mighty reservoirs in the heart of the mountain, fed by the snow wh. lies on the heights great part of the yr., issue in the springs of Jordan at Ḥasbeiyeh, Bāniās, and Tell el-Qāḍy. It forms a ridge fm. 16 to 20 miles long fm. N. to S., rising about the middle into three distinct peaks, the two higher being to the E. Under the highest are the ruins of Qaṣr 'Anṭar, poss. an anct. sanctuary of Baal. The mountain dips steeply to the E., the lower slopes sinking gently into the plain of Damascus. To the W. the descent is more gradual into Wādy et-Teim: fm. the S. base fall away the rough uplands of the Jaulān. It is by far the most prominent feature of the landscape. The Phœnicians called it Sirion (Ps. 29.[6]), the Amorites Senir (Dt. 3.[9], &c.). It is called "the Hermons," fm. its triple summit (Ps. 42.[6], RV.). The moderns call it Jebel eth-Thalj, "Mount of Snow," or Jebel esh-Sheikh, "Mt. of the Chief" or "Old Man." The upper reaches are bare and barren, but the lower parts to the W. and S. are rich in vineyards and orchards, and the land is fertile. The wolf, the leopard, and the brown bear are still found in the mountain. It seems improbable that the Transfiguration took place on any part of Mt. H. The name Little Hermon attaching to Jebel ed-Duḥy, S. of Tabor, dates only fm. the Middle Ages.

HEROD, HERODIAN FAMILY. The founder of the Herodian family was an Idumæan named Antipater or Antipas. Jannæus made him governor of Idumæa, wh. his fr. Hyrcanus had conquered, forcing the inhabitants to become Jews. His s., also called Antipater, became a close friend of Hyrcanus, the elder son of Jannæus. Hyrcanus, a weak and indolent man, was seduced into giving up to his br. Aristobulus the High Priesthood, to wh., as elder s., he had the right. Antipater, however, roused the suspicions of his friend against his br., even to fear that he wd. aim at taking away his life, and led him to make his escape to Aretas, k. of Arabia. With the Arabian k. as an ally Hyrcanus shut up his br. in Jrs. and besieged him there. The Romans forced him to desist fm. the siege. As Pompey shortly after arrived in Syria both parties appealed to him. Antipater managed to win over Pompey to the side of Hyrcanus. The somewhat insolent bearing of Aristobulus also inclined Pompey to decide in favour of Hyrcanus. Aristobulus rebelled agst. this decision. Pompey marched agst. Jrs., into wh. Aristobulus had thrown himself. After a siege he captured it, and desecrated the Temple by entering the Holy of Holies. Soon after this Cassius, with the remnant of the army of Crassus wh. had been defeated by the Parthians, came into Judea. Antipater secured his favour.

Meantime the Civil War broke out and Pompey, the patron of Antipater and of Hyrcanus, was defeated at Pharsalia by Julius Cæsar. Antipater, however, by assisting Cæsar's lieutenant, Mithridates, in the Alexandrian War, gained the favour of the dictator. He made Hyrcanus Ethnarch of Judea and Galilee, and assigned to Antipater the position of Roman procurator. Antipater sent his s. Herod to Galilee as under governor, and appointed Phasael to the same position in Judea. Herod manifested the energy of his character in the ruthless vigour with wh. he put down the robbers—really Zealots—in Galilee. He was tried before the Sanhedrim for his cruelty, but surrounded by his soldiers he overawed the court into acquitting him.

Another change occurred. Julius Cæsar was assassinated in the Senate House by Brutus and Cassius. When the conspirators scattered to collect armies Cassius came again to Syria, and Herod at once got into favour with him. Antipater was assassinated by one Malichus, and the two sons were left to maintain their position as best they could. The defeat of Cassius and his associates at Philippi might have seemed to expose them to the vengeance of Antony, to whom the East, under the second triumvirate, was assigned. Again the Herodian charm triumphed, and H. became as great a favourite with Antony as he had been with Cassius. H. and Phasael were made tetrarchs of Judea. In order to strengthen his position H. was betrothed to Mariamne, the granddr. of Hyrcanus and of his brother Aristobulus.

New actors, however, appeared upon the scene. Antigonus, the s. of Aristobulus, who had taken refuge with the Parthians, induced them to take advantage of the disturbed condition of the empire to invade Syria and seat Antigonus on the throne in Jrs. By treachery they secured the persons of old John Hyrcanus and of Phasael. In order to render Hyrcanus incapable of being High Priest they cut off his ears, and they killed Phasael. H. escaped and removed his mother, his betrothed wife, and his relatives generally to Masada, while he himself made for Alexandria and thence to Rome. Once there, through the influence of Antony H. received the kdm. of Judea. He did not for some time get possession of his dominion, as Antigonus held Jrs., and the Parthian war hindered Antony fm. assisting him with troops. H., however, succeeded in conquering Galilee, and after celebrating at Samaria his marriage with Mariamne, he advanced against Jrs., captured it, and took Antigonus, who was beheaded by Antony at the instigation of H. As John Hyrcanus was incapacitated and his grandson too young for High Priesthood, an inconspicuous Ananelus (Hananeel) was made High Priest, only shortly to be dispossessed in favour of Aristobulus, the brother of Mariamne. Him H. had suffocated in a bath. H. was threatened with a danger fm. the side of Egypt. Cleopatra unsuccessfully importuned Antony to assign to her the dominions of H.

A new civil war arose, the second triumvirate having broken up, and Octavianus and Antony fought for the empire of the world at Actium. Octavianus (Augustus) was victorious. Again the Herodians had favoured the losing side. H. proceeded to Rome, gained the favour of Augustus, and returned to Judea with greater power than before.

Now began the tragedy of the Herodian family. Hyrcanus was murdered before H. went to make friends with Augustus. During his absence Mariamne discovered his orders that, shd. his embassy fail, she shd. be put to death. On his return she met him with scorn and recrimination. False charges were made agst. her by Herod's sr. Salome, and she and her mr. were put to death.

Externally all prospered with H. SAMARIA was added to his other dominions. He had to the full the taste for magnificence then so prevalent. To propitiate his new Samaritan subjects he erected a street of columns, many of which, altho' deprived of their capitals, still attest their former splendour. In compliment to Augustus he changed the name of Samaria to "Sebaste," the Gr. equivalent of "Augustus."

The village of Strato's Tower he enlarged into a city, supplied it with a harbour, and called it CÆSAREA. His greatest work, however, was rebuilding the Temple at Jrs. in the utmost splendour: the work was unfinished at his death.

Still the domestic tragedy went on: friend after friend, son after son, roused the suspicion of the bloodthirsty tyrant and were put to death. It was towards the end of his reign, when Herod was out of favour with Augustus, knowing that his people wished him dead, and without a friend he cd. trust, that Christ was born and wise men from the East came to worship Him. There is no word in Josephus of the Massacre of the Innocents at Bethlehem, but Macrobius, a heathen writer of the fourth Christian century, gives a confused reference to a massacre of two-year-old children under H.'s orders, in wh. a son of his own was killed. This mischance suggested the witticism of Augustus that it "was safer to be Herod's sow than his son." He lingered on after our Lord's escape into Egp., a miserable, disease-stricken old man. He had executed his two sons by Mariamne at the instigation of Antipater, his eldest s., and when nearing his end found that this eldest s. had not only falsely accused his brothers, but was conspiring against his father's life. Having got permission from Augustus, H. had him executed, and five days later the old tyrant passed away himself. He is called "H. the Great," but it may simply mean the "elder," as compared with his sons who had the same name. At the same time there was a grandiose magnificence about the man that renders the title "Great" not wholly inept. By his will, wh., with modification, was allowed by Augustus, his s. Archelaus, whom he had nominated as his successor, got Judea with the title of Ethnarch. Herod Antipas, his heir by a previous will, received Galilee and Perea with the title of Tetrarch, and Philip became Tetrarch of Iturea. Another Herod Philip lived in Rome as a private individual, who had married his niece Herodias, the dr. of his half-br. Aristobulus.

Archelaus proceeded to Rome to receive the kdm., but he had to meet the opposition of an embassy from Judea, a fact to wh. our Lord points in the parable of the pounds (Lk. 19.[14]). Augustus gave Archelaus Judea with the title of Ethnarch. He too faithfully acted, as did the nobleman of the parable, in slaughtering his enemies, and his rule was protested against repeatedly, until at the end of nine yrs. he was deposed by the emperor. He wd. be nearing the end of his reign when our Lord made His visit to the Temple as a child.

Herod Antipas is the most prominent of all Herod's sons in the Gospel narratives. He had many of the characteristics of his fr., cruel, lustful, magnificent, but in a less degree. The two portions of his tetrarchy were separated fm. each other by the territories of the Decapolis. He built a city on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, and wishing, like his father, to ingratiate himself with the reigning emperor, named it Tiberias. He had strengthened himself politically by marrying the dr. of Aretas, k. of Arabia. In his frequent visits to Rome he enjoyed the hospitality of his brother, Herod Philip, and repaid his kindness by wiling his wife away fm. him. It is, however, likely that this ambitious woman preferred to reign in Galilee to being the wife of a private person in Rome. This connection, wh. added the guilt of adultery to that of incest, was denounced by John the Baptist. For this boldness the Baptist was imprisoned and ultimately beheaded, the latter at the special instigation of Herodias, who seems to have been the Jezebel to Herod's Ahab.

Josephus says that John was imprisoned in the fortress of Machærus, E. of the Dead Sea, and that the execution took place there. But the birthday feast was made for "the chief of Galilee" (Mk. 6.[21]). It is difficult to believe that the chief inhabitants of Galilee were conveyed to that lonely fortress, four days' hard riding away fm. Galilee. Further, Machærus seems at this time to have been in the hands of Aretas,* the wrong done to whose dr. by the crime of Herod John had so boldly rebuked. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

* Jos. makes Herod send his wife, at her own desire, to Machærus, "wh. was subject to her fr." (Ant. XVIII. v. 1), she being then aware of his infidelity. In the next section (ib. 2) he says that Herod sent John as prisoner to Machærus. Aretas was not likely, in the circumstances, to act as custodian of Herod's political prisoners. There seems to be some confusion in the narrative.

Herod's lawful wife had left his house and betaken herself again to her fr. Only the power of Rome hindered Aretas fm. taking vengeance on Antipas for the dishonour done to his house. Meantime the figure of the murdered John haunts H.'s dreams, and when our Lord's preaching and miracles draw the multitudes then his uneasy conscience suggests that the Baptist has risen fm. the dead. He was eager to see Jesus, and when our Lord wd. not reply to his questions, or work a miracle to satisfy his curiosity, he and his soldiery mocked Him and set Him at nought. Shortly after the tragedy of Calvary Aretas invaded the territories of H. and inflicted a severe defeat on him. To get his revenge on Aretas H. endeavoured in every way to ingratiate himself with Tiberius. At length, some seven yrs. after the crucifixion, Tiberius died, and was succeeded by Caius Caligula, his step-grandson. Thinking to secure that his tetrarchy shd. be raised to a monarchy by the addition of his br. Philip's territory, and moved thereto by his wife, H. went to Rome to gain the favour of the young emperor. His nephew, H. Agrippa, however, had forestalled him, and voicing the complaints of the Galileans, secured the banishment of H. and his wife to Gaul (Ant. XVIII. vii. 2).

Next of the Herodians in prominence in the NT. is Herod Agrippa I., called usually "H. the k."

COIN OF HEROD AGRIPPA I.

He was the grands. of H. the Great by Mariamne, and so cd. claim descent from the Hasmoneans. Brought up in Rome in intimate association with the members of the Imperial House, he learned habits of reckless extravagance. Falling out of favour with Tiberius for a number of yrs. he led a vagabond life. He returned, however, to Rome, and ingratiated himself with Caius, the heir to the empire. Some indiscreet words, when in a chariot with Caius, indicating his desire for the accession of his friend, overheard by a slave and reported, led to his imprisonment. The opportune death of Tiberius saved him. Caius gave him the tetrarchies of Lysanius and of his uncle Philip. That of his uncle Antipas was added when he (Antipas) was banished, and the title k. was given him. Shortly after Judea and Samaria were added to his dominions. He thus entered into the kdm. of his grandf. He endeavoured to gain popularity with the Jews by scrupulous attention to all the prescriptions of the law. He is celebrated in the Talmud for his reverence for the law. In his efforts to secure Jrs. he built the wall to the N. Owing to interference by the Romans it was not quite completed at his death. In pursuance of his policy of currying favour with the Jews, he beheaded James, the s. of Zebedee, and imprisoned Peter with the view of treating him in a similar manner (Ac. 12.[2, 7]). Shortly after this, in receiving at an assembly in Cæsarea deputies from Tyre and Sidon, he was smitten with acute disease and died.* He certainly endeavoured to benefit the Jews. His noblest action was his successful opposition of the mad design of Caligula to set up his statue in the Temple at Jrs.—an opposition that was highly hazardous, as the project was the freak of a madman. His daughters Bernice and Drusilla both appear in the Scripture nar. His s., Herod Agrippa II., on the death of his fr. received the small principality of Chalcis with the title of k. He was a weaker character than his fr., but endeavoured to pursue the same policy. Before the outbreak of the Jewish War, wh. ended in the capture of Jrs. by Titus, Agrippa used every effort to stave off the calamity, but in vain. He retired to Rome, and died probably in Rome about the end of the first Christian cent. Paul was brought before him by Festus when he had come to welcome Festus to his new governorship. Tho' his moral char. left much to be desired, he was for a Herodian a fairly good man. The best of the Herodians appears to have been Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis. He seems to have ruled with moderation and acceptance (Ant. XVIII. iv. 6). Perhaps the fact that the population of his tetrarchy was mainly Greek or Syrian rendered it easier to rule gently. He beautified Paneas and changed its name to Cæsarea, to wh., to distinguish it fm. that greater Cæsarea on the coast, was added the name Philippi, after its founder. He is only named in the NT. once (Lk. 3.[1]). The function of the Hn. family was to promote steadfast allegiance to Rome, and their intercourse with the Romans tended to break down effectively the exclusiveness of the Jews and bring them into the Imperial system, so opening the way for the wider freedom of Pauline Christianity.

HERODIANS, a sect only known to us fm. the Gospels (Mw. 22.[16]; Mk. 3.[6], 12.[13]). It is not certain what their tenets were; that they were a political party primarily seems prob., but the refce. to the "leaven of Herod" implies religious doctrines as well.

HERODIAS, granddr. of Herod the Great. She married first her uncle, Herod Philip, but, as he was not a sovereign, deserted him for her uncle Antipas. She instigated the murder of John the Baptist. Her dr. Salome, who was the instrument of her vengeance, married her uncle, Herod Philip, Tetrarch of Iturea.

HERON (Heb. 'ănāphāh), a bird declared unclean (Lv. 11.[19]; Dt. 14.[18]). It is uncertain what bird is meant; there are several species of H. known in Pal.

Heron

HESHBON, the royal city of Sihon, k. of the Amorites (Nu. 21.[25], &c.), fortified by Reuben (32.[37]), on the S. border of Gad (Jo. 13.[26]), to whom it is reckoned as a Levitical city (21.[39]). It appears later as a city of Moab (Is. 15.[4]; Jr. 48.[2], &c.). It was held by Jannæus (Ant. XIII. xv. 4). Jos. calls the country Essebonitis (ib. XV. viii. 5; cp. BJ. II. xviii. 1). It is ident. with the mod. Ḥesbān, in the mountains over agst. Jericho, c. 16 miles E. of Jordan. The existing ruins are mostly Rm. The spring in the valley forms pools (SS. 7.[4]). The city is approached fm. the valley by a steep path, through a cutting, wh. may have been closed by a gate (Conder, Heth and Moab, 142). On a ridge to the W., el-kurmīyeh, dolmens and stone circles are found (Musil, Arabia Petræa, i. 383ff.).

HETH. See Hittite.

HETHLON, a place named only in Ek. 47.[15], 48.[1], in his description of the future frontiers of Israel's land, as on the N. boundary. It is associated with Zedad and the "entering in of Hamath" (cp. Nu. 34.[8]). This seems to point to the ident. suggested by Furrer, with Ḥeitala, to the NE. of Tripoli. Some (Von Kasteren, Buhl, and others) are inclined to place it at 'Adlūn, N. of the river Qasimiyeh; but this seems too far to the S.

HEZEKIAH ("J". hath strengthened," or "strengtheneth") at 25 yrs. of age succeeded his fr. Ahaz, k. of Judah (2 K. 18.[1f.]). The fall of Samaria is placed in his 6th yr. (v. 10); his accession wd. therefore be in B.C. 727. But Sennacherib's invasion, B.C. 701, is placed in his 14th yr. (v. 13). This wd. date his accession in B.C. 715. The earlier date agrees with the statement that he was a contemporary of Micah (1.[1]), who prophesied before the destruction of Samaria (v. 6). The discrepancy cannot at present be explained.

The events of his reign are prob. not recorded in chronological order, but the youthful enthusiasm of one with his disposition and char. may well have found immediate expression in the reformation of relg. (2 Ch. 29.[3]). Accdg. to the Chronicler the Northern tribes still occupied their country (30.[5ff.]). Others think H.'s reforming zeal was connected with the deliverance fm. SENNACHERIB. He had the high places restored, the pillars and Asherah broken; and the brazen serpent of Moses, wh. had become an obj. of superstitious reverence, he brake in pieces, calling it nehushtan, "a bit of copper." The Temple was cleansed and the service reorganised. The destruction of the high places, images, &c., by the people who had gathered to Jrs., extended to the Northern Kdm. (2 K. 18.[4ff.]; 2 Ch. 29. f.). Despite the relapse under Manasseh, the work then done laid the foundations for Josiah's thorough-going reform.

For a time H. preserved the tributary alliance with Asyr. inherited fm. his fr. On the death of Sargon discontent long felt broke out, and took body in a league of the peoples along the Syr. seaboard, to oppose Asyr., relying upon help fm. Egp., a reliance ridiculed by Isaiah (30.). Prob. at this time Merodach Baladan, who had recovered for a brief space the monarchy of Bab., sent ambassadors with gifts to Jrs., to strengthen the league agst. the common enemy, Asyr. Sennacherib's account of his victorious march against the cities in this league is recorded on the Taylor cylinder. There was a pro-Asyr. party, to wh. belonged Padi, k. of Ekron. The patriots had handed him over to H., but at Sennacherib's request he was set free. The defeat of the allies at Eltekeh, the capture of many cities of Judah, the deportation of a great portion of the population, and the apparent certainty of the fall of Jrs. itself, compelled H. to sue for terms of submission. He purchased immunity fm. immediate attack by a payment of 30 talents of gold and 300 talents of silver, stripping off, for this purpose, the gold ornaments of the Temple.

It was prob. on a second campaign (689), that Sennacherib sent his boastful and threatening embassy to Jrs. Strongly supported by Isaiah, H. took up an attitude of trust in God, amply vindicated by the swift destruction of the boaster's army, and his return to his own city, only to fall by the hands of his own sons (2 K. 18.[17]–19.; 2 Ch. 32.[9ff.]; cp. Herod. ii. 141). This left H. free to work for the safety of the country, and the welfare of the people. The captured cities wd. be reconquered, and to this time may belong the successful war with the Phil. (2 K. 18.[8]). He fortified the city and initiated works of public utility, e.g. in relation to the water supply. Under him the famous SILOAM tunnel may have been made. He was a man of literary interests and poetic gifts (Pr. 25.[1]; Is. 38.[9]). His grievous sickness and recovery, accompanied by the miraculous sign (see DIAL), are related as showing God's special favour. His memory is held in highest honour among the Jews, and their Rabbis have always regarded Is. 9.[1ff.] and 11.[1ff.] as referring to him.

HEZION, the grandfather of Asa's contemporary, Ben-hadad, king of Damascus (1 K. 15.[18]). The name is prob. corrupt. Winckler would read "Hazael," wh. may be correct. Others (Ewald, Thenius, Klostermann) think "Hezron" to be the original, of which "Rezon" (1 K. 11.[23]) is another form.

HEZRON. (1) Jo. 15.[3], poss. = HAZAR 1. (2) Jo. 15.[25] = HAZOR 3 (see KERIOTH 2). The name may linger in Jebel Hadîreh, S. of Beersheba. (3) A s. of Reuben (Gn. 46.[9]). (4) A s. of Perez (Gn. 46.[12]).

HIDDEKEL (Asyr. Diglath, mod. Digleh), the Tigris; it rises in Armenia in a mountain lake not far fm. the source of the EUPHRATES. It flows SE., parallel to the Euphrates, and unites with it not far fm. where they both fall into the Persian Gulf. The H. is one of the four rivers of Paradise (EDEN).

HIEL, the Bethelite who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 K. 16.[34]) and endured the curse of Joshua (Jo. 6.[26]). Some have thought that H. sacrificed his sons, placing the first under the foundation, and the last under the threshold of the city. But the language seems rather to imply death for them by misadventure during the work.

HIERAPOLIS (Col. 4.[13]), mentioned only once in Scrip., a city of Phrygia, on the Lycus, c. six miles N. of Laodicæa. It was famous for its hot springs, greatly valued for medicinal purposes. The alum wh. the water contains quickly precipitates, so that the steep rocks over wh. it flows, S. of the city, have been transformed "into the appearance of an immense frozen cascade." Leto was the goddess of the city (Strabo, 469f.). Near the anct. site stands the mod. vill. Pambuk Kalesi. See Ramsay, Cities and Bishopricks of Phrygia, index.

HIGH PLACES (Heb. bāmōth). While it was believed that a god might be worshipped wherever he dwelt, or at any spot where he had shown himself (see ALTAR), the sanctuaries of the Canaanites were mostly in conspicuous places. This prob. explains why the name "high place" came to be attached to any seat of idolatrous worship. Thus we find H. P. used as equivalent to "sanctuary" (Am. 7.[9]), and even the centres of the Baal cult in the valley of Hinnom are called H. Ps. Most interesting accounts of the high place at GEZER are found in the PEFQ. 1903, p. 23ff., &c. Scrip. contains many illustrations of the association of divine worship with mountains, and one of the most important discoveries of recent yrs. is that of the high place on the height at Petra, where altar, steps, court, &c., are carved out of the living rock, on the summit.

In the confusion of the times of the Judges, while the supremacy of the central hearth of the nation was recognised theoretically, the sacrifices of the whole people were not restricted to one altar. Each tribe and family had its own high place. These were frequently anct. Canaanitish shrines, connected fm. hoary antiquity with the impure rites of the heathen Amorites. These unholy associations exercised a baneful influence, tending to degrade the worship of Jehovah there to the level of that of Baal. This led the prophets to lay emphasis upon the Deuteronomic legislation.

In accordance with what we find elsewhere in antiquity, there must always have been the central altar to symbolise the unity of the nation; but in these early times the exclusive sanctity ascribed to it had not the same sanction. It is not impossible that "the second giving of the law" (Deuteronomy) contained most of the enactments now found in it. But during the period of the Judges frequent foreign domination added much to the perils of travel, and the regulations fell into abeyance. Something not unlike this happened in Christendom, when, despite the Second Commandment, and the contempt poured by the primitive fathers upon idols, image-worship became universal.

Elijah and Elisha did not endeavour to reform the modes of worship. They were concerned with a more important matter, viz., the Person to be worshipped. In like manner, neither Wycliffe nor Huss denounced image-worship. Amos and Hosea declared the sinfulness of worship in high places (Am. 4.4; Ho. 8.11). Hezekiah was the first who resolutely set himself to put down the H. Ps. (2 K. 18.32), but his work was undone by Manasseh his s. Josiah zealously renewed the efforts of his great grandfr. The hist. of the Bks. of Kings is written exclusively fm. the prophetic standpoint; hence it is mentioned as a blemish in the rule of even such a monarch as Jehoshaphat, that "nevertheless the H. Ps. were not taken away" (1 K. 22.43). The captivity in Bab., and the destruction of the Temple on Mt. Zion, occasioned the rise of synagogue worship (see SYNAGOGUE), and after the return fm. Bab. there is no further mention of high places. Isr. cd. still worship, even when hindered from going up to the Temple. The facts regarding that time brought to light in the documents recently discovered at Assouan, and also the action of Onias some three cents. later, prove that the Israelites held it right to set up a Temple to J". wherever they were in sufficient numbers.

HIGH PLACE AT PETRA

There are many curious customs, possibly survivals of the primitive cult, connected with local sanctuaries in the East to-day. These latter may in many cases be identical with the high places of antiquity (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day).

Lit.: The Lit. is extensive, but specially important are Robertson's The Early Religion of Israel; Wellhausen's Proleg. to the Hist. of Isr.; and Robertson Smith's RS.

HIGH PRIEST. See LEVI, &c.

HILKIAH ("the portion of J"."), the High Priest who found the bk. of the law in the Temple

wh. inspired and directed the reforms of Josiah (2 K. 22.$^{8ff.}$; 2 Ch. 34.$^{8ff.}$). See also 2 K. 18.^{18}; 1 Ch. 6.^{45}; Ne. 8.^{4}; Jr. 1.^{1}, 29.^{3}.

HILL. (1) Gib'ah (1 K. 14.^{23}, &c.) denotes a hill standing apart, and is never used of a range. It is uniformly trd. "hill" (see further GIBEAH).

ANCIENT DOOR HINGES AND SOCKETS

(2) Har may be either a single hill (1 K. 11.^{7}, &c.), a mountain range (Ps. 68.^{15}, &c.), a definite part of a range (Jo. 17.^{15}, &c., see MOUNT), or a mountainous district (Jo. 13.^{6}, &c., in wh. cases RV. genly. trs. Hill Country). (3) 'Ophel, "a swelling" (2 K. 5.^{24}, see OPHEL). In NT. (Mw. 5.^{14}; Lk. 4.^{29}, 9.^{37}, RV. "mountain"), H. stands for oros, lit. "mountain."

HIN. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HIND. See HART.

HINGE. In ancient times the H. was always made by a pivot and socket above and below; sometimes the socket was of metal set in the stone, sometimes a hole was cut in the stone of the threshold or lintel. In the Ḥaurān anciently doors were made of slabs of stone cut so as to leave pivots projecting at top and bottom. Such a door may be seen in Ṣeffūrieh (Sepphoris), dating fm. Christian times.

HINNOM (or HINNAM), an unknown person after whom (Jo. 15.^{8}, 18.^{16}; Ne. 11.^{30}), or his son (Jo. 15.^{8}, 18.^{16}; Jr. 7.$^{31f.}$, 19.$^{2, 6}$, 32.^{35}; 2 Ch. 28.^{3}, 33.^{6}), or his sons (2 K. 23.^{10}, EV. "children"), a valley S. of Jrs. was named. In Jr. 2.^{23} it is simply "the valley." It appears in the name, "the gate of the valley" (see JERUSALEM). From Jo. 15.^{8}, 18.^{16} it is clear that mod. Wādy er-Rabbābi is intended. The name, however, must have covered part of the large basin at the junction of this valley with the Kidron (see TOPHET). The valley was dry, i.e. watered by no spring, and formerly even treeless (En. 26.^{4}). For the pools, not mentioned in the Bible, in the upper part and at the head of the valley, see JERUSALEM. For the high place at its issue into the Kidron see TOPHET. Jeremiah's prediction that it shd. be called "the valley of slaughter," or "of the slain" (7.^{32}, 19.^{6}, corrected text), together with Is. 66.^{24}, gave foothold to the notion that this valley, with the lower part of the Kidron, shd. become the place of eternal damnation (En. 27.$^{7ff.}$), wh. accdgly. was called "Gehenna" (= gē Hinnam, "valley of Hinnom" [Mw. 5.^{29}, RV. "hell"]). In the fourth cent. this name was applied to the whole Kidron valley E. of Jrs. As Wādy en-Nār, "valley of hell fire," it is still used for the lower reaches of the same valley.

HIRAM, Hirom (1 K. 5.^{10}, &c.), Huram (2 Ch. 2.^{11}, &c.). (1) S. of Abibaal, k. of Tyre. After the capture of Jrs. he assisted David in building his palace, with cedar and workmen (2 S. 5.$^{11ff.}$). The cordial relations established with David H. sought to maintain with Solomon (1 K. 5.^{1}), and this with entire success. His skilled artisans assisted in building the Temple and Solomon's palace, cedar and fir being brought fm. Lebanon (1 K. 5., 6., 7.), Solomon giving him annually large quantities of oil and wheat, besides presenting him with cert. cities in Galilee; Hiram giving in return 120 talents of gold (1 K. 9.$^{10ff.}$: the statements in 2 Ch. 2.$^{3f.}$, 8.$^{1f.}$ differ considerably). The friendship of the monarchs was doubtless strengthened by copartnery in commercial enterprise, the success of wh. wd. be largely due to the skill of Tyrian sailors (1 K. 9.$^{26ff.}$, 10.$^{11, 22}$; 2 Ch. 8.$^{17f.}$, 9.^{21}). The reign of H. was one of great splendour. Accdg. to Rawlinson (Hist.

He greatly extended and adorned the city of Tyre, and under his direction the Tyrian people grew rich and prosperous. (2) A skilful artificer in metal work, who cast the great pillars of brass (bronze ?), and prepared the metal ornaments and utensils for the Temple (1 K. 7.[13ff.]; 2 Ch. 2.[13ff.]). His fr. was a Tyrian, and his mr. an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (2 Ch. 2.[14]) or of Naphtali (1 K. 7.[13]).

HITTITES, the (חִתִּים, Χετταῖοι), Khatâ, Khatti in cuneiform, Khata in Egyptian, a people whose original seat was in eastern Asia Minor, but who played a great part in the history of Syria. When the Assyrians first became acquainted with Syria and Palestine they formed so dominant an element in the population as to cause the old Babylonian title, "land of the Amorites," to be replaced by "land of the Hittites." Even as late as the age of Sennacherib the Assyrian campaign against Phœnicia and Judah is stated to have been made against "the land of the Hittites." Hence in Gn. 10.[15] "Heth" occupies the first place among the races and tribes of Canaan. In Nu. 13.[29] the Hittites are described along with the Jebusites and Amorites as dwelling "in the mountains," in opposition to the Amalekite Beduin in the southern desert, and the Canaanites on the sea-coast and in the Jordan valley.

The "sons of Heth" (בְּנֵי חֵת), from whom Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah, correspond with the "sons of the god Khatu" of the native texts, and must therefore have been a Hittite tribe settled at Hebron. The painted pottery found in the pre-Israelitish strata of Lachish and Gezer has been traced by Prof. J. L. Myres to Cappadocia, and shown to be of Hittite origin (Jnl. Anthropological Institute, xxxiii. pp. 367 sqq.), and a stela in the Louvre (C. 1) belonging to the beginning of the 12th dynasty refers to "the palaces of the Hittites" in southern Palestine, tho' the ethnic meaning of the name in this passage is denied by some Egyptologists. A Hittite army invaded Babylonia as early as the Abrahamic age, and the astrological texts of the same period associate "the king of the Hittites" with "the king of the Amorites" or Canaan. The people of Ashkelon are still depicted with Hittite features in a bas-relief at Karnak of the time of the 19th dynasty. The Hittites of the Israelitish period of Hebrew history are confined to the north. The Canaanite who betrayed Beth-el built the town of Luz among them (Jg. 1.[26]); the merchants of Solomon traded in horses between Egypt and "the kings of the Hittites" (1 K. 10.[28, 29]), and the king of Samaria was supposed to have "hired the kings of the Hittites" against its panic-stricken assailants (2 K. 7.[6]). A probable correction of the text, based upon Lucian's recension, transforms the unintelligible Tahtim-hodshi of 2 Sam. 24.[6] into "the Hittites of Kadesh," the southern capital of the Hittite empire.

The history of the Hittites has been in part recovered, first from the inscriptions of Egypt and Assyria, and now from their own monuments. Their primitive seat was in Cappadocia and the Taurus mountains. They were thick-set and muscular, with large, protrusive jaws and nose, high cheek-bones, fairly prominent eyebrows, hairless face, and retreating forehead and chin. Their excessive prognathism distinguishes them among the populations of Western Asia. They wore pigtails and tunics wh. descended to the knees, mantles wh. came down to the ankles, and mountaineers' boots with upturned toes. These latter, originally intended for walking thro' snow, were retained by them even in the hot plains of Syria. The usual head-dress was a sort of skull-cap, but the priests, like the figures of the gods, wore a high-peaked mitre, wh. was also often adopted by the king, and in the case of the High Priest was of an elaborate description. The dirk was used, but not the sword, along with the spear, bow, and arrow.

The Hittite language, wh. seems to have been divided into several closely-allied dialects, was related to those of the proto-Armenian (Vannic) and Mitannian cuneiform inscriptions, and was probably of Caucasian origin. The type is "Asianic," like that of the other pre-Aryan languages of Asia Minor. Like the modern Georgian, it was inflectional, and in many respects presented striking resemblances to the Indo-European languages. Thus (as in Vannic and Mitannian) the nominative and accusative sing. of the noun ended in -s and -n, the acc. pl. in -s, the first and third person sing. of the verb in -i, -wi, or -u and -t, while the possessive pronouns were mi-s, ta-s, and sa-s. It was, nevertheless, not a member of the Indo-European family of speech.

The native monuments are scattered over the larger part of Asia Minor, from the frontiers of Armenia to Lydia, as well as over northern Syria as far south as Hamath. Most of them are accompanied by inscriptions in a peculiar hieroglyphic system of writing, wh. was probably invented in Cappadocia. The hieroglyphs, however, were for the most part reserved for monumental purposes, the ordinary literary script being the cuneiform, adopted from the Assyro-Babylonian settlers in the neighbourhood of Kaisariyeh, where they had been established as early as the Abrahamic age. The ruins of Boghaz Keui, north of the Halys, the site of the capital of the Hittite empire, contained two libraries of clay tablets inscribed with cuneiform characters, hundreds of wh. have now been disinterred. Most of the texts are in the native language, but for documents of an international nature, like the Hittite copy of the treaty between Khattu-sil and Ramses II., Assyrian is used. And even the native texts are filled with words and phrases borrowed from Assyrian.

The standard Babylonian work on astrology shows that already in the Abrahamic age "the king of the Hittites" was a power, and the Hittite invasion of Babylonia in B.C. 1900 seems to have brought about the fall of the dynasty to wh. Khammu-rabi (Amraphel) belonged. Eastern Asia Minor was rich in metals wh. had long since been exported to Syria and Babylonia; already in the age of the 6th dynasty gold was brought from thence to Egypt; and it was from the same region that bronze appears to have made its way to the south and east. In the wake of the trader came the soldier, and the Tel el-Amarna tablets reveal to us a Canaan filled with Hittite free-lances, who sold their services to the highest bidder and, while professing allegiance to the Egyptian government, carved out principalities for themselves. Thus Labbawa, from the neighbourhood of Aleppo, established himself at Shechem, and the sons of Arzawaya (from Arzawa in Cappadocia) in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, whose king bore a Hittite name and had the Hittites of Kas (Cappadocia and Cilicia) in his pay. Ezekiel (16.[3, 45]) was therefore justified in describing the "mother" of Jerusalem as a Hittite, and the Hittite descent of Uriah (2 Sam. 23.[39]) and Ahimelech (1 Sam. 26.[6]) can be accounted for. The decay of the Egyptian empire enabled the Hittites to make themselves masters of Syria as far south as the northern borders of Palestine, and establish their southern capital at Kadesh on the Orontes. Under Khattu-sil I. and his successors, Subbi-luliuma (who corresponded with Amon-hotep IV. c. B.C. 1380), Mur-sil, and Khattu-sil II., a great empire was founded wh. extended from the shores of the Ægean to the frontiers of Egypt, with its capital at "the city of the Hittite god," now Boghaz Keui. Here temples and palaces were erected, enclosed by a stone wall of great length, and in a rocky ravine (Yasili Kaia) near the city bas-reliefs were cut representing the figures of the deities in human form and the rites with wh. they were worshipped. The empire was based on a confederacy of nine Hittite states. The contest between the Hittites and Egyptians for the possession of Syria was finally brought to an end in the 21st year of Ramses II. (c. B.C. 1280), when a treaty was concluded between him and Khattu-sil II. defining the boundaries of the two empires and guaranteeing immunity to the political refugees of the two countries. The treaty left Canaan in the hands of Egypt. The Hittite empire seems to have been broken up by the movement of the northern tribes of Greek or Thracian origin wh. took place about B.C. 1200; henceforward it was represented by a number of separate independent states, of wh. the best-known were that of the Khatti-nâ on the Gulf of Antioch and the Lydia of the Herakleid dynasty. In Asia Minor the Hittites were called upon to struggle against the Thraco-Phrygians; in Syria against the Aramæans and Assyrians. The capture of Carchemish (Jerablûs), wh. commanded the ford of the Euphrates and the high-road of commerce from east to west, marks the final fall of Hittite power. It was taken by Sargon B.C. 717 and made an Assyrian satrapy.

Hittite religion was a nature-worship, the chief object of wh. was the Earth-goddess or "Great Mother." Rites were performed in her honour symbolising the mysteries of marriage and birth, and she was served by multitudes of eunuch priests. Along with her son, who was also her husband, she formed a sort of trinity, the conception of wh. was probably derived from Babylonia. Originally the objects of worship were fetishes—bull-heads, the chariot, the sacred tree, the sacred dirk, the sacred stone, columns and poles and the like—but contact with Babylonian culture introduced the idea of deities in human form, of whom the fetishes and sacred animals were symbols. Each city or state was a divinity and represented a special form of the Earth-goddess. By the side of the deified state stood the Sun-god, who seems to have been identified with it. The mountains and rivers were also accounted divine. By eating and drinking at a table before the image of the deity the worshipper was believed to participate in the divine nature. The "asylum" or city of refuge was a Hittite institution.

Hittite art was derived from Babylonia, but modified in a special way. It is characterised by a peculiar roundness and thickness of outline, and tho' vigorous, is heavy and at times clumsy. It shows a particular fondness for animal forms wh. are often composite. Thus the centaur, like the winged horse, passed from Babylonia to Greece thro' Hittite hands. The Hittites were metallurgists from an early period; their work in silver was especially skilful, and their hieroglyphs were originally embossed on metal plates, the characters being afterwards imitated in relief on stone. The painted pottery of the eastern basin of the Mediterranean, in wh. red plays a prominent part, has been traced to their primitive seat in Cappadocia, where the red ochre was found. Their buildings were of unmortared stone, not of brick, and the remains at Boghaz Keui show that in the Mosaic age their architectural designs rivalled those of Assyria or Egypt.

HIVITE. A Canaanitish race expelled by the Israelites (Jo. 24.^{11}); they seem to have dwelt in central Pal.; e.g. GIBEON (Jo. 9.^{7}) and SHECHEM (Gn. 33.^{18}) were H. cities. The origin of the name is doubtful; the sugg. that H. simply means "villager" is contradicted by their dwelling in large cities such as Gibeon and Shechem. They seem to have had a settlement in Cœlosyria, between Lebanon and the Antilibanus (Jo. 11.^{3}; Jg. 3.^{3}).

The suggested various reading cf "Hittite" instead of H. in these passages "from geographical reasons" has no weight with those who know how Kurdish, Circassian, Druze, and Arab villages alternate in modern Pal.

HOBAB, br.-in-law of Moses, s. of JETHRO (RAGUEL). This follows fm. the most natural interpretation of the apparently conflicting accounts of the household into wh. Moses married (Nu. 10.$^{29ff.}$; Jg. 4.^{11}; cp. Ex. 3.^{1}, &c.). Altho' eager at first to return to his own land and kindred after visiting Moses with his fr., he seems to have been persuaded to stay with Isr. His acquaintance with the desert, and his powers of observation trained in the wilderness, on wh. wanderers in waste places so largely depend, wd. be of great value to the camp (Nu. 10.^{31}).

HOBAH, whither Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14.^{15}), poss. = Ḥōbā, c. 60 miles NW. of Damascus.

HOHAM, k. of Hebron, slain by Joshua (10.$^{3ff.}$).

HOLINESS, HOLY (Heb. qōdesh, qādōsh). The essential idea of holiness in OT. is "separation." It applies equally to persons and things. What is "holy" is "set apart" for the use or service of the deity. It did not necessarily imply ethical purity. The moral content of the idea depended upon the known char. of the deity concerned. The char. of J″., however, as revealed to His people was such that men knew He could not be served with iniquity. And in the teaching of Scrip. it is made increasingly plain that "holiness to God," to be pleasing to Him, must be "separated" from all impurity, dishonesty, injustice, oppression of the poor, &c. The requirement, "Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy," "Ye shall be holy unto Me, for I am holy" (Lv. 19.^{2}, 20.^{26}), is connected with ritual enactments designed to separate Isr. fm. all other races. The prophets showed that this ritual separation was a symbol of moral purity. The use of qādēsh for "sodomite," and qĕdēshāh for "harlot," expresses the fact that these were "set apart" for the impure rites of Ashtoreth.

A "holy place" is thus a place set apart for purposes of worship (Lv. 7.^{6}); what is used in the ritual of worship is "holy" (Nu. 5.^{17}, &c.); the priest is "holy" (Lv. 21.^{7}, &c.); the nation is "holy" (Ex. 19.^{6}, &c.); so also is the day set apart for special service (Ex. 12.^{16}, &c.).

We may take hagios in NT. as simply a tr. of qādōsh; it becomes practically the technical term for followers of Jesus Christ (Ac. 9.^{13}, &c., "saints"). In 1 Tm. 2.^{8}; Ti. 1.^{8}; He. 7.^{26}; Rv. 15.^{4}, "holy" represents the Gr. hosios, lit. "gracious." In 1 Cor. 9.^{13}; 2 Tm. 3.^{15}, the Gr. word is hieros, lit. "priestly."

on wh. the curtains were hung. (3) Ḥāḥ (Ex. 35.^{22}), prob. = "ring," like that put in the nose of a beast to master it. Fish hooks are mentioned in Jb. 41.^{1}; Am. 4.^{2}; Mw. 17.^{27}. The Pruning H. is shaped like our own shearing hook, on a much smaller scale. It is fitted with a long wooden handle, so that thorny trees can be pruned without danger to the hands.

HOPHNI and Phinehas, sons of Eli, were priests in Shiloh (1 S. 1.[3]). They used their position to secure more than their due of the sacrifices, and are described as "men of Belial" (1 S. 2.[12ff.]). LXX omits the charge of licentiousness (v. 22). Eli had lost all control over them. They were slain in battle with the Phil. in fulfilment of the doom pronounced on the house of Eli (1 S. 3.[11ff.], 4.[11]).

HOPHRA (Egp. uah-ab-rah), k. of Egypt, who reigned fm. B.C. 586 to 569. He intervened in the affairs of Pal., sending an army to relieve Jrs. The Babylonians temporarily raised the siege; but as H. did not venture to encounter Nebuchadnezzar, the siege was renewed, and the conqueror wreaked all the severer vengeance on Jrs. and its k. After an unsuccessful expedition agst. Cyrene he was put to death by his subjects (Jr. 44.[30]; tho' not named he is the "Pharaoh" of Jr. and Ek.: see also Herod. ii. 161–163).

HOR. (1) A mountain wh. cannot now be identd., "by the border of the land of Edom" (Nu. 20.[22], 33.[37]), in wh. Aaron died and was buried (vv. 38ff.). Tradition has long pointed to Jebel Hārūn, a prominent height E. of the Arabah, hard by the famous city of Petra (Ant. IV. iv. 7), wh. in Jerome's time was identd. with Kadesh (OEJ. s.v. "Or"). The mountain commands a spacious view of the Arabah, and of the broken uplands E. and W. It is crowned by a whitewashed sanctuary, the reputed tomb of Aaron, held in great veneration by the Moslems. Pilgrims fm. Damascus yearly bring a covering for the tomb of Sayidna Hārūn. In former times, when the Hajj pilgrimage passed by el-Kerak and esh-Shōbak, great numbers ascended the mountain. Now only a few of those more zealous for the honour of Aaron visit his grave (Musil, Arabia Petræa, II. i. 41). But the identification is imposs. Petra was cert. not Kadesh, and Jebel Hārūn lies in the heart, not on the border of Edom. The NW. frontier was prob. Wādy el-Fiqrah. Jebel Madarah, S. of this Wady, c. midway between 'Ain Qadīs and the Dead Sea, has been proposed (Trumbull, Kadesh Barnea, 127ff.). The position seems to suit the requirements of the text; but without further kge. certainty is imposs. (2) A mountain named only in Nu. 34.[8], as on the N. border of the land of Can.: unidentd. The text is difficult, and the mountain is not known to Ezekiel (47.[15f.]).

HOREB (Ex. 31., &c.) = Mt. SINAI.

HOREM ("consecrated"), a fortified city in the uplands of Naphtali (Jo. 19.[38]), poss. ident. with the mod. Ḥūrah, wh. occupies a mound at the S. end of Wādy el-'Ain, to the W. of Kedesh-Naphtali.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD, an unidentd. station in the wanderings (Nu. 33.[32f.]). LXX understands "mountain of Gidgad." But the Heb. word is ḥōr, "hollow" or "cavern," not har, "mountain." See GUDGODAH.

HORIM, HORITES, the primitive inhabitants of Mount Seir (Gn. 14.[6]) expelled by the Edomites (Dt. 2.[12-22]). The name H. is supposed to mean "cave-dwellers."

HORMAH ("accursed"), a city near Kadesh, the scene of disaster to Isr. (Nu. 14.[45]; Dt. 1.[44]). When taken later its name, Zephath, was changed to H. (Nu. 21.[3]; Jo. 12.[14]; cp. Jg. 1.[17]). It lay in the S. of Judah, in the territory assigned to Simeon (Jo. 15.[20ff.], 19.[4]; 1 Ch. 4.[30]; see also 1 S. 30.[30]). The anct. name prob. survives in eṣ-Ṣebaita, c. 23 miles N. of 'Ain Qadīs, 14 miles S. of 'Aslūj (= Ziklag ?). Robinson decides for some position on Naqb eṣ-Ṣafā, but that seems too far fm. Kadesh.

HORN. We read of H. vessels for oil (1 K. 1.[39]; 1 S. 16.[1]) and for eye paint (Jb. 42.[14], Keren-happuch, lit. "horn of eye paint"), also of H. trumpets (Jo. 6.[4]). H. perhaps stands for weapon of attack (Ps. 18.[2]). To prosper or crush a man is to exalt or break his H. (1 S. 2.[1]; Jr. 48.[25], &c.). The arrogant man lifts his H. (Ps. 75.[4]). The H. symbolises strength (Dt. 33.[17], &c.), and is used for monarchs and empires (Dn. 7.[8], 8.[21], &c.). The Hs. of the altar are projections at the corners. See ALTAR.

HORNET, a large hymenopterous insect (Vespa orientalis), larger than the common wasp but not so vicious. It is referred to in connection with the conquest of Pal. by Israel: "I will send the H. before you" (Ex. 23.[28]; Dt. 7.[20]; Jo. 24.[12]; Ws. 12.[8]). It prob. is metaphorical for the terror that unmanned the Canaanites before the Israelites. As in all three cases where the word occurs the LXX has σφηκία, no suggestion of a various reading need be considered.

HORONAIM, an unidentd. city in the S. of Moab (Is. 15.[5]; Jr. 48.[3], &c.; cp. Moabite Stone, l. 32f.). The "descent of H." may be the way leading up Seyl ed-Drā' and Wādy Kerak, by el-Mezra and Kerak (Musil, Arabia Petræa, i. 21).

HORONITE (Ne. 2.[10]), a native of Beth-horon.

HORSE (Heb. sūs, pārāsh). Among the Jews the H. was used only for war or pageant, for chariots (sūs), or for cavalry (pārāsh, usually in the pl. tr. "horsemen"). The H. was not introduced into Egp. till the times of the Hyksos. As Isr. was an agricultural nation, and not intended by Providence to play an imperial rôle, they were forbidden to addict themselves to horsemanship. The k. was forbidden to multiply Hs. (Dt. 17.[16]); it was regarded as a proof of apostasy to ride upon Hs. (Is. 30.[16]). After his victory by the Waters of Merom Joshua "houghed the Hs." of Jabin and his allies (Jo. 11.[9]); David acted similarly (2 S. 8.[4]), tho' he "reserved of them for a hundred chariots." Solomon reversed this policy; he had "forty thousand stalls for horses for his chariots and twelve thousand horsemen" (1 K. 4.[26]); and he established a regular traffic in Hs. Cavalry and chariots were more used in the Northern than in the Southern Kdm. The only refces. to Hs. in agriculture are Is. 28.[28] and Am. 6.[12]. The hilly nature of Palestine rendered chariots ineffective, so they were needless in defensive war; they cd. only be of use in aggressive war, and this was to be discouraged in the Jews. For the Jews to found an "empire" was to be untrue to their calling. As used for purposes of pageant the heads of the horses were adorned with trappings of various kinds—bells and studs.

HORSE-GATE. See Jerusalem.

HORSE-LEECH (Heb. 'alūqāh). The leech in both species is common in Pal.; most pools are infested with them, so that horses frequently get them in their mouths. The name occurs only in Pr. 30.[15].

HOSANNA (Heb. hōshī'ā nā, "save now"), the exclamation used by the multitude at our Lord's triumphal entry into Jrs; taken fm. Ps. 118.[25].

HOSEA, the first of the Minor Prophets, is one of the earliest of the writing prophets of OT. He prophesied in the days of Jeroboam II., k. of Isr., and his successors, and was a younger contemporary of Amos. But, while Amos of Judah looked upon the evils of the Northern Kdm. fm. the outside, H. himself belonged to the land wh. he denounced; and while he condemns, there is, as in the case of Jeremiah, tender affection for the people in all he says. H. has the distinction of being the only prophet of the Northern Kdm. who has left any written prophecy. He speaks of its k. as "our k.," and refces. to Judah are not frequent. Of his personal life we know nothing except what can be gathered fm. his prophecy, and of his fr., Beeri, the name only is known.

It was an evil time in the hist. of Isr., and H. saw clearly that it was the beginning of the end. Jeroboam reigned till B.C. 746, and the first three chaps., which belong to his time, reveal the vices and arrogance of the wealthy during his prosperous reign, when the name of J". was dishonoured. H. foretells that disasters would follow, and that the royal house of Isr., wh. began in bloodshed when Jehu destroyed the house of Ahab, would itself be overthrown. Jehu had acted under the instigation of the earlier prophets, but they were not responsible for the cruelty and selfishness wh. was shown; and now H. declares that the blood of Jezreel (2 K. 10.[11]) will be avenged. Zechariah, s. of Jeroboam, reigned only six months, and with his murder the house of Jehu came to an end. H., in the second part of his bk. (4.–14.), gives a picture of the condition of anarchy wh. ensued when ks. were set up and quickly removed, one after the other. Shallum, the next k., was overthrown by Menahem, who called in the aid of Pul or Tiglath-pileser, k. of Asyr. The difft. parties in the kdm. looked either to Asyr. or to Egp. for support, and H. plainly declares that as the result of this they will become subj. to Asyr. This prophecy was soon fulfilled. Menahem was succeeded by his s. Pekahiah, but after two yrs. he was killed by Pekah, who in his turn fell before Hoshea. Pekah had come into conflict with Tiglath-pileser, whose assistance had been invoked by Ahaz, k. of Judah, agst. him and his allies in B.C. 734. The Asyr. k. took captive the inhabitants of Galilee and Gilead (2 K. 15.[29]), and Hoshea was made k. of the much weakened and reduced kdm. of Samaria, under the over-lordship of Asyr. On the death of Tiglath-pileser, Hoshea attempted to throw off the yoke, trusting to the help of Egp., but Shalmaneser IV., the successor of Tiglath-pileser, attacked Samaria; and after a siege of three yrs. the city was taken by Sargon, who succeeded Shalmaneser, and the Northern Kdm. came to an end in B.C. 722. This event was foreseen by the prophet H., for there is reason to conclude that his prophecy was delivered before the yr. B.C. 734. His refces. to Gilead (6.[8], 12.[11]) must have been made before the deportation of its inhabitants, and while it was still a part of the kdm. of Isr.; and there is no mention of the attack of Pekah upon Judah.

H. ranks among the very greatest of OT. prophets, and he had a distinct contribution to make to men's thoughts about God. His prophetic inspiration seems to have come in connection with an unhappy domestic life. His personal experience of an unfaithful wife, whom he still continued to love and to seek to win back to love and virtue, gave him an insight into the relation of God to His people. God is love. H. knew what this meant, fm. what he had learned of his own heart; and herein he found the explanation of J".'s dealings, and of His requirement from Isr. J". is the Husband and Isr. the mr., and His patient, forbearing love will not let His people go. But they must be changed. H. insists upon the ethical and sptl. nat. of worship, and laughs at the calves of Bethel, and the worship connected therewith. God requires loving-kindness and not sacrifice, and the kge. of God more than burnt-offerings. When we consider that these ideas, wh. are of the essence of the highest relg., were absolutely new to the world, we must look upon H. as one of the greatest religious geniuses wh. the world has produced.

The greatness of H. has been obscured by the difficulty of his style, and the sequence of his thought is often hard to follow. His prophecy is well described as a monologue, in wh. a deeply moved soul is expressing all its changing moods and impressions, without thought of logic or order. He passes quickly fm. condemnation to promise, fm. despair to hope. In the midst of his strongest denunciations of the false relg. and of the unfaithfulness of Isr., the thought of the yearning love of J″. continues to recur; and the prophecy ends with an exquisite picture of the beauty and the joy wh. would return to Isr. if she wd. even yet return to J″. her God, and place all her confidence in Him.

The 1st division of the bk. (chaps. 1.–3.) gives an act. of the prophet's domestic life, and the circumstances wh. gave rise to his religious insight. In chap. 1. the story is told of his false w., Gomer, who bore three children, to whom, like Isaiah, he gave significant names, accdg. to the direction of J″. The 1st, Jezreel, was named as a prophecy of the fall of Jeroboam's house, wh. had begun in bloodshed at Jezreel. Next a dr. was born, who was named Lo-ruhamah, meaning "That hath not obtained mercy"; and then again a son, Lo-ammi, "Not my people," indicating that Isr. was rejected by J″. Yet the prophet is not willing to give up all hope, and the chap. closes with a picture of future restoration.

Chap. 2. gives the prophet's explanation of the foregoing chap. Ephraim's ingratitude and unfaithfulness to J″. occasion the punishment wh. He will send upon her—a punishment, however, not meant as a final destruction, but as a means of bringing her to repentance. When the nation returns to her allegiance J″. will make a new covenant with her, and will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy.

In chap. 3. H.'s own story is continued. He behaves towards his w. in the way in wh. J″. deals with Ephraim. Gomer, who has left her husband and become the w. of another, is bought back by H. and is kept beside him, for a time on probation. Thus J″., who is forsaken by His people, will deprive them for a time of their liberty, as in the Exile, and then, taught by experience, they will return with fear unto the Lord and to His goodness.

The 2nd part of the bk. (chaps. 4.–14.) consists of a series of prophecies, arranged without apparent system or continuity. H. inveighs esp. agst. two great evils: first, agst. the false worship, wh. puts emphasis on the wrong things, and thinks of relg. as a matter of ceremonial, instead of moral obedience; and secondly, agst. the political tendencies of the time, when the nation set its hope upon the help of Asyr. and Egp., instead of trusting in J″. alone. In chap. 4. a vivid picture is drawn of the moral deterioration of the people, wh. is laid to the charge of the priests, who themselves are worldly and immoral; and in chap. 5. the priests and princes are addressed personally, their sin is denounced, and J″. is represented as finally leaving Ephraim to itself. The prophecy continues with fierce denunciation of immorality and faithlessness, while ever and again occurs a passage of tender longing for the repentance and restoration of Isr. "O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee?" "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" "O Isr., return unto the Lord thy God." Such alternate promise and condemnation continue throughout, for H. feels deeply for those whom he is compelled to denounce. He is one of themselves, and he experiences the shame of their evil doing. But if they will only repent and trust in the God of love, whom he has declared, then all the threatenings wh. their own sin deserved will be given up; and even yet J″. will be ready to bestow His blessings upon them.

HOSHEA. (1) The original name of Joshua (Nu. 13.[8], AV. "Oshea"; Dt. 32.[44]). (2) Ruler of Ephraim under David (1 Ch. 27.[20]). (3) The last k. of Samaria. He slew and succeeded Pekah, s. of Remaliah (2 K. 15.[30]). Fm. the Asyr. inscrs. it is clear that H. was of the pro-Asyr. party in Isr., and carried out this conspiracy in concert with Tiglath-pileser III., whose puppet he became. He did evil "but not as the ks. of Isr. that were before him" (2 K. 17.[2]), influenced, perhaps, by the preaching of Hosea, his contemporary. H. doubtless felt the Asyr. tribute burdensome, and sought for greater independence by alliance with So (or Sawa), k. of Egp. The non-arrival of his tribute roused the suspicions of Shalmaneser, who marched into Samaria and besieged H. in his capital for three yrs. Shalmaneser died and was succeeded by Sargon, an energetic and able prince, who completed the conquest and took H. prisoner. The summary given in 2 K. 17. is supplemented by the conqueror's brief words in the Khorsabad inscrn.: "Samaria I besieged, I captured, 27,290 of her inhabitants I carried away."

HOSPITALITY is primarily the reception and entertainment of travellers; but around this have grown up cert. deeply interesting ideas and practices, sanctioned by immemorial usage, and consecrated by religion.

Among the dwellers in the anct. Orient to ask a wayfarer to pay for lodging and food wd. have been reckoned an outrage; and not less for the guest to offer payment. The traveller was regarded as unfortunate, a man to be pitied, and kindly entreated. No man wd. leave home and kindred to wander amid strange places and people except under the urgency of dire necessity. Save in the larger centres of population, dearth of patronage made houses of public resort impossible. In the fleeting tent villages of the nomads an "inn" wd. be an absurdity. Were there no welcome for a man in the tent it is his hap to find, there wd. be little assurance of life amid the perils of the wilderness. No man knows when his own fortune may cast him on the consideration of others. Each, therefore, tries to deserve kindness by showing it to such as come his way. The host expects, and usually receives, no thanks. The guest has only had what custom prescribes as his right, wh. he mt. take if it were refused. In the villages, if no one is rich and generous enough to win honour by taking the burden on himself, responsibility for the proper care of the guest is shared by the whole community.

The Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, as well as the anct. Hebs., held H. in high esteem, and its requirements are still loyally observed in all the far-spreading encampments of Arabia. The old dislike of travel is nearly universal. A man's position and influence depend largely on his reputation for open-hearted H. A niggard in this regard is held in contempt, while he who spurns the guest is covered with indelible infamy.

The rights and duties of H. centre in the tent or dwelling, and in the common meal. There is no safety for the stranger met in the country, if he be not valiant, or have not powerful relatives; but even in an enemy's land peril is past if he touch but the most distant peg of the foeman's tent. When he eats and drinks with the owner the two pass under a sacred bond to defend each other to the uttermost.

The tent is regarded as belonging to God, by whose favour it stands. By entering or touching it appeal is made to the Deity for shelter and sustenance. These His servant, the occupant, is ready and eager to give. The host does not speak of the stranger as "my guest," but as "the guest of God." To mishandle or neglect the guest were to incur the displeasure of God.

In the desert food and drink are not articles of merchandise. They represent the bounty of the Divine Host, and all alike are His "guests." Only a churl wd. refuse or take payment for a share in life's necessities supplied to a fellow-sojourner in God's great tent.

The Arab recognises "duties" and "rights" only within the circle of his own kin. Nothing done to those beyond is "wrong," and fm. them no rights can be claimed. But one born without may acquire the kindred relationship by eating and drinking with one or more members of a kin—this of course to a certain limited extent, wh. includes the right to food and protection. The kin is a sacred unity. If one member suffer in life or honour, the duty of vengeance lies upon all. This idea seems to rest on the primeval faith that the deity shared his life with the kin. When one eats with a clansman he is said to become sharer in the same life. His blood is renewed and refreshed fm. a common source. He thus shares the life of the clan, and also of the clan god, and must therefore be protected at all costs. Sacred associations attached to the common meal. The animal slain is still called dhabīḥah, "sacrifice," and to the feast all members of the kin are free to come unbidden.

This "brotherhood of the bread" or "of salt," with its mutual obligations, lasts only 36 hours after the guest leaves the tent; but it may become perpetual by frequent repetition.

The guest's right of entertainment, it is genly. allowed, runs to three days. Beyond this the host may give him work to do. No guest of honour will stay to his host's inconvenience.

"The guest who arrives after sunset sleeps without supper"; so runs the desert law. The host must have time to do himself credit by the meat prepared. But as no one wd. willingly be abroad after sunset, the law is often relaxed. The guest, mindful of the host's honour, will always leave a portion of the food as evidence that more than enough has been supplied.

The right of asylum attaching in all times to particular places, in origin rests on appeal for H. made by the fugitive to the god there worshipped. Joab indeed was slain at the altar; but he had forfeited the right of asylum by his own breach of the law (1 K. 2.[31ff.]). Jael's treacherous murder of Sisera was a gross outrage, bearing witness to the savage lawlessness of the time (Jg. 4.[17], &c.).

Biblical illustrations of or refces. to H. are numerous: e.g. Gn. 18., 19.[2ff.]; Jg. 19.[15, 18]; Jb. 31.[31f.]; Mw. 10.[9f.], 25.[35]; Lk. 7.[44ff.], 10.[4ff.]; Jn. 13.[20]; Rm. 12.[13, 20]; 1 Tm. 3.[2]; He. 13.[2], &c. See further Inn.

HOST OF HEAVEN (Heb. tzĕbā hashshāmayīm), primarily the stars (Gn. 2.[1]; Dt. 4.[19]); fm. this the transition was simple to the Angels (1 K. 22.[19]; cp. Lk. 2.[13]).

HOSTS, LORD OF (Heb. JHWH tzĕbā'ōth), a prophetic title of God, used also in Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Psalms. It is uncertain whether the reference is to "hosts of Isr." or the "hosts of Heaven," i.e. the stars, or the angels.

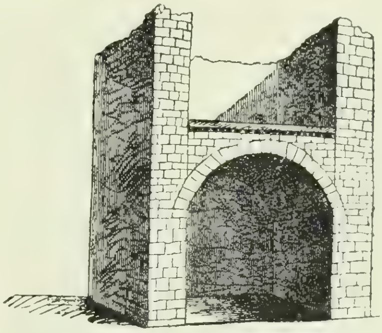
HOUR (Aram. shā'āh) in the OT. occurs only in Daniel (3.[6], &c.); the Hebrews did not divide the "day" into hours. Even for the Greeks until the time of Hipparchus H. had a very indefinite meaning; it mt. equally be a season of the yr. or a portion of a day. The Rms. gave definite meaning to the term. In NT. the Gr. hōra has also the meaning of an appointed time (Jn. 7.[30]), or the time during wh. anything occurs (Rv. 3.[10], &c.).

HOUSE (Heb. bayith, poss. from bānāh, "to build," or fm. būth [Aram.], "to pass the night." It is sometimes used for "a tent"; though bayith is elsewhere contrasted with 'ōhel, the usual word for "tent," 2 S. 7.[6]). In the beginning two forms of shelter wd. be open to men, the shade of trees and the shelter of caves. When these were not available men had to invent substitutes for them, so the tent took the place of the tree, and the built house that of the cave. In countries like Greece, where trees were plentiful, or like Egp. where winter rains did not make solid shelter imperative, the tent generated the "booth," and that in turn the "wooden hut"; fm. this sprang the pillared architecture of Egp. and Greece. In Pal., where the winter rain is torrential, the limestone rocks afford many examples of caves, and there is abundance of rock that may be easily quarried, built houses appear to have been the rule in anct. times as now.

We have shown under Corner-stone that the foundations of an Eastern H. are really four arches, the piers of wh. are the "Corner-stones." The next step in building is to collect a quantity of earth and mould it into the shape of the inside of a vault; when this is done, stones shaped as voussoirs of an arch are laid upon the mound above described and united with cement. After this has settled the earthen core is removed and there is left the vault, the imitation cave. The ends are closed up with walls, in which necessarily the doors and windows are placed; walls are also built up tangential to the sides, enclosing the vault. The space between these side-walls and the vault is filled up with earth and rubble. The whole is overlaid with earth to form the flat roof so characteristic of the nearer East. This has to be rolled with a stone roller when the first rain indicates the approach of winter, to obliterate the cracks made by the summer heat and make it water-tight. If this is not done the rain percolates through: at times the mass of rubble gets so water-logged that the haunches of the vaults fall in. Sometimes the roller is a stone that had been a drum of a small column in Roman times. Access to the roof is most frequently afforded by an outside stair. Although the enactment of the law (Dt. 22.[8]) is generally complied with, yet cases in wh. there is either no parapet at all, or one too low to be of any use, are frequent, hence injuries in consequence of falling fm. the roof are not uncommon. When a second storey is contemplated the retaining walls are carried up to the requisite height, the space roofed over with beams, covered with rough boards and brushwood; upon this earth and clay are placed, and again the flat roof is formed. In the case of the house of a rich man, a number of these vaults, the erection of wh. we have described, are arranged in the form of a square, forming a courtyard in wh. there may be trees and a fountain. In the cases of the sheikh of a village, who has to consider the housing of horses and cattle, occasionally all the vaulted chambers are used for stabling, and the living rooms are built as an upper storey upon them; a broad passage guarded by a parapet going round in front of the various rooms. The windows to the street are usually small and high, and often unglazed.



Flooring over an Arched Room

Sometimes, if the houses exceed two storeys, the windows protrude beyond the line of the wall; it was through a "lattice" of this sort that Ahaziah

the s. of Ahab fell (2 K. 1.[2]). The roof in anct. days, as now, was a place to wh. one mt. retire for devotion, as Peter did in Joppa (Ac. 10.[9]). One often betakes himself to the housetop to enjoy the coolness of the evening. For a like reason small chambers are frequently erected on the roof for sleeping in. That Bathsheba shd. be bathing on the housetop throws a sinister light on her character; for the housetop in a city was not a place of seclusion.

There is little of what we wd. regard as furniture in an Eastern house; there may be a small table or two. Along the wall is a "diwan" or stone seat, and on it are numerous cushions laid. Occasionally one of the walls is covered with stone shelves in wh. are laid precious carpets fm. Damascus or Persia. In the kitchen premises tall whitewashed structures built of stone cemented with clay serve the purposes of grain chests. Filled fm. the top, the grain is withdrawn for use by an orifice at the foot. In the houses of the wealthy there is no difficulty in securing privacy for the harem; in smaller houses a curtain has to afford the desired seclusion. Fm. the general warmth of the climate in Pal. there is no need of fire-places; that, conjoined with the absence of woodwork, makes destructive conflagrations practically unknown in Pal. The description we have just given applies to houses erected about half a century ago and earlier; since then western methods have been rapidly gaining ground. In the primitive period of Jewish hist., if we may judge fm. the remains at Tell el-Hesy and Gezer, things must have been very much as they were in the middle of last cent. The pillared structures of Solomon owned the effect of Egyptian influence; while in the period of the Herodians a Romanised Hellenism predominated among the wealthy. Even in the time of our Lord the external appearance of the houses of the middle and lower classes must have been much what it is at present.

In certain ruined and deserted cities in the Ḥauran houses are found standing practically intact, with walls built of squared blocks of stone, and roof of stone slabs. The door is a single slab of stone, swinging easily on its Hinges; while the aperture in the wall corresponding to our window is filled by a smaller slab, similarly hung. These doors are often elaborately carved. The date of these houses is uncertain, but probably they were built about the beginning of our era.

The mod. fig. use of "house" for "family" or "household" has prevailed in all ages. The first time "house" appears in EV. it is used in this sense (Gn. 7.[1]).

HUKKOK, on the boundary of Naphtali, not far fm. Tabor (Jo. 19.[34]), prob. = Yaqūq, NW. of the Sea of Galilee, five miles fm. el-Mejdel. H. stands for Helkath in 1 Ch. 6.[75].

HUKOK (1 Ch. 6.[75]) = HELKATH (Jo. 21.[31]).

HULDAH, the prophetess, w. of Shallum, the keeper of the wardrobe (2 K. 22.[14ff.]; 2 Ch. 34.[22ff.]), with whom Josiah took counsel when the bk. of the law was found in the Temple.

HUNTING as a form of sport was little known among the Hebs., as indeed it still is among Orientals. Herod's love of H. was prob. due to foreign influence (BJ. I. xxi. 13). Birds, such as the partridge (1 S. 26.[20]), quail, even the lark, and cert. wild animals, the gazelle, the roebuck, the hart, and wild goat (Dt. 12.[15, 22], 14.[5]; 1 K. 4.[23]), were valued as food. In securing these men used snares (Ps. 64.5, &c.), decoys (Sr. 11.30), nets (Ps. 9.16, &c.), slings (1 S. 17.40), clubs (Jb. 41.29), bows and arrows (Gn. 27.3, &c.). Pits were dug for larger animals (Ps. 9.15, &c.). Dogs for hunting are mentioned in Jos. (Ant. IV. viii. 9) but not in Scrip. Despite the prohibition of Moses and Mohammed, the boar is sometimes hunted and eaten. The presence of the lion (in anct. times), bear, wolf, leopard, fox, &c., compelled men to acquire some kge. of H. for the protection of themselves and their flocks.

HUR was a name borne by several persons. (1) H. with Aaron supported the hands of MOSES on Horeb, while the battle of Rephidim was being fought on the plain (Ex. 17.12); with Aaron he was left as Moses' vicegerent (Ex. 24.14) when the latter went up Sinai. Jewish tradition declares H. to have been the husband of Miriam. (2) Grandfr. of Bezaleel (Ex. 31.2). (3) A king of Midian slain by Isr. (Nu. 31.8).

HUSHAI the Archite, the friend of David who, in the rebellion of Absalom, overthrew the counsel of AHITHOPHEL (2 S. 15.32, &c.; 1 Ch. 27.33).

HUSKS. These are the brown pods of the carob tree, wh. grows luxuriantly in Pal. They are used to feed cattle and horses, and wd. cert. be given to swine (Lk. 15.16). Sweet to taste, they are sometimes eaten by the poor. It is customary to boil them, extracting a substance like molasses, used in various ways for food. See LOCUST.

HUZZAB (Na. 2.7). It is doubtful whether H. is a prop. noun as it is in EV. Rabbinic comm. declare H. to have been Queen of Nineveh. No such name has yet been found. The text may be corrupt.

HYMENÆUS, a false teacher associated with Alexander (1 Tm. 1.20) and with Philetus (2 Tm. 2.17). He taught that the "Resurrection was past already." The precise force of Paul's sentence on H. and Alexander, "delivered unto Satan," cannot be decided absolutely, but "excommunication" seems the simplest meaning.

HYMN (Gr. humnos). The H. has been a feature of Christian worship, public and private, fm. the earliest times (Mw. 26.30; Ac. 16.25; He. 2.12, &c.). In Eph. 5.19; Col. 3.16, humnoi are apparently distinguished fm. psalmoi and ōdai pneumatikai, "psalms" and "spiritual songs," the psalms prob. referring to the contents of the psalter, the others being religious songs, humnoi being specially songs of praise. But the distinction is not maintained; Josephus speaking of the "hymns" wh. David wrote (Ant. VII. xii. 3). Fm. Col. 3.16 it wd. appear that such compositions were used to convey instruction. Eph. 5.14 is evidently part of an anct. H. There are prob. many fragments of Hs. in NT. Illustrations are Mary's song (Lk. 1.46ff.), reminiscent of that of Hannah (1 S. 2.1ff.), and the H. of the angels (Lk. 2.14).

HYPOCRITE, in OT. represents Heb. ḥaneph, "impious," frequently in Jb., twice in LXX hypokritēs: in NT. meaning "an actor" in religion, i.e. one who wd. seem more pious than he actually is. In Mw. 24.51 ḥaneph appears to have been in the mind of the Evangelist; in the parallel passage in Lk. 12.56 we read "unbelievers."

HYSSOP, a plant of wh. the twigs formed into a bunch were used as a sprinkler (Ex. 12.22, &c.). It is described as springing out of the wall (1 K. 4.33). The herb intended is prob. a species of Marjoram, the Origanum Maru, wh. is found plentifully in Pal. Its "straight, herbaceous stems and rough, hairy leaves" are easily made into a bundle fitted for the purpose named. The leaves and heads have an aromatic flavour, with a refreshing quality. On this act. prob. the sponge with vinegar was laid on a bunch of H. and raised to the lips of Jesus, on the end of a reed (Jn. 19.29; cp. Mw. 27.48, &c.). It often grows in the chinks of rocks, between the stones in old dykes, terrace walls, &c.

I

IBLEAM, a town in Manasseh (Jo. 17.11; Jg. 1.27). It is ident. with the mod. Bel'ameh, a large tell ½ mile S. of Jenīn, with anct. remains. "The city has been inhabited certainly fm. the Amorites to the early Arabs" (R. A. Macalister, PEFQ., April 1907, p. 129).

IBZAN (Jg. 12.8ff.), a minor judge, successor of Jephthah, prob. fm. Bethlehem in Zebulun. Jewish tradition identd. him with BOAZ. The fr. of a remarkable family, he judged Isr. seven yrs.

ICHABOD (Heb. 'ī chābōd, poss. "the glory has departed"), s. of Phinehas. His mr., overwhelmed by disastrous tidings, died in giving him birth (1 S. 4.19f., 14.3).

ICONIUM, a Phrygian city rivalling Damascus in antiquity, resembling that city in the beauty and fruitfulness of its surroundings, and in its protection by western mountains (Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul, 317ff.). It is represented by the mod. Konia, in the great plain of Lycaonia, N. of the

Taurus, at a point where cert. important roads meet, connecting it with the sea and the Euphrates valley. Possessing thus many commercial advantages, it attracted a colony of Jews. Paul visited I. on his first missy. journey, coming fm. Antioch in the W., and met success among both Jews and Gentiles (Ac. 13.[51], 14.[1ff.]). Trouble arising, he passed on to Lystra and Derbe, returning later to "confirm the souls of the disciples." To the experiences of this time he alludes in 2 Tm. 3.[11]. Timothy was well known in I., and may have been circumcised and ordained here, when Paul came on his second missy. journey (Ac. 16.[1ff.]). Although not named, it was prob. visited again on the third missy. journey (Ac. 18.[23]). Ill-adapted for defence, the city owes its continuance to its central position and serviceableness, with its well-watered and fruitful district. It became a Rm. colony, and in later times it was the capital of the Seljuk empire. It is still the chief town of the district. The scene of the legend of St. Thekla is laid here (Ramsay, The Ch. in the Rm. Emp., 31ff., 375ff.).

IDDO. (1) 'Iddō (2 Ch. 12.[15], 13.[22]), Ye'dō, or Ye'dī (2 Ch. 9.[29], prob. in error for 'iddō), a prophet who wrote a hist. of the times of Solomon, Rehoboam, and Abijah. (2) 'Iddo (Zc. 1.[1]), or 'Iddō (1.[7]; Ez. 5.[1], 6.[14]), fr. of Zechariah. (3) 'Iddō, "the chief at the place Casphia" (Ez. 8.[17]), to whom Ezra sent for "ministers for the house of our God." See also 1 K. 4.[14]; 1 Ch. 27.[21]; Ez. 10.[43]; He. 12.[4, 16].

Konieh (Iconium)

IDOL, IDOLATRY. Every representation of Deity used for worship was an idol, and all reverence given to it was idolatry. Idols in Isr., if we may make a reasonable deduction fm. the remains of Asyr. and Egp., were usually figures representing men, animals, or composite beings. These last were prob. recognised as symbols; not representations. Very frequently they symbolised the reproductive powers of nature (see Ashtoreth). Sometimes amorphous stones, posts, or natural objects, such as trees, were regarded as representatives of Deity and worshipped. The Heb. names for idols are numerous, but the most common are 'elîlêm and gillûlîm, "idols" generally; pesel, "graven image"; massēkāh, "a molten image"; the frequency with wh. these two last terms occur together suggests that the "idol" was first cast, then the graver completed the work; or that a cast was made fm. the "graven image" and used as a mould. The earliest refce. to idols in Isr. is Gn. 31.[19], the "teraphim" that Rachel stole. Later Jacob buried "all the strange gods" under the oak at Shechem. How far Isr. was addicted to idolatry in Egp. it is impossible to say. The case of Micah (Jg. 17.[1ff.]) shows that very soon after their settlement in Pal. Isr. relapsed fm. the spiritual worship of J″. to make use of idols. The hist. of the period of the Judges is one of repeated fallings away into idolatry. The revival under Samuel of the purer worship of J″. continued till the reign of Solomon. Prob. Solomon's personal view was that, as all worship was really directed to J″., the form was indifferent. At the disruption of the kdm. Jeroboam introduced the worship of the "calves." As he had been so long in Egp. where there was a spiritual religion behind idolatry, Jeroboam chose the form of Apis wh. had been worshipped by Isr. in the wilderness (Ex. 32.[4ff.], JE.). In the

PEF. Drawing

Cow Divinity (Pottery)

Northern Kdm. the alternation was between Baal-worship and the worship of J″. by idols. In the Southern there was more spirituality; though under some of the kings, e.g. Manasseh and Amon, and possibly also Ahaz, there were lapses into heathenism. There does not seem to have been anything equivalent to the worship of the calves in the Southern Kdm.

The reason for the severity of the Mosaic law towards idolatry is found partly in the immorality wh. accompanied all heathen worship; partly in the tendency to regard all material symbols as representations. The materialised and limited deity became a person. The parabolic descriptions of the powers of nature took form in myths, the contents of wh. were regarded as sacred facts. The spirituality of God was gradually obscured, and progress towards fetichism was accelerated.

Again, idolatry was to be deprecated if Judaism was to be the precursor of and preparation for Christianity. Human sacrifice is a constant feature in the history of all heathenism. This was an infamy wh. Isr. did not wholly escape (2 K. 16.[3], 17.[17], &c.). It involved denial of the sanctity of the individual as a child of God. One who offered his son was held as sacrificing his most precious possession. But Christianity declares that each individual has a direct personal relation to God, and cannot be regarded as the possession of another, even of his father.

After the return fm. Babylon the Jews appear to have been completely weaned fm. idolatry. They seem indeed to have imbibed the contempt for idol-worship wh. we find in the prophets. The Persians as fire-worshippers stood in a closer relationship to spiritual worship than did the worshippers of Bel-Marduk and Nebo, so their domination favoured the anti-idolatrous views of the prophets. The advent of the Greek power exposed Judaism to a severer test. For a time the Hellenisation of the Jews went on rapidly, and idolatry was the natural termination of this. The effort of Epiphanes to hasten the process resulted in the revolt of the Maccabees, and the deepening of the antagonism to idolatry. Under Rome there was no attempt at compelling the Jews to be worshippers of idols. Every form of faith or unfaith was tolerated within its empire. Judaism was, however, a purely national religion. The Jews attempted no mission to convert the world fm. idolatry; this was the function of Christianity. In the days of the apostles scepticism was the rule among the educated classes. The apostle Paul, when he said (1 Cor. 8.[4]) "an idol is nothing in the world," must have assumed general agreement with the statement, or he wd. have argued the question. It is a singular phenomenon that Christianity, wh. thus in the beginning assumed the absolute nonentity of idols, shd. within half a millennium become fanatically addicted to idol-worship.

In Athens St. Paul takes a further step. He considers idol-worship as misdirected worship of the true God (Ac. 17.[23]), altho' idolatry was so common in Athens that men said it was easier to find a god than a man there. Yet philosophy had affirmed the merely symbolical meaning of idols. We must remember that St. Paul's discourse was addressed to philosophers.

The apostle Paul recognised a spiritual meaning behind idolatry. Anything wh. becomes so absorbing that it hinders the love and service of God is regarded as idolatry (Col. 3.[5]). Such devotion to any enterprise as excludes or limits the devotion due to God: the pursuit of pleasure, wealth, even of knowledge, when carried to excess, becomes in its essence idolatry.

IJON, a town in N. Naphtali named with Dan and Abel-beth-maachah (1 K. 15.[20]), taken by the Syr., and later (2 K. 15.[29]) by Tiglath-pileser: unidentd. The name lingers in Merj A'yūn, the plain N. of Tell el-Qādy (Dan). It may be represented by the mod. Khiyām, 5 miles N. of Abil, or by the considerable ruin at Tell Dibbīn, 3 miles NW. of Khiyām.

ILLYRICUM (Rm. 15.[19]), the W. limit of the sphere in wh. Paul had hitherto preached. The district lay on the E. shore of the Adriatic, S. of Italy and N. of Epirus, with Mœsia and Macedonia on the E. The name Dalmatia applied to the S. part of I., but fm. the time of the Flavian emperors it covered the whole province.

IMAGE. Among all creatures the unique distinction belongs to man of being made in the image of the Creator (Gn. 1.[26f.]); that is, in His likeness (Gn. 5.[1]). In view of the spiritual nature of God, this cannot refer to any material or formal resemblance. We must find the divine reflected in the mental, moral, and spiritual nature of man: in the elements of personality, self-conscious thought, the power of distinguishing good from evil, freedom to choose and to pursue ends that are approved. That the image may be complete these powers must be exercised under the influence of a true conception of God and human destiny, and in harmony with the divine will. The Fall, setting the human will in opposition to God's will, obscured the true knowledge of God, and shattered the divine image in man. But the lost image may be restored (Rm. 8.[29]). Unmarred in its perfection it is found in Jesus Christ (Col. 1.[15]; He. 1.[3], &c.). By the agency of the Spirit believing men are changed into His image (2 Cor. 3.[18]; Col. 3.[10]), and therefore again into that of the Creator. For image as an obj. of worship see IDOL.

INCENSE (Heb. qĕtōreth), ALTAR OF INCENSE. Taking into account the Oriental delight in perfumes, and the fact that alike in Assyria, whence Isr. had sprung, and in Egp. where they had sojourned so long, the burning of incense was an act of worship, it seems an anachronism to postpone the introduction of this practice till after the days of Ezra, as do Wellhausen, Nowack, and Benzinger. The materials of wh. the I. was to be compounded (Ex. 30.[34]), STACTE, ONYCHA, GALBANUM, and FRANKINCENSE, were all easily accessible even in the desert. The great increase in the number of the ingredients of I. in later times indicates the primitive nature of the Ex. narrative. The Altar of Incense was a double cube of shittim wood, two cubits high, overlaid with pure gold; it was placed before the veil of the Holy of Holies. Offering I. on an altar does not seem to have been practised either in Asyr. or Egp.

The cloud of incense that accompanied the High Priest when he entered the Holy of Holies, besides being the symbol of prayer (Rv. 8.[4]), had also a psychological reason. The overwhelming sense of being alone with God, spirit with spirit, might have so crushed the sensitive that death might have ensued there before God. The pungent but pleasing odour of the incense kept the body always in evidence, thus preventing such fatal absorption.

The burning of incense formed part of the regular morning and evening sacrifice (Ex. 30.[7f.]).

INCENSE

In a regular order of rotation the priests burnt incense before the Lord (Lk. 1.[9]). This privilege, wh. was highly esteemed, was seldom enjoyed twice by one person.

The golden "spoons" (Nu. 4.[7], &c.; Heb. kaf, "hollow of the hand") were evidently vessels in wh. incense was kept. In use it was usual to cast the incense on the fire, but there is ample evidence that the CENSER also was employed (Lv. 10.[1]; Ek. 8.[11], &c.).

INDIA. EV. so render hōddū, derived fm Hondu, the name of the Indus and the country it drains. It marks the E. limit of Ahasuerus' empire (Est. 1.[1], 8.[9]; cp. 1 M. 8.[8]; Est. Ad. 13.[1], 16.[1]; 1 Es. 3.[2]). While I. proper is not mentioned in Scrip., Isr. seems to have had relations with it by means of the Arabian merchants. Cert. products of I., brought by the Arab caravans, are named in Ek. 27.[15ff.], e.g. "horns of ivory and ebony," "cassia and calamus." Many of the things brought by the ships fm. Ophir and the navy of Tarshish seem to have been of Indian origin, almug (sandalwood), apes, peacocks, &c. (1 K. 10.[11, 25], &c.).

The usual word, naḥalāh, denotes property that passes fm. holder to heir, but also quite commonly = "possession." The same is true of the Gr. klēronomia (Mw. 21.[38]; Ac. 7.[5], &c.), and klēros (Ac. 26.[18]; Col. 1.[12]). See Heir.

INN. For Eastern views of travel and provision made for travellers see Hospitality. The I. as we know it does not appear in the OT. The mālōn (Gn. 42.[27], &c.) was only a halting-place, not implying any bldg. In NT. times Inns, with the foreign name pandocheion = Arb. funduq (Lk. 10.[34]), were plentiful, and were resorted to by all kinds of people. The moral atmosphere was such that Christians deemed it prudent to shun them, and keep open door for the brethren (1 P. 4.[9], &c.). The bldgs. affording shelter and security on the main roads prob. resembled the mod. khān, a square court enclosed by a stout wall, with accommodation for animals on the ground level, and for travellers in rooms above. The inn of Lk. 10.[34] is gen. identd. with Khān Ḥadrūr, c. eight miles E. of Jrs., on the descent to Jericho.

In Lk. 2.[7] we shd. prob. tr. kataluma "guest-chamber," as in Mk. 14.[14]; Lk. 22.[11]: i.e. a room in a private house placed at the disposal of guests. Joseph and Mary may have expected such quarters in a friend's house, and finding it full, had to be content with the shelter of the khān.

There are now many hotels in Pal. patronised chiefly by tourists.

INSTRUMENT (Heb. kĕlī) is applied to instruments of music as with ourselves (1 Ch. 15.[16], &c.). It is also employed where we should speak of "furniture" (Ex. 25.[9] RV., &c.), "utensils" (Nu. 31.[6], &c.), and "implements," e.g. implements of husbandry (2 S. 24.[22]; 1 K. 19.[21]) and of war (1 S. 8.[12], &c.). Our bodies are "instruments" (Gr. ὅπλα) with which righteousness or unrighteousness is wrought (Rm. 6.[13]). The word also occurs in 1 M. 13.[42] in the mod. sense of a legal deed.

IR-HA-HERES (RV.), City of Destruction (AV.). In his vision of the coming time Isaiah (19.[18]) sees several cities in Egp. whose inhabitants speak the language of Canaan, and swear to J″. of Hosts, one of which is called "the city of destruction." This may mean that they were occupied by Jewish colonists, or that the inhabitants were converts to the relg. of Isr., and naturally, in worship of J″. of Hosts, they wd. make use of the sacred tongue. Possibly the name was Ir-ha-ḥereṣ, "city of the sun," which a scribe, writing to dictation, might have mistaken for Ir-ha-hereṣ. It is only in the late square characters that the Heb. h and ḥ resemble each other. There may, however, be intended a play upon the two words wh. were so similar in sound: the city where the sun was worshipped under many emblems becomes a city where the zeal of those converted to J″. finds expression in the destruction of all objects of their former idolatrous worship. The LXX curiously reads polis asedek, "city of righteousness."

The reading "city of the sun" is perhaps rendered suspicious by the fact that it was in the nome of Heliopolis, "city of the sun," that Onias afterwards erected his temple.

IRON (Heb. barzel) was certainly known to the Egyptians, and used by them fm. c. B.C. 3800 to 3000 (Budge, Hist. of Egp., ii. 135). The ore was found in considerable quantities in certain districts of Mt. Lebanon, and was worked there in ancient times. Recently steps have been taken for opening the old mines in the neighbourhood of Btughreen. The metal is frequently referred to in Scrip. (Gn. 4.[22]; Am. 1.[3]; Jb. 28.[2], &c.). It was used for tools and implements; indeed so common was this use that the axe-head was called simply "the iron" (Dt. 19.[5]; 2 K. 6.[5]). Isaiah (44.[12]) represents the smith as making the axe to cut down the tree with wh. an idol is to be made (adopting the reading of LXX).

Og, king of Bashan, had a bedstead of iron (Dt. 3.[11]). Some (e.g. Driver ad loc.) wd. translate "sarcophagus of basalt." While basalt contains a high percentage of iron, there is no evidence that the Heb. barzel ever means basalt. Further, the present writer has seen many sarcophagi E. of Jordan made of limestone, wh. when weathered and darkened is often mistaken for basalt, but he has not seen any made of basalt. And it is questionable, to say the least, whether the Heb. 'eres, "a bed" or "couch," could ever denote a sarcophagus.

ISAAC, the long-promised s. of Abraham and Sarah (Gn. 17.[16], P.; 18.[10], J.). Various occasions are suggested for the bestowal of the name Yitzḥaq, "he laughs" (17.[17], 18.[12], 21.[6]). His life was comparatively uneventful. His rôle as presented in the extant records was little more than that of a link in the patriarchal chain connecting Abraham and Jacob. These were both far-travelled men, who had seen much of the world and life. I.'s days were spent in a narrow circuit, in the S. of Pal., in pastoral and agricultural occupations.

Abraham's willing obedience, when called to sacrifice the s. in whom all his hopes centred, was not more remarkable than the meek submission of I., who is therefore often cited as a type of Christ.

Accdg. to a custom still largely prevailing, he had no choice as to whom he shd. marry. He accepted REBEKAH, who had been brought by his fr.'s steward, without question (Gn. 24.[67]). He was then 40 yrs. old. Twenty yrs. later Jacob and Esau were born (25.[20, 26]). Famine drove him to GERAR: fear led him to practise deception wh. involved him and Rebekah in grave peril (26.[1-11]). Settled in the neighbourhood of Gerar, he prospered greatly. He first of the patriarchs is mentioned as sowing (26.[12]). He secured a good supply of water by digging wells. These became scenes of strife with the envious Phil. in wh. his peace-loving disposition was made manifest (26.[14ff.]). He removed to Beersheba, and there made a treaty with Abimelech, who had followed him to entreat an alliance. In the scene where Jacob and his mr. win by guile the blessing designed for Esau, he figures as already a frail old man, his eyes dimmed with yrs. At Rebekah's sugg. he sends Jacob away to Padan-aram. He was still alive when Jacob returned (Gn. 28.[1], 35.[27]). At the age of 180 he died, and was buried by his sons in the cave of Machpelah (35.[28f.], 49.[31]).

It is evident that only fragments of his hist. have been preserved. An allusion in Amos 7.[9, 16] seems to sugg. that in some way he was more particularly associated with the tribes of N. Isr.

ISAIAH (Heb. Yesha'yâhû, "salvation of Yâhû"; Gr. Esaias; Vlg. Isaias, whence the English form in the OT. is derived), traditional author of a collection of prophecies. The chapters in the Bks. of Kings in wh. this prophet's name occurs are practically identical with three incorporated in his bk. (36.-39.), and the chronicler (2 Ch. 32.[32]) attributes this portion of the Bk. of Kings, as well as that dealing with Uzziah (26.[22]), to the prophet; but our kge. of the origin and hist. of these works is not such as to enable us to state their relations with precision. It is now commonly supposed that the three chapters were taken from the historical bk. by the compiler of the Bk. of Isaiah; against this is the fact that the latter bk. has preserved an ode by Hezekiah (38.[9-20]) wh. is not found in the Kings. If the chapters were transferred fm. "Isaiah" by the compiler of the Bk. of Kings, the bk. bearing the name of the latter must be regarded as our sole source of information about him; and it is observable that Ezra (1.[1]) quotes Jeremiah and not Isaiah for the prophecy of the return under Cyrus; and in Daniel (9.[2]), in a somewhat similar context, Jeremiah and not Isaiah is mentioned; the first writer who characterises his prophecies being Ben-Sira, near the beginning of the second cent. B.C. (Sr. 48.[22-25]). According to the bk. ascribed to him, wh. is written partly in the first, but more often in the third person in its narrative portions, and contains even secret details of its author's life, he was the son of Amos ('Âmôtz, not to be confused with 'Âmôs, the name of the Minor Prophet transliterated in the same way), received his call to the prophetic office in the yr. of King Uzziah's death (B.C. 740), and held it during the reigns of Jotham (16 yrs.), Ahaz (16 yrs.), and Hezekiah, at any rate till 15 yrs. before that king's death. His residence appears to have been mainly, if not entirely, at Jrs.; but there are passages wh. imply an acquaintance on his part with the topography of Pal., and even of the adjoining countries. Incidentally there is an allusion to his wife (called the prophetess), and two or perhaps three of his sons (Shear-Jashub, Mahar-shalal-hash-baz, and possibly Immanuel). The prophecies that are dated belong to the last yr. of Uzziah and the periods of Ahaz and Hezekiah; and they contain references to the operations of various Asyr. kings, of whom Sargon (722-705) and Sennacherib (705-681) are mentioned by name (20.[1], 36.[1], &c.). In the latter portion of the bk. there are references to Cyrus, king of Persia (ob. 529). His career seems to have been marked by many of the hardships associated with the prophetic office (20.[3]), but the chaps. 36.-39. represent him as court-prophet and physician to Hezekiah. Of the time of his death there is no record, though a tradition, wh. may have been known to the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, makes him suffer martyrdom under Manasseh, by the process of sawing asunder, a mode of torture wh. is attested by excavations in parts of Pal.

Of the oracles collected in the bk. one (2.[2-4]) is also attributed to Micah (4.[1-3]), and portions of chaps. 15. and 16. are to be found in Jr. 48. In one case (16.[14]) an oracle "spoken formerly" is confessedly utilised by the prophet.

Division of the Book.—The bk. falls into two main divisions, chaps. 1.-39. and chaps. 40. to the end. It has been suggested that these at one time occupied separate rolls, and it has been argued that the chaps. 36.-39. were an appendix to the first collection of Isaiah's prophecies similar to the historical appendix to Jeremiah. This may or may not be correct. In the first division chaps. 13.-23. appear to constitute a collection of oracles dealing mainly with foreign countries; whence (since 36.-39. constitute a section) the first division falls into four groups of chapters. The second division is sometimes thought to fall into two sections, the first ending with chap. 55. The arrangement of the first division appears to be in the main chronological, since kings and other personages are mentioned in order of time (Uzziah, chap. 6.; Ahaz, chaps. 7., 14.; Shebna, chap. 22.; Hezekiah, chaps. 36.–39.). The principle, however, on wh. the various oracles are introduced into this chronological framework is obscure. In part it seems to be artistic; this wd. explain the reservation of the account of the prophetic call (chap. 6.) till the reader has some acquaintance with the prophet's message, and the regular alternation of threats with promises; and esp. the preparation (beginning in chap. 2.), in oracles of gradually increasing length, for the subject wh. fills the most of the second division.

Authorship of the Book.—The attitude adopted towards this subject depends largely on the view taken by individuals of the function and powers of a prophet. In Ecclesiasticus Isaiah is said to have foreseen the future to the end of time, and in the chapters common to the Bk. of Isaiah and the Kings he foretells the rout of Sennacherib and the prolongation of Hezekiah's life for 15 yrs.; and the author of the latter half claims belief for his predictions on the ground that the "former things" have come to pass. The author of the first half appears otherwise as a miracle-worker of extraordinary power: he offers to produce any sign demanded of him in heaven or earth; and though this offer was rejected by Ahaz, it was accepted by Hezekiah, and the prophet caused the sun to retreat; a miracle wh. was perhaps intended to exhibit a greater degree of power than that displayed by Joshua, who made the sun stand still. To those who believe in the possibility of these powers the ordinary criteria for dating and estimating literary matter will seem inapplicable in such a case: the mention of Cyrus by a prophet who lived more than a cent. before his appearance cannot serve as evidence of imposture or mistaken ascription. Nor cd. arguments drawn fm. environment or language have any weight. The general belief of the Jews, at any rate fm. the second cent. B.C., and the Christians till about the eighteenth cent., attributed these powers to the prophet, whence it was not unnatural that with the latter community many passages in the second half of the bk. and some in the first were thought to apply primarily to the Christian Saviour.

To those who regard miraculous powers as inconsistent with the order of nature, and the power of prediction as in conflict with the freedom of the human will, the traditional ascription of these prophecies is fraught with difficulty; and many critics, abandoning the tradition, have attempted to locate them by processes resembling those employed in ordinary historical research. These studies have led to the division of the bk. between a great many authors, dating fm. the time of the traditional Isaiah to the beginning of the Greek period, i.e. somewhat after B.C. 300, or even later (B.C. 120). A theory wh., first made popular by Döderlein in the eighteenth cent., has found wide acceptance, assigns the second half in the main to a Second Isaiah (Deuteroisaias), contemporary of Cyrus and resident in Babylonia: attributing the inclusion of these oracles in Isaiah's bk. to mistake or the accidental juxtaposition of the two rolls. This hypothesis involves that of serious interpolation in the first half, and even the brilliant chaps. 13., 14., and 35. come under this head, as they deal with the fall of Bab. and the fate of the Exiles. This results, therefore, in a highly complicated hypothesis, wh. is moreover seriously invalidated by (1) the fact already noticed, that the first half is presupposed by the second half, whence the notion that the two were accidentally attributed to the same prophet can scarcely be maintained; and (2) the undeniable uniformity of the whole, at least to the extent that both parts are unequalled in Heb. literature for pathos and sublimity of expression. Endeavours that have been made to prove the language employed in different parts to differ in date have been unsuccessful; whereas some curious coincidences have been noticed. Hence it has been suggested that the whole is one author's work, but belongs to the latest date wh. critics have tried to establish for any part of it, i.e. the Greek period. The author mainly responsible for this suggestion supposes the nucleus of the bk. to be the chapters incorporated fm. the Kings, whence the fabricator obtained the name of Isaiah with his historical location, to base thereon this volume of oracles. Hitherto this theory has met with little acceptance, partly owing to the confirmation by cuneiform inscriptions of the capture of Ashdod by Sargon mentioned in Is. 20.^{1}, wh. is not recorded in the Kings, and wh. it seems incredible that a forger of a later period cd. have known; but still more by the improbability that the classical language of this bk. cd. have been written in the Greek period. Slightly less improbability wd. attach to a theory wh. made the whole originate in the Captivity. An argument of some weight in favour of conflation of documents on a large scale may be drawn from the incorporation in the bk. of oracles elsewhere assigned to Jeremiah and Micah.

Structure of the Book according to Current Hypotheses.—The amount of Isaianic matter wh. modern criticism finds in the book is therefore small. The following is the list given by Stade (1889): chaps. 1.–11.^{5}, 17.$^{1\text{-}12}$, 18.–20., 22., 28.–31. (most of these chapters are, however, said to contain interpolations). The following is the list given by Cheyne (1895): chap. 1. (except vv.

1–4 and 27, 28), 2.[6-22], 3. (parts), 5., 6., 7., 8. (mainly), 9.[7]–10.[4] (some other verses in 10.), 15.[1]–18.[6], 20., 21.[11]–23., 28.[1-22], 29.[1-15], 30.[1-17], 31. According to the latter the latest oracle embodied in the bk. is 19.[16-25], "not earlier than 275": the former appears to regard the verses as the work of the genuine Isaiah. Hence it appears that critics of the same school may differ to the extent of over four hundred yrs. in the dates wh. they assign particular passages. In general the arguments by wh. they are located wd. be assigned little value in other fields of historical inquiry.

Of the second part various divisions have been attempted, those chapters which speak of the Return as in the future being referred to the period between the rise of Cyrus and the fall of Bab. (539), while others wh. call attention to definite abuses are referred to the period after the Return, interpreted where possible from the scanty historical data of Ezra and Nehemiah, and located at various points in the fifth, fourth, and third centuries B.C. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the place where the prophet of the Return resided, most critics being probably in favour of Babylonia; and indeed some acquaintance is displayed with Babylonian civilisation, though not more than wd. be matter of common kge. when that country was at the head of a world-empire. There is an almost total dearth of local and personal names wh. is very unlike the wealth in such specifications to be found in the first half of the bk. in connection with the Assyrian campaigns. The discourses, however, are even so too seditious to have been delivered with safety in public; but if they were delivered in private (wh. the prophet declares was not the case, 45.[19], 48.[16]), the reason for such vagueness is obscure.

The prophets whose oracles are assigned to the period after the Return are supposed to have been resident at Jrs.

Collection of these Works into a Volume bearing the Name of Isaiah.—It has been seen that the bk. is known to have existed in its present form (in the main) early in the second cent. B.C. According to the Jewish tradition Hezekiah collected the prophecies of Isaiah, and this, though a guess, wd. not be improbable, if that king is rightly connected with other literary enterprises (Pr. 25.[1]). The prophecies themselves contain some allusions to their being written (at least in part, 30.[8], 8.[1]) and guarded in the prophet's school (8.[20]); and the autobiographical matter (especially 6., 8.) cannot easily be thought of otherwise than as coming fm. memoirs written by the prophet, though Jr. 36.[18] might seem to imply that the writing of oracles was an innovation in Jeremiah's time. In 59.[21] there appears to be a reference to an oral tradition of them in the prophet's family. Some have supposed that the Bk. of the Lord, mentioned 34.[18], is to be interpreted of an original bk. of Isaiah, but this suggestion has little probability, the phrase being more probably poetical. The theory of the origin of the bk. that has been sketched above wd. imply that in the course of five centuries this nucleus of genuine oracles (whether first issued by Hezekiah or by the prophet himself) had been re-edited repeatedly, with fresh and ever fresh accretions. Suggestions that may be quoted are that the first part was at one time a collection resembling that of the twelve Minor Prophets; and that the nucleus was purposely swollen by the addition of matter of doubtful authenticity in order that Isaiah might not sink to the rank of a Minor Prophet. Of the production of "editions" we have absolutely no record, nor indeed wd. it be easy to state with precision what that process wd. mean; but if the plurality of authorship be established, the collection was probably put together by combining survivals of written documents with oral tradition, wh. may indeed have been preserved in particular families, professing descent fm. Isaiah, or have been attributed to Isaiah on critical grounds. The tendency wh. led to both collection and attribution wd. be the same as produced the Bk. of Psalms.

Chief Topics.—An analysis of the contents of the bk. wd. exceed the limits of the present article. The various styles represented may be classified as the oracular, the homiletic, the hymnodic, the apocalyptic, the narrative, and autobiographical: the first, fifth, and sixth are confined to the first half, the others spread over both halves. By oracles we mean messages delivered either in reply to consultation, or in reference to some definite situation: such are found in the first half, in reference to the following countries (besides Judah and Israel): Arabia or Kedar, 21.[13]; Assyria, 7.[17], &c.; Babylon, especially 13., 14., 21.; Damascus, 17.[1]; Dumah, 21.[11]; Edom, 34.; Egypt, 19., 30.; Ethiopia (with Egypt), 20.; Moab, 15., 16.; Philistia, 14.[29]; Silsal Kenafaim (unknown), 18.; Tyre, 23.; the Wilderness of the Sea (heading), 21. Some connection with Israelitish politics can be found in each case. The oracles dealing with political emergencies are given to Ahaz spontaneously, but to Hezekiah after consultation. It is not certain whether we are to think of the others as sent (like Jeremiah's) to the nations concerned or delivered to Jewish audiences. The homiletic style is represented by the first chapter, and numerous others, in which the sins of the people are denounced, esp. idolatry, and practices connected therewith; besides various vices and social evils. According to a practice observable in other prophecies, threat is made almost invariably to alternate with promise. In these "remonstrances" no class of the population is spared; and there are two vigorous denunciations of the women of the community. The hymns or songs show even less trace of metrical scheme than can be found in the psalms, though their poetic merits are in no way inferior. The apocalyptic passages are those in wh. the glories of the "new heaven and new earth" are depicted; they occur chiefly in the second half, but even the first two chapters show the idea matured.

Partly owing to difficulties of language, but still more to the absence of any authoritative commentary traceable to the author, the bk. is in numerous places obscure, and the ease with wh. the Christian interpretation gained ground shows at least that there was no generally recognised reference of such passages as 7.[14], 9.[5], wh. had to be refuted before the NT. interpretation cd. be received. Even where the oracles seem unusually clear, and the persons to whom they refer are known, there is usually some obscurity, e.g. 22.[15] threatens Shebna, the mayor of the palace, with exile, his place being given to Eliakim, son of Hilkiah; but in 37.[2], while Eliakim appears as mayor of the palace, Shebna occupies the honourable position of state secretary. To some oracles, e.g. chap. 18., the key appears to be entirely lost.

In the latter portion the most interesting problem is that connected with the import of the phrase, "Servant of the Lord," occurring especially 42.[1-4, 18-25], 49., 50.[4-9], 52.[13]–53.[12]. The resemblance of the function and career of the Servant, as described in these passages, to those of the Christian Messiah was found so striking that their effect both on the development and propagation of Christian doctrine cd. not be easily over-estimated; but the majority of modern critics have endeavoured to find a less distant reference, not without some countenance fm. the text of the prophet, in wh. the title Servant is at times given to "Jacob" or "Israel," and the introduction of the word "Israel" into 52.[13] is not wholly devoid of plausibility. On the other hand, the functions ascribed to the Servant being such as cannot be reconciled with those of the whole nation, it has often been held that the name applies to the pious kernel of it, or even the members of the prophetic profession. As, however, some of the texts seem to refer distinctly to an individual, another set of commentators have searched the hist. for a suitable identification; and among the names that have been suggested those of Hezekiah, Jehoiachin, and Zerubbabel may be mentioned. A yet older exegesis interpreted the Servant as the prophet himself, and for this, too, a plausible case may be made out. The passages dealing with the Servant are by some critics separated fm. the rest of the Second Isaiah, and even assigned to different authors. Another theory makes (at any rate portions of) them relics of older hymns, adapted to some new ideas. It seems clear that only archæological discovery, continuing such finds as have recently been made at Elephantine, can settle finally the direction in wh. the solution of this problem is to be sought.

History of Interpretation.—The events recorded in the Gospels gave a new significance to a large portion of the bk., while at the same or perhaps an earlier period, attempts were made to explain it by the aid of Greek philosophy. The Christian interpretation largely affected the Jewish, which, while adopting part of it, endeavoured in various ways to evade the application of the oracles to Jesus Christ. The results of modern criticism have, as has been seen, been more largely negative or suggestive than positive and satisfactory.

ISCARIOT. See JUDAS.

ISHBOSHETH, s. of Saul, who at Mahanaim was proclaimed k. over all Isr., except Judah, wh. had chosen David at Hebron. The original form of the name was Ishbaal (1 Ch. 8.[33], 9.[39]). In early times J". was freely spoken of under the designation of Baal, "Lord." But the name came to be used for the Phœnician deity as distinguished fm. J"., and in personal names this element was changed to bosheth, "shameful thing" (2 S. 2.[8], &c.; cp. Jg. 6.[32]; 2 S. 11.[21]; 2 S. 4.[4]; 1 Ch. 8.[34], &c.). His army under Abner was defeated by the troops of David at Gibeon (2 S. 2.[12ff.]). Abner, smarting under an insult (see ABNER), went over to David (3.[6ff.]). This was the death-blow to the hopes of I. Soon after he was murdered by Rechab and Baanah (4.[1ff.]), who brought his head to David, and were forthwith ordered to execution. Thus bereaved, all the tribes rallied to David (5.[1ff.]).

ISHMAEL (Heb. Yishma'ēl, "God hears," Gn. 16.[11]). (1) S. of Abraham by HAGAR, an Egyptian handmaid of Sarah (Gn. 16.[15]). Driven forth with her child by reason of Sarah's jealousy, Hagar went towards her native land. At Beer-lahai-roi, prob. the mod. Muweilih, on the Egyptian highway, 25 miles N. of 'Ain Qadīs, the angel of the Lord turned her back. The promise of great posterity for I. is followed by a characterisation wh. accurately describes his descts. He is to be "a wild ass among men," capricious, intractable, dwelling in the open, like the Bedawy tribes who brook no restriction of their freedom, over whom even their own chiefs have no absolute dominion, who regard as God-sent booty whatever they can take fm. caravan or traveller on the way. God confirmed to Abraham the promise made to Hagar, and at the age of 13 I. was circumcised (Gn. 17.[20-24]; cp. 16.[16]). Sarah's motherly interest in her own s. gave her no peace while I. remained in the camp, so Hagar and I. were finally dismissed by Abraham. They narrowly escaped death in the desert through the intervention of an angel, who discovered to Hagar water near by, and spoke words of good cheer (21.[9ff.]). This nar. assumes that I. was still a child in arms (vv. 14, 15, 20), while chap. 16.[16] (cp. 17.[24]) wd. make him now at least 16 yrs. old. The difference is explained by the combining of different accounts, that in 16., 17., 21.[5] being fm. P., that in 21.[8ff.] fm. E. When I. "grew up" (21.[20]) he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, married an Egyptian w., and became famous as an archer. I. met Isaac at their fr.'s burial (25.[9]). He lived 137 yrs. (25.[17]).

For the sons of I. who rank as ancestors of the tribes named after them, see separate articles (Gn. 25.[13]). See also ARABIA. As his descts. increased they came to occupy the land to the E. of Pal. (25.[18]). Esau married Mahalath (28.[9]), or Basemath (36.[3]), a dr. of I.

Ishmaelites are mentioned as trading by caravan with Egp. (Gn. 37.[25], J. = "Midianites," v. 36, E.). The name poss. denoted their occupation, not their race; cp. Jg. 8.[24]. See also 1 Ch. 2.[17], 27.[30]; Ps. 83.[6].

(2) The murderer of GEDALIAH, whom, after the fall of Jrs., Nebuchadnezzar had made governor, with his residence at Mizpeh. I., s. of Nethaniah, of Davidic stock, at first submitted to Gedaliah, but later, at the instance of the Ammonite k. Baalis, undertook to kill him. Gedaliah disbelieved reports of his design, and discouraged measures to prevent it. This confidence made easy for I. and his ten associates the treacherous murder of Gedaliah and his attendants. I. seems to have taken the town, into wh., two days later, he enticed 80 pilgrims bound for Jrs., and put them to death; ten men promised to discover stores of provisions and were spared. I. attempted to carry away the inhabitants of Mizpeh and the k.'s drs., but was overtaken at Gibeon by Johanan ben-Kareah and his troops. He was unable to keep his prisoners, and escaped to Baalis with only eight men (2 K. 25.[23ff.]; Jr. 40., 41.). For others see 1 Ch. 8.[38], 9.[44]; 2 Ch. 19.[11], 23.[1]; Ez. 10.[22].

ISLAND, ISLE (Heb. 'ī, pl. 'īyyim, Gr. nēsos, nēsion). If Caphtor (Jr. 47.[4], RV.) is Crete, we have one cert. use in OT. of "island" in the mod. sense. But almost always the word stands for land washed by the sea, coast-lands. Thus, e.g., "the isles of the Gentiles" (Gn. 10.[5]) are the lands on the W. Mediterranean seaboard. For islands named in NT. see separate articles.

ISRAEL. The purpose of the present article is to sketch the hist. of Isr. fm. the entrance of ABRAHAM into Pal. till the final fall of the nation before Rome. Under ABRAHAM, JACOB, MOSES, SAMUEL, SAUL, DAVID, &c., fuller information is given regarding the periods specially associated with these names.

Palestine B.C. 2000.—The country was sparsely covered by a number of small cities surrounded with earthen walls strengthened by towers at intervals; a larger tower or towers marked the gateways, in front of wh. markets were held; within the GATE the Elders met in session as judges or legislators. A considerable territory round the walls was occupied by the citizens for purposes of agriculture. Notwithstanding, as at present, there were great open tracts claimed by no one as property, where nomadic tribes might pasture their flocks and herds. Those cities, while to a great extent independent, probably were united to each other in somewhat loose leagues. The head of each city generally assumed the title of king. It wd. seem that HEBRON was a republic in the time of Abraham; as also, a little later, SHECHEM, and still later, GIBEON. As at present, there were different races scattered in patches over the land. The powerful HITTITE race, who contested with Asyr. and Egp. the supremacy of SW. Asia, abutted on Pal. in the N., but had an offshoot in the S. at Hebron. The HIVITES appear to have had their possessions in the centre of the country; tho' they seem also to have had territory between Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon. The Canaanites inhabited the plain, and the AMORITES and the JEBUSITES the mountains. The Amorites were early so prominent that at all events the hill portion of the country was known both to the Egyptians and the Assyrians as the "Land of the Amorite." Besides these there were fragments of primitive races, Emim, Zamzummim, and Horim; and, connected with them, the Anakim, and Rephaim. These were not in so advanced a stage of civilisation as the other inhabitants. They do not seem at first to have had cities, tho' later the Anakim had migrated into Hebron. The language of the peoples seems to have been a tongue akin to Heb. In religion, if we are to be guided by the notices in Gn. (14.[18], 20.[11ff.]), they were worshippers of "the Most High God" ('el 'elyôn), who had his shrine in Salem, whose priest was MELCHIZEDEK.

There is light thrown on Melchizedek by the Tell el-Amarna tablets. Among the correspondents of Khu-n-Aten is Ebed-Tob, k. of Uru-Salim (Jerusalem—see Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, 71, 72).

As in Egypt, and in many savage nations of the present day, along with the supreme God many inferior deities were reverenced.

Into this land came, entering by the N., a great tribe of nomads fm. the banks of the Euphrates. Their leader, or to call him by the modern name, "sheikh," was an old man who had come through many spiritual experiences. The original home of these wanderers had been the city of UR, near the Persian Gulf. Thence they had migrated to Harran, near the fords of the Euphrates. After a stay of some time there, they crossed the Great River: wherefore they were called 'Ebiri, "Hebrews,"

"the men from beyond," i.e. beyond the river. Thence they journeyed S. and entered Pal. fm. Damascus. Along with the aged sheikh ABRAHAM was his nephew LOT, who, travelling with his uncle, had yet an independent following. Their first stay was made near Sichem (Shechem), under the shadow of Mount Gerizim. There an altar was built, but they do not seem to have had any intercourse with the Shechemites. Their next halt was at a place between Bethel and Ai. They continued their S'ward journey, when a season of drought, followed by famine, led the nomads to take refuge in Egypt. The reigning dynasty was Hyksos, and the Hebrews, as kindred Semites, were received with a disturbing amount of cordiality; the k., regarding Sarai as Abraham's sister, took her into his harem as a pledge of their alliance. The danger thus threatened was averted by Divine interposition (Gn. 12.[10ff.]). After a short stay in Egp. the nomads returned to Pal. and reoccupied their former district between Bethel and Ai. Their wealth had been increased by their residence in Egp., so that Abraham and his nephew cd. not pasture their flocks together. They agreed to separate. Lot went to the rich plain of Jordan, but Abraham remained in the hill-country, and moved S. to Hebron. In Hebron he made an alliance with the Amorite and Hittite inhabitants. Not long after this Chedor-laomer, the Elamite suzerain of Babylonia, and his allies invaded Pal. to recall to their allegiance those who had rebelled after their previous submission. The kings of the plain of Jordan were defeated and their cities plundered. Among the captives was Lot. This led Abraham to arm his followers and call upon his allies to assist him in pursuit of the conquerors. Surprising them by night, he released the captives and regained what had been taken.

After this overthrow the suzerainty pased fm. the Elamites to AMRAPHEL (Ḥammurabi).

The destruction of the Cities of the Plain appears to have happened shortly after Abraham's return to Hebron fm. this expedition. At this point in the hist. is introduced the nar. explaining the descent fm. Lot of the Moabites and Ammonites. The relationship between Isr. and the Arab tribes is exhibited in the story of ISHMAEL. ISAAC, the son of Abraham's old age, is the progenitor of Isr. After his father's death Isaac became the leader of the clan. His marriage with REBECCA indicates at once a maintaining of relations with Assyria and a break off fm. the inhabitants of the land. Connected with this, if not the occasion of it, mt. be the growing density of the population and the consequent limitation of spaces free for pasture. Altho' dwelling at the edge of the desert, away fm. the centres of population, Isaac is involved in continuous contests about wells. This same cause may have led Isaac to supplement his care for his sheep with cultivation of the ground (Gn. 26.[12]). In consequence of a quarrel between Isaac's two sons, Jacob, the younger, fled to Padan-aram. His br. Esau allied himself with the neighbouring clans and left his blind fr. After 20 years JACOB returned with a new Semite clan wh. he had gathered together. As Jacob was manifesting a desire to give Joseph the place of "first-born," so ousting Reuben fm. his right, the rest of the sons conspired agst. Joseph, and he was sold into slavery. Time rolls on and the slave becomes prime minister of Pharaoh, the last of the Hyksos rulers of Egp. He induces his fr. and the clans that had gathered round his brethren to come down to Egp. In order at once to supply the country with a defence agst. raids, and to have a means at hand for retaliation, he placed his kinsfolk in the border territory of Goshen. At the death of their fr. the sons of Joseph seem to have united themselves and their followers to the clans of Isr. There is a reference to a counter-raid by the Ephraimites agst. the S. of Pal. (1 Ch. 7.[21]).

While it is not impossible, and not at all derogatory to Scrip. to regard the Patriarchs as impersonations of tribes, since in Gn. 10. tribes are declared to be the sons of individuals (vv. 15–18); yet the intense personality of the leading Patriarchs, Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph, and the minute accuracy as to habits, render it impossible to regard them as other than historical persons.

The discovery of Dr. Pinches that the four Eastern confederate kings of Gn. 14. were really kings in Babylonia, and contemporaries, heightens the probability that the whole narrative is historical. The utter carelessness as to mere fact congenital to the Jew renders it improbable in the highest degree that, in inventing a victory for Abraham, he wd. search the Babylonian records for four kings contemporary with each other. Their names conveyed no idea to his immediate public. In Jewish and Mohammedan tradition Nimrod is made the opponent of Abraham. Cornill (Introduction to the Canonical Bks. of the OT., p. 128) says that a Jew with literary instincts cd. obtain names and dates fm. the old Mesopotamian hist. in abundance. He wd. be a marvellous Jew who wd. search for such historical personages, merely for a Midrash. The purpose of the Midrash was moral, and historic accuracy was of little value, as every student of the Tlm. knows. Cornill himself doubts Zimmern's unproved assertion to the effect that an epos involving Ḥammurai was extant in the time of the Seleucids. Mere abstract possibility is no proof of actuality.

The fall of the Hyksos dynasty and the rise of the native kings was naturally adverse to Isr. What was the dynasty of the oppression and what was the duration of Isr.'s stay in Egp. are questions difficult to answer. The fact of a lengthened residence in Egp. may be regarded as indubitable.

That there was a Musr. (Egypt) in Arabia may be taken for granted; it probably was a name given to the Egyptian possessions in the Sinaitic peninsula. It does not follow that Isr. was only in this, and not in the greater Musr.—Egp. proper. As well mt. it be regarded as valid reasoning to argue that because there was adjoining Normandy a "Bretagne" much more accessible than "la Grande Bretagne" across the sea, it was the former, not the latter, wh. was conquered by William Duke of Normandy in the eleventh cent.

Oppressed and enslaved in Egp. they called to God and were led out fm. the land of bondage by Moses, who opened a way for them through the Red Sea. He led them to the foot of Mt. Sinai, where he delivered to them "the Law of Jehovah (JHVH)," and united the people in a covenant relation to Him. Here also he erected the Tabernacle. The people were miraculously sustained by manna fm. heaven, water fm. the rock, and quails brought by the wind.

To those who believe in revelation the presence of miracle in a nar. dces not prove it to be unhistorical. This does not mean that we are to multiply marvels. One of the greatest difficulties is the great number of Isr. when they left Egp. This applies not only to the Exodus and the journey through the wilderness, but also to the conquest of Canaan. A huge army of more than 600,000, under one leader, wd. have subdued in a single campaign a small country like Pal., inhabited by differing races dwelling in small independent cities. A suggestion of Dr. Petrie is worthy of consideration; that 'eleph (EV. "a thousand") shd. be rendered "family," as it is in Jg. 6.[15]; so instead of reading (Nu. 1.[21]) "of the tribe of Reuben were forty-six thousand five hundred," it ought to be "forty-six families, five hundred men." Mrs. Gibson suggests that 'eleph is an interpolation, and we shd. read "of the tribe of Reuben five hundred and forty-six." Both schemes imply that the summations of the camps and of the people have been added in Nu., both in chaps. 1. and 2. and in chap. 26. They wd. both necessitate a modification of the numbers in Jo. 7.[4], 8.[3, 12, 25] also. In both schemes the number of warriors wd. be about 6000; and the whole of the men, women, and children about 30,000. When they encamped in the wilderness, it was probably not in four large camps, but in relatively small groups of tents embracing only a "family" each. The "forty years" in the wilderness may be taken as a round number indicating any space of time fm. 25 to 60 yrs.

After a long period of journeying Isr. arrived in the plains of Moab. There they encountered and conquered the Amorite kings Sihon and Og. In acknowledgment of kinship Isr. did not assault or dispossess Edom, Moab, or Ammon. Before he was taken fm. them Moses addressed the assembled tribes and re-enacted the "Law" with modifications (Deuteronomy). Having renewed his exhortations to the tribes of Isr., Moses ascended Mt. Nebo to die. He was succeeded by Joshua, who had been his servant, and had acted as military leader during the march through the wilderness. Under him Isr. crossed the Jordan, wh. was dried up before them. The walls of Jericho fell down before the simple blast of their trumpets. City after city was then besieged and taken; and merciless slaughter was meted out to the inhabitants.

In considering this we must bear in mind (a) that Isr. cd. not be lifted violently out of the moral atmosphere of their time, nor follow a different practice in warfare fm. that wh. was customary. (b) We must also not forget that our own colonists have a way of killing out the aborigines in any land where they settle; they can neither claim the sanction of Divine command, nor excuse themselves by the practice of modern warfare. (c) There was the necessity, for the ultimate benefit of humanity, that Isr. be kept pure fm. idolatry and its attendant pollutions.

During the lifetime of Joshua thirty-one cities and their territories seem to sum up the conquests of Isr. These cities were scattered over the country; thus there was an excuse for the division of Western Pal. into ten portions by Joshua and Eleazar. The conquest was continued by the different tribes in the spheres thus allotted to them. During the lifetime of Joshua the central authority was represented, not only by the leader, but also by the "Elders of Isr." The allotment of separate provinces to the different tribes made the government tribal; so it appears to be throughout the period of the Judges (Judges). That Isr. became now a loose confederacy laid them more open to assaults fm. without; hence foreign invaders were so often the instruments of Divine chastisement on them for their lapses into idolatry. When the oppression had served its purpose God raised up for Isr. a deliverer, a Judge. How far these oppressions were successive, and how far they overlapped, it is impossible to say. As indefinite is our kge. of the char. and extent of the authority exercised by the Judges. The struggle with the Phil. forced upon Isr. the need of greater unity; and this feeling found its exponent in Samuel. He endeavoured to regularise the government by arranging a system of circuits, and appointed his sons as Judges under himself. The people wished to go further than Samuel desired; he wished as the principal magistrate, the divinely appointed Judge, raised and inspired by God for a special emergency; but the people desired a king to be their permanent generalissimo. In the choice of Saul by lot JHVH was acknowledged as the true k. of Isr. The kingship of Saul was limited; he was expected to be guided by Samuel the prophet. He, however, wd. not yield to this, and so alienated the prophetic order. His massacre of the priests at Nob naturally put him at enmity with the priests. A man religious even to superstition, Saul was now isolated. By his defeat and death on Gilboa the way was opened for the accession of David, who had, even during the lifetime of Saul, gained the favour of the Prophetic and the Priestly parties.

David's kdm. at first consisted only of Judah, but gradually it embraced all Isr. He conquered Moab and Ammon on the E., Edom on the S., Philistia on the W., and Syria on the N. His rule was really imperial on a small scale. Solomon succeeded to this extensive kdm., and at first maintained it; but causes of discontent and consequent disintegration appeared. The erection of his splendid Temple appeared to consolidate the national unity, by thus glorifying the national hearth. His magnificence was costly; the philosophic indifference wh. led him to permit the worship of heathen deities in rival shrines over against the Temple alienated prophets and priests.

At the death of Solomon and the accession of his s., Rehoboam, the Northern tribes revolted. There had always been a tendency on the side of Judah and Simeon, whose tribe had been absorbed in Judah, to segregate themselves; now Benjamin stayed by the House of David; the Temple made it natural that the Levites as a whole shd. follow the Southern tribes. The Northern tribes, joined by those E. of Jordan, chose Jeroboam as their k. He had returned fm. a lengthened exile in Egp. whither he had fled fm. Solomon. He introduced the worship of the Calves at Bethel and at Dan; probably the Egyptian Apis-worship suggested to Jeroboam the calf as the symbol of JHVH. There was little stability in the Northern Kdm.; the dynasties of Jeroboam, Baasha, and Omri flit across the stage; only the last seeing the third generation. Ahab, the s. of Omri, endeavoured to introduce the worship of Baal alongside of that of JHVH. It is to be noted that all the sons of Ahab whose names are recorded have JHVH as an element in the name—Joash, Ahaziah, Jehoram. Against the impure cult of BAAL the prophets ELIJAH and ELISHA set themselves. Finally they overthrew the house of Omri and replaced it by that of JEHU. The new dynasty seemed to endeavour to keep on friendly terms with the prophets; under Jeroboam II. the Northern Kdm. attained its greatest extent and power. After this the descent was rapid; in less than a generation Samaria was taken, and the Northern Kdm. ceased to be.

Although, if we sum up the reigns of the successive kings fm. the death of Jeroboam II., we have 41 years; yet between the accession of Tiglath-pileser, who exacted tribute fm. Menahem, and the fall of Samaria, there are, accdg. to the Assyrian records, only 23 years; hence we cannot regard the time between the death of Jeroboam II. and the end of the kdm. of Isr. as more than 31 years. Kautzsch supposes that Pekah's reign shd. only be 6 instead of 20 years.

There was much greater stability in the Southern Kdm. With the exception of the six yrs. of Athaliah's usurpation the House of David held the throne. Though the Temple was the principal seat of worship, yet until the accession of Hezekiah, who saw the fall of Samaria, the people still sacrificed in the HIGH PLACES. He began a puritan reformation on Deuteronomic lines. Sennacherib, the s. of the conqueror of Samaria, invaded Judah but did not take Jrs. Hezekiah's reformation did not sink into the heart of the people, for under his successor, Manasseh, idolatrous worship was set up and the prophets of JHVH put to death. Though Amon was, like his fr., an idolater, JOSIAH, who followed him on the throne, pursued the same religious policy as Hezekiah.

It was during his reign that "the Book of the Law" was found in "the House of the Lord." It is assumed without evidence that this was DEUTERONOMY. There is nothing in the narrative to prevent it containing the whole enactments of the Pentateuch. In 2 K. 23.[2] the bk. is called "the Book of the Covenant"; this phrase is found in Ex. 24.[7] (J.: Addis attributes this v. to E.); some portion of the Torah, not DEUTERONOMY, must be understood by this designation.

The weakening of the Assyrian Empire was taken advantage of by Necho, k. of Egp., to endeavour to restore the dominion of Egp. over W. Asia. Josiah had, in the weakness of Assyria, resumed royal power over the Northern Kdm. He resented and attempted to resist the passage of the Egyptian army. He was defeated and slain at Megiddo, and Necho put Jehoiakim on the throne. Necho himself was overthrown at Carchemish by NEBUCHADNEZZAR. The young conqueror followed up his victory, receiving the submission of the various tributaries of Egp., among the rest that of Jehoiakim, apparently after a siege (Dn. 1.[1]). Jehoiakim rebelled, and in the reign of his s., Jeconiah, Jrs. was taken, and the king carried captive to Bab. His uncle, Zedekiah, set on the throne, also rebelled; again the city was captured, the Temple was ruined, and the whole city made a desolation. Nebuchadnezzar deported all the inhabitants likely to be centres of rebellion and brought them to Bab.

If reckoned fm. the capture of Jrs. the Babylonian captivity lasted about fifty years. The residence of the Jews in Bab. did not result in their absorption in the mass of the population, as seems to have been the case with the deported of the ten tribes. While they maintained their religious isolation they seem otherwise to have made themselves at home in the city of their exile, as may be seen by the relatively small number that returned when the decree of Cyrus gave them permission. As the Temple services were not open to them in Bab., the worship of the synagogue came into all the greater prominence. The exiles that returned to Pal. found themselves in a land very different fm. that whence their frs. had been carried captive. Intruders fm. neighbouring countries had taken possession of the land of Isr. The Jews who had been left had in many cases intermarried with these strangers. Although Heb. was known in Jewish families, the language of ordinary intercourse was Aramaic. When they had arrived, they set up an altar to the Lord; and, pari passu with dwellings for themselves, they began to erect the Temple again. When it was dedicated those who remembered the former Temple wept at the sight of the relatively mean aspect of the newly built edifice. Various bands of the exiles returned; notably one under Ezra. They now began to think of rebuilding the walls of Jrs., but met with many hindrances, to a large extent fm. the envy of the SAMARITANS whom they had refused to allow to take part in the rebuilding of the Temple.

After the departure of Nehemiah a veil falls on the hist. of Isr. till the conquest of Alexander. A new element entered now into SW. Asia. Greek cities sprang up everywhere, in Pal. as well as elsewhere; the Greek language began to supersede Aramaic as the medium of intercourse; Greek culture had a fascination for the Jew. At first Pal. formed part of the Lagid dominion; and under the Ptolemies the Jews enjoyed much freedom of worship. In these circumstances the process of Hellenisation went on peaceably. When Pal. passed into the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes there was an attempt made to hasten the process, and put down Judaism by force. This produced the revolt of the Jewish people under the leadership of Mattathias, the priest of Modin, and his heroic sons. The conflict was maintained agst. great odds. The Maccabean brothers fell one by one, but the people fought on, till at last the Seleucids had to acknowledge the independence of the Jews under John Hyrcanus. He conquered Galilee, the E. of Jordan, and invaded Samaria and burned the Temple on Mt. Gerizim. Edom he also conquered, and compelled the people to be circumcised and become Jews. He ruled only with the title High Priest, but his s., Aristobulus I., assumed the title King. He was succeeded by his br., Alexander Jannæus. On his death there was a conflict between his sons, John Hyrcanus II. and Aristobulus II., for the supreme power. This occasioned the intervention of the Romans under Pompey, who took Aristobulus captive to Rome and declared Hyrcanus High Priest and Ethnarch, while the Idumæan Antipater, his major-domo, was appointed Roman Procurator. Antigonus, s. of Aristobulus, by the help of the Parthians, snatched a momentary victory, and for a short while held Jrs. By the Parthians Hyrcanus was taken prisoner and mutilated so that he cd. not be High Priest. Antigonus was soon dispossessed, and after various vicissitudes Herod the s. of Antipater, who had married the grand-dr. of Hyrcanus, secured the throne (HERODIANS). His s. Archelaus, who succeeded with the title of Ethnarch, was deposed, and Judea became a Roman province. So it remained with the exception of a short period, when the first Agrippa received the territory of his grandfr. During the rule of the Roman Procurators the alienation of the Jews fm. their Roman masters became more and more acute, till they definitely rebelled agst. Gessius Florus and Cestius Gallus. The latter made an attempt to take Jrs. but had to make a disastrous retreat. Vespasian was appointed to the command in the war agst. the Jews. He began his operations in Galilee, and took city after city. Before he carried the conflict into Judea the death of Nero occurred, and the struggle for the Empire began. While prosecuting his claim to the throne Vespasian left the conduct of the campaign to his s. Titus. After a heroic defence Jrs. was taken by assault, and the slave-market was glutted with Jewish captives. Two generations later the attempt of Barcochba to restore the sacred kdm. excited the hopes of the Jews; but it was quenched in blood. While Isr. ceased as a state it lived on as a religion, having its synagogues in every city of the Roman Empire. The Sanhedrin still continued, no longer as council of state but as an assembly of scholars; it was moved fm. Jrs. to Jabne, to Sepphoris, to Tiberias. There was no longer Israel, but Judaism.

ISSACHAR (Yissākhār [pointed in MT. יִשָּׂשכָר]; some tr. as 'ish sākhār, "a hired worker"). (1) Ninth s. of Jacob, the fifth by Leah (Gn. 30.[18], 35.[23]). Of his life no details are given. For strength of the tribe see NUMBERS. The boundaries of the "lot" of I. cannot be certainly traced (Jo. 17.[10], 19.[17ff.]). On the E. was Jordan, on the N. Zebulun and Naphtali, on the S. Manasseh, and on the W. Manasseh, and poss. Asher. It does not seem to have touched the sea. It included Tabor and Moreh, and the great plain (see JEZREEL). Manasseh held cert. towns in I. (Jo. 17.[11]). I. played a heroic part in the battle with Sisera (Jg. 5.[15]). They did not then deserve the reproach implied in Gn. 49.[14f.] Enjoyment of their rich land may have induced a softer mood. Dt. 33.[18] poss. refers to a sanctuary on Tabor to wh. people were attracted fm. afar. A market connected with this, such as till recently was held under the shadow of the mountain at Khān et-Tujjār, wd. prove a source of enrichment. (2) S. of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26.[5]).

ISSUE. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES.

ITALIAN BAND. See AUGUSTUS' BAND.

ITALY originally applied to the SW. corner, but fm. Cæsar's time it covered the whole of the peninsula now called by that name, reaching to the foot of the Alps. In Ac. 18.[2] I. is poss. = Rome. Many Jews were attracted to I. as the home of the world's masters (Ac. 2.[10]), and Christianity was early introduced there (He. 13.[24]).

ITCH. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES.

ITHAMAR, youngest s. of AARON (Ex. 6.[23]), paymaster at the erection of the TABERNACLE (Ex. 38.[21]). He superintended the service of the sons of Gershon and Merari in removing the Tabernacle. Fm. ELI to ABIATHAR the High Priesthood was in the house of I.

ITHRA, the husband of David's sister Abigail, and father of AMASA (2 S. 17.[25]). In this passage he is called an "Israelite." But the reason for stating his nationality at all would prob. be that he was not an Israelite. Most likely, therefore, the reading of 1 Ch. 2.[17] is correct, viz., "Jether the Ishmaelite."

ITTAI. (1) A Phil. fm. Gath, who came to Jrs. with 600 men, poss. as hostages (2 S. 15.[18ff.]: I.'s name has dropped out in v. 18), and became devoted to the service of David. He commanded the third division of the army sent agst. Absalom (18.[2ff.]). There may be a refce. to I. and his 600 in the titles of Ps. 8., 81., 84., wh. Delitzsch, agreeing with Hitzig, thinks may mean "a joyous melody . . . a march of the Gittite guard." (2) One of David's heroes (2 S. 23.[29]; 1 Ch. 11.[31]).

ITURÆA (Lk. 3.[1]). Accdg. to Prof. Ramsay (Expositor, 1894, ix. 51ff., 143ff., 286ff.), the word must be taken as an adj., denoting the country of the Ituræans, the descts. of Jetur (Gn. 25.[15]; 1 Ch. 1.[31]). Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 30) quotes Eupolemus (c. B.C. 150) to the effect that they were among the tribes E. of Jordan agst. wh. David warred. Aristobulus I. (B.C. 105–104) obtained some success agst. them (Ant. XIII. xi. 3). They are frequently mentioned in classical writers (see Lit. in Schürer, HJP. I. ii. 325ff.). They appear now as Syrians, now as Arabians. They were famous as horsemen. They seem to have resided mainly in the Lebanons and the broad vale between them; but prob. held also the uplands SE. of Hermon, the mod. Jēdūr. In B.C. 20 Augustus gave to Herod Ulatha and Panias, wh. prob. had been part of Ituræan territory (Schürer, op. cit. 333). This district, at the death of Herod, was given to the tetrarch Philip (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ. II. vi. 3); doubtless this was meant by the "Ituræan country" in Lk. 3.[1].

IVORY (Heb. shēn, "tooth," shenhabbīm, "elephant's teeth"). The Heb. name shows that the Jews knew the nat. of I. Brought by ships of Tarshish to Solomon (1 K. 10.[22]), who made a throne of I. (1 K. 10.[18]). Ahab made a palace of I.; prob. so called because adorned with inlaid wk. of I. (1 K. 22.[39]). It was prob. brought fm. Africa.

IVVAH, a town, prob. in Syr., named with Hena and Sepharvaim (2 K. 18.[34], &c.). In an interesting article in Expository Times, April 1898, 330, Prof. Hommel suggests that Hena and I. are intended to

J

JAAR (Heb. ya'ar), commonly rendered "forest" or "wood," is taken as a proper name in Ps. 132.[6], RVm. It is prob. a shortened form of the name of Kirjath-jearim, where the ark rested so long—"the town of the woods," Qiryat Yĕ'ārīm, yĕ'ārīm being the pl. of ya'ar.

JAARE-OREGIM (2 S. 21.[19]). The name is prob. "Jair." "Oregim" has slipped into the text by mistake fm. the following line.

JAAZER. See JAZER.

JABAL, son of Lamech and Adah, described as "the father of such as dwell in tents" (Gn. 4.[20]), i.e. the first who followed the nomadic life.

JABBOK, a stream in E. Pal. crossed by Jacob at a ford near PENIEL on his way fm. Mahanaim (Gn. 32.[22ff.]). It is named as the N. border of Sihon's kdm. (Nu. 21.[24]) and as the boundary of Ammon (Dt. 3.[16]). It is the mod. Nahr ez-Zerqā, wh. rises near 'Ammān (= RABBATH AMMON). Taking first a north-easterly direction, with many windings it turns W'ward, and flows through a deep valley with high precipitous banks in many places, reaching the Jordan at ed-Dāmieh. It is the most important stream S. of the Yarmuk. The rich soil in the bed of the valley is covered with luxuriant tropical vegetation.

JABESH-GILEAD, a city in Gad the inhabitants of wh. failed in religious duty, and were terribly punished (Jg. 21.[5ff.]). It was rescued by Saul fm. the Ammonite Nahash (1 S. 11.[1ff.]), and the people showed their gratitude in the hour of his fall (1 S. 31.[11], &c.). The city has utterly disappeared, but the name lingers in Wādy Yabis, wh. breaks down through Gilead almost due E. of Beisān.

JABEZ. (1) An unidentd. town inhabited by scribes (1 Ch. 2.[55]). (2) A desct. of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[9]). The name Ya'bētz is interpreted as if it were Ya'tzēb, "he causes pain." See also play on the word, v. 10.

JABIN. (1) K. of Hazor, defeated and slain by Joshua at the Waters of Merom (11.[1ff.]). (2) K. of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor, whose army under Sisera was destroyed on the banks of the Kishon (Jg. 4., 5.). Critics suspect a mingling of tradition in these two nars., but there are no materials for the reconstruction of the hist.

JABNEEL (Jo. 15.[11]), or JABNEH (2 Ch. 26.[6]). (1) A town on the N. border of Judah, near the sea, taken fm. the Phil., along with Gath and Ashdod, by Uzziah (cp. Ant. V. i. 22; XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7). As Jamnia it figures in the wars of Judas (1 M. 4.[15], &c.), who burned its port and navy (2 M. 12.[8], &c.). Strabo (XVI. p. 75) says J. and its district furnished 40,000 fighting men. Under Jannæus it had passed to the Jews (Ant. XIII. xv. 4), and while it changed hands under Pompey, Gabinius, and Herod, becoming the private property of Tiberius, it still contained a considerable Jewish population. After the destruction of Jrs. it became for a time the seat of the Sanhedrin, and here tradition says the great Gamaliel was buried. It is identd. with Yebneh, a vill. with anct. fortress crowning a hill, 13 miles S. of Jaffa, four miles fm. the coast, with ruins dating fm. Crusading times. The port was at the mouth of Nahr Rūbīn, affording good protection for ancient shipping (for Lit. see Schürer, HJP. II. i. 78f.). (2) A town in Naphtali named with Adami-nekeb and Lakkum (Jo. 19.[33]). It may be = "Jamneia" (Jos. Vit. 37) or "Jamnith" (BJ. II. xx. 6). Conder suggests Yemma, seven miles E. of Tabor.

JACHIN (Heb. yakīn, "He [God] establishes"). (1) S. of Simeon (Gn. 46.[10]). (2) Head of 21st division of priests (1 Ch. 24.[17]). (3) The right hand of the two brazen pillars moulded by Hiram for the entrance of the Temple. See BOAZ.

JACINTH (Gr. hyakinthos, Rv. 9.[17], 21.[20]), a precious stone; it is uncertain what mineral is meant. It may be identical with the mod. sapphire, known to science as zircon. It was found in Syene, in Egp.

JACKAL. This animal is never named in AV., but it is often referred to in OT. (see Fox). (1) The Heb. shū'āl, wh. AV. uniformly renders "fox," certainly denotes the jackal in Jg. 15.[4]. Jackals go in packs, often in great numbers, while the fox is solitary in its habits. A fox may be intended in Ne. 4.[3]. In Ps. 63.[10] we must read "a portion for jackals." Their main food is carrion. Either foxes or jackals may be meant in SS. 2.[15], as both are very fond of grapes, and are cordially hated by the vine-dressers. The jackal's haunts in the daytime are ruins and waste places (La. 5.[18]; Ek. 13.[4]). (2) Tannīm. For AV. "dragons" (Jb. 30.[29], &c.), RV. gives "jackals." In Ek. 2.[2] we shd. prob. read tannīn, as apparently the crocodile is intended. In all other cases "wolves" would poss. be the correct translation. (3) 'Iyyīm, AV. "wild beasts," RV. "wolves" (Is. 13.[22], 34.[14]; Jr. 50.[39]). Cheyne (Isaiah, ad loc.) renders "hyænas." 'I. is lit. "howler," and corresponds to the Arb. ibn 'awā, the common jackal. The howling of the jackals round the city walls is among the most dismal sounds of an Oriental night. (4) 'Ōḥīm, "doleful creatures" (EV. Is. 13.[21]), Cheyne (ad loc.) renders "jackals."

Living chiefly upon carrion, the jackal, save when present in considerable numbers, is not apt to attack men. It issues from its haunts at nightfall. When the challenge of the jackals without is answered by the dogs within the walls, the earlier hours of darkness especially are often made hideous.

JACOB (Ya'aqob), "one who takes by the heel" (Gn. 25.[26]), or "one who outwits" (27.[36]; cp. Ho. 12.[3f.]), the younger twin s. of Isaac and Rebekah. The rivalry between him and his br. Esau began before they were born (25.[22]). In this was foreshadowed the strife between their descendants, the nations of Edom and Isr. (v. 23). Their contrasted chars. led to a division of parental regard, Rebekah loving J., the "quiet" lad about the tents, engaged in peaceful pastoral work, while Isaac's heart was drawn to Esau, the "man of the field," prob. following agricultural pursuits, and at the same time a bold and skilful hunter. In open conflict J. wd. have been no match for the brave and free son of the wilds; but what he lacked in strength and courage he more than made up in guile. In the contest of wits Esau was easily vanquished. His frank, generous nat. unfitted him to use the weapons that came readily to the hand of J. Even apart fm. the influence of his son's venison on the old man's palate, it is not difficult to understand and sympathise with Isaac's preference. But the crafty schemer had the truer estimate of real values. With Esau the supply of present need was all-important. In his own exaggerated way he was "ready to die" of hunger; and he "despised" a birthright, the true worth of wh. he cd. not appreciate. All this favoured J.'s designs (Gn. 25.[27ff.]). J. purchased the birthright easily enough; to secure it was another matter. Like most improvident persons, when the pinch of the moment was past, Esau was in no way ready to accept the consequences of his folly. To make sure of the blessing wh. the birthright carried J. resorted to congenial methods, with the assistance of his mr. practising upon the infirmities of his aged fr. The trick, complete in its immediate success, brought an undreamed-of entail of sorrow upon the deceivers. Regard for his fr.'s feelings alone prevented Esau fm. slaying the "supplanter" at once. In the hope that the gusty wrath of the inconstant huntsman wd. soon blow over, J. was sent to his kinsmen in the far N., ostensibly to seek a wife. He and his mr. met no more on earth. One episode in his journey is recorded, his never-to-be-forgotten experience at BETHEL. Prob. in the "place" consecrated by Abraham's sacrifice (Gn. 12.[8]) he saw the vision of the ladder or flight of steps reaching to heaven. The form of the dream may have been suggested by the appearance of the rocky terraces on the adjoining hill. Angelic messengers come and go between heaven and earth, and J″. Himself bends over the slumberer with words of kindly interest and inspiring promise. He is assured of a great posterity, who shall possess the land, and of the guidance and protection of J″. in his own life. The vision further suggests the thought of a Divine Providence presiding over and directing all human affairs. While J. on awaking had the grace to feel "how dreadful is this place," he yet accepted the promises in the spirit of a huckster. "Nothing for nothing" was his motto. If J″. fulfilled His promises then J. wd. do certain things for Him! J. shared the conviction of his day that deity cd. choose any time and place for self-manifestation; but where a god had once been seen men mt. reasonably expect to see him again. The "pillow" of stone associated with the vision was regarded as a beth-el, "house of God." It was set up and anointed, and in future times became the centre of a famous sanctuary.

Arriving at HARAN, J. found that he had no monopoly of craftiness. At first he cd. not even hold his own in artifice with his uncle Laban, who palmed off on him Leah instead of Rachel, and secured in return for his two drs. 14 yrs. faithful service of an accomplished shepherd. All J.'s children except Benjamin were born in Haran, in the following order: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, of Leah; Dan and Naphtali, of Bilhah, Rachel's maid; Gad and Asher, of Zilpah, Leah's maid; Issachar and Zebulun, of Leah; and Joseph, of Rachel.

When J. proposed to return home with his family, Laban prevailed on him to serve another seven yrs., on terms that seemed specially favourable to the older man. J. cleverly turned them to his own advantage, and his flocks and herds rapidly increased. From the envy and ill-will of Laban thus excited J. determined to escape. In his uncle's temporary absence he gathered together his possessions and "passed over the river" (Euphrates) on his homeward journey. Rachel, prob. to secure the blessing of the family gods, stole her fr.'s teraphim. Hearing of the flight, Laban took his brethren, pursued, and overtook the fugitive in Mt. Gilead. With something of her fr.'s guile Rachel saved herself fm. grave peril. The interview, wh. threatened to be stormy, ended in reconciliation. A heap of stones was made (see GILEAD), and each vowed not to pass it with hostile intent agst. the other. The treaty was sealed in a common meal (see HOSPITALITY).

At MAHANAIM ("two camps"), J. was cheered by a vision of angels (Gn. 32.[1f.]); but on the bank of the JABBOK came the remembrance of Esau, and fear of his vengeance. With something like panic he heard of his br.'s approach. Fear, however, did not paralyse his wit. He divides his company into two, so that if one is attacked, the other may escape. He arranges a present for Esau, skilfully designed to appease him. The cavalcades move forward, and he is left alone for the night by the stream. Suddenly he finds himself sore beset by one whom he may have thought an emissary of Esau come to slay him. They wrestle till morning, when, discovering through a disabling touch who his adversary is, he entreats and obtains a blessing, the sign of wh. is a new name. This appears as the turning-point in J.'s life. Hitherto he has been self-reliant, trusting in his own craft and cunning: henceforth he trusts in God. The change of name signifies a change of char. With the "supplanter" or "over-reacher" what good end cd. be attained? With Israel, "the perseverer with God," all things were possible. When the sun rose upon him halting on his thigh over PENIEL, it was truly the dawn of a new day for a new man.

Rebekah's estimate of Esau was justified. He had ceased to desire revenge, and evidently regarded the erewhile "supplanter" with nothing but brotherly feelings, reinforced no doubt by kindly recollections of old boyhood's days. He was unwilling even to accept J.'s present. The reconciliation was as complete as the anxiety of the returning exile had been deep. Esau returned to Edom, and J., crossing the Jordan near SUCCOTH, ascended to Shechem, and pitched his tent E. of the town, doubtless in the plot of land wh. he bought fm. the children of Hamor (Gn. 33.[19]), where in later days the body of Joseph was laid (Jo. 24.[32]).

The seduction of Dinah by Shechem, Hamor's son, led to complications. In his desire to secure Dinah as a w. for his s., and to establish social and commercial relations with J.'s people, Hamor accepted the guileful proposal of Dinah's brs. The men of the city fell into the snare, and while they were suffering and unable to defend themselves, J.'s sons took terrible revenge for the outrage upon their sister (Gn. 34.). The horror of this deed seems to have paralysed the surrounding peoples, and J., unmolested, journeyed to Bethel. He buried under "the oak wh. was by Shechem" everything associated with idolatry among his people; Rachel's stolen teraphim, ear-rings (amulets), &c. At Bethel he renewed his homage to J″., and received fresh promises of blessing.

On the further journey towards Hebron Rachel died in childbirth, not far fm. EPHRATH. With her last breath she called her s. Benoni, "son of my sorrow," but J. called him Benjamin, "son of the right hand" (see RACHEL). By way of the tower of Eder—not otherwise known—he came to Hebron, where he was present at his fr.'s death, and met Esau, apparently for the last time, at the funeral.

J. continued to reside near Hebron, but his flocks in charge of his sons grazed over a wide circuit (Gn. 37.). The remaining recorded episodes of his life are closely associated with the hist. of Joseph. In his sorrow for the loss of his favourite son, his heart turned to the youngest, Benjamin. The famine, and the incidents leading to the settlement in Egp., are recorded under JOSEPH. On the journey God spoke to him in a vision at Beersheba words of encouragement and hope. Accdg. to Gn. 46.[26] the company of his descendants going down with him numbered 66, besides his sons' wives. Kindly received by Pharaoh for Joseph's sake, the rich pasture-land of GOSHEN was assigned to them, and there, in peace and tranquillity, the evening of J.'s life was spent. Before his death he blessed the sons of Joseph, discerning the superiority of Ephraim to his elder br. To Joseph he promised one portion (Heb. shechem, "shoulder" or "mountain slope"), referring doubtless to the spot where Joseph's bones were laid (see SHECHEM).

The Blessing of J. (Gn. 49.) is a poetical composition attributed to J., dealing with the leading characteristics of the tribes, or of their respective territories; see separate articles. It received its present form at a later time, poss. that of David.

In accordance with a solemn charge to his sons, J.'s body was embalmed. With great pomp it was carried up to Hebron, and laid in the cave of Machpelah.

As fr. of the 12 patriarchs J. is represented as the great ancestor of the people called by his name, ISRAEL.

In literature of such antiquity, subjected to so many vicissitudes, there are, naturally, many difficulties in the nars. Fm. the extant records, e.g., it is impossible to construct a consistent chronological scheme.

Whether, and if so how far, the patriarchal nars. are historical, are questions on wh. opinions differ. Dr. Cheyne (EB. s.v. JACOB) frankly accepts the view that the patriarchs are not historical persons, but impersonations of the clans and tribes called by these names. To these imaginary ancestors are attributed the characteristics of their presumed descts., and in their life hist. are reflected the movements and experiences of peoples in an age long posterior to that assumed for the patriarchs. Dr. Driver (HDB. s.v.) cannot go so far, hindered by "the amount of personal incident and detail" in the nars. For him Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are historical persons, and the acts. given of them are, in outline, historically true; but "their chars. are idealised, and their biographies in many respects coloured by the feelings and associations of a later age."

Dr. Robertson's trenchant and effective criticisms (Early Relg. of Isr. 120ff.) of Wellhausen's view—practically that of Dr. Cheyne—Dr. Driver describes as "contemptuous," showing "little insight," and "anything but conclusive." This may not be contemptuous: it certainly is an easy but inconclusive way of dealing with a hostile critic. What must the writer of JACOB in EB. think of Dr. Driver's own position?

There is no convincing reason why the nar. shd. not be regarded as in the main a firm outline of the life of the man Jacob.

JACOB'S WELL (Jn. 4.[6]) is not mentioned in OT. Anct. tradition unanimously idents. it with Bîr Ya'qûb, just under Mt. Gerizim—"this mountain"—where the vale of Shechem opens E'ward into the plain of el-Mukhneh. Here Jacob must have pitched his tent "before," i.e. to the E. of Shechem (Gn. 33.[20]). There is a copious spring not far off, at 'Askar, on the N. edge of the vale. But it wd. make for independence and peace with his neighbours if Jacob had his own water-supply. For this reason, doubtless, the well was dug. A church reared over it was destroyed after the Crusades. The well was prob. of great depth, to secure a constant supply of water by percolation. There is no evidence of a spring in it, wh. wd. have yielded "living water." Owing to accumulated rubbish in the bottom the depth is not now more than 75 ft. On the mouth is a large stone with circular aperture through wh. vessels were lowered to draw water, in the sides of wh. the ropes have worn grooves. Water is now found in the well only in the rainy season. The natives esteem it "light" as compared with the "hard" water fm. the springs (PEFQ. 1897, pp. 67, 149, 196). The well was hard by the road to Galilee, whether one turned W. through the vale, or turned N'ward to Jenīn (Jn. 4.) ; see Sychar. For act. of the ruins, &c., see PEFM. ii. 172ff.

JAEL (Yā'ēl, "mountain goat"), w. of Heber the Kenite (Jg. 4.[17]), who had alliance with Jabin. After the battle on the Kishon (see Deborah, Barak) Sisera fled, and at J.'s invitation took shelter in her tent, where she treacherously slew him. The prose act. does not agree with the song (Jg. 4.[17ff.], 5.[24ff.]). The latter, wh. bears marks of greater antiquity, represents him as struck down when unsuspectingly drinking at the tent door (v. 27) ; the former gives details of his murder while asleep in the tent, a peg, by no means "blunt" (Moore, Judges, p. 124), being driven through his temples. The language of the song is obscure, and courageous conjectures have been made as to its meaning (EB. s.v.). But we may assume that the writer of chap. 4. had the song before him, and was as likely to understand it as modern scholars. In any case J.'s blow was treacherous, and her deed was an outrage upon Hospitality. It could not have been justified even then save in the fervour of patriotic fanaticism.

JAH, a contraction for J". Altho' it only appears in Ps. 68.[4] (EV.), about 50 times it is the Heb. word translated "Lord." It occurs mostly in the bk. of Psalms. J. is the form of the Divine Name wh. appears in composition, e.g. Jerem*iah* : it is to be noted that in Heb. this termination is most frequently yahu, as Yeremiahu. This supports the conjecture of a connection of J". with Asyr. Yahu.

JAHAZ, an unidentd. city, the scene of Sihon's defeat (Nu. 21.[23] ; Dt. 2.[32] ; Jg. 11.[20]) on the plateau (Jr. 48.[21], "Jahazah"), poss. near the main road N. of Arnon and S. of Heshbon. Given to the Merarite Levites in the lot of Reuben (Jo. 13.[18], 21.[36]), it is mentioned on the Moabite Stone (lines 19f.) as taken by Mesha fm. the k. of Isr.

JAHAZIAH, RV. JAHZEIAH, was one of those "who were employed about" the matter of the men who had married foreign wives. This has been taken to mean that they assisted Ezra (Ez. 10.[15]). RV. makes them his opponents. This is in accordance with the meaning of the Heb. phrase in other places (2 Ch. 20.[23], &c.), but the LXX, μετ' ἐμοῦ, favours the rendering of AV.

JAIR (Yā'īr, "he enlightens"). (1) A desct. of Manasseh, contemporary of Moses, under whom a district E. of Jordan, variously described, was conquered (Nu. 32.[41] ; Jo. 13.[30], &c.). (2) A judge (Jg. 10.[3]), by some identd. with (1). If this is right, J.'s exploits came after the settlement in W. Pal., and the act. of them in the earlier nar. may have been introduced to give completeness to the story of the conquest. (3) Fr. of Elhanan (1 Ch. 20.[5], Yā'īr, "he awakens"). (4) Fr. of Mordecai (Est. 2.[5] ; cp. Ad. Est. 11.[2]).

JAIRUS, the ruler of the synagogue whose little dr. Jesus raised fm. the dead (Mk. 5.[22], &c.), prob. in Capernaum.

JAMBRES. See Jannes and Jambres.

JAMES (Gr. Jakōbos), the name of at least three men of note in the early days of Christianity. (1) The fisherman, s. of Zebedee, prob. elder br. of John, as he is always named first (Mw. 4.[21] ; Mk. 1.[19], &c.), one of the Twelve and a member with Peter and John of the inmost group. He is not named by John. He and his br. were called Boanerges. They were ambitious, their mr., Salome (cp. Mw. 27.[56] ; Mk. 15.[40]), the aunt of Jesus (Jn. 19.[25]), interceding with Him for the advancement of His cousins (Mw. 20.[20f.], cp. Mk. 10.[35f.]). Of J.'s work in the first days nothing individual is recorded, but his zeal was rewarded with the martyr's crown under Herod Agrippa, A.D. 44. He was the first of the apostles to die (Ac. 12.[1f.]). Accdg. to anct. tradition the brave bearing of the apostle led to the conversion of his accuser, who therefore perished with him. There is no truth in the marvellous story of his visit to Spain (Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, i. 230ff.). (2) S. of Alphæus, prob. br. of Levi (Mk. 3.[18], 2.[14], &c.), one of the Twelve, poss. = James the Less, lit. "the little" (Mk. 15.[40]; cp. Mw. 27.[56]). There is no record of his life (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). (3) The Lord's br. (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD), to whom Jesus appeared after the resurrection (1 Cor. 15.[7]). Poss. this led to his conversion, as we find him at once numbered with the believers (Ac. 1.[13]). Close relationship to Jesus may have favoured his promotion, but that he was a man of commanding char. and ability need not be doubted. He soon took a leading position in the Church, as appears fm. Gal. 1.[18f.]; holding it still 14 yrs. later (Gal. 2.[9]). As president of the Council J. delivers its decision on the relation of the Gentile Christians to the Jewish law. He was evidently himself associated with its stricter application to Jewish Christians (Gal. 2.[12]). This may act. for his surname, "the just." Hegesippus (quoted by Eusebius, HE. ii. 23) represents J. as a Nazirite, called "just" fm. the first. His knees were as hard as a camel's from perpetual kneeling to pray for the people. For his fearless testimony to Jesus as Saviour the Scribes and Pharisees had him hurled fm. the pinnacle of the Temple into the valley, where he was despatched by a blow with a fuller's club, praying that his murderers mt. be forgiven. Josephus with more probability attributes his death to the "bold" and "insolent" High Priest, Ananus the younger, between the death of Festus and the arrival of Albinus, his successor. For this he was deprived of office (Ant. XX. ix. 1). The passage referred to by Eusebius (HE. ii. 23), in wh. Josephus describes the horrors of the siege of Jrs. as vengeance for this crime, has disappeared fm. his works. J was author of the epistle bearing his name. The Protevangelium Jacobi and the Liturgy of St. James are also attributed to him.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. The first of the "Catholic" Epistles.

Contents.—It consists mainly of a series of exhortations as to Christian conduct, wh. follow each other without much logical connection. Sometimes a word suggests a thought wh. leads the writer off at a tangent; thus the word leipomenoi, "lacking" (RV.), in the 4th verse suggests the 5th verse, "If any man lack wisdom"; again the word aiteitō, "ask," in the 5th verse suggests the next, "but let him ask in faith." He returns in v. 12 to "patience under temptation," with wh. he began; but some one, he fancies, mt. excuse himself in falling before temptation by saying he was "tempted of God," so he turns aside to denounce this error and show the source of temptation in "lust"; this, again, leads him to follow "lust" to its consequences. Space fails to follow step by step the windings of his thought. At times the writer does carry on a consecutive argument; as where, meeting the case of one who wd. excuse his slackness in practical beneficence by claiming orthodoxy of belief, he shows by instance after instance that "faith" to be worth anything must express itself in action. The whole manner of thought has a striking resemblance to what we find in the "Sermon on the Mount."

Audience Contemplated.—By its introduction it is addressed "to the twelve tribes wh. are scattered abroad," i.e. only to Israelites and to all Israelites outside Pal. While the writer does not conceal his own Christianity he addresses a wider audience; in the same way that a Baptist mt. address Protestants as a whole, without noticing the differences between difft. sections of Protestants; to him all Jews are rightfully, like himself, "servants of Jesus Christ." He uses sunagōgē for the place where he expects his readers to meet for worship; he does not exalt Jesus as do Paul, Peter, and John, in obvious statement. Certainly the writer calls upon his readers not to have "the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ (the Lord) of Glory with respect of persons," but this does not necessarily and obviously mean more than a belief in His Messiahship; though implicitly it contains more. While he addresses all Jews, his primary message is for those who, like himself, are Christians.

Date.—External evidence is not very early, yet although it is not quoted there are traces of acquaintance with this epistle in Clement of Rome, Hermas, and Justin Martyr. It is, however, in the Peshitta, wh. omits 2 P., 2 and 3 J., and Rv.: it is quoted repeatedly by Irenæus and Tertullian. The internal evidence points to an early date. The separation between Church and Synagogue had not become prominent; there is no hint of persecution, except the oppression of the poor by the rich; no reference to the episcopate, nor indeed to the apostolate. Elders are mentioned, but every Jewish community had of necessity its Elders. The use of the term "Synagogue" is also evidence of primitive conditions.

In Safed there were 62 synagogues, but only six communities (congregations) named according to their origin, or their tenets: each of these had a certain internal government.

While the resemblance between J. and Paul is too close to be accidental, it is not to be assumed that J. is the later. A close study of the passages in question proves the opposite. From there being no reference to believing Gentiles we may deduce that the Epistle of James was written before the Council of Jrs. (A.D. 48, Lewin). It may prob. be dated A.D. 40–45.

Authorship. The epistle claims to be written by "James, a servant of God and our Lord Jesus Christ." James (Jacob) was a name common in the opening cent. of our era; it was borne by three men prominent in the early hist. of the Church. Two were apostles, viz., James, s. of Zebedee, and James, s. of Alphæus. There was also James, the br. of our Lord. The epistle has never been ascribed to the second of these save when he has been regarded as identical with the third. The choice really lies between James, son of Zebedee, and our Lord's br. We have seen that the epistle may have been written before A.D. 44, when James, the son of Zebedee, was put to death. On the other hand, in beginning his letter, the author does not, like Peter, announce his apostleship. Further, we find in style and vocabulary a striking resemblance between the epistle and the speech recorded in Ac. 15.$^{13-21}$. These facts strengthen the probability that James the br. of our Lord was the writer.

Canonicity.—Eusebius (HE. ii. 23, iii. 25) says that the Epistle of James was rejected by some churches, but received by most. It was not in the Muratorian catalogue; but it was in the Canon of the Syrian Church. It was accepted as Scrip. by Origen, Athanasius, and Gregory, and is placed in the Canon by the Council of Carthage (397). It did not claim to be written by an apostle, and it seemed to controvert the teaching of St. Paul. This sufficiently explains the hesitation of some in accepting it as canonical.

JANNES AND JAMBRES (2 Tm. 3.^{8}). The traditional names of two of the Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses (see Tg. Jrs.; Ex. 7.^{11}). An Apocryphal bk. under their name is referred to, but not preserved.

JANOAH. (1) A town near Kedesh Naphtali (2 K. 15.^{29}). The name is found in Yānūḥ, a vill. six miles E. of Tyre; but this seems too far to the W. (2) On the NE. border of Ephraim (Jo. 16.$^{6f.}$). OEJ. s.v. "Jano," points to Yānūn, eight miles SE. of Nāblūs.

JANUM, RV. JANIM, a town in the territory of Judah, in the mountain near BETH-TAPPUAH (Jo. 15.^{53}); not identd.

JAPHETH, the eldest s. of Noah (Gn. 10.^{21}), ancestor of the Greeks, the Medes, and Aryan races generally (Gn. 10.$^{2-4}$).

JAPHIA. (1) K. of Lachish, who, after the defeat at Beth-horon, was slain at Makkedah (Jo. 10.$^{3ff.}$). (2) A s. of David (2 S. 5.$^{14, 15}$, &c.).

JAPHIA, a town on the E. border of Zebulun (Jo. 19.^{12}). If the places are here named in order, the identn. with Yāfā, two miles SW. of Nazareth, is precarious (cp. BJ. II. xx. 6; III. vii. 31; Vit. 37, 45, 52).

JAPHO. See JOPPA.

JAREB, "King Jareb" (Ho. 5.^{13}, 10.^{6}), apparently the name of an otherwise unknown Asyr. k. It is poss. that the prophet here modifies the title, "the Great King" (Asyr. Sharru Rabbu), to make it describe the char. of the man—"king quarrelsome."

JARMUTH. (1) A royal city of the Can. in the Judæan Shephelah (Jo. 10.^{3}, 12.^{11}, 15.^{35}; Ne. 11.^{29}). It is the mod. Khirbet el-Yarmūk, eight miles N. of Beit Jibrīn. The ruins crown a hill, and bear many marks of anct. strength. (2) An anct. city in Issachar (Jo. 21.^{29}). In 1 Ch. 6.^{73} it is called Ramoth, wh. resembles "Remeth" of Jo. 19.^{21}. It may be er-Rāmeh, c. 11 miles SW. of Jenīn.

JASHER (RV. JASHAR), THE BOOK OF, is referred to, Jo. 10.^{13} (not in LXX), 2 S. 1.^{18}. Jasher may mean "the Just"; in the Psh. it is rendered "praise"; in Tg. Jn. "the Law." Judging by the two references it was a collection of ballads, but the facts available are too few to permit an absolute decision.

JASHOBEAM, the first of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.^{11}), "the son of a Hachmonite" (RV.), "the son of Zabdiel" (1 Ch. 27.^{2}). He was one of the three who broke through the ranks of the Phil. to draw water fm. the well of Bethlehem.

In 2 S. 23.^{8} the text is corrupt. Jashobeam is changed into josheb basshebeth, "that sat in the seat" (AV.). RV. takes it as a prop. name, Josheb-basshebeth. LXX reads Jebosthe; the true reading was therefore prob. Jeshabbosheth, wh., according to the analogy of ISHBOSHETH, wd. imply Jashabbaal. The chronicler changed "l" into "m," to avoid writing "Baal." "Tachmonite" for "Hachmonite" is a scribal error, taking ת for ח, so late that the square character must have been in use. "Adino" is a form also due to scribal error. Confusing ר with ד, the copyist took the phrase, "raising up his spear," as a proper name, with ethnic determinative.

JASON was Paul's host in Thessalonica, and his surety with the magistrates (Ac. 17.$^{5ff.}$). He may have been a Jew, J. being a favourite equivalent of Heb. Joshua. The "kinsman" (Rm. 16.^{21}) was poss. the same man.

JASPER (Heb. yashepheh, LXX iaspis), a precious stone appearing in the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.^{20}), among the jewels of the k. of Tyre (Ek. 28.^{13}), and as the first foundation of the new Jrs. (Rv. 21.^{19}). Some wd. identify it with the Opal (Cheyne), or Chalcedony (King), or Diamond (Ebrard). It is impossible to decide what stone is intended. It is certainly not the mod. J. Iaspis seems to have denoted stones of various colours (Pliny, NH. xxxvii. 37).

JATTIR, a town in the highlands of Judah (Jo. 15.^{48}), given to the priests (21.^{14}), associated with the adventures of David (1 S. 30.^{27}). It is = Khirbet 'Attīr, a place with caves and traces of anct. bldgs., 13 miles S. of Hebron.

JAVAN, fourth s. of Japheth (Gn. 10.^{2}), is the representative of the Greek race, esp. of the Ionians on the coast of Asia Minor. J. thus appears in connection with "the islands far off"; i.e. those of the Archipelago (Is. 66.[19]). J. is a nation of merchants and slave-dealers (Ek. 27.[13]; Jl. 3.[6]). J. is mentioned again in Ek. 27.[13], where the text is prob. corrupt. The references in Daniel (8.[21], 10.[20], 11.[2]), where Javan is translated "Greece" (RV.; "Grecia," AV.), are to the empire of Alexander. Sargon campaigned agst. Javan. Among the allies of the Hittites agst. Ramses II. are Yevana. All over SW. Asia the name is the same.

JAVELIN. See ARMS.

JAZER, an Amorite town taken by Isr. (Nu. 21.[32]) in the lot of Gad, assigned to the priests (Jo. 13.[25], 21.[31]). It is mentioned in connection with David's Census (2 S. 24.[5]). The district was very fertile. J. was captured by Judas (Ant. XII. viii. 1). It is prob. = Kh. Ṣār, five miles W. of 'Ammān. This corrsps. with the position indicated by OEJ.; the perennial stream, Wādy Ṣīr, near by, being doubtless the "river" referred to as "flowing to the Jordan."

JEBUS. See JERUSALEM.

JECONIAH. See JEHOIAKIM.

JEDIDIAH. See SOLOMON.

JEDUTHUN, apparently the same as ETHAN; head of a guild of singers (1 Ch. 16.[38]): fm. the use of the name in the titles of certain psalms (39., 62., 77.) Jeduthun seems to have been either a musical instrument or a tune.

JEGAR SAHADUTHA ("cairn of stones"), the Aram. name given by Laban to the heap of stones called by Jacob GALEED (Gn. 31.[47]).

JEHOAHAZ. (1) S. and successor of Jehu, k. of Isr. (2 K. 10.[35]). He reigned 17 yrs. He failed to free Isr. fm. the dominion of Syr., Benhadad III. being esp. oppressive. Idolatry flourished in his reign (2 K. 13.[1-9], 22.). The "saviour" (13.[5]) prob. indicates J.'s grandson, Jeroboam II. The figures in vv. 1, 10 require adjustment. (2) S. and successor of Josiah, k. of Judah. After a brief and inglorious reign of three months, he was deposed by Pharaoh Necho and carried into Egp., where he died. His name, Shallum, was changed to J. at his coronation (2 K. 23.[30]; 2 Ch. 36.[1]; Jr. 22.[10ff.]; Ek. 19.[2ff.]). (3) A name of AHAZIAH, k. of Judah (2 Ch. 21.[17], 22.[1]).

JEHOASH, JOASH. (1) Youngest s. of Jehoram, k. of Judah, who alone escaped the massacre planned by ATHALIAH his grandmr. Hidden by his aunt JEHOSHEBA, he was brought out and crowned in his seventh yr. (see JEHOIADA) (2 Ch. 22.[10f.], 23.). A covenant was made between God, the k., and the people. The temple of Baal was destroyed, and the Temple service reorganised. The revenue fm. gifts and offerings was given to the priests on condition that they shd. keep the Temple bldgs. in repair. This they failed to do, and part of the income was withdrawn fm. them, ample funds for repair and furnishing of the Temple being collected in a box with a hole in the lid, placed for their reception. After Jehoiada's death J. seems to have deteriorated, and the murder of Zechariah is a dark blot on his record. He bought immunity fm. a Syrian attack with a costly bribe, poss. after the defeat recorded by the chronicler (2 K. 12.[17ff.]; 2 Ch. 24.[23ff.]). He was murdered by his servants Jozacar and Jehozabad, having reigned 40 yrs., and was buried in the city of David, but not in the royal sepulchres (2 Ch. 24.[25]). (2) S. and successor of Jehoahaz, k. of Isr. (2 K. 13.[10]). Idolatry flourished in his reign of 16 yrs. The Syrians, weakened by attacks of Asyr. (Winckler, Geschichte Isr. i. 154), he thrice defeated (2 K. 13.[14ff.]). AMAZIAH, elated by success over Edom, forced J. into conflict, to his own decisive discomfiture (2 K. 14.[8ff.]). He seems to have been a brave and capable soldier.

JEHOIACHIN (Jeconiah, Jr. 27.[20], &c.; Coniah, Jr. 22.[24], &c.; Jechoniah, Mw. 1.[11]), s. of Jehoiakim, k. of Judah. He succeeded his fr. at 18 (2 K. 24.[8]: "eight" in 2 Ch. 36.[9] arises fm. displacement of the "ten," added as days to the length of his reign). The Chaldeans were already in the country, and on the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar J. surrendered at discretion. Nebuchadnezzar sacked the Temple, carrying away the treasure and sacred vessels, and took captive to Bab. J., his mr., the nobles, and men of war, together with the craftsmen, leaving only the poorest of the people (2 K. 24.[11ff.]; Jr. 52.[28]). Among the exiles was Ezekiel. Evil-Merodach dealt kindly with J. (2 K. 25.[27ff.]; Jr. 52.[31ff.]). Scrip. condemns J. as an evil-doer: for a more favourable estimate see Ant. X. vii. 1.

JEHOIADA, the High Priest, related to the royal house by marriage (2 Ch. 22.[11]), who brought up JEHOASH, and secured his coronation at seven yrs. of age (see ATHALIAH). His influence over the boy king prob. continued till his death, so that he was in fact ruler (2 Ch. 24.[2]). To his initiative was due the renewing of the covenant, the destruction of the temple and slaughter of the priests of Baal, the re-ordering of the Temple service, and, along with the k., the placing of the box to receive the money for Temple repair, &c. At his death he was buried among the kings, an honour due prob. to his royal connection as well as to his good deeds in Isr. (2 K. 11.[17ff.], 12.[1ff.]; 2 Ch. 23.[16ff.], 24.[1-16]). Several other men bore this name.

JEHOIAKIM, s. of Josiah, whom Pharaoh Necho made k. instead of his half-br. Jehoahaz, changing his name fm. Eliakim to J. (2 K. 23.[34], &c.). He was then 25 yrs. old. He reigned 11 yrs., during three of wh. he was subj. to Nebuchadnezzar, the power of Egp. being broken (24.[1ff.]). Of the evil wh. he did there are illustrations in the prophets Jeremiah and Habakkuk. The former presents a picture of the general degradation of the country. The old idolatries flourish; loathsome heathen rites are practised; princes, priests, and people are sunk in regardlessness and vice (chaps. 7.–9., &c.). In 22.[13-19] a fierce denunciation is launched at J. (cp. Hb. 2.[9-11]). His cruel murder of Uriah (Jr. 26.[20ff.]), the despite done to the law (36.[22]), and his desire to be rid of Jeremiah and Baruch (36.[26]), shed lurid light upon his char. How he died we know not; it may have been by the hand of some victim of his oppression. His dishonoured corpse was buried " with the burial of an ass," drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jrs. (Jr. 22.[19]; but see LXX, 2 Ch. 36.[8]). The fall of the city, B.C. 597, properly marked the beginning of the Captivity.

JEHONADAB (Jonadab, Jr. 35.[6], &c.), s. of Rechab (2 K. 10.[15], &c.), the founder of the RECHABITES (Jr. 35.[6], &c.).

JEHORAM, JORAM. (1) S. of Jehoshaphat, k. of Judah. Crowned at the age of 32, he reigned eight yrs. He married ATHALIAH, dr. of Ahab, poss. for diplomatic reasons. To her influence perhaps we may trace the murder of his brs. (2 Ch. 21.[4]) and the revival of idolatry. Under him Edom rebelled. Fm. an ill-starred expedition to subdue it he escaped with difficulty, and Edom regained freedom (2 K. 8.[21]; 2 Ch. 21.[8ff.]). At the same time LIBNAH revolted (2 K. 8.[22]; 2 Ch. 21.[10]). In 2 Ch. 21.[12] we shd. prob. read " Elisha " (but see ELIJAH) for " Elijah," the latter being then long dead. The Arabians and Phil. invaded Judah, sacked the k.'s house, and carried off the k.'s wives, and all his sons save Jehoahaz. He died of a loathsome disease, and was refused burial in the royal sepulchres. (2) S. of Ahab, who succeeded his br. Ahaziah as k. of Isr. He modified but did not abolish the worship of Baal (2 K. 3.[1-3]). Mesha, k. of Moab, revolted fm. J. Gaining the help of Jehoshaphat, k. of Judah, and the k. of Edom, i.e. Jehoshaphat's vassal, he marched agst. Moab fm. the S., passing through a waterless district, where only a miracle by Elisha saved their army fm. death by thirst. The Moabites were vanquished and Mesha beleaguered in Kir-hareseth. In desperation he sacrificed his first-born on the wall. For what reason we know not, Isr. returned home.

J. may be the k. of Isr. associated with the deeds of Elisha (2 K. 4.–8.) (see ELISHA). Wounded in battle at Ramoth Gilead, J. returned to Jezreel. Jehu, his general, followed, and slew him in the field of Naboth (2 K. 8.[28]–9.[26]).

JEHOSHAPHAT (" J". hath judged "), s. and successor of Asa, k. of Judah (1 K. 22.[41f.]; 2 Ch. 20.[31]). Thirty-five yrs. old at his accession, he reigned 25 yrs. At first he strengthened himself agst. Isr. (2 Ch. 17.[1]). He sought to abolish idolatry, removed the high places and Asherim (v. 6, but cp. 1 K. 22.[43]), and made provision for teaching the people the law. The Phil. and the Arabians brought him presents: he built store cities, and raised a very great army (2 Ch. 17.). He then made friendship with Ahab of Isr., whose dr. Athaliah his s. Jehoram married—a step fraught with dire consequences to his house. Despite the warning of Micaiah he went with Ahab agst. Ramoth Gilead, and narrowly escaped death, while Ahab fell (1 K. 22.[1-38]; 2 Ch. 18.). 2 Ch. 19 describes his arrangements for administration of justice, &c. Chap. 20. narrates an invasion by the men of Moab, Ammon, and Mt. Seir, with nothing to show whether before or after the attack on Mesha with JEHORAM. The enemy slaughtered each other, and great spoil fell to Judah in the Vale of Beracah, prob. Wādy Bereikūt, SW. of Tekoah. The destruction of J.'s ships at Ezion-geber quenched Isr.'s sea-ward aspirations (1 K. 22.[48ff.]; 2 Ch. 20.[35ff.]). For others called J. see 2 S. 8.[16], &c.; 1 K. 4.[17]; 2 K. 9.[2].

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (Jl. 3.[2, 12]). This valley is not mentioned by this name elsewhere in Scrip., and Josephus does not refer to it. Some would connect it with the name of King JEHOSHAPHAT, and the great victory recorded in 2 Ch. 20. This might point to the valley there called BERACHAH. A late tradition (4th cent.) identifies the Valley of Jehoshaphat with that wh., on the E., cuts Jrs. off fm. the Mt. of Olives (see KIDRON). Since then this has figured in most narratives of pilgrims and travellers. There is, however, nothing to support it; and the name, 'ēmeq, wh. signifies a wide vale, wd. not be applied to such a valley as the Kidron. If the name pointed to a literal valley, wh. is prob., there is now no clue to its identity.

JEHOSHEBA (Jehoshabeath, 2 Ch. 22.[11]), sr. of Ahaziah, w. of Jehoiada, and aunt of Jehoash (2 K. 11.[2]).

JEHOSHUA. See JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH (GOD), sacred name JHWH with vocalisation of ădōnāi. The latter was substituted in reading for the sacred name, wh. it was not permissible to utter.

JEHOVAH JIREH (" J". seeth," or " will see," or " provide "). Abraham so named the spot where God provided the animal for sacrifice instead of Isaac (Gn. 22.[14]).

JEHOVAH NISSI (" J". is my banner "). So Moses called the altar built to signalise the defeat of Amalek (Ex. 17.[15]). As men gather round a banner in war, so shd. men gather round J".

JEHOVAH SHALOM (" J". is peace "), the name of the altar Gideon built in Ophra (Jg. 6.[24]), referring to the salutation " peace be unto thee " (v. 23).

JEHOVAH SHAMMAH (" J". is there "), the symbolic name of Jrs. renewed and beautified, wherein J″. shd. abide (Ek. 48.^{35}).

JEHOVAH TZIDKENU (" J″. is our righteousness "), the symbolic name of the k. who is to reign over Isr. when restored to their own land (Jr. 23.^{6}, &c.).

JEHU (poss. " J″. is he "). (1) S. of Jehoshaphat, s. of Nimshi, founder of the 5th dyn. in Isr. J. belonged to Ahab's guard (2 K. 9.^{25}), and rose under Jehoram to the rank of General. This k., when defending Ramoth Gilead agst. the Syrians, was wounded, and returned to Jezreel, leaving J. in command. A messenger fm. Elisha visited him in his tent and anointed him. He at once secured his acclamation as k. by the army, and set out for Jezreel. The story of his impetuous drive, his slaughter of Jehoram in the field of Naboth, the pursuit and death of Amaziah, and the fate of Jezebel, is vividly told in 2 K. 9. Seventy sons of Ahab's house in Samaria were done to death by J.'s order, and their heads, brought to Jezreel, made two ghastly heaps by the gate. All, great or small, who might be suspected of friendship for Ahab's family, were slain. The like fate overtook 42 princes, " brethren " of Ahaziah, k. of Judah. All poss. rivals to the throne were thus cut off (2 K. 10.$^{1-14}$). Coming to Samaria accompanied by Jonadab, J. guilefully ensnared the priests of Baal, and his worshippers. Having shut them up in his great temple, he sent his soldiers, who slew them to a man. The temple and its furniture were utterly destroyed.

Personal ambition was doubtless the chief motive in J.'s career. His designs were assisted by the action of Elisha, who found in him an instrument for the overthrow of Baal-worship, and the baneful influence of Phœnicia in Isr. Resentment, deep and widespread, at the shameful murder of Naboth furnished occasion for successful appeal to popular passion agst. the house of Ahab. There is no reason to think that J. was much of a J″.-worshipper himself (2 K. 10.^{29}), or that the murder of Naboth was to him more than a useful pretext for the furtherance of his views.

That J. was cruel and unscrupulous is plain to see. A man of fierce energy; swift and decisive in action; an able soldier and capable ruler; his career is redeemed by no touch of chivalry, nor by the more humane and generous elements wh. win affection.

Friendly relations with Phœnicia being ruptured, it was necessary to seek some means of security agst. the Syrians. This J. found in alliance with the growing Asyr. power. The tribute he sent to Shalmaneser II. is figured on the black obelisk of that monarch (see pp. 300–1). Repeated invasions of the Asyr. brought the Syrians very low, leaving J. in peace and security. After B.C. 839, however, these attacks fm. the N. ceased, and the Syrians, swiftly gathering strength, avenged themselves on Isr. by conquering the land E. of Jordan (2 K. 10.$^{32ff.}$). J. reigned for 28 yrs. At his death he was buried in Samaria.

JEHUD, a town named between Baalath and Bene-berak (Jo. 19.^{45}), prob. = el-Yehūdīyeh, eight miles E. of Jaffa.

JEHUDI (Heb. yehūdī, " a Jew ") is the name of the princes' messenger who brought Baruch with the roll in wh. he had written Jeremiah's prophecies, to read to them (Jr. 36.^{14}). Afterwards, at the royal command, Jehudi read the roll before the king and the princes; whereupon the king cut the roll in pieces and burned it (vv. 21ff.).

JEPHTHAH, an illegitimate s. of Gilead. Driven fm. home by his brs., he went to the " land of Tob," and there, as leader of a guerilla band, gained the experience and repute wh. fitted him for the great part he was called on to play. The Gileadites, fearing an Ammonite invasion, having no capable leader, asked him to take command. Having bound them by oath to make him their " head and chief," he consented. In a remonstrance wh., curiously, refers more to Moab than to Ammon, he tried in vain to make the enemy withdraw. Battle being inevitable, J. vowed to sacrifice to J″. " whoever " shd. come first fm. his door to meet him if he returned victorious. He triumphed completely, somewhere near Rabbath Ammon, and, returning, was stunned at the sight of his dr., his only child, first issuing fm. the door to welcome the victor " with timbrels and dances." Infinitely pathetic is the brave acceptance of her fate by that heroic maiden. Two months were granted for bewailing her virginity. To die unwed and childless was heavy grief. Then she died by her fr.'s hand.

It is quite futile to argue that she was only condemned to perpetual virginity. The lang. of the vow shows that J. contemplated a human sacrifice. Such offerings were known among the Hebs. (2 K. 16.^{3}; Ek. 20.^{26}, &c.), as among other peoples (2 K. 3.^{27}; cp. Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. 112f.).

The Ephraimites' discontent and threat were met as we wd. expect by J. (Jg. 12.$^{1-8}$). Their inability to pronounce " sh " betrayed them to the swords of Gilead. Having ruled six yrs., J. died and was buried " in the cities of Gilead "—we shd. prob. tr. " in Ary of Gilead."

Critics maintain the composite char. of the nar.; but no satisfactory analysis is proposed. For Dr. Cheyne's interesting reconstruction see EB. s.v.

JERAH, fourth s. of JOKTAN (Gn. 10.^{26}). The Joktanites represent the S. Arabian tribes; J. may be represented by Yurākh in Yemen.

JEREMIAH, the most interesting personality in the hist. of Isr., flourished during the stirring times wh. preceded the fall of Jrs. and the captivity of the Jews. The bk. of J., wh. is made up of history, biography, and prophecy, reveals much of the public and private life of the prophet, and his life is consequently better known than that of any other prophet. The story of his chequered life is narrated fm. his call to the prophetic office to his sojourn in Egp. after the destruction of Jrs. We are impressed by the strong, unflinching attitude agst. evil wh. he everywhere displays, and all the more when we consider the fears and trembling with wh. he undertook the office imposed upon him, and his profound dislike of a position and a kge. wh. continually caused him to appear as the enemy of his own people, whom he deeply loved. When the "call" came, he shrank fm. it, saying, "Ah, Lord God, I cannot speak, for I am a child," but he obeyed the heavenly vision; and though, again and again, he felt a deep longing to be allowed to remain hidden and silent, he never failed to speak out his message when the strong word was needed. His own personal experience gave the form to his teaching, and his continual introspection and examination of the workings of his own heart led him, the first of all the prophets, to give the heart of man its true prominence in religion. "'Cast your idols of gold and your idols of silver to the moles and to the bats,' cried Isaiah. 'Cast your ark of the covenant, your Temple made with hands, your holy sacrifices, your sacred utensils and machinery—cast them all into the same dust-hole,' cried J." (A. B. Davidson).

J. came of a priestly house, and belonged to Anathoth, a vill. a few miles north-east of Jrs. His call came in 626, a few yrs. before the reformation under k. Josiah, and the discovery of the Bk. of the Law in the Temple. J. had no illusions as to the nat. of this reformation, but he realised the danger of the people concentrating all their thoughts upon the one true Temple, thereby giving it a sanctity wh. was hurtful to the true religious spirit. He felt that the reformation did not go beyond externals. It was only a sowing among thorns, there was no deep ploughing of the ground (4.[3]). When Josiah fell in battle agst. Pharaoh Necho at Megiddo, in B.C. 608, there was a speedy end of all the hopes of Judah. The event bewildered the people, for they thought they had been faithful to J"., and yet He had not defended them agst. their enemies. J. declared that they had not been faithful to J". at all. They had trusted in lying words instead of amending their ways, and, in answer to their superstitious confidence in the Temple of the Lord, he prophesied that it wd. become desolate, even as Shiloh.

Jehoiakim, who was made k. by Necho, after the death of Josiah, his fr., followed in the footsteps of Manasseh, and aroused the hostility of the fearless prophet. But the people were full of high hopes, secure under the protection of Egp., and proud of their young king. So long as the Temple stood they considered themselves safe, and they manifested their devotion by greater diligence in worship and in the keeping of fasts (36.[6-9]). Soon, however, the supremacy of Egp. came to an end, and in the battle of Carchemish in B.C. 605, one of the decisive battles of the world, Nebuchadnezzar, son of the k. of Bab., defeated Pharaoh Necho, and gained the mastery over Syria and Judah. Jehoiakim now came under the Chaldean power, and paid tribute peacefully for three yrs. Jeremiah proclaimed Nebuchadnezzar to be the minister of J"., sent to punish the nation for sin, beginning with Jrs. His previous prophecies of evil had been fully justified, and the prophet now received the Divine command to write down what he had been declaring during the past yrs. His spoken word had seemed to all others the declaration of things wh. were wildly imposs., but now the fulfilment was at hand. For long he had believed that the instrument of Divine vengeance wd. come fm. the north, perhaps by the inroads of the wild Scythians, but now he saw that J".'s avengers were Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans. J. hated the office of a prophet of evil upon the land he loved, but there was no escape. "I cannot hold my peace, because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war" (4.[19]). Yet he hoped that, if his words were now heard by the people with the light of their new experience upon them, they mt. listen and repent (36.[2, 3]). The story is told in chap. 36. how the king destroyed the roll of his prophecies, and immediately ordered the arrest of J. and Baruch. They were not to be found, but J. dictated his prophecies once more to Baruch, "and there were added besides unto them many like words." These doubtless contained additions, made in the light of subsequent events, and this second edition forms the basis of the present Bk. of J.

Jehoiakim, after three yrs., refused to pay tribute to the Chaldeans, trusting to the support of Egp., and in B.C. 597 Nebuchadnezzar advanced in person agst. Jrs. Jehoiakim had died in the meantime, though we have no details of his death (but cp. 36.[30]), and his son Jehoiachin had soon to surrender to the enemy. The young k. and 10,000 men, the best of the people, were carried off into Bab., and Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah, was set on the throne. Chap. 24. is addressed to these exiles, to encourage them to wait with patience. The Lord will remember them in exile, and after seventy yrs. they shall return (25.[12]). J. urged the king to submit quietly to the Chaldeans, but was fiercely opposed by the k.'s advisers, who considered his attitude unpatriotic. Early in Zedekiah's reign there was a widespread rebellion agst. the k. of Bab., but under the influence of J. the k. refrained fm. participating in it. He opposed the false prophets, esp. one Hananiah, who encouraged rebellion, and he continued to maintain that the fall of Bab., though cert., was yet far off (27., 28.). He continued to reiterate that, though Jrs. wd. be taken by the Chaldeans, God's gracious purposes with His people wd. not be ended. The days wd. come when the Lord wd. make a new covenant with Isr. and with Judah, a covenant written in their hearts (31.[31-40]). As a sign of his confidence the prophet bought a field in his native vill. and took out all the legal instruments to make it secure agst. the future (32.[6-15]).

Zedekiah, notwithstanding his adherence to Nebuchadnezzar, had to send messengers to Bab. to allay all suspicion, and J. took the opportunity of sending a letter to the captives in Bab., urging them to remain quiet and to distrust their false advisers (29.). Zedekiah was weak and shifty in char., and, though secretly inclined to favour J. and to believe in him, he allowed himself to be swayed by his opponents. On difft. occasions the k. consulted the prophet privately, but lacked resolution to act on his advice. He asked J. to pray for him (37.[3]), and secretly inquired of the Lord through him (37.[17]). At last, urged by his evil advisers and by the promises of help fm. Egp., Zedekiah rebelled agst. his over-lord. Jrs. was besieged by the Chaldeans for a yr. and a half, and during most of this time J. was subjected to the greatest indignities. Formerly he had been put in the stocks because of his prophecies of evil (20.[2]), and narrowly escaped death (26.[11]). For a time, at the beginning of the siege, some respect was paid to his utterances, but soon a new situation arose. An army came fm. Egp. to the help of Jrs., and the Chaldeans left the city to meet the new enemy (37.[5]). All except J. looked upon this intervention as a deliverance by the Lord; but the prophet knew there was no respite. While the besiegers were absent he set out for his native vill., but he was captured and accused of escaping to the Chaldeans. Though he repudiated the charge he was scourged and cast into prison, where he remained many days, afterwards being granted by the k. a milder imprisonment in the "court of the prison" (37.). Here he had access to the people, to whom he declared that their only safety was to be found in yielding to the Chaldeans. He was accused of treason by the princes, and the k., too weak to defend him, delivered him into their hands. He was cast into a miry dungeon, where he wd. have perished but for the intervention of a negro servant of the court, who obtained permission fm. the k. to rescue him. He was again put in the court of the prison, where he remained till the city fell (38.[1-13]).

On the repulse of the Egyptians the siege had been renewed with fresh vigour. Zedekiah still sought private interviews with J., but saved him fm. the malice of the princes, by concealing fm. them the answers of the prophet, who reiterated his advice to the k. to make his peace with the enemy. Zedekiah was afraid to act upon the prophet's advice, and in the end the city fell in B.C. 586, and the k. was taken captive and cruelly treated by the conquerors. J. was also taken prisoner and carried in chains to Ramah, but his attitude during the siege had become known to the Chaldeans, and he was given the choice of going with the exiles to Bab., or of remaining in the ruined city. He chose to remain, and returned to Mizpah, to Gedaliah, the new governor. But the end of his troubles had not come. Gedaliah was assassinated by a band of adventurers, and though the party of the governor regained the upper hand, they were afraid to remain in Jrs. to answer to the Chaldeans for their failure to preserve peace, and resolved to flee into Egp. They consulted J. as to their course, promising to follow his decision, but when he advised them to remain they refused to obey, and, denying that he spoke in the name of J″. at all, they carried him, sorely agst. his will, along with them (43.[2]). This was "the most unkindest cut of all." From first to last the word of the prophet was discredited and despised, and the declaration of the will of J″., wh. it cost his tender heart such intense agony to deliver, was looked upon as mere disloyalty to Judah, or as the false utterance of a godless prophet. In Egp. he had the misery of seeing his fellow countrymen return openly to idolatry, and, on his remonstrating with them, they roundly declared that J″. had not been a Helper in the past, and now they wd. seek help fm. the "queen of heaven" (44.[16-19]). Here he delivered his last message, declaring that the hand of J″. wd. yet reach them even in this new land. Tradition says that he was stoned to death by his own people, who were enraged at his continued condemnation of their doings.

"Like many of the world's greatest children, J. was little esteemed in his life, but when dead his spt. breathed out upon men, and they felt its beauty and greatness. The oppressed people saw for ages in his sufferings a type of itself, and drew fm. his constancy courage to endure and be true. Imagery fm. the scenes of his life and echoes of his words fill many of the psalms, the authors of wh. were like him in his sorrows, and strove to be like him in his faith. Fm. being of no account as a prophet he came to be considered the greatest of them all, and was spoken of as 'the prophet' (Jn. 1.[21, 25]); and it was told of him how in after days he appeared in visions to those contending for the faith like an angel fm. heaven strengthening them" (A. B. Davidson).

The Bk. of J. differs fm. the other prophetical bks. in the amount of biographical matter wh. it contains, a fact partly to be explained by the char. of the prophet himself, who makes known his own personal experiences, both in the inception and the delivery of his message. The bk. is the longest in the Bible, and is arranged without apparent plan. In the LXX we find a very difft. arrangement of the chaps., and many passages and phrases of the Heb. text are omitted altogether. The basis of the bk. is the collection of prophecies wh. J. dictated to Baruch in the yr. B.C. 605. The prophet's description of this collection shows that it contained a denunciation of the sins of Isr. and Judah, and prophecies agst. the nations; and, in view of the known date at wh. the collection was made, the attempt is usually made to reconstruct it in its main features. It is quite evident, however, that the original roll has not come down to us as it was dictated to Baruch, but has been arranged by later hands. Therefore a chap., or a series of chaps., wh. is assigned to a special date, may yet contain passages wh. break the connection, but wh. have been inserted or rearranged for reasons wh. are no longer known. The original roll, wh. contains the prophecies belonging to the time of Josiah and Jehoiakim, will be found in chaps. 1.–20., 25., 45. Chaps. 21.–29., with reservations, belong to the reign of Zedekiah. Chaps. 30.–33. seem to contain a separate prophecy of the restoration of Judah and Isr., placed by some after the fall of Jrs. Chaps. 34.–45. are mainly biographical, and 46.–51. are concerned with the denunciations of the foreign peoples, Egp., the Phil., Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Elam, Bab. The last chap. of the bk. is a historical appendix wh. seems to be taken fm. 2 K. 24.[18]–25.[30]. JOHN DAVIDSON.

JERICHO, a Can. royal city about the site of wh. there has never been any doubt. It was on the border of Judah and Benjamin, belonging to the latter (Jo. 16.[1], 18.[12], &c.). Anct. J. stood by the fountain, 'Ain es-Sulṭān. Its position is marked by a mound with remains dating fm. Can. days, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles fm. mod. Erīḥa. It lay 900 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, in a district wh., with ample irrigation, must have been a very garden of God. To the humble husbandry of to-day it responds with singular generosity.

J. was the first stronghold W. of Jordan taken by Joshua (Jo. 6.). Every living thing within was put to death, save the household of Rahab, who had befriended the spies. The city was utterly destroyed, and a curse pronounced agst. the man who shd. restore it. Fm. the spoil taken it must have been wealthy. It stood on the great avenue of commerce, &c., fm. the E., wh. here entered the western uplands. It seems soon to have revived, although perhaps unfortified. It was known as "the city of palm trees," and was taken by Eglon of Moab (Jg. 3.[13]). It is mentioned as inhabited in 2 S. 10.[5]. In Ahab's time Hiel rebuilt it, and endured the curse (1 K. 16.[34]). Here dwelt a company of the "sons of the prophets" (2 K. 2.[5]). The spring (v. 21) prob. denotes 'Ain es-Sulṭān, popularly known as the fountain of Elisha. Hither the captives of Judah taken by Pekah of Samaria were sent back and kindly treated (2 Ch. 28.[15]). Hard by the fugitive Zedekiah was captured (2 K. 25.[5], &c.). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ez. 2.[34]; Ne. 7.[36]), and the inhabitants took part in building the walls of Jrs. (Ne. 3.[2]). In the Maccabæan war J. was fortified by Bacchides (1 M. 9.[50]). Visited by Pompey, B.C. 63 (Ant. XIV. iv. 1; BJ. I. vi. 6), it was honoured by Gabinius, who (B.C. 57) made it the place of assembly—i.e. the chief city—in the district, and the seat of one of the five councils wh. he set over the people (Ant. XIV. v. 4; BJ. I. viii. 5). When Antony gave the country to Cleopatra, Herod farmed fm. her the revenues of Jericho (Ant. XV. iv. 1, 2). Later he greatly enlarged and beautified the city, building theatre, hippodrome, and amphitheatre (Ant. XVII. vi. 3, 5; BJ. I. xxxiii. 8). Traces of this city are still found between Erīḥā and the mountain S. of Wādy el-Qelt.

Here Jesus healed blind Bartimæus (Mk. 10.[46]; Lk. 18.[35]; cp. Mw. 20.[29]) and visited Zacchæus (Lk. 19.[1ff.]).

Records of J. in subsequent times are meagre. Justinian built a church here and a hospice. Under the Arabs J. was a place of consequence (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, index). The Crusaders assigned the revenues of the district to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jrs., and, later, to support a convent in Bethany (Will. of Tyre, xi. 15, xv. 26). In these times the plain was rich in sugar-cane, palms, and bananas. Indigo also, and balsam (see BALM), were profitable articles of commerce.

Mod. Erīḥā is a squalid vill. on the N. lip of Wādy

el-Qelt, about a mile fm. the foot of the mountain, consisting mainly of frail mud huts. There are several hotels for the accommodation of tourists, and a large hospice wh. shelters pilgrims of the Greek Church. An old tower hard by dates, prob., fm. Crusading times. The road to Jrs. enters the mountain by the gorge of Wādy el-Qelt, and passes upward through scenes of utter loneliness and desolation (Lk. 10.[30]). Along the edge of the plain are the ruins of old sugar-mills, and remains of anct. aqueducts. Jebel Quruntul, the traditional Mt. of Temptation, frowns over it fm. the W., pierced by many caves, still the haunts of eremites. E'ward, across the flat lands, and beyond the Jordan, rises the steep wall of Moab, while away to the S., in the mighty hollow between the mountains, is seen the haze that hangs over the Dead Sea.

JEROBOAM. (1) S. of Nebat (1 K. 11.[26]). His industry commended him to Solomon, who made him overseer of the forced labour in Ephraim. The people were restless under the despotism of Solomon, and, incited by a prophecy of Ahijah (11.[29ff.]) J. attempted an uprising wh. failed, and he fled to Egp. The folly of Rehoboam produced popular exasperation wh. furnished J. his opportunity. Returning fm. Egp., he was chosen k. with the consent of every tribe but Judah (chap. 12.). He fortified Shechem and Penuel. To the latter he may have retired at Shishak's invasion (1 K. 14.[28], Karnak inscr.). To counteract the influence of Jrs. as the religious centre of the whole nation, he reconsecrated the anct. sanctuaries at Dan and Bethel, setting in each a golden calf (i.e. a representation of J″. as a gilded bull), and instituted attractive religious ritual. This it is that brands him with the infamy of having made Isr. to sin. 1 K. 13. tells of J.'s encounter with the prophet whose denunciation of the altar at Bethel, with its significance for his own house, failed to turn J. fm. his evil ways. Ahijah foretold the doom of J.'s children, fm. wh. his s. Abijah was mercifully delivered by an early death (14.[1-18]). Continually at war with Judah, J. does not seem to have achieved any great military success. He failed to establish a dyn., his s. Nadab being slain and succeeded by Baasha after a two years' reign. (2) S. of Joash k. of Isr., the fourth of Jehu's dyn. (2 K. 14.[23]). A skilful warrior; under him Isr. attained its greatest success. Syr., weakened by repeated Asyr. invasions, he brought low, restoring the border of Isr. fm. the entering in of Hamath to the sea of the Arabah (2 K. 14.[25]). This seems also to imply the conquest of Moab. Amos describes the conditions that flourished amid the prevailing peace and security—the gross idolatries, the wealth and luxury, the moral depravity and corruption, the oppression of the poor, and perversion of justice, in wh. his prophetic eye saw the heralds of swiftly approaching doom (2.[6ff.], &c., 5.[27], 6.[14]; cp. Ho. 1.–3.).

JERUBBAAL. See GIDEON.

JERUEL (2 Ch. 20.[16]), the scene of the discomfiture of Judah's foes. It is prob. the district NW. of En-gedi, in the direction of Tekoa.

JERUSALEM. I. Name.—In later Heb. Yerūshālayim, perhaps originally Yerūshālēm; from Yerūsh-shālēm, "possession of Shalem." Shorter form Shālēm, only in Ps. 76.[3], Gn. 14.[18]. Whether Jebus (Jg. 19.[10]; 1 Ch. 11.[4]) really was its ancient name is doubtful.

II. General Situation.—Jrs. is situated on the S. Palestinian plateau, at a point where the watershed curves to westward, itself belonging to the hydrographic sphere of the Dead Sea. Part of the higher land here sloped to the E., and the drainage flowed in that direction, breaking an opening thro' the spur of Olivet, not far SE. of Jrs. This hollowed out the valleys, wh. increasing in depth and steepness as they approach their common issue at the opening mentioned above (originally 1929 ft., now 1979 ft.), left between them the long and comparatively narrow spurs on wh. the city is built. The southern extremities of these low ridges, between the valleys, offered strong positions for human habitations, lacking in strength only on the N. In this direction they rise slowly, and finally unite in a slope which comes down fm. the western range (2717.2 ft.), higher than the Mt. of Olives.

The surrounding country afforded sufficient ground for the cultivation of grain and fruit trees. Water was provided by the GIHON, a somewhat poor spring rising under the E. slope of the spur next to the Mt. of Olives, the mod. 'Ain umm ed-Daraj. Water percolating thro' the soil, fm. the natural drainage of the whole area, was collected by EN-ROGEL, mod. Bīr Eyūb, at the issue of the system (see also KIDRON). The position of the spring and the well pointed out the hill nearest them, i.e. the S. end of the spur W. of the spring and N. of the well, as suitable for human dwellings. There was on the top ample room for one of the small cities of Pal. at the time of the Israelite immigration. A larger population wd., however, find accommodation on the S. end of the next spur to the W. This was further fm. the spring and the well; but it had the advantage of stronger natural defences, having deep valleys on all sides, and being connected with the N. slope only by a narrow neck, wh. cd. be easily guarded. Further, the great highway fm. N. to S. passed here; and the roads from E. to W. were more easily accessible fm. the South-west Hill than fm. the remote corner of the South-east Hill. The latter might become a local centre, and, perhaps, a fortress; the former was fitted to be a market-place and political centre for a larger district. The connections with the N., S., and W. were excellent; and it is important to note that, N. of the great barrier of the Dead Sea, the first possible road crossing fm. the fertile pains of Moab to the coast came this way. On the other hand it is true that a town on this site was too far S. to dominate the whole of Pal.; and this Jrs. did only for a very short time. None of the great lines of commerce of the old world passed through her. On these stony mountains bordering the wilderness, neither trade nor agriculture cd. create a centre of culture like DAMASCUS, capable of subjecting vast surroundings to its influence. Not the natural flow of history but the influence of great personalities, under Divine guidance, could have given to a city in such a position an importance, not for Pal. alone, but for the whole world.

III. The Situation in Detail.—(a) The Valleys.—The main artery of natural drainage near Jrs. is the KIDRON valley, on the E. It receives three tributaries fm. the W.: (1) a short valley in the N. coming fm. the NW., wh. may be called the Valley of Bezatha (see BETHESDA); (2) a much longer valley, running at first parallel to the Valley of Bezatha, then bending to the S., with a slight deviation towards the W., called by Jos. the Cheesemakers' Valley * (by mod. writers, incorrectly, "the Tyropœon"). In the wide depression wh. forms the head of this valley Jos. (Ant. VII. x. 3; cp. I. x. 2) places the vale (or lowland) of the king (Gn. 14.[17]; 2 S. 18.[18]); prob. also the vale (or lowland) of Jehoshaphat (Jl. 3.[2, 12]). It was the place where foreign hosts approached Jrs. fm. the N.; hence the last gathering of her enemies is expected in this vale (cp. Is. 22.[7]; Jr. 31.[40]). The Cheesemakers' Valley receives, near the middle, a tributary fm. the W. wh. may be called the Valley of the Upper Pool (see below), because the biblical pool of this name marked its head. (3) Deeper than these two, further to the W., is a third valley, wh. runs at first fm. NE. to SW., then due S., and finally eastward again to join the Kidron immediately S. of the issue of the Cheesemakers' Valley. The Bible calls it the Valley of (the son of) HINNOM. The name prob. applied only to the southern part, now called Wādy er-Rabbābi. Like many Palestinian valleys, it has at its head a wide depression, which collects the natural surface water, now gathered in Birket Mamilla. The Fuller's Field (Is. 7.[3], 36.[2] = 2 K.

* The name is suspicious. We shd. more likely find cheesemongers than cheesemakers in a city like Jrs. Accdg. to Sabb. 15a, it was a dwelling-place of weavers. Perhaps the real name was "Dung Valley," corresponding with that of the gate at the end, because refuse was thrown into it fm. both sides. Jos. may have felt warranted by 2 S. 17.[29] to translate shpōth (lit. "refuse") "cheese."

18.[17]) would be in this neighbourhood. At the confluence of the last two valleys with the Kidron, a great natural basin caused the accumulation of humus on a large scale, wh., with the water from the Gihon, formed admirable gardens for the cultivation of vegetables. This unique garden-land, belonging at first to the Jebusite owners of the eastern spur and the spring, afterwards became royal property as "the king's gardens" (2 K. 25.[4]; Jr. 39.[4], 52.[7]; Ne. 3.[15]). Not far off to westward, at the exit of the HINNOM valley, the TOPHET must have been, and southward, near En-rogel, the stone of ZOHELETH.

(b) The Hills.—Of the hill between the Kidron and the Valley of Bezatha, only in the latest times of old Jrs. was a small part included within the precinct. In the days of Jos. it was the hill of "the Fuller's Monument" (BJ. V. iv. 2). Of the highest importance, however, was the spur between the Cheesemakers' Valley and the king's vale on the one side, and the Valleys of Bezatha and Kidron on the other. It starts in the N. with the mod. hill of es-sāhira (2549 ft.), now cut off fm. its southern continuation by a broad ditch. This ditch is the result of quarrying, wh. was carried into the interior of the hill to the S., forming a large grotto called by Jos. (BJ. V. iv. 2) "the royal caverns," or, as we shd. say, "the royal quarries": a royal property, as might be expected, by the side of the king's vale. The continuation of the spur southward gradually sloped from a height of 2529 ft. to 2409 ft., where it was so narrowed by a western extension of the Valley of Bezatha that this part looked like an independent hill. It may be called the North-east Hill of Jrs. At the time of Jos. it was named Bezetha or Bezatha (see below); formerly, perhaps, it was the hill Gareb (Jr. 31.[39]). S. of this constriction lies the central part of the eastern spur, with a flat and almost even top (2419–2440 ft.), terminating at the edge of the Kidron valley in a steep declivity. To the SWS. it runs out in a long narrow slope, fm. 2300 ft. to 2100 ft., where it sinks into the deep valley of the Kidron. Accdg. to Jos. (Ant. XIII. vi. 6; BJ. V. iv. 1) this slope had once a summit of its own, appearing like an independent hill, though even then much lower than the central eminence to the N. It may be called the South-east Hill. In ancient times the name Zion covered all the spur S. of Bezatha. The central part alone was called Ophel, "mound" (Mi. 4.[8]), a name wh. later was confined to the southern end, outside the Sanctuary (Ne. 3.[26f.], 11.[21]; 2 Ch. 27.[3], 33.[14]). It was identified with Moriah (2 Ch. 3.[1]).

A second spur rising between the Cheesemakers' Valley and the head of the Vale of Hinnom also runs at first fm. NW. to SE., and then to the S. In the N. it resembles a long slope rather than a hill, falling fm. a height of 2630 ft. to 2510 ft. On the E. it drops into the Cheesemakers' Valley at its confluence with the Valley of the "Upper Pool." If, as we think, the North-east Hill was "the hill Gareb," then "Goa" (Jr. 31.[39], RV. "Goah") must have been the northern end of the western spur—the North-west Hill. Jos. (BJ. V. vii. 3, xii. 2) calls it "the camp of the Assyrians." Christian tradition gives the special name of GOLGOTHA to its western declivity. The southern part of this spur, the South-west Hill (2502), is more isolated than any other eminence of the two spurs. The broad area on its summit afforded ample room for a city. It was, we believe, the old site of Jrs., and had no other name.

JERUSALEM FROM ROOF OF CONVENT OF THE SISTERS OF ZION: DOME OF THE ROCK AND MOUNT OF OLIVES TO THE LEFT

Of the mountains round Jrs. the most prominent, although not the highest, was the MOUNT OF OLIVES (2664.8 ft.) on the E. It was not a single mountain, but only a lower summit of an extensive range, beginning at the watershed in the N. with a summit of 2735 ft. An outrunner to the W. (2686 ft.) was renowned as the spot whence the traveller fm. the N. obtained the first good view of Jrs. Jos. calls it Scopos, "look-out," "watchman" (Ant. XI. viii. 5; BJ. II. xix. 4, 7, v. 2, 3). In Heb. the name was har hatz-tzōphīm, "mount of the watchmen" (B. Makkoth, 24[b], J. Moed Qatan, 83[b], Siphre, ed. Friedmann, 81[a]). GETHSEMANE lay at the western base, and the mountain terminated to the S. in the low summit of Bāṭen el-Hawa (2411.4 ft.); see MOUNT OF OLIVES. The mountains to the W. belong to the range on the eastern spurs of wh. Jrs. is built. The range attains a height of 2717.2 ft.

The spur running out to the S. bounding the upper part of the Valley of Hinnom on the W. falls to 2647 ft. In the time of Christ the monument of Herod (i.e. the sepulchre of his family) was seen on the eastern slope of this spur (BJ. V. iii. 2, xii. 2). It was prob. the tomb, with remarkable rock-bases for monuments, wh. is now shown under this name. No name for this hill has come down to us. Jo. 15.[8] refers to it as "the mountain that lieth before the Valley of Hinnom westward, wh. is at the uttermost part of the Vale of Rephaim northward." The watershed follows the spur, and then turns eastward. A vill. stood here in the time of Christ called "the place of chickpeas" (Heb. Beth-aphūnīm), prob. because the adjoining plain of Rephaim was the only place near Jrs. where that legumen was grown to advantage. S. of the lower part of the Valley of Hinnom the watershed rises to a point 2548.9 ft. high, now called Jebel Deir Abu Thōr. In Josephus' time it was known as "the camp of Pompey" (BJ. V. xii. 2). On its N. slope towards the Kidron was shown "the field of blood" (see AKELDAMA), and, lower down, the tomb of the High Priest Ananos (BJ. ib.), prob. the Annas of Lk. 3.[2]; Jn. 18.[13]; Ac. 4.[6]. The mountains around Jrs. were thus on three sides higher than the hills on wh. the city stood; that on the S. being only of equal height. Through the great opening between the Mt. of Olives and Jebel Deir Abu Thōr a far-reaching view is obtained over the Wilderness of Judæa, with the mountains of Moab, beyond the Dead Sea, on the distant horizon.

IV. History.—When the Isr. entered Pal., Jrs. was the centre of a small kdm. (Jo. 10.[1]). Its sphere of influence apparently extended more to the S. and SW. than to the N. It was inhabited by Jebusites, who were subdued, but not driven out by the Isr. (Jg. 1.[21]). In Jo. 18.[16ff.] (cp. Dt. 33.[12]; Ne. 11.[30]) its territory is reckoned as part of the lot of Benjamin, the S. frontier of wh. made a circuit to include it. Accdg. to Rabbinical tradition (B. Joma, 12[a]) the Sanctuary, excluding only the Temple house, was Judæan. For reasons already stated, the main portion of Jrs. must, at this time, be located on the SW. Hill. If the Jebusites dwelt here along with the Israelite rulers of the country, the SE. Hill was still in their exclusive possession. Had the city covered the whole of the SW. Hill to the bottom of the Cheesemakers' Valley, this small place, in its relatively low position, mt. have been called a suburb of Jrs. But at that time the city was confined to the summit of the SW. Hill; and the SE. Hill was strong enough to bear a castle independently of Jrs. The supposition that this castle, "the stronghold of Zion" (2 S. 5.[7]), might dominate Jrs., is without sufficient ground. Nearness to the Gihon and to En-rogel was an advantage, but long ere this the Jerusalemites had certainly provided for water supply by means of cisterns and pools. In Maccabæan times foreigners who held the stronghold of Zion were able to molest visitors to the Temple; but they never seriously threatened the owners of the city.

David conquered the castle of Zion and made it his own city (2 S. 5.[7, 9]) without entirely driving out the Jebusites (2 S. 5.[8], corrected text,* 24.[16ff.]).

What he wanted was a fortress as a support for his kdm. further north than Hebron, and not too far fm. his own tribe. Jrs. was too large and populous to become a safe residence and military store-house for the new king. But the Jebusite castle, while not too strong to be captured, was strong enough to become the solid base of an intertribal kdm. David fortified it by a new wall (2 S. 5.[9]), had a house built for himself (v. 11), and prob. also the "house for the mighty men" (Ne. 3.[16])—the barracks for his guards. At the S. declivity, within the city (2 K. 2.[10]), "the sepulchres of David" (Ne. 3.[16]) were hewn in the rock; prob. very plain rock chambers. At their entrance Herod erected a monument (Ant. XVI. vii. 1) wh. suddenly decayed, c. A.D. 132 (Dio Cassius, lix. 14). The place, well known in the time of the apostles (Ac. 2.[29]), was afterwards forgotten. When Solomon built a new residence on the central summit of the Eastern Hill it was not owing to disregard of his fr.'s stronghold, for he strengthened it at a point wh. David had not sufficiently fortified, by building the Millo (2 S. 5.[9]; 1 K. 9.[15], 11.[27]; 2 Ch. 32.[5]). This must have been a strong fort at the N. end of David's city, to wh. prob. even the harīm of David's palace had to give way (1 K. 9.[24]). The new castle was intended to protect the new residence fm. the S., and to furnish a place of refuge in case of imminent danger.

In David's time the central summit of the Eastern Hill was still used as a threshing-floor (2 S. 24.[25]). The wide space furnished ample room for a palace and a sanctuary, surrounded by spacious courts, as Phœnician architecture and royal splendour required. Here, higher up than the City of David (1 K. 9.[24]), in seven yrs. Solomon completed the building of the new Sanctuary, more glorious than the tent of the ark in David's City (2 S. 6.[17]), over the spot already consecrated by David's altar (2 S. 24.[25]). At a later time the place was associated with the offering of Isaac (Gn. 22.[14]; cp. 2 Ch. 3.[1]). Great artificial substructions were necessary to provide level areas for the various platforms required. In the days of Josephus it was believed that the central part of the eastern substructions, supporting the Sanctuary of that time, was the work of Solomon (Ant. VIII. iii. 9; XV.

* "David said: Whosoever smiteth a Jebusite, toucheth his own neck; the lame and the blind [as they pretend to be] are not hated of David's soul; wherefore they say the blind and the lame [not being dangerous] may come into the house."

xi. 3; XX. ix. 7; BJ. V. v. 1; Ac. 5.[12]). If this be true, then traces of it are still to be seen here. Stones of ten cubits and eight cubits were used (1 K. 7.[10]). For the Temple itself and its history see TEMPLE. Here it need only be said that it had an inner court of its own (1 K. 7.[12]), and a great court in common with the royal residence (v. 12). Subsequently part of this latter was set apart as an "outer" (Ek. 10.[5]), or "new" (2 Ch. 20.[5]) court of the Sanctuary. The inner court included the highest platform of the area; the great court, widest towards the E., surrounded it; containing also to the S. the royal residence. This was completed in 13 yrs. (1 K. 7.[1]), including the time occupied in building the great court and substructions. The residence consisted of an inner court called (1 K. 7.[8]) "the other court" (2 K. 20.[4], correct text,

SOLOMON'S STABLES

"the middle court"), wh. contained the house of the king and the house of Pharaoh's dr. (1 K. 7.[8]), i.e. the harîm of the palace. This court must have been to the S. of the Sanctuary, so that "there was but the wall" between them (Ek. 43.[8]). At the entrance stood the throne-room, with the judgment-seat of the king (1 K. 7.[7]). This was approached thro' a larger pillared hall, of 50 to 30 cubits, with a porch (v. 6), evidently the waiting-room for the people who came to see the king, and for the watchmen of the royal guard. In the outer court the most conspicuous building was the House of the Forest of Lebanon, equal in size to the Temple, 100 cubits long, 50 broad, and 30 high (1 K. 7.[2-5]). The name was taken fm. the ground-storey, the ceiling of wh. rested upon 45 pillars of cedar in three rows. Above this were three storeys of store-rooms, prob. 64 in each storey, the rooms measuring fm. 6 to 12 cubits each. The Temple store-rooms were 5 cubits high (1 K. 6.[10]). We may assume that these were of equal height. This leaves 15 cubits as the height of the pillar hall. The whole building was designed as an armoury (1 K. 10.[17]; I. 22.[8]), the hall on the ground-floor being the show-room, where costly weapons were exhibited. Here also, perhaps, the soldiers assembled to receive their arms. Naturally only the most important parts of the residence are specified. We must conceive the whole as a bewildering complex of small rooms, galleries, and courts, grouped around the great courts. In the outer court there certainly were numerous store-houses, stables, offices, and other apartments. The enclosing walls of the great court consisted of three rows of hewn stones and one row of cedar beams. This means, not that the walls were only four rows in height, but that above every third row of stones there was laid a row of cedar beams, accdg. to an anct. method of strengthening high walls. The new royal residence, including the Sanctuary, might be called a fortress. Its weakest point was in the N., although the Valley of Bezatha was a natural protection. The higher platform of the present Sanctuary (Ḥaram) is more than large enough to accommodate Solomon's Temple and court; while the area on the E. and towards the S. to a line drawn through the N. wall of the so-called Stables of Solomon, wd. afford ample room for the royal residence. One gate, "the gate of the footmen" ("runners," 2 K. 11.[19]), or the "upper gate" (2 Ch. 23.[20]), furnished direct communication between the residence and the Sanctuary. The "gate of the horses" (2 K. 11.[16]; Ne. 3.[28]) was an entrance fm. without in the SE. The "gate of the guard" (Ne. 3.[31], 12.[39]—the phrases are different) was in the N., while "the court of the guard," i.e. the prison (Jr. 32.[2, 8, 12], 33.[1], 37.[21], 38.[6, 13, 28], 39.[14f.]), was at the SE. corner of the outer court, near the gate of the horses (Ne. 3.[25]). "The gate Sur" (2 K. 19.[6]), or "the gate of the foundation" (2 Ch. 23.[5]), is perhaps only a mistake for "horse-gate." "The middle gate" (Jr. 39.[3]) was perhaps the least gate of the inner Sanctuary (cp. Ant. X. viii. 2).

Another work of Solomon was the wall of Jrs. (1 K. 3.[1], 9.[15]). This might refer to the fortification of the city on the SW. Hill. But the chronicler makes Joab restore the rest of the city (1 Ch. 11.[8]). If he assumes, as does Josephus later (Ant. VII. iii. 1, 2; BJ. V. iv. 2), that the wall uniting the SW. and SE. Hills was already in existence, it is not impossible that it was Solomon who, by means of his wall, accomplished this union of Jrs. with the two royal residences on the Eastern Hill, and thus created Greater Jrs., wh. was his city. The new wall left the old city open and defenceless on the side towards the Eastern Hill with its two castles, in full accord with the line of inner politics followed by Solomon. The track of the wall described by Josephus as the first and oldest (BJ. V. iv. 2) will therefore follow the wall of Solomon. It is doubtful, however, if any of the remains excavated by Dr. F. J. Bliss (1894-97) really belong to it.

According to the description of Josephus, and the remains found by Wilson, this wall started fm. the East Hill, exactly where the royal residence must have had its N. wall, towards the Sanctuary. It crossed the Cheesemakers' Valley, and ran almost straight westward, to the upper part of the Valley of Hinnom, leaving the Valley of the Upper Pool outside. Here it bent sharply to the S., followed the edge of the valley to the point where it curves eastward, descended the slope towards the issue of the Cheesemakers' Valley, and then turned northward to join the southern extremity of the wall of the City of David. In what way the E. wall of this stronghold was connected with the E. wall of the new residence we do not know. Some details of this " first " wall of Jrs. are known to us fm. the Bks. of the Kings and Nehemiah ; some of them, however, may belong to later alterations in the time of the kings of Judah. The main N. gate wd. be that of Ephraim (Ne. 8.^{16}, 12.^{39}), 400 cubits fm. the corner gate (2 K. 14.^{13}), and consequently not far E. of "the pool of the patriarch's bath " in mod. Jrs. The wall between these gates was called " the broad wall " (Ne. 3.^{8}, 12.^{38}), because it was more strongly built than the rest. This is easily understood. It had to protect the weakest point in the whole line of fortification. The corner was defended by the tower of the baking-ovens (Ne. 3.^{11}, 12.^{38}), the predecessor of Herod's Hippicus. The baking-ovens of old Jrs. were in this vicinity. Here also must have been " the gate of the corner " (2 K. 14.^{13} ; Jr. 31.^{38} ; Zc. 14.^{10}—not mentioned by Ne.), the west gate of the anct city. On the S. three gates are mentioned. " The gate of the valley " (Ne. 2.$^{13, 15}$, 3.^{13}) was the S. gate of oldest Jrs., but not so important as the W. gate, since, owing to the depth of the southern valley, the great road to the S. started fm. the latter. " The dung-gate "—better, " the gate of refuse " (Ne. 2.^{13}, 3.$^{13f.}$, 12.^{31}), perhaps also called " the gate of potsherds " (Jr. 19.^{2})—answered to the Cheesemakers' Valley, and gave the city on the SW. Hill an outlet towards En-rogel and the Wilderness of Judah. " The fountain gate " (Ne. 2.^{14}, 3.^{15}, 12.^{37}), not far fm. the last, led in the same direction, but belonged to the City of David. It was also called " the gate betwixt the two walls " (Jr. 39.^{4}, 52.^{7} ; 2 K. 25.^{4}), prob. because a double wall here closed the Cheesemakers' Valley. The " stairs of the City of David " (Ne. 3.^{15}, 12.^{37}) must have led up fm. this gate. Lower down, the royal wine-presses (Zc. 14.^{10}) may have had their place.

A suburb (mishne) is mentioned (2 K. 22.^{14} ; Ne. 11.^{9} ; Zp. 1.^{10}) as existing at least in the last days of pre-exilic Jrs. Part of it seems to have been called " the mortar," showing that it did not cover the hills N. of the old town ; although, as Jr. 31.^{39} presupposes, extension was possible only in that direction. " Another wall without " is referred to in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 32.^{5}), and Manasseh " built an outer wall to the City of David on the W. side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entering in at the fish-gate ; and he compassed about Ophel " (2 Ch. 33.^{14}). Hezekiah's outer wall prob. protected the " suburb " in the N. corresponding to part of Nehemiah's N. wall (Ne. 3.$^{1ff.}$), and to the " second wall " of Jos. (BJ. V. iv. 2). Jos. says it began at the gate Gennath in the old wall, and ended at the castle of Antonia. We can best understand the clear distinction between the northern and southern parts of this wall if we take it as running fm. the first wall to the N., then turning sharply to the W. Fm. BJ. V. vi. 2, xi. 4 it appears that the point of departure in the W. was to the E. of the Upper Pool and not too near Herod's three greatt owers (see below). The anct. wall found N. of Herod's second tower cannot, therefore, belong to the " second wall," wh. did not start fm. this tower. More probably it is part of the " third wall," or it belongs to Ælia Capitolina. The direct object of the " second wall " was not to protect old Jrs. agst. assault fm. the N., but to secure the " suburb " in the middle part of the Cheesemakers' Valley, and to improve the connection of the city with the Sanctuary and the royal residence. Naturally, however, the W. wall of the suburb made it dangerous for an enemy to approach the N. wall of the city, and so added to its security. Manasseh's wall seems to have been a continuation of that existing in Hezekiah's time, in the interest of the royal residence. Solomon's wall was no longer deemed sufficiently strong. A second wall was therefore built lower down, perhaps beginning at David's city above the Gihon, following the valley, and crossing the narrow neck between the NE. Hill and the Hill of the Sanctuary, to join Hezekiah's wall. Here, at the NE. corner, near an important entrance to the Temple, there seems to have been another small suburb wh. required protection. That the wall shd. end near the fish-gate is surprising, as no older wall cd. have terminated here. If the act. in Chronicles is correct, the wall of the suburb may originally have taken a curve, reaching the E. Hill further S. than Manasseh's wall. Nehemiah's restoration seems to have followed the line of Hezekiah and Manasseh. His description (Ne. 3.$^{1ff.}$) points to this outer wall. It would begin on the E. with the water-gate (Ne. 8.$^{26ff.}$, 12.^{37}) leading down to the Gihon. It was necessary to make two inward curves and one outward corner in order to surround the southern end of Ophel and join the E. wall. At the corner a tower projecting fm. the royal residence strengthened the position. The road fm. the horse-gate, wh. already belonged to the residence (see above), joined that fm. the water-gate, and crossed the Kidron to the NE. towards the Mt. of Olives and the Jordan. The east gate (Ne. 3.^{29}) prob. only belonged to the Sanctuary. The E. wall of Ophel ended towards the N. in a corner provided with an upper chamber (Ne. 3.[31])—a kind of tower. Here, at the Valley of Bezatha, it turned to the W. or NW., ascending the E. spur. The sheep-gate (Ne. 3.[1, 32], 12.[39]), wh. may be identd. with the gate of Benjamin (Jr. 37.[13], 38.[7]; Zc. 14.[10]), was the N. outlet of the E. Hill, with roads leading to the N. and to the E. The towers of Hammeah, "the hundred" (perhaps permanently occupied by a guard), and Hananeel (Ne. 3.[1], 12.[39]; Jr. 31.[38]; Zc. 14.[10]), strengthened the wall at its weakest point, where it was overlooked by the ascent of the NE. Hill. Then came the fish-gate (Ne. 3.[3], 12.[39]; Zp. 1.[10]; 2 Ch. 33.[14]), evidently the N. gate of the suburb, whence issued important roads to the N. and NW. We shd. prob. look for it at the point where the wall crossed the Cheesemakers' Valley. Some believe that the W. gate of the suburb was "the gate of the old [wall]" (Ne. 3.[6], 12.[39], where prob. we shd. supply "wall"), poss. also called the former gate (Zc. 14.[10]). The name wd. be most appropriate for a gate in the N. wall of oldest Jrs., called by Jos. "the old wall" (BJ. V. iv. 2, 4). This gate wd. then be ident. with the "gate of Ephraim" mentioned in Ne. 12.[39] as beside "the gate of the old," one or other of wh. wd. therefore require to be cancelled. In any case the gate of Ephraim, wh. must have been the N. gate of the old city, wd. be the point at wh. Hezekiah's "outer wall" started fm. the old wall, and must be identd. with Josephus' gate Gennath (BJ. V. iv. 2).

In the time of Nehemiah at least, there were open spaces within the walls near the gate of Ephraim (Ne. 8.[6]) and at the water-gate (Ne. 8.[1], 3.[16]: this place may be intended by bēth merḥāq—read beth merḥāb—in 2 S. 15.[17]); that is, near the principal gates of both parts of the city. Market streets cd. not be wanting. A bakers' street is mentioned (Jr. 37.[21]). But also the craftsmen and the locksmiths (2 K. 24.[16]), even the potters (Jr. 18.[2]), the perfumers (Ne. 3.[8]), and fullers (Is. 7.[3]), wd. have their own streets. The foreign merchants and the goldsmiths had their quarters in the suburb (Zp. 1.[11]); later, near the sheep-gate (Ne. 3.[31ff.]). It is very prob. that one street connected the gate of the valley with the gate of Ephraim, another the dung-gate with the fish-gate, both crossed by a street running from the gate of the corner, over the open place at the gate of Ephraim, towards the Sanctuary and the royal residence. In mod. Jrs. there are streets corresponding with these, although not always in the same positions. In the time of the kings the whole city, except the residence, was under one governor (2 K. 23.[8]; 2 Ch. 34.[8]): in Nehemiah's time it was divided into two districts (Ne. 3.[9, 12]).

Fm. Jo. 18.[16ff.] we may infer that the territory of Jrs. was limited in the S. to the Valley of Hinnom. Its chief olive and fig land must have been to the N. as Jos. (BJ. V. ii. 2, iii. 2) assumes, round the king's vale. Here was Absalom's monument (2 S. 18.[18]). In this direction also may have lain Uzza's garden with Manasseh's tomb (2 K. 21.[18]).

The City of David and Solomon was destroyed, B.C. 587, by Nebuchadnezzar. All houses were burned, and the walls broken down (2 K. 25.[9ff.]). Zerubbabel and Joshua, B.C. 519–515, restored the Sanctuary (Hg. 1.[12]; Zc. 4.[9]; Ez. 5.[6]), and Nehemiah, B.C. 445, the outer wall in 52 days (Ne. 3.[4], 6.[15]). The mention of the house of the mighty men, the armoury, the upper house of the king, and the court of the guard (Ne. 3.[16, 19, 25]) shows that, of the old buildings in David's City and Solomon's residence, much had been preserved, and prob. restored, before Nehemiah came. When the N. wall of the SW. Hill was restored is unknown. It may have been done by the High Priest, Simon II. (died B.C. 198), who also fortified the Sanctuary anew (Sir. 1.[3]; cp. Ant. XII. iii. 3). At the same time the Egyptians occupied a castle in Jrs. In 168 B.C. the Syrians strengthened it with a new wall, and held it until 142. 1 M. 1.[33], 7.[32], 14.[36] leave no doubt that the Akra (Heb. ḥaqrā [Meg. Taan.]), a stronghold used agst. the Jews, was the old City of David. This was the reason for completely fortifying the Sanctuary (1 M. 4.[60f.], 6.[7], 10.[11], 12.[37], 13.[52]). At this time prob. the remains of Solomon's residence disappeared. A wall was built on the E. of the SW. Hill to protect it agst. the Syrian castle (1 M. 12.[36]). To this wall prob. belonged the gate at the bridge wh. connected the upper city with the Temple (BJ. VI. vi. 2). It may not have been the Hasmonæan Simon, as Jos. pretends (Ant. XIII. vi. 7; BJ. I. ii. 2, iv. 1; but cp. 1 M. 13.[50f.]), but his s., John Hyrcanus I. (135–105), who found it necessary not only to destroy the Akra, but to lower the hill, so that it mt. no longer, in foreign hands, prove a danger to Jrs. The top of the hill was cut away, the Cheesemakers' Valley being filled with the debris. Simon had already made the Sanctuary his residence (1 M. 13.[52]). His son replaced the towers Hammeah and Hananeel in the N. by a new castle, called Baris (Ant. XIII. xi. 2, xvi. 5; XIV. i. 2, iv. 2; XV. xi. 4; XVIII. iv. 3; BJ. I. iii. 3, v. 4), wh. Aristeas describes as garrisoned by 500 men; and here the vestments of the High Priest were usually kept (Ant. XV. xi. 4). The castle was an annex of the Sanctuary, secured on the E. by the Valley of Bezatha, and severed fm. the NE. Hill by a broad ditch (Ant. XIV. iv. 2; BJ. V. iv. 2), wh. is still in existence, although not so deep as was formerly supposed. It served also as an approach to the sheep-gate. Another ditch, supposed to run between the castle and the Sanctuary, is doubtful. The royal residence proper, however, was not here, but on the E. edge of the SW. Hill, connected with the Sanctuary by a bridge (see above) wh. spanned the Cheesemakers' Valley (Ant. XIV. iv. 2; BJ. I. vii. 2). Fm. the palace, wh. was on a level with the highest part of the Sanctuary, a good view was obtained of all that was going on there (Ant. XX. viii. 11; BJ. II. xvi. 4). Its position also secured control of the old city. It is first mentioned in the time of John Hyrcanus II., B.C. 67 (Ant. XIV. i. 2; BJ. I. vi. 1), but it may have been the work of John Hyrcanus I. This palace was afterwards given to the Herodian family, when their own royal seats were taken by the Romans. Herod Antipas resided here when Jesus was sent to him by Pilate (Lk. 23.[6ff.]); Agrippa I. when he killed James, and put Peter in prison (Ac. 12.[2-4]); and Agrippa II. when he tried to prevent the Jewish rebellion (BJ. II. xvi. 3). It was destroyed by the insurgents, A.D. 66 (BJ. II. xvii. 2). In the time of the High Priest Jason (B.C. 174–171), a gymnasium (1 M. 1.[14]) was built just "below the castle," in the Cheesemakers' Valley (2 M. 4.[12]). The statement as to the position seems incorrect, as we afterwards find a "Xystos"—the designation of covered halls connected with a gymnasium—higher up in the same valley, just below the crossing of the "old wall," at the bridge leading to the Sanctuary (Ant. XX. viii. 11; BJ. II. xvi. 3; V. vi. 2; VI. iii. 2, vi. 2, viii. 1). This place was certainly no longer used for gymnastics, but rather resembled a forum, having on the W. the palace of the Hasmonæans, and on the E. the Council Hall (BJ. V. iv. 2; VI. vi. 3), where it was resolved to deliver Jesus to Pilate (Mw. 27.[1]; Mk. 15.[1]; Lk. 22.[66ff.]); where Peter and John (Ac. 4.[5]), Stephen (Ac. 6.[7]), and Paul (Ac. 23.) were examined. Stairs led fm. the Xystos up to the Sanctuary (BJ. II. xvi. 3). The public archives probably were in the neighbourhood (BJ. II. xvii. 6; VI. vi. 3).

Even before the time of the Hasmonæans, the influence of Hellenic art must have been very visible in Jrs. Herod lent himself to its promotion. Representations of the human figure were avoided, but those of animals were common (Tos. Ab. Z., V. 2; J. Ab. Z., 42[c]). The golden eagle placed by Herod in the Temple was an idolatrous symbol, and, therefore, naturally detested (Ant. XVII. vi. 2; BJ. I. xxxiii. 2). The Sanctuary was not only enlarged by Herod, but also adapted to Hellenic taste. Hellenic art and comfort were introduced in his palace, castles, and towers; while the old Phœnician style of building with huge stones was retained in the substructions.

Herod's first great work was the construction of a new castle wh. he called Antonia (Ant. XV. viii. 5, xi. 4, 7; XVIII. iv. 3; BJ. I. xxi. 1; V. v. 8), on the site of the Baris. It was square, with towers at the corners, of wh. those nearest to the Sanctuary were highest. The castle, wh. projected into the NW. corner of the sacred enclosure (BJ. V. v. 2; VI. v. 4; cp. VI. ii. 7), stood in immediate connection with the outer cloisters, making it easy to line them with soldiers; but it was not easily accessible fm. the Sanctuary. The Jews set fire to it at the outbreak of the insurrection (BJ. II. xvii. 7). This Jos. regards as a bad omen (BJ. VI. v. 4), poss. referring to Dn. 9.[27], and interpreting it "and on a corner one destroys abominations" (AV. "for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate"). It was finally demolished by the Romans (BJ. VI. ii. 1, 7; VII. i. 1). In this castle the apostle Paul was a prisoner (Ac. 21.[34], 22.[24], 23.[26]).

Another castle was built by Herod at the weak point in the defence of old Jrs. in the NW. The tower of the furnaces (or "bakers' ovens"—see above) was replaced by a row of three unusually strong and high towers, Hippicus, Phasael, and Mariamne (BJ. V. iv. 3, 4). Hippicus, also mentioned in Tg. Jn. 31.[37]; Zc. 14.[10], stood at the corner of the city (BJ. V. iii. 5); but Phasael was the strongest, resting on a solid cube of masonry of 40 cubits, wh. is poss. still preserved in the substruction of the so-called Tower of David, a solid block measuring 68 ft. by 56 ft., and 56 ft. high. These towers, built in the city wall, also protected a palace, finished B.C. 23, designed as the residence of the king; the dwelling-houses, gardens, ponds, &c., were enclosed by a special wall with towers, and connected with barracks (Ant. XV. ix. 3; BJ. II. xv. 5, xvii. 8; V. iv. 4). The old gate of the corner was replaced by one near Hippicus (BJ. V. vi. 5), prob. the same by wh. an aqueduct entered the city (ib. vii. 3). How this gate was made accessible fm. the town is not known. At the W. front of this castle was an open space, where Gessius Florus, the Rm. Procurator, erected his judgment-seat (BJ. II. xiv. 8). Prob. here also the judgment-seat of Pilate was placed (BJ. II. ix. 4; Mw. 27.[19]; Jn. 19.[13]); see GABBATHA. Herod's palace wd. therefore be Pilate's prætorium, where Christ spent the morning before His crucifixion (Mw. 27.[27]; Mk. 15.[16]; Jn. 18.[28]). As a Hellenistic town cd. not be without places of amusement, Herod built a theatre (Ant. XV. viii. 1), intended also for athletic combats and wild beast fights (alluded to, Tos. Eduj. iii. 2; J. Shek. 51[a]; B. Men. 103[b]), and therefore more a circus than a theatre. The same edifice may be meant by the Hippodrome (Ant. XVII. x. 2; BJ. II. iii. 1, ix. 3), S. of the Sanctuary, prob. in the Cheesemakers' Valley; while "the amphitheatre in the plain" (Ant. XVII. x. 2) is evidently the Hippodrome at Jericho (Ant. XVII. vi. 5, viii. 2; B.J. I. xxxiii. 6; cp. xxxiii. 8).

For Herod's restoration of the Temple, B.C. 19–12, see TEMPLE. Here we need only note that he added considerably to the strength of its fortifications. The extension of its substructions to the S. and to the N. made an assault fm. these sides very difficult. In its last days, John of Gischala built four towers; one at the NE. corner, another at the gate in the W. leading to the bridge, a third at the SE. corner, and a fourth over the "store-rooms," wh. must have been near the SW. corner, as fm. this place the Sabbath was announced to the inhabitants of Jrs. (BJ. IV. ix. 12). The NW. corner was already fortified by the Antonia. At the NE. corner of the upper town a tower was erected by Simon Bar Giora (BJ. VI. viii. 1).

Greater Jrs., before its destruction, consisted of four parts. The Upper Town, usually called the Upper Market (Heb. hash-shūq hā-'elyōn: Shek. viii. 1; Tos. Sanh. xi. 14), was oldest Jrs. (BJ. V. iv. 1): the Lower Town, or Akra, was the former City of David (BJ. I. i. 4; II. xvii. 5; IV. ix. 12; V. iv. 1, vi. 1; VI. vi. 3, vii. 2, viii. 1), still at that time a noble quarter, with the palaces of the royal family of Adiabene (BJ. IV. ix. 11; V. vi. 1; VI. vi. 3). Even after the destruction of the castle, the name Akra remained in use. The New City evidently means the quarter between the old and the second wall (BJ. II. xix. 4; V. viii. i, xii. 2), and wd. be the Lower Market (Heb. hash-shūq hat-taḥtōn: Tos. Sanh. xi. 14), altho' not so called by Jos., because the bazaars of the wool-dealers, and blacksmiths, and the clothes-store (BJ. V. viii. 1), prob. also the timber merchants (BJ. II. xix. 4), were there. Markets of the wool dealers and of the perfumers are mentioned in Tlm. B. Erub. 101[b]. The fourth part of Jrs. was called Bezetha, a name wh. originally applied only to the quarter on the NE. Hill (BJ. II. xv. 5, xix. 4; V. iv. 2, v. 8). Jos. says (BJ. V. iv. 2) that "Bezetha" may be trd. "New City"; and calls this quarter a portion of the New City (BJ. V. v. 8), and that in the north part of the Cheesemakers' Valley the Lower New City (BJ. V. xii. 2). He even extends the name New City to a place W. of the second wall, on wh. there were only scattered buildings.

Josephus' trn. of Bezetha (other rdgs. "Bezatha," "Bethaza") is imposs. It is = either bēzēthā, "place of olives," or beza'tā, "section." Jewish tradition (Tlm. J. Sanh. 19[b]; Tos. Sanh. iii. 4; B. Shebu. 16[a]) speaks of two "sections" (Heb. biṣ'īn) in Jrs., the lower of them being sanctified before the Exile; the other (the higher), at the weak point of Jrs., after it. The sing. of biṣ'īn wd. be biṣ'ā, Aram. det. beza'tā or beze'tā. The lower beza'tā wd. be the pre-exilic "suburb"; the higher, Josephus' Bezetha. To protect the new, wh. was also the weakest part of Jrs., Agrippa I. (A.D. 41–44) began to build a wall (Ant. XIX. vii. 2; BJ. II. xi. 6; V. iv. 2) wh. was finished by the insurgents, A.D. 66–69 (BJ. V. iv. 2). This wall, fm. the NW. corner of the Upper Market, ran northward to the high octagonal tower, Psephinus, where it turned to the W. Crossing the royal caverns, prob. = the mod. "cotton grotto" (more correctly "linen-dealers' grotto"—see above), it turned again at another tower, and joined the old wall, evidently at the NE. corner of the Sanctuary (BJ. V. iii. 5, iv. 2, 3). Of the various theories as to the course of this wall the most prob. is that, on the whole, it followed the line of the N. wall of mod. Jrs. The Psephinus must then be sought at the NW. corner of the present city; and the Fuller's Monument, wh. Jos. places at the opposite corner, perhaps at Burj Laqlaq, within the walls. The two Towers of the Women protected the principal gate to the N. (BJ. V. ii. 2, iii. 3), to wh. the present Damascus gate must correspond. On the Western Hill, as far as it was included, there were perhaps more olive gardens than houses. This is why the N. gate of the old city was called "Gennath" (BJ. V. iv. 2), wh. can be explained only by the Heb. ginnā, pl. ginnōth, appearing in Aram. as ginnāth, "the garden gate." Here, opposite the old city, naturally part of the necropolis of Jrs. was found. The tomb of King Alexander Jannæus in the N., and that of the High Priest John (prob. not Hyrcanus) in the W., were the most prominent monuments. The refuse of Jrs. cd. no longer be thrown into the Cheesemakers' Valley, adorned as it was with important buildings. Jos. speaks of a place at the SE. corner of the old city wall, called Bethso, or Besou, wh. means "place of filth" (Heb. bēt tsōā: BJ. V. iv. 2). That near by the S. gate of the old city was now called the gate of the Essenes (BJ. V. iv. 2), prob. because their haunts were in the southern wilderness. The priests' gate, E. of the Sanctuary (Cant. R. 2, 9), would be the predecessor of the present Golden Gate. A synagogue of the Alexandrians is mentioned in Tos. Meg. 3^b; Tlm. J. Meg. 73^d; cp. Ac. 6.[9]. The synagogue of the Tarsians (Tlm. B. Meg. 26^a) reminds us of the apostle Paul. The house of John Mark (Ac. 12.[12]), as the first Christian church, was believed to have survived the destruction of Titus. It was shown on the site of the present Cœnaculum, in the Upper Town of old Jrs., and the rose garden within the town was regarded as a singular curiosity (Maaser. ii. 5; Tlm. B. Bab. k. 82^b).

Jos. exaggerates the population of the city destroyed by the Romans: 1,100,000 souls are said to have perished during the siege, 40,000 retained their freedom, and, of the captives, 18,000 died (BJ. VI. viii. 2, ix. 2, 3). This points to a population of over 1,200,000. If we compare this with the present population of Jrs., we have within the walls, at most, 40,000; adding about half that number for the district now outside the walls, we get somewhere near 55,000 souls for a very crowded area. As old Jrs. was not densely occupied in all parts, a fair estimate for its later days wd. be 45,000 to 50,000: perhaps 30,000 more than in the time of Solomon.

After the destruction, Titus stationed the tenth legion in the NW. part of the old city (BJ. VII. i. 1, 2). As military encampments were square, we may assume that it occupied the site of the SW. quarter of mod. Jrs., cut off by a line from the Jaffa gate to the first market street, and following its prolongation southward. Ælia Capitolina, built by Hadrian after A.D. 135, covered the whole area of the present city. The camp of the tenth legion became one of the seven quarters of the new city. The Cardo (principal street) ran fm. the Damascus gate to the site of the mediæval south gate. The two Decumani corresponded to the street fm. the Jaffa gate to the Sanctuary, and fm. the mediæval gate near the NW. corner, to the present Gate of the Tribes. The NE. corner of the city formed the seventh quarter.

The main buildings were two public baths, a theatre, a triple arch (prob. the present Arch of Ecce Homo), a four-sided Nymphæum, with fountains, perhaps at one of the principal street crossings; a place with twelve gates, formerly called "stairs," wh. prob. means the area of the Temple with the stairs to the inner Sanctuary; and a square (kodra), perhaps the higher platform of the Sanctuary. All this we know fm. the Chronicon Paschale, wh., however, does not mention the temple of Jupiter, on the site of the old Temple (Dio. Cass.), nor the temple of Venus over against it, W. of the Cardo, between the two Decumani (Eusebius, Vit. Const.), nor the prætorium (Hieron.).

For water supply Jrs. must at first have depended solely on the Gihon and En-rogel. Various attempts were made to render these waters more approachable by artificial means (see GIHON, SHILOAH, EN-ROGEL). As the population increased, it became necessary to collect the rain-water in cisterns and pools. For this purpose the City of David had "the pool that was made" (Ne. 3.[16]) with a very doubtful name, wh. shd. prob. be corrected to "the pool of Asaiah." In Hezekiah's time, besides the conduit of Shiloah, special efforts were made to have water stored up within the walls. A pool was constructed between the two walls for the water of the "old pool," wh. is also called the "lower pool" (Is. 22.[9]; 2 K. 21.[20]); see SHILOAH. Hezekiah's new pool, called "the king's pool" (Ne. 2.[4]), "the pool of Shiloah" (Ne. 3.[5], correct text), "the pool of Solomon" (BJ. V. iv. 2), was at the southern issue of the Cheesemakers' Valley: the "old," or "lower pool," prob. a little higher up in the same valley. "The upper pool" (Is. 7.[3], 36.[2]), wh. was perhaps connected with the lower pool by a conduit, may be found at the head of the side branch of the Cheesemakers' Valley, N. of the old city, in the pool Amygdalon of Jos. (BJ. V. xi. 4)—prob. Heb. berēkath hammigdāl, "pool of the tower," because of its nearness to one of Herod's great towers (Mariamne); perhaps also intended by the "pool of the heifer" (Tg. Jr. 33.[38]); the present "pool of the patriarch's bath." We can hardly conceive this pool without a conduit such as now feeds it fm. Birket Mamilla on the W. This latter is not old in its present shape; but its predecessor may have been the "end of the conduit of the upper pool" (Is. 7.[3]), and perhaps the serpent pool of Jos. (BJ. V. iii. 2); if indeed this last is not to be identd. with the much smaller predecessor of the present Birket es Sulṭān, W. of the old city.

The Sanctuary was provided with many cisterns. The large pool sunk by Simon (Sir. 50.[3]) was poss. one of the largest. The present Birket Isrāīn, N. of the Sanctuary, belonged to Ælia Capitolina. Of greater antiquity, prob., is the pool further to the N., part of wh. has been found again. Useful to the inhabitants of the quarter Bezetha, it mt. prob. be called the pool of Bezatha—prob. the correct rdg. in Jn. 5.[2] (see BETHESDA). Baris and Antonia were supplied fm. the pool, now changed into a double cistern, below the house of the Sisters of Zion, wh. must have been the strouthion, or sparrow-pool of Jos. (BJ. V. xi. 4). It is connected with a conduit coming fm. the moat, E. of the present Damascus gate; a second conduit carried the overflow towards the Sanctuary. The letter of Aristeas distinctly mentions a conduit leading water to the Sanctuary.

Pilate was prob. the first to lead spring water into the city, making use of works begun by Herod to bring water to his castle, Herodium (Ant. XV. ix. 4). The length of the conduit Jos. gives in Ant. XVIII. iii. 2 as 200 stadia; in BJ. II. ix. 4 as 400 stadia. He was either ignorant of the exact length, or he purposely exaggerated. Jewish tradition says that the conduit wh. conveyed water to the Temple came fm. Etam (Tlm. J. Yom. 41.[9]; B. Yom. 31[a]; Seb. 54[b]). There, about 65 stadia S. of Jrs., a conduit of earthenware pipes still begins, wh., following the contours of the hills in many windings, may have an actual length of 150 stadia. It collects the water of four springs. It might be strengthened by two great tanks, wh. stored the overflow of water in the winter. Prob. in the Middle Ages a third tank was constructed, and the water supply increased by a new conduit coming fm. Wādy el-'Arrūb, c. 100 stadia S. of Jrs. Another conduit, partially constructed of hermetically joined stone pipes, brought the water of the upper springs near Etam, increased by the springs in Wādy el-Biyār, in a straight line to Jrs. The first conduit reached Jrs. at the level of the Sanctuary. Was it possible for the last to keep a higher level? Inscriptions prove that it belonged to Ælia Capitolina. It would furnish water for the two public baths, and for the Nymphæum. The first conduit was repaired at intervals fm. the Middle Ages, but in 1902 it was replaced by a system of iron pipes. The perforated "water-trough of Jehu," where all legal purifications were performed (Mikw. IV. 59; Tlm. B. Yeb. 15[a]), may have been connected with Pilate's conduit, prob. near the bridge (see above) on wh. it crossed the Cheesemakers' Valley to reach the Sanctuary. G. H. Dalman.

JESHANAH (2 Ch. 13.[19]), a town taken along with Bethel by Abijah fm. Jeroboam, prob. = 'Ain Sīnia, a vill. 4½ miles N. of Beitīn.

JESHIMON (Nu. 21.[20]; 1 S. 23.[19], &c.). We shd. read with RV. in each case "desert." The desolate stretch along the E. shore of the Dead Sea and N'wards is referred to in Numbers, that E. of Hachilah in 1 Sam.

JESHUA, a name once applied to Joshua, the s. of Nun (Ne. 8.[17]), borne by several men, the most important of whom was the High Priest, also called Joshua (Hg. 1.[1], &c.), who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[2]) and took charge of building the altar and restoring the offerings (3.[2ff.]). He also assisted in laying the foundation of the Temple (Hg. 1.[1], &c.). Zechariah makes use of him in a striking fig. (3.[1ff.]), and in a fig. crowns him (6.[11]).

JESHURUN, a poetic name for the people of Israel (Dt. 32.[15], 33.[5]; Is. 44.[2]).

JESSE, apparently a well-to-do sheep farmer in the town of Bethlehem, a desct. of Boaz (Ru. 4.[17]), fr. of David (1 S. 16.[1], &c.). His importance is due entirely to his relationship to his distinguished son, and to his place in the genealogy of Christ (Is. 11.[1, 10]; Ps. 72.[20]; Mw. 1.[5f.]; Lk. 3.[32]; Ac. 13.[22]). At the time of David's exploit with Goliath J. was already an old man. This explains David's care of his parents in the days of his persecution (1 S. 17.[12], 22.[2f.]). This is the last we hear of J., although 22.[4] implies his return fm. Moab.

JESUS CHRIST. Every human life may be said to have for its presupposition all the antecedent hist. of the race and to transmit its consequences into all subsequent hist., for it can never be told with certainty either from what distance some influences wh. have modified it may have travelled or to what distance influences originated by it may reach. The more important the life, however, the more solemn become such considerations; and this solemnity reaches its height in the life of Christ. All preceding hist. culminates in Him, and from Him all subsequent hist. flows. The histories of the Jews, the Greeks, and the Romans may be studied as providential preparations for His advent; and, in modern hist., we see His influence affecting, first, the races round the basin of the Mediterranean, then, from the fourth cent. onwards, it extends to the conquering races wh. swarm forth, to occupy Europe, from the basin of the Baltic; while, in our own day, we see Africa, China, and Japan coming within its sweep.

The nearest formative influence is that of the home; and, in this respect, the circumstances in wh. Jesus was brought up resembled many other aspects of His life in their combination of lowliness with loftiness. His parents were poor, yet of royal descent; they were working people in the village of Nazareth, yet they belonged to the excellent of the earth. In them, as in a few others, scattered as a seed of godliness throughout the land, the results aimed at in the past hist. of the people of God had been fulfilled: they feared the Lord, fed their piety on His Word, and sighed and prayed for a better time. In this home the language spoken would be Aramaic, a kind of degenerate Hebrew; but He would know Greek also, wh. was extensively spoken in "Galilee of the Gentiles," and it is not impossible that He may have been master of Hebrew, the language in which the Scriptures were read in the synagogue. He seems to have learned the trade of Joseph—that of village carpenter—and to have practised it for many years. The great source of ideas for Him would be the Old Testament, read and commented on in the synagogue; but nature also proved a school to Him, and He never wearied of considering the lilies, how they grow, or the sparrows, how they are fed. When He was taken to Jerusalem to the feasts, the history of His race spoke to His heart out of the fields and cities through which He passed. Palestine is so small a country that His eye could almost sweep over its whole extent as He stood on the hill behind the town of His abode, and the love of it sank deep into His affections, as it had into those of its children from century to century. But He could not love the Roman rule, which then held it in a grasp of iron, or the degenerate native sovereignty, the rumour of whose frivolity and crimes was poisoning the air. Closely as Jesus loved and studied nature, He studied human nature more closely still, and, in the silent years of Nazareth, the observations and convictions that were subsequently to flow from His lips in terms of grace and truth were unconsciously yet incessantly collecting in His mind.

A religious movement, which filled the whole land with excitement and sharply divided the spirits, preceded that of which Jesus was the centre; and it may be said to have been through the Baptist that Jesus was induced to part from His employment in the Galilean village and turn His thoughts towards another vocation. How far in the incidents accompanying the baptism there may have been for Jesus an element of surprise, it is impossible to tell; but, at all events, these formed a crisis, which must have been accompanied by a remarkable development within Himself. As the dove, brooding on the nest, evokes life, so the descent of the Holy Spirit stirred and called forth the latent powers of His nature; and the voice from heaven, while a testimony to the Father's love, was, at the same time, a summons to a Messianic career. The flight of Jesus into the wilderness, which immediately ensued, undoubtedly betokens internal excitement, from which relief was sought in solitude, where the mastery might be obtained of the multitude of thoughts fighting in His heart, His mind grasping the great vocation which had been divinely imposed upon Him and determining the methods by which it was to be carried out. Of this conflict a record has come down to us in what is called our Lord's Temptation in the Wilderness, which is full of suggestive hints on temptation in general, but unfolds its deepest meaning when interpreted in its special application to Him at the crisis which His life had then reached. In these dramatic scenes we discern, negatively, how Jesus resolved not to act; but we should give much to learn, with the same clearness, positively, how He did resolve to carry out His Messianic calling. As this, however, has not been vouchsafed, we must trust to subsequent events to reveal the secret; for doubtless the way in which He actually discharged His vocation corresponded with the vision of it which He saw from its commencement. The nearest approach we possess to an accurate summary of the purposes which were thronging in His soul at this time may, however, be found in the prophetic words from the Book of Isaiah which He read aloud in the synagogue at Nazareth, adding, "To-day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." The passage is instinct with the consciousness of Divine inspiration, a high calling, and an ability to comfort and to bless; and this must have been the mood in which He entered on His career.

For a few months, indeed, we hear very little of what Jesus was doing, the information of the Synoptists having not yet commenced, and John, who had been brought into close contact with Jesus during those opening scenes of His ministry, not being yet copious in his communications. The imprisonment of the Baptist seems to have been the signal for a more public and systematic beginning; and this was in the line of the work which had dropped from the hands of the forerunner. Like John, Jesus commenced with the message that the kingdom of God was at hand, and with the summons, therefore, to repent and believe the Gospel. But it was not long before, instead of saying that the kingdom was at hand, He intimated that it had already come; and, although, for reasons which were to be found in the moral and spiritual unpreparedness of His hearers, He refrained from intimating that He was the Messiah, this was the inference implied in the attitude taken up by Him; nor were voices of various kinds long lacking to demonstrate that by some, at least, this inference had been drawn.

Like John the Baptist and the other prophets who had gone before, Jesus wielded, as His first and chief instrument, the word. His word was with power; He spake as one having authority and not as the scribes; never man spake like this man—such were the rumours of His preaching which soon spread from one end of the land to the other, and brought people in thousands to hang upon His lips. Even in the form of His words there lurked a grace and charm, which might by themselves have accounted for the popularity of the speaker. Everything was simple, homely, and practical. So pointed and weighty were the sentences that they could not be forgotten. Besides, He made use of illustrations, which He drew with perfect facility from the commonest aspects of nature and the commonest experiences of human life. These culminated in His parables—a literary form which none had ever with any considerable success cultivated before, and none have successfully imitated since. Yet it was not in the form of His words that their compelling power lay, but in the substance. He spoke of the spiritual world as one who was native to it and before whom all its secrets lay naked and open. Of God He spoke as the Heavenly Father, without whose knowledge not a sparrow falls to the ground, but whose delights are with the sons of men. He honoured woman, and blessed the little children, and declared the soul of man to be more precious than all the world. Yet He did not flatter human nature: He detected sin not only in the outward conduct, but in the most secret movements of the heart and fancy; and, while He received with unbounded compassion the penitent, He scourged with unsparing severity the sin that was unconscious of itself. The keynote of the Sermon on the Mount, the best example which has come down to us of His popular method, is Blessedness; but, after ringing out this watchword a number of times, He goes on to show that blessedness consists in righteousness, which to Him is a far higher and rarer attainment than His hearers were thinking of. With the skill of a born teacher, He brings out its qualities one by one by comparing it with the ideals to which they were accustomed—first in the sermons of the scribes, and then in the practices of the Pharisees—and then He contrasts it with the selfishness and worldliness of men in general, who spend their days asking, What shall we eat? and What shall we drink? and forget whence they have come and whither they are going. Those who are not willing to be condemned with the wicked must strive to enter in by the strait gate. The commonest phrase in all the preaching of Jesus was "the kingdom of God" or "the kingdom of heaven." This may seem to mean the other world. And so it does; Jesus saw everything in the light of eternity. But, at the same time, it is here and now; He Himself was in the world for the very purpose of making the will of God to be done there as it is in heaven; and for this He taught all who listened to Him not only to pray, but to labour and to agonise. This had been the goal of the prayers of the saints and the labours of the prophets of old, into whose aspirations He entered; and this was the Messianic kingdom of which He was to be King.

Unlike John the Baptist, Jesus used as a second method for accomplishing His life-work the performing of miracles. In this He had been preceded by some of the greatest of the prophets, and the Jewish people, with whom He had to do, had been accustomed to this mode of authenticating a Divine message. Indeed, they were excessively fond of the supernatural; and one of the temptations which Jesus had to meet and overcome in the wilderness was to seek popularity by gratifying their taste for wonders. He never yielded to their demands that He should perform miracles of this type. His were all reasonable, consistent with His own character, and illustrative of His doctrine. When He gave sight to the blind, it was to prove that He brought the light of revelation to a dark world; and, when He cured the leper, it was to hint that He had a remedy for the worse leprosy of sin. Yet His miracles did not fail on occasion to touch the utmost limits of wonder; for He fed the multitudes, stilled the storm, and even raised the dead. They produced an overpowering sense of the immediate presence of the holy God, as we see in the effect on Peter of the miracle in his boat. They made the journeyings of Jesus like the flowing of a river of mercy through the country, as the sick and tormented flocked or were carried to the places where He was; and there is no reason to doubt that a large proportion of those who believed in Him consisted of persons who had been healed or had had their relatives healed at His hands.

What may be truly looked upon as a third method by which Jesus accomplished His life-work was the training of the Twelve. In this it cannot be claimed that He was entirely original; for something of the same kind had been attempted by the prophets in the same country in the "schools of the prophets," and "those about" Socrates and the other philosophers of Greece propagated to the generations coming after them the views of the masters. But none had ever seen with the same clearness of insight what are the possibilities of an intense and concentrated influence on a chosen few; none ever stuck to the work with the same assiduity amidst constant temptations to neglect it in favour of work that seemed more pressing; and none ever received more ample justification in the ultimate success of the method. From an early period of His ministry Jesus chose twelve of His disciples to be apostles. These were to be with Him, surrendering their earthly callings for this purpose and accompanying Him wherever He went, so that they were constantly under His personal influence. Not only did they witness all His miracles and hear all His discourses, but they enjoyed, besides, the inestimable privilege of questioning Him in private as to points in His discourses which they had not understood, or as to doubts which had arisen in their minds. After they had reached some degree of maturity, they were sent forth, two and two, to heal and evangelise on their own account in places which He had not time to visit, or to prepare the way for visits which He intended to make. They were of diverse character and occupation; some attained to greater nearness and familiarity with the Master than others; but the position they were able to take in guiding the Christian enterprise after Jesus had been taken from the world is the most eloquent testimony to their Master's wisdom and greatness. They became the nucleus of the Christian Church, and they now rank among the foremost instructors of mankind. In spite of the natural talents which some of them possessed, they were at first insignificant and seemed destined to obscurity; but the influence of Jesus made them "the glorious company of the apostles."

Such were the means with which Jesus operated, employing them with perfect freedom, and meeting every occasion, as it arose, with the naturalness of one always equal to the demands of His vocation. Many of the most exquisite touches in the Gospel narratives must have been inspirations of the moment; He displayed the utmost readiness and mother-wit in answering the objections of opponents on the spot; and the remarks He dropped in casual conversation or table talk were no less redolent of wisdom than His deliberate discourses. He was ever the child of nature, notwithstanding the clearly conceived purpose which went through all His life.

For a time it seemed as if He were to carry everything before Him, so enormous were the crowds that gathered round Him and followed Him wherever He went, and so overwhelming the enthusiasm excited by His miracles. After the feeding of the five thousand the multitude tried to take Him by force and make Him a king; and the king intended was, no doubt, the Messianic King of the Jews. Nevertheless, His ministry had not lasted long before, in influential quarters, a disposition began to manifest itself of a contrary character. The scribes, who were the public teachers in the synagogues, and the Pharisees, who were the popular models of piety, stood in doubt or proceeded to open opposition, while He never could visit the Holy City without, in one form or another, coming into collision with the party of the High Priests and the Sadducees, which was all-powerful there. These various authorities were offended by the lowliness of His origin, and by the fact that He "had never learned." He gave offence by His refusal to be bound by the strict rules of Sabbath-observance current in the country, and by His want of respect for other points in "the tradition of the elders," such as fasting and the washing of hands before eating bread. Jesus not only turned into ridicule a whole circle of observances invented by the pretenders of piety and supposed to be pleasing to God, but swept away the distinction between things clean and things unclean, as this had been laid down in the Jewish law, and intimated not obscurely that the whole worship of the Temple was to come to an end, giving way to a worship in spirit and truth, which should know nothing of sacred places, but should be as extensive as humanity and appropriate in any corner of the wide world. By this contrast, which became ever more marked, between the traditional opinions and the message of Jesus, there was created throughout the country a great fermentation of clashing opinions. Some thought Him a good man, while others considered Him a deceiver of the people; many were clear that He was a prophet, others allowed Him to be a forerunner of the Messiah; but the voices were not numerous that pronounced Him to be the Messiah Himself.

For a time Jesus simply went on with His work, leaving the people free to make up their own minds. And this was a golden season, when He revelled in the bliss of doing good, in the gratitude of those who had benefited from His beneficence, and in the friendship and enthusiasm of His disciples. The principal scene of His labours was the Lake of Galilee; and there He went, preaching and healing, from town to town round the shore or retired with the Twelve to the bosom of the deep. Sometimes He would strike away to the north or the south, the east or the west; sometimes He would make a wide circuit in Galilee, preaching in the synagogues; sometimes He would have the Twelve scouring the country far and near; at the feasts He would go up to Jerusalem with the pilgrims, and come back with exciting memories of adventures there; but ever the blue and sunny lake in the north drew Him back, to mingle with the people with whom He felt most at home and to reiterate the good news of eternal life. But by degrees the tide of popularity ebbed. The authoritative classes became more and more hostile. This could not be the hero they were expecting to come and redeem their country from bondage to the Roman; He had none of the grandeur which surrounded the Messiah in Old Testament prophecy; this was a feeble dreamer and a false Messiah. Such grew to be their settled conviction. Wherever He turned, He met this frowning aspect on the face of authority. From headquarters deputations were sent down to Galilee to watch and test Him, and to take counsel with the local authorities. But one who made Messianic claims, or allowed them to be made for Him, without being able to fill the rôle, excited, not only disappointment, but the keenest resentment; for He was defacing the proudest hope of a nation and blaspheming the name of God; and at an early stage of His career there began to be whispers about cutting Him off, when an opportunity should arise.

Such sentiments in high places could not fail, in the long run, to tell on the multitude. As time went by, the crowds waiting on His preaching dwindled, and His miracles no longer created the boundless wonder they had at first excited. He Himself lost the sympathetic touch with the multitude which had gladdened His earlier ministry, and fell back on the chosen few who believed entirely in Him, and especially on the Twelve. With the latter He made long circuits, at a distance from the region which had hitherto been the centre of His activity, sometimes plunging into natural solitudes, sometimes even going across the confines of the Holy Land in order to devote Himself to the deeper instruction of the apostles in the truth for which they were to be His witnesses.

On one such journey, which carried Him and them to Cæsarea Philippi, on the north-eastern frontier, at the foot of Mount Hermon, having gently drawn from them what were the opinions of the people at large about Himself, He asked what was their own opinion; whereupon Peter, in the name of all, confessed Him to be the Messiah, the Son of the living God. This noble confession of religious conviction He hailed with delight as the work of God, and proceeded to indicate that now He had the nucleus of that body which would propagate His views and spirit, and would survive all the changes and chances of time. It was not long after this till the faith of the chosen Three was still further confirmed by the sight of the Transfiguration, when, on the top of a mountain, to which they had accompanied Him, Moses and Elias appeared talking with Him about His destiny, and God again, as at the Baptism, acknowledged Him as His beloved Son. But, as if He had been waiting for the moment when their faith should be mature enough to stand it, Jesus made these happy and exalted experiences the signals for communicating to them the prediction, now become a clear conviction in His own mind, that He would fall a victim to the zeal of His adversaries; and, returning again and again to the subject, He disclosed more and more of the details of the sad future. But He did so to ears that could not take in what He was trying to instil; for, sharing the conceptions of the Messiah entertained by His enemies, they were certain that He could not die.

At length, quitting Galilee for ever, He turned His face towards Jerusalem, where, He was conscious, the final judgment of the nation, whether for or against Him, must be pronounced. Yet He did not hasten thither; because He owed it to the parts of the country He had not yet visited to make them also partakers of His Gospel, if they would accept it. Accordingly He lingered in the regions between Galilee and Samaria, and in the country beyond Jordan, unfolding all the activities of which He had made use in Galilee, and awakening so much of the enthusiasm which had at first risen around Him in the north that it seemed not impossible that, on the crest of this wave, He might advance with irresistible prestige on Jerusalem.

It was a week before the ceremonies of the great annual feast of the Passover commenced, in the spring of the year, that He reached Jericho, the City of Palm Trees, in the basin of the Jordan, and from there entered on the ascent towards the Holy City along a road thronged with pilgrims from Galilee and those parts in which He had been recently evangelising. It was no wonder that He became the centre of the advancing crowd, or that the pilgrims soon became fervent with Messianic excitement. And, at last, He who had, at earlier stages, resisted all such attempts, yielded to the popular tide; for the time had come for giving to the country an unmistakable indication of the claims made by Him, and to challenge on these a final decision. Seated, therefore, on an ass, over which some gay garment had been spread, and borne along by the multitude, who cut down branches and strewed them in His path, whilst they shouted "Hosanna to the Son of David!" He entered the city and proceeded through the streets to the Temple. But the inhabitants of the capital looked coldly on, and the authorities ordered Him to call upon His followers to hold their peace. Giving them an answer which revealed the exuberance of His spirit at the moment, He entered the Temple and drove thence the traders, who were turning, He said, the place which His Father had intended as a house of prayer for all nations into a den of thieves. This might have been the signal for an outbreak of reformatory zeal against those institutions with which the city abounded and in which the power of His enemies was entrenched; but He took no further advantage of the opportunity; the multitude, which was of provincial complexion, dispersed; Jerusalem went about its ordinary concerns; and He retired for the night to the Mount of Olives.

The authorities could hardly be expected, however, to let such a demonstration take place without some rejoinder on their part; and they resolved upon His death, waiting only for an opportunity of putting this purpose into execution without re-awakening the enthusiasm on His behalf of which He had failed to take advantage. The opportunity came to them from an unexpected quarter, one of His nearest followers offering to betray Him for an insignificant reward. Some have thought that the purpose of Judas was to compel Jesus to take the prompt and decisive action which He had failed to do on the day of the triumphal entry; but it is more probable that, as the Gospels seem unanimously to say, his treachery was the revenge of a disappointed man. At all events, it facilitated the operations of the authorities and hastened the inevitable end.

Meanwhile Jesus, going day by day into the city, continued His usual ministrations as preacher and healer. The sentiments of the growing pilgrim-multitudes was favourable; but the authorities, encountering Him publicly in argument, endeavoured to expose Him before His sympathisers. Out of these dialectical encounters He rescued Himself with the utmost brilliancy, and, carrying the war into the enemy's camp, overwhelmed the authorities with ridicule. The flood-gates of His anger and contempt for them being opened, He assailed them with a philippic of accusation which has the rhythmic perfection of a poem in its concentrated truth and scorn. It could not, however, be doubtful whither such violent division between them and Him must tend; and, on the night when the ceremonies of the festival commenced in the slaying of the paschal lamb, He took farewell of the Twelve in words which have been called the Holy of Holies of His biography, while He transmuted the Old Testament feast of the Passover into the New Testament Lord's Supper, ordaining it to remain for all time His memorial. That night He was betrayed by Judas at the gate of the Garden of Gethsemane, to which He had retired for prayer.

His captors led Him into the presence of the Jewish authorities, who condemned Him to death for blasphemy. But it was not in their power to execute Him without the confirmation of their sentence by the Roman governor; and this they had no small difficulty in obtaining from Pontius Pilate. They extorted it, however, by the use of threats; and Jesus, being handed over to the executioners, was, without delay, put to death by crucifixion.

At the critical moment all His disciples forsook Him and fled; and Peter, the foremost of them all, denied, with oaths and curses, that he knew Him. This looked like the breaking up of the whole Messianic enterprise; politico-religious illusions have been far from rare in the history of mankind; and this appeared to be one which had come to an ignominious end. But, from the time when He had begun to foretell that He was to suffer and die, Jesus had likewise foretold that He would rise again from the dead the third day. A thing so unlikely, however, had taken no hold of the disciples, who probably gave to the words some figurative sense, so far as they observed them at all. On the morning, however, of the third day, certain women, who went to the sepulchre in which He had been buried, found it empty; and to one of them Jesus appeared, telling her to go and spread the news amongst His followers that He had risen. To Peter He likewise appeared, and to His own brother James, who had not, till this point, been a disciple. He appeared to two on the way to Emmaus, and then to larger numbers, till at last he was seen by five hundred at once in Galilee. For forty days He lingered among His disciples; and then, in the sight of the Eleven, whom He had led out as far as the Mount of Olivet, He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. Under the influence of these experiences the meanness and failure of the last stages of the career of Jesus were forgotten; the grandeur of His character, the loftiness of His aims, and the wisdom of His teaching were revived in the memory of the disciples; and they returned to Jerusalem with jubilation, to wait for the descent of the Spirit, which He had promised to them at parting. This endowment came on the Day of Pentecost; and then they appeared in public as His witnesses, testifying to small and great that Christ was risen and alive for evermore.

The Problems of the Life of Christ

There is no other portion of human knowledge on which the same amount of inquiry has been concentrated as on the life of Christ. Every incident has been scrutinised with microscopical closeness; every line and every word have been weighed; every conceivable way of accounting for the phenomena has been tried. There has been so much arbitrariness of criticism as to call forth the not unnatural resentment of those to whom the Lord is precious; but it ought to be remembered that the very excess of doubt or scepticism is a tribute to the immeasurable value of the facts: if these did not matter so much, it would not be worth while to make so much noise about them; and, the more precious any kind of truth is, the more hot must the fires be by which it is tried.

(1) The Sources.—In two directions the attempt has recently been made to enlarge the literary sources from which our knowledge of Jesus must be derived—on the one hand, by the collection of Agrapha, as they are called, that is, sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels but preserved in early documents, something like a score of these having been ascertained with more or less of confidence; on the other hand, by the unearthing and study of books which may have influenced our Lord and His apostles (to borrow the happy title of one of the books on the subject), these being products of the period between the Old Testament and the New, and being now ransacked for ideas or phrases which may have modified the thinking or the language of our Lord. A recent writer of a life of Christ has made use, wherever possible, of the fragments which have come down to us of a Gospel to the Hebrews, but without adding to our knowledge anything substantial. The four Gospels still assert their position as practically the sole sources on which we can draw with security. The three first are called the Synoptists, because they look at the history from the same point of view. But it is one of the most intricate of all literary problems to account for their resemblances on the one hand and their differences on the other. The favourite explanation at present is what is called the Two-source Theory, which assumes that St. Mark was first, and that St. Matthew and St. Luke borrowed from him, while the two latter, and perhaps all three, borrowed from an older collection attributed in tradition to the apostle Matthew, who may or may not have been the author of our present St. Matthew. Extraordinary attempts are being made to reconstruct this older document by piecing together the fragments of it scattered through our present Gospels, and some are confident they may be able in this way to educe a simpler and more primitive life of Christ. It is too readily, however, taken for granted that priority in time must necessarily imply superiority in quality. No portions of our Gospels bear more incontestably on their face the signature of trustworthiness than some passages, like the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son, which we owe entirely to St. Luke, although this Evangelist is generally believed to be later than the others. The truth would appear to be, that each of the Evangelists had an affinity for certain aspects of the life, and each is superior in his own direction. In St. Mark we have the rush and movement of Christ's life, the wonder it created, and the rumour it diffused; to St. Matthew we are indebted for our Lord's sayings and discourses, preserved with manifest fidelity and arranged in excellent order; while St. Luke has an affinity for the more human and catholic aspects of the Lord's ministry.

The fourth Gospel has a point of view of its own. In very early times it was called the "spiritual" Gospel; it might be called the interior Gospel, depicting its subject as He moved among His own in private, whereas the Synoptists portray rather His public life; and it cleaves largely to His life in Judæa, whereas they attach themselves mostly to Galilee. The tradition is, that it was written intentionally to supplement the others. But opinion as to its date, authorship, and value has passed through extraordinary changes, swaying, on both sides, to the extreme reach of the pendulum. Many have considered it the gem among the four; others have questioned its value altogether. It cannot be denied that there is a remarkable contrast between the traits and the words of the Figure who moves in a guise so simple through the first three Gospels and those of the Christ of the fourth. But this is not without analogy in literature, the Socrates of Xenophon bearing a striking resemblance to the Jesus of the Synoptists, while the Socrates of Plato, with his subtle arguments and lofty speculations, bears an undoubted resemblance to the Christ of St. John. Invaluable as is the portrait of Jesus we owe to the Evangelists of the first three Gospels, it hardly brings out the full stature of Him who towers at the commencement of Christian history; and as one of the ablest representatives of a school of pretty negative criticism has proved, in a work on the teaching of Jesus, the ideas of Christ in St. John, when stripped of a superficial mannerism, perhaps due to the peculiar mental constitution of the Evangelist, are, in their essence, identical with the doctrines of Jesus as reported by the other Evangelists. Scholarship has its own rights, which some of its representatives proclaim from the housetops; but the experience and the instincts of the Christian mind have also something to say; and it will not be easy to take from the Church of God the conviction, that in this Gospel it possesses a priceless and faithful picture from the hand of the disciple whom Jesus loved. Idealised it may be; but, if so, only in the sense in which the products of the loftiest genius are all idealised.

(2) The Events.—When we turn from the records to the events, we are confronted by a great profusion of problems. Chronological problems, for example, abound; and it may even be said to be a problem, how far the attempt should be made to identify a chronology at all. The most interesting, however, of these inquiries relates to the duration of the public ministry. From the indications supplied in the fourth Gospel of the feasts at Jerusalem attended by Jesus, the conclusion has been drawn that it lasted three years, each of which had its own character, the first being a year of comparative obscurity, the second one of marked success and popularity, while the third deepened into eclipse and disaster. But, in consequence of the disposition in certain quarters to drop the fourth Gospel from the list of authoritative sources, there has arisen a tendency to suppose the public ministry to have been very brief, not lasting longer than a single year. But not only would this detract from the dignity of the drama, the different acts not having room to unfold themselves, but there are indications even in the Synoptists—such, for example, as the lament over Jerusalem—"How often would I have gathered thee"—which point to a more frequent activity in the capital than this theory could make room for. Another interesting question of the same kind is the day on which the Lord's Supper was instituted. By many St. John is supposed to correct the chronology of his predecessors, and to represent the farewell scenes as having taken place four-and-twenty hours earlier than the others assume. Not only, however, would this seriously interfere with the connection between the old and the new ordinance stamped on the Synoptic records, but such an obvious mistake is a thing very unlikely in itself.

Of course, however, it is in the sphere of the miraculous that problems most abound. Against the very idea of miracle there is a strong prejudice in the minds of many, who believe either that it is impossible for a miracle ever to have happened or at least that such an occurrence can never be proved; and against particular miracles objections may at any time be raised owing to these having accidentally been made prominent in controversy. Thus, not long ago, fierce controversy raged, in this country, round the casting out of the devils from the demoniac of Gadara, and, at an earlier date in other countries, the raising of Lazarus was made for long a burning centre of attack. At present there is a disposition to divide the miracles attributed to our Lord into two classes—such as might possibly admit of a natural explanation and such as could by no possibility be explained in this way. The area of the former class is widened as much as possible; it is acknowledged that the working of such marvels, which were accepted by His unscientific contemporaries as miracles, formed a conspicuous element in His activity; and all kinds of modern marvels, such as those of hypnotism and faith-healing, are cited as suggestions to account for His performance of them, while much is made of the instances wherein He made use of means, such as His own spittle, and special interest is exhibited in any cases which seem to show that either He or His disciples sometimes failed in their attempts. The other class of miracles, comprising the turning of water into wine, the stilling of the storm and the like, would be rejected as unhistorical. But these are related by the Evangelists, side by side with the others, with the utmost tranquillity; and the accounts of some of them are of the most incontrovertible kind; thus the feeding of the five thousand is attested by all the four witnesses. Not a few of them are authenticated by striking sayings of Jesus, so woven into the texture of the narrative that, if the saying be His, the miracle must have taken place also. The message of Jesus to the Baptist carries exceptional force: "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have the Gospel preached unto them." Here it will be observed how quietly the cleansing of lepers and the raising of the dead are ranged side by side with the other works of a less extraordinary character; and it is worth observing also how much apologetic value Jesus Himself ascribes to His miracles. The same line of argument was obviously in His mind on other occasions; and it is no contradiction of it—although it has been so interpreted—that He reproved the Jews for their greed of signs, for the highest value may be justly placed on marvels of one type while it is wholly refused to those of another.

(3) The Sayings.—The study of the words of Jesus has lagged behind that of His acts; but lost time is now being rapidly made up, and it is not unlikely that works on the words or teachings of Jesus may pour from the press as copiously during the next half-century as books on His life have done in the half-century just past. In this region, at all events, problems already abound, and they will grow more numerous as the attention of scholarship is more drawn in this direction.

The remark made above about single miracles may be here repeated about single sayings of Jesus, that circumstances may, as if by accident, at any time make one of them a theme of keen controversy. Thus, the saying attributed to Jesus about His parables, that He uttered them, in order that they who heard might hear but not understand, but have their hearts hardened, has of late been violently assailed as a sentiment which the loving Saviour can never have uttered: on the contrary, the purpose of His parables was to make the truth intelligible and acceptable. It is, however, the reverse of probable that even an Evangelist can have been ignorant that the latter was the obvious use of parables; and the question is whether they may also have had a use which was not obvious: many a preacher popular with the multitude has had to make the experience that, after an audience has been drawn and gratified with the æsthetic virtues of the preaching, nothing has been done for the real ends of the Gospel. The passage in the Sermon on the Mount in which Jesus is made to say that, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled, has been objected to as a total misrepresentation of the attitude of Jesus to the dispensation which went before, one zealous critic remarking that it is just as likely that Jesus said this as it would be to read that Luther had bought an indulgence after nailing his theses to the church at Wittenberg. The relation, however, of Jesus to the Old Testament Law is a topic of great difficulty and complexity; and a thorough exposition of it will not be able to dispense with this verse for its completion. At least one entire book has recently been written on the question whether or not our Lord's farewell words to the Eleven, reported in the last three verses of the Gospel of St. Matthew, are authentic. Of course to those who disbelieve that there was any resurrection, any words attributed to the risen Saviour must be spurious, and there is a disposition in certain quarters to empty all the greatest sayings of our Lord of the major part of their meaning; but, assuming the situation to be real, we cannot but recognise that the words exactly fit it; and none speak more powerfully to the heart of Christendom.

There are certain sections of the words of Jesus which have given rise to serious problems. For instance, His references to the Old Testament are extremely numerous; and it is allowed by all competent to judge that in many cases He has shed a marvellous light on the passages which He quotes; but the question has been acutely raised, especially in England, whether His references to certain events, such as the case of Jonah, and to the authorship of certain portions, such as the 110th Psalm, imply authoritative decisions on questions which criticism is apt to raise at these very points. This, however, resolves itself into a far wider question as to the limits of Jesus' knowledge. On one topic, we know from His own lips, He was ignorant; and the question may be asked, whether this was the only one, or only a specimen of others of the same kind. The attempt to deal with such difficulties has given rise to what are called the Kenotic Theories in modern theology. These it is far from easy either to state briefly in an intelligible form, or to apply in detail to the phenomena of our Lord's earthly life; but it is surely wise to keep His name as much as possible out of the investigations and conflicts of science. Not less perplexing are the difficulties connected with another section of our Lord's words—that, namely, which may be called eschatological. Many of His sayings related to the future; and, although, as has just been stated, He acknowledged there was at least one future event which the Father had kept in His own power, He uttered many predictions, in some of which, as in those relating to the Last Judgment, His glory was conspicuously revealed. Yet there are other things which, it must be admitted, are hard to be understood. Such, for example, are the sayings which seem to imply that He was to return to the world in the lifetime of the generation then living. These are the more strange because they appear to be in conflict with others wherein He anticipated such a lengthy development of His kingdom as history since then has actually exhibited. Some think that the conditions can be met by assuming that He was referring to such a return to the world on His part as took place at the destruction of Jerusalem; but there may be a deeper secret: this may have been a way of intimating that the proper attitude of His followers in all generations is to be on the watch, as if He might appear at any moment.

Interesting, however, as the problems indicated or others that might be mentioned may be, the point round which the discussion of the teaching of Jesus has centred, during the last ten or twenty years, has been what is called the Self-consciousness of Jesus—that is, His teaching about Himself, His own person and His work.

Here fall to be considered the titles by which He was known; and the first of these is His own favourite name for Himself—the Son of man. Most people are tolerably satisfied that they know what this sweet and tender title signifies, but, in the realm of scholarship, there prevails extraordinary variety of opinion on the subject, one investigator quoting, a few years ago, a perfectly bewildering number of shades of difference in the views of various authors. Since then the learned world has been extraordinarily agitated by a suggestion that it means no more than "any one." The contention is, that the language spoken by Jesus was Aramaic, and that in this language the phrase which He must have used signifies no more than this. In point of fact, this suggestion is not by any means new, and the wonder it has excited will not last long; for "the son of man" in the vague sense of man in general frequently occurs both in the LXX and the New Testament, evidently as the translation into Greek of a Semitic idea, but the phrase in which, in such cases, it is rendered is never identical with that employed by Jesus when speaking of Himself. The investigations of recent scholarship leave practically no doubt that the source of the phrase as used by Jesus was the passage in Daniel where the prophet saw one like unto the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven; and, therefore, its primary meaning is not that attributed to it by the common mind, but Messianic; and there is strong reason to think that Jesus employed it partly because it concealed His pretensions from the crowd, while it suggested them to those to whom He wished to reveal His secret mind. Another title, "the Son of God," occupies in St. John the same place as "the Son of man" does in the Synoptists, though it is not absent from the latter any more than "the Son of man" is from St. John; and it was more a name bestowed on Him by others than one He of His own accord applied to Himself. In the common mind it designates His deity, as "the Son of man" does His humanity; and St. John distinctly states that the Jews accused Him of making Himself equal with God because He made claim to this title. Nevertheless, it is maintained by many that, in the Synoptists at least, it is no more than a Messianic title; and, if it be observed that in Scripture not only angels but many human beings are called "sons of God," it will be easily perceived that the mere application of this name to Jesus does not, as a matter of course, imply divinity; it may do so, but, if it does, this must be proved by further evidence. These two designations—"the Son of man" and "the Son of God"—may be called the two more intimate titles of Christ; but there corresponded with them two more public—"the Son of David" and "the Messiah" or "the Christ." In one of the closing days of His ministry Jesus, after silencing those opponents who were trying to puzzle Him, carried the war into the enemies' country by puzzling them with the question how the Messiah could be the son of David, when, in the 110th Psalm, David called Him Lord. This is confidently interpreted by some to mean that Jesus admitted He was not entitled to the name of "the Son of David," but wanted to prove that He might be the Messiah nevertheless. There is, however, no evidence whatever that it was ever charged against Him that He did not stand in the Davidic line; and the consensus of the New Testament to the opposite effect is too unanimous to leave any doubt on the subject. The intention of Jesus in voluntarily raising the question, as He did on this occasion, was very different. He wanted to suggest that, though David's son, as the Messiah must be by common consent, He was yet far above David; just as He said, on another occasion, "A greater than Solomon is here." For reasons already hinted at, Jesus did not readily apply the other popular title, "the Messiah" or "the Christ," to Himself; but voices around Him were doing so, from time to time, all through His ministry; and when the Twelve, through the lips of St. Peter, did so at Cæsarea Philippi, we have already seen how He accepted the confession. The nearest equivalent to "Messiah" in English would be "King"; and closely connected with the claim of Jesus to this name is His employment of the phrase "the kingdom of God" or "of heaven" ("heaven" being, perhaps, only another name for God, as in the phrase, "I have sinned against heaven"), as a general name for His teaching as a whole. To determine what exactly this phrase meant has engaged the most earnest labour of interpreters; and systematic theologians have displayed their skill in bringing all the details of the teaching of Jesus within the scope of this single conception. Some believe devoutly that it was intended by Him to be the framework within which Christian thought should, in all ages, be gathered; but others regard it with less favour, asserting that it was imposed on Jesus by circumstances rather than chosen by Himself; that it was sloughed off by Christian thought even before the close of the New Testament; and that the revival of its use could only have the effect of imposing fetters on theology.

(4) The Virgin Birth and the Bodily Resurrection.—Mention has been made above of the problems connected with the miracles wrought by Jesus; but problems still more vital surround the miracles wrought on Him. These comprise the voices from heaven which acknowledged Him as the object of the Divine good pleasure, the Transfiguration, which was a foretaste of the Ascension, and the Ascension itself; but those of greatest moment were the Virgin Birth and the bodily Resurrection. Both of these are included in the Apostles' Creed, which forms a part of the regular liturgy of the Lutheran Church; but, in 1892, a preacher in South Germany, of the name of Schrempf, began to recite the liturgy with these two clauses left out. For this he was challenged by his parishioners and ultimately deposed by the ecclesiastical authorities. His situation being, thereupon, sympathetically referred to by Professor Harnack and other like-minded theologians of Germany, there broke out a perfect tempest of controversy on these two points, which has extended far beyond the limits of Germany, and may be said to be raging still; although nothing substantially new on either topic has come to light.

The supernatural birth must have presented as grave difficulties to the first who heard it as it does to us; for the Jews of that time were violent monotheists, who treated the heathen fables of the birth of heroes from the gods with horror and disdain. It is charged against the fact that it is not oftener referred to in the New Testament; but it is of such a nature that it was not likely to be often referred to; and the poetic drapery in which the details are veiled are precisely such as became a fact so delicate and mysterious. The narratives in St. Matthew and St. Luke present, it must be acknowledged, some divergences, but these are not irreconcilable, nor is some diversity unnatural in such a case. Wellhausen has simply dropped both narratives out of his edition of the Gospels; but such a procedure is wholly unscientific, there being not a particle of evidence that either Gospel ever existed minus this portion. It may be confessed, however, that the credit of no fragment of ancient literature could survive if it were submitted to the torture to which these have been subjected—that is, if they were isolated from their surroundings and searched as with microscopes for signs of untrustworthiness. These narratives are entitled to be studied as part of the whole life of Christ, and particularly in connection with His sinlessness; and, when so studied, the fact they narrate will be perceived to be not unnatural but necessary, although there is no sign in these primitive and idyllic stories that they were invented for a dogmatic purpose.

The other miracle wrought on Jesus, His bodily resurrection, enters even further into the essence of Christianity. The theory of those who reject the evidence of this fact is that the disciples believed the Lord had risen because they were eagerly expecting Him to rise. This is the point of view still met with in the latest life of Christ of the naturalistic type—that of Otto Holtzmann. But no assumption can be more utterly at variance with the situation, or with the testimony of those who were most immediately concerned. The holy women went to the sepulchre not to see whether their Lord had risen but to anoint His corpse; and, when they reported to the disciples what they had seen, their words seemed to them as idle tales and they believed them not. The two on the way to Emmaus placed no faith whatever in the women's testimony; it is well known how obstinate was the unbelief of Thomas; and even among the five hundred who saw the risen Lord in Galilee "some doubted." So far from eagerly expecting Him to rise, they were as certain that He had disappeared for ever as were the Jews who had crucified Him, and their scepticism could only be overcome by many infallible proofs. The number and variety of the appearances count for much; and in some of them, as in those to Mary Magdalene and to Thomas, there are touches of nature incapable of being invented. Indeed, so lifelike and impressive are these narratives that Keim, a scholar strongly disposed to take a naturalistic view, invented the theory that, by the special providence of God, it was arranged that visions of Jesus should appear to the different disciples for the purpose of convincing them that He was alive. But it is difficult to perceive wherein this is easier to believe than the miracle itself.

Even these evidences, however, for this cardinal fact of the Christian religion are not by any means the strongest. The overwhelming proof of the resurrection of Christ is what may be called the resurrection of Christianity. When Jesus was lying dead in the grave, His cause may be truly said to have been lying in a grave as deep. It was then the cause of a Messiah proved false by the irresistible logic of events; His enemies were glorying that Providence had decided the controversy between Him and them in their favour; and what could His adherents say, seeing that they shared the presuppositions of His enemies about the necessary course of the career of a true Messiah? They were in despair, and the enterprise in which they had been engaged was ended. But from the nadir of depression the cause of the Messiah swept back at a bound to the opposite extreme. At the Passover the situation was such as we have seen; but at Pentecost the apostles were witnessing to a cause newborn, and born to a vigorous and enduring vitality. They were filled with enthusiasm; they were ready to live and to die for it; and, in point of fact, many of them did die for it. What was the reason for this transformation? The subjects of it alleged that they had seen the Saviour alive; and this would adequately account for the facts; but the wit of man has never invented, and never can invent, any other explanation that has even the semblance of being sufficient.

The resurrection may be said to have transfigured the Twelve: they had been earthly, limited, ambitious, now they were intrepid, magnanimous, and wise. It transfigured Christ and Christianity. Jesus had missed the Messianic crown, but, through the providence of Him who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working, He had thereby attained a throne universal and everlasting. But strangest and most solemn of all was the transformation which had taken place on His death. That had been the defeat of His enterprise, the despair of His friends, the triumph of His foes; but now, as the apostles pondered the mystery, guided by the Scriptures of the Old Testament, interpreted to them by the Risen One Himself, it turned into the ransom paid for the redemption of the world. Thenceforth they knew Him after the Spirit, and, though they had known Him after the flesh, they knew Him so no more. The Christianity of the resurrection is the true Christianity; but to dispense with this fact is to return to the position of the disciples in the days of their ignorance, if not to that of the enemies who believed that the life of Christ had terminated at the mouth of the sepulchre.

JETHER. (1) The father-in-law of Moses is so called, prob. in mistake for Jethro (Ex. 4.18, Heb.). (2) The eldest son of Gideon. He was evidently still a tender youth when he first tasted the excitements of war. His father ordered him to slay Zebah and Zalmunna, in revenge for the slaughter of his kinsmen. "But the youth drew not his sword; for he feared, because he was yet a youth" (Jg. 8.20). He was slain, with all his brothers, save Jotham, by Abimelech (9.5). (3) The father of Amasa = ITHRA (1 K. 2.5, &c.). (4) Eldest son of Jada, of the family of Hezron. He died childless; so the birthright passed to his younger brother (1 Ch. 2.32). (5) Son of Ezrah, a man of Judah (1 Ch. 4.17). (6) Father of Jephunneh, named in the record of mighty men, as belonging to Asher (1 Ch. 7.38), perhaps identical with "Ithran" of v. 37.

JETHRO, also JETHER, REUEL, RAGUEL, father-in-law of Moses, priest of Midian (Ex. 3.1, 18.1, &c.). In cuneiform script. the names "Jethro" and "Reuel" closely resemble each other (Conder, Earliest Bible). Moses was acting as shepherd to J. when he had the vision of the "Burning Bush." J. visited the camp of Isr. and gave Moses valuable counsel, propounding a scheme of administration wh. the latter adopted. In his capacity as priest he offered a sacrifice in wh. Aaron and the elders of Isr. felt justified in taking part (Ex. 18.12)—an acknowledgment of community in faith and worship.

JETUR. See ITURÆA.

JEUSH. (1) Esau's son by Aholibamah, reputed ancestor of an Edomite clan (Gn. 36.5, &c.). (2) Son of Bilhan, "head" of a house in Benjamin (1 Ch. 7.10). (3) A descendant in the eleventh generation fm. Saul (1 Ch. 8.39, AV. Jehush). (4) Head of a Gershonite family (1 Ch. 23.10f.). (5) Son of Rehoboam by ABIHAIL.

JEW. The name is derived fm. "Judah," and applied in the first instance to inhabitants of the Southern Kdm. (2 K. 16.6; Jr. 32.12, 38.19, 40.11). The fall of the Northern Kdm. left Jrs. the one centre of national and religious feeling; and at the end of the Captivity it was the scene of the reorganisation of the national and religious life of Israel. The name "Jew" thus easily gained a wider significance, and became practically synonymous with "Israelite." This meaning it bears in NT. Saul of Tarsus, altho' a Benjamite, claims to be a Jew (Ac. 21.39). He also, however, uses the term to denote an adherent of the Jewish faith, as distinguished from the Christian (1 Cor. 9.20, &c.).

In Mw. 2.2, and in the title on the cross, "Jews" undoubtedly means the Jewish nation. St. Mark names them once in connection with ritual washing (7.3), and St. Luke speaks of the ELDERS of the Jews (7.3). In the Gospel of St. John they appear frequently as the critics and antagonists of Jesus. What is called "the Dispersion" was not then a thing of recent date. Colonies of Jews were already long settled in practically all the main trading centres of the world. Their presence in newly-founded cities was especially valued by many rulers, by reason of the prosperity which by their skill in commerce they assured; only a small fraction of the nation then found its home in Palestine. Jews in various parts of the world have often been persecuted by Christians, by way of avenging the murder of Jesus by the forefathers of their victims. The latter justly claim that, whoever was responsible, their forefathers were innocent, having settled in the lands of the Dispersion long before the days of Jesus. This enables us to understand the part played by the Jews in the Acts of the Apostles. Wherever a Jewish colony was founded, a synagogue was established, in which the community assembled for worship, preserving in the midst of heathendom the faith of their fathers, and cherishing the Messianic hope. To them naturally the missionaries of the Gospel went first, with the good news that this hope was fulfilled; and the converts won among them formed centres of missionary influence in the Gentile world.

What is called the Jewish or Judaising party in the Christian Church exercised great influence in the early days of Christianity. Their deep loyalty to the old order, and their inability to believe that anything once ordained of God could have fulfilled its purpose and cease to claim observance, led them to protest against the freedom from the ritual obligations of the old law, which, in the spirit of Christ's teaching, was asserted by St. Paul. The new faith, they maintained, was only the completion of the faith of their fathers. The Gospel could be approached, therefore, only by way of the law. Judaism was, so to speak, the vestibule through which alone either Jew or Gentile could enter the temple of Christianity. They laid upon all alike the burden of the ancient requirements, laying especial emphasis upon the necessity for the characteristic rite of CIRCUMCISION. They were a sore trial to St. Paul, whose claim to apostleship they impugned, even casting aspersions on his character; and by their zealous propaganda they succeeded in leading many of his converts into what he calls the "bondage" of the law. The question was submitted by St. Paul to an assembly of Church leaders in Jerusalem. There he fought successfully the battle for liberty on behalf of them who "from among the Gentiles turn to God" (Ac. 15.; Gal. 1., 2., &c.). It is interesting in this connection to note that to this day there are many Christians of Jewish blood, who, while regarding the Gentiles as entirely free, hold themselves bound to observe the ritual requirements of the ancient law.

MODERN TIBERIAS JEW AND GRANDCHILD

During the War of Independence, so graphically described by Josephus, the Jews manifested splendid heroism, and the powers of endurance they displayed during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus were almost incredible. But lack of internal unity had foredoomed their enterprise to failure, even against a less powerful enemy than Rome. The destruction of the Temple was a severe blow to the pride, but it hardly endangered the existence, of Judaism. Its position had long been secured as a religion associated with a book, and its life was nourished in the worship of the synagogue. Jerusalem, with the Temple and great annual feasts, ceased to be the rallying ground of the scattered nation; but it is not merely fanciful to suggest that the sacrificial ritual, in the hands of the unspiritual and avaricious Sadducees, had already been largely discredited in the minds of the truly pious in Israel (the sect of the Essenes entirely avoided the Temple sacrifices). These men were driven to seek sustenance for their faith along other lines: in the more earnest study and observance of the law, and in prayer. The way was thus prepared for the transition; and the world witnesses the strange spectacle of a religion, the very essence of which was sacrifice, reorganised on a non-sacrificial basis, and proving an unfailing bond of unity and inspiration among a people who are broken in fragments, and scattered to the ends of the earth.

When the last embers of revolt under Bar Cochba had been quenched in Jewish blood (A.D. 135), the Jews were driven from Palestine, and for centuries were strangers to their ancestral haunts. In later centuries, under Mohammedan rule, small companies found their way again into the country; but not until recent years have the numbers been considerable. During the latter half of the 19th cent. immigration took place on a larger scale, settlements being made at Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed. Schemes of colonisation have also been promoted by various agencies, and large tracts of the best land on both sides of the Jordan are now again being tilled by the children of Abraham. The most important movement of recent days is that called Zionism, the history of wh. hardly lies within the scope of this DICTIONARY.

JEWEL. This in EV. represents various Heb. wds. wh. refer to ornaments; the meaning being usually clear from the context. Oriental love of display led to lavish use of the precious metals in articles of personal adornment. Of gold and silver were made chains, rings for finger, nose, and ear; bracelets, armlets, crescents, anklets, &c. (see Amulet). In mod. use "jewels" signify precious stones. These are treated under their own names (Amethyst, &c.).

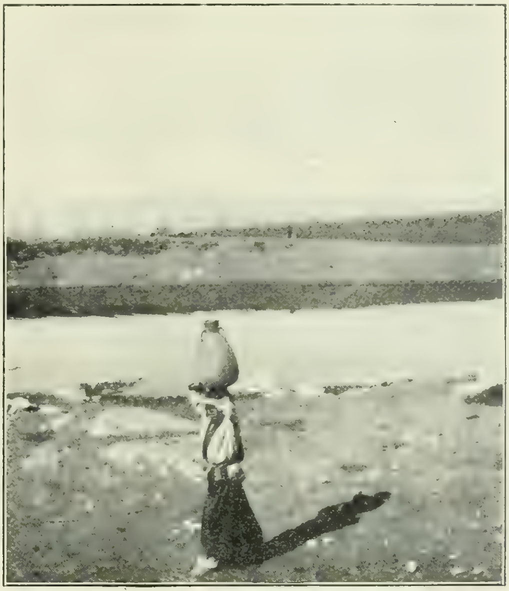
JEWRY. This stands in AV. for Gr. Ἰουδαία, in Lk. 23.[5]; Jn. 7.[1]. Elsewhere AV. renders "Judea"; RV. uniformly "Judæa."

JEZANIAH, one of the "captains of the forces that were in the fields" (Jr. 40.[7f.]), who had escaped from Jerusalem at the time of the siege by the "king of Babylon." He joined Gedaliah, who had been made "governor of the land" at Mizpah. After the murder of Gedaliah, the pursuit of Ishmael, and the consequent unsettlement in the country, he was one of those who at Geruth Chimcham pressed for migration to Egypt, thus coming into wordy conflict with Jeremiah (42.[1ff.]). He seems to have assumed the rôle of leader in this movement (43.[2]). Here he is called Azariah, a form wh. may have arisen from Jaazaniah, the name given him in 2 K. 25.[23].

JEZEBEL, dr. of Ethbaal, k. of Tyre, w. of Ahab, k. of Isr., mr. of Ahaziah and Jehoram, ks. of Isr., and of Athaliah, w. of Jehoram, k. of Judah (1 K. 16.[31], &c.). She was a woman imperious, resolute, unscrupulous. She set her heart upon supplanting in Isr. the worship of J″. by that of Baal, and Ahab became practically her tool. He built a great temple to Baal in Samaria. Her propaganda was enforced by slaughter of the prophets of J″. (1 K. 16.[32], 18.[4]). Her chief antagonist was Elijah, by whose agency the triumph of J″. at Carmel was achieved (1 K. 18.[1ff.]); but even he fled before the wrath of J. thus aroused. By a process of peculiar infamy she compassed the death of Naboth, whose patrimony Ahab was thus enabled to secure (21.), drawing upon himself and his house the curse of Elijah. The crime also excited deep and abiding popular detestation (2 K. 9.[21, 25f.]). About B.C. 853 Ahab was slain. J. lived ten yrs. longer. In all the pride of her fierce nat. she prepared herself for the end. It was a queenly figure that greeted Jehu the regicide with such disdain. It is impossible to justify that coarse plebeian in his brutal treatment of the aged princess of Tyre (9.[30ff.]).

JEZIEL, a Benjamite archer or slinger, who went to David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[3]). He was son of Azmaveth, prob. identical with Azmaveth of Bahurim, David's hero (1 S. 23.[31]).

JEZREEL ("God soweth"). (1) The Valley of J. (Jo. 17.[16]). While the city J. overlooks both, the name 'emeq applies more suitably to the depression between Moreh and Gilboa than to the wide plain wh. runs W'ward to Carmel. But the larger vale is also so designated (Jg. 5.[15]). Elsewhere it is called by the more appropriate name, used of wide plains, biq'ah, and associated with Megiddo (2 Ch. 35.[22]; Zc. 12.[11]). In later times it takes the Gr. form of Esdraelon (Jth. 1.[8], &c.). The mod. name is Merj ibn 'Amr. It is almost a right-angled triangle in shape, the base, 20 miles, stretching fm. Carmel to Jenīn, with the apex at Tabor. The soil is very rich, partly basaltic fm. the crater of Little Hermon. The Kishon winds in its deep bed through the plain to the gorge at Carmel, whence it escapes to the sea. The Canaanites long held the plain by means of their iron chariots (Jo. 17.[16]). Its fruitfulness attracted the nomads fm. the E., to whose attack it lay easily open (Jg. 6.[33]). Until comparatively recent times Arab raids were a source of terror to the people on the plain.



Ford at Jezreel

It was a great battlefield of the old world (Jg. 5.[15], 6.[33], 7.[1]; 1 S. 29.[1], 31.; 2 K. 23.[29], &c.). In what more fitting scene could be imagined the gathering of the peoples to war in the great day of the Lord (Rv. 16.[14, 16])? (2) A city in Issachar (Jo. 19.[18]) wh., with its district, adhered to the house of Saul (2 S. 2.[9]). It was the northern residence of Ahab and Jezebel (1 K. 18.[45], 21.[1], &c.), the scene of the dastard crime upon Naboth, and of the tragedy enacted by Jehu (2 K. 9.[20f.]). It occupied the site of the mod. Zer'īn on the NW. spur of Gilboa. It is a position of great charm, commanding a varied and interesting prospect over the surroundings of the great plain, down the vale to Beisān, and the hills beyond Jordan. Rock-cut wine-presses hard by attest the anct. vine culture. The ruined tower in the vill. is of no great antiquity. There is a good supply of water at 'Ain el-Meiyiteh, E. of the vill., and also at 'Ain Jalūd (see Harod, Well of). With the fall of Ahab's dyn. the town passed into obscurity. (3) An unidentd.

town near Carmel in Judah (Jo. 15.^{56}) whence came Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (1 S. 25.^{43}, &c.).

JIPHTAH, RV. IPHTAH, an unidentd. town in the Judæan Shephelah (Jo. 15.^{43}). The neighbourhood is indicated by NEZIB and MARESHAH, wh. are mentioned in the context.

JIPHTHAH-EL. The gai' ("ravine" or "glen") of Jiphthah-el lay on the W. border of Zebulun (Jo. 19.$^{14, 27}$). It is named before Cabul, travelling from the S. Since the days of Robinson (BRP. iii. 107) it has been usual to identify the valley with that of 'Abilīn, which sweeps round the S. of Jebel Kaukāb, and breaks out westward through the plain. It takes its rise at Jafāt, the Jotopata of Josephus, in wh. we may detect an echo of the ancient name. No more probable identification has been suggested.

JOAB ("J". is father"), s. of David's sr. Zeruiah (2 S. 2.^{32}, &c.), first mentioned as Abishai's br. (1 S. 26.^{6}). He led David's men with entire success agst. Abner at Gibeon (2 S. 2.^{13}). When the latter came over to David's side, seeing in him a poss. rival, and in revenge for his br. Asahel's death, J. treacherously murdered him (3.$^{27ff.}$), incurring thereby the curse of David. His value to the k. was soon illustrated by his capture of the stronghold of Jebus (1 Ch. 11.^{6}). After an act. of David's victories over the Phil., Moab, Zobah, Syr., and Edom, J. is named as "over the host" (2 S. 8.^{16}). That he bore a part in these campaigns we may infer fm. the later notice of his share in subduing Edom, wh. won for him a name of dread (1 K. 11.$^{14ff., 21}$). Along with Abishai he inflicted heavy defeat upon the Ammonite Hanun and his Syrian allies (2 S. 10.$^{1-14}$). At the siege of Rabbah he secretly arranged for the death of Uriah (11.). With magnanimous regard for the k.'s honour, he summoned David to complete the capture of Rabbah (12.$^{26ff.}$). He secured for Absalom return fm. exile and reconciliation with the k. (14.$^{1ff., 33}$). Adhering to David in Absalom's rebellion, J. commanded a division agst. the latter. Contrary to the k.'s orders, but clearly in the interests of peace and security, he slew the young prince (18.$^{2ff.}$). He rebuked David's excessive grief, wh. was disheartening the troops, and, recalling the k. to a saner mood, saved the situation wh. was becoming perilous (19.$^{1ff.}$). David's displeasure, however, was marked by transference of J.'s command to Amasa (v. 13). Deficient, apparently, in energy and decision, Amasa was slain by his cousin J., on the expedition agst. Sheba. Although Abishai was nominally in command, J. was the real leader. Having stamped out the revolt (20.$^{1-22}$), he thenceforward securely held his position. He wisely resisted David's wish to number the people, and, although overborne by the royal will, the chronicler says that he did not complete the work (1 Ch. 27.^{24}). Prob. with perfect loyalty to David, J. accepted Adonijah as his successor (1 K. 1.$^{7, 19}$), unaware of Bathsheba's intrigue on behalf of Solomon. This furnished Solomon with a pretext for his execution (2.$^{28ff.}$). It was a pitiful end to a great career. When full allowance is made for his selfish ambition, his vindictiveness and treachery, he yet stands out as a heroic warrior and loyal patriot, to whose soldierly abilities, there can be no doubt, the consolidation of David's power was largely due.

It has been attempted to show that David's injunction to Solomon (1 K. 2.$^{5f.}$) is a late addition. The passage appears to be certainly ancient, and there is no convincing reason to doubt its historicity.

Several others bore this name (1 Ch. 2.^{54}, 4.^{14}; Ez. 2.^{6}, 8.^{9}).

JOAH. (1) Son of Asaph, "recorder" in the court of Hezekiah (2 K. 18.$^{18, 26}$; Is. 36.$^{3, 11, 22}$), one of the deputation sent to interview Rabshakeh at the conduit of the upper pool. (2) Son of Zimmah, a Gershonite (1 Ch. 6.^{21}), apparently identical with Ethan of v. 42. (3) Son of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26.^{4}) of the family of Korah. He and his brothers were noted as "able men in strength for the service." To their care was entrusted the south gate of the Temple, and the storehouse (vv. 8, 15). (4) Son of Joahaz, "recorder" in the court of Josiah. He had oversight of the work of repairing the Temple, which had suffered from neglect under Manasseh and Amon (2 Ch. 34.^{8}).

JOANNA. (1) An ancestor of our Lord (Lk. 3.^{27}). (2) Wife of Chuza, steward of Herod Antipas; she ministered to Christ of her substance (Lk. 8.^{3}). She was one of those who prepared spices and ointments, and took them to the sepulchre, on the morning of the resurrection (Lk. 23.^{56}, 24.$^{1, 10}$).

JOASH. (1) Fr. of Gideon (Jg. 6.^{11}, &c.). (2) S. of Ahab (1 K. 22.^{26}, &c.), if indeed "k.'s son" be not an official title. See JEHOASH.

JOB, THE BOOK OF. It is one of the Kĕthubīm (Hagiographa), and in our English Bibles, as in Luther's, is placed first among these books; in the ordinary Hebrew Bibles J. usually stands third. With singular unanimity the literary excellence of J. has been acknowledged.

Contents.—J. begins with a prose prologue in five scenes; three are on the earth and two in heaven. The first of these shows us J., a wealthy village sheikh, pious, beneficent, and universally respected. He has seven sons and three daughters, for whom he daily intercedes. The next scene is in heaven, in the presence of God. Among the "sons of God" Satan appears; God demands of him if he has observed the character of J. This abrupt introduction seems to imply that we are admitted to be auditors in the middle of a controversy, in the earlier part of wh. SATAN has maintained that all men are irremediably bad, incapable of disinterested love of God. In such a case the question arises, Why is Satan so anxious to prove men wholly bad? It wd. seem that a plausible case mt. be made out that mankind were receiving more favour than they had a claim to. Satan asserts that Job's prosperity is the reason for his integrity; in consequence he is allowed to test J. by the destruction of his property. The third scene is on earth. Job, it may be, has just completed the sacrifice for his children, when messenger after messenger comes, each treading on the other's heels, and declares to him that flocks and herds, servants and sons, have been destroyed by successive catastrophes. Job yet maintains his integrity; he says, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." The fourth scene is in heaven; again Satan appears, and on being challenged, asserts that it is on account of his immunity fm. personal suffering that Job still trusts God. In consequence he is allowed to afflict Job with disease; apparently elephantiasis. The last scene in the prologue is upon the earth; Job is seen sitting in ashes scraping himself. Now his wife wd. tempt him to take leave of God; friends come, but they misjudge him. Still Job maintains his integrity.

Now begins the poem proper. Eliphaz the Temanite, an old man, claiming indeed to be older than Job's father; Bildad the Shuhite, possibly a coeval of Job's; and Zophar the Naamathite, possibly a young man compared with the others: these three friends of Job, when they see him, sit astonished and silent for seven days. The pent-up sorrow of Job's heart now expresses itself; he curses his day; the day of his birth becomes personified before him and he pours maledictions upon it. There is no word of blame uttered agst. God. Eliphaz, in virtue of his seniority, answers Job. Without distinctly saying so, Eliphaz assumes that there must have been special guilt on Job's part wh. has brought down on him such special punishment. Job answers; charges his friends with failing to realise the depth of his misery; the pain of wh. is enhanced by the thought that God has done it. Bildad now joins in the discussion, and blames Job for charging God foolishly; he must be wicked since God has punished him so sorely. His duty is to acknowledge his sin and God will restore him to favour. Job in answer acknowledges that the Divine standard of holiness must be far higher than that of men; yet God has condemned him without showing him why He has so afflicted him. If there were a Mediator between God and man it wd. be different. Zophar answers. Divine Wisdom is his theme; it is our place to submit, not to ask explanations. Job answers by pouring contempt upon the platitudes that have been addressed to him. This may be regarded as the end of the first Act.

The second Act is opened by Job's new argument; man is of so few days that God need not be so strict with him; misery has a more painful meaning when life is so short. Eliphaz assails Job for daring to maintain his righteousness agst. God. If we exclude a sarcastic protest agst. platitude, Job's answer is an appeal fm. man to God. In his turn Bildad intervenes; he endeavours, by portraying the fate of the wicked, to insinuate that Job must be wicked when he has suffered such things. In answering, Job complains of his friends having turned agst. him; he ends with a confident appeal to God, who will be his Avenger. Zophar reiterates the charge of hypocrisy agst. Job. Job's answer, in wh. he shows that the wicked may be prosperous to the day of his death, may be regarded as the transition between the second and third Acts.

Eliphaz opens the third cycle of speeches by reasoning that Job must be guilty because it can be no profit to the Almighty to afflict. In his answer Job passes his opponents on one side, but declaims on the impossibility of seeing God and so having the mystery cleared up, how he is suffering while some who are flagrantly unjust prosper. Bildad interposes a short speech; it is a repetition of his former speeches on the impossibility of a man being justified with God. The chapters that follow contain Job's answer, wh. is an unswerving declaration of his own relative righteousness. It wd. seem not impossible that the greater part of chap. 27. is the missing speech of Zophar; it inveighs agst. the rich. The position of chap 28. can only be understood if it is regarded as a chorus, in the Greek sense, in praise of the infinite kge. and wisdom of God compared with man's kge., however extensive it may seem. It concludes with the Divine sentence summing up the whole matter, "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart fm. evil is understanding." This is the practical solution of the problem; it is implied that the theoretic is beyond the power of man's apprehension.

In what may be regarded as the fourth Act Job indulges in a monologue wh. occupies the three following chaps. It consists of reminiscences of his prosperity, of his conduct, esp. to the poor, during that period, and contrast with his present evil case. Then follow the Elihu speeches. The speaker is represented as a spectator and auditor who has followed the discussion with interest, but at the same time with disappointment. He intervenes, but it is difficult to see what his argument adds to the elucidation of the question at issue. There is a faint suggestion of benefit to the sufferer, a view not wholly absent fm. the thought of the earlier speakers: this may be taken as Elihu's contribution. When the last human speaker has become silent God Himself appears. A dark cloud gathers and covers the whole heaven, blinding flash upon blinding flash is followed by the long roll of the thunder; and on the group round the patriarch bursts the hurricane. Jehovah answers out of the tempest. God's first speech is an emphasising of the conclusion of chap. 28. Job replies by submission. God's second speech deepens the effect of the former, restricting attention to two of God's creatures, Behemoth (the hippopotamus), and Leviathan (the crocodile). Job replies with deeper reverence. On this follows the Epilogue, the justification of Job, his sacrifice in order that his friends may be forgiven, and the restoration of Job to more than all his previous prosperity. One feels that in order to full, rounded-off, poetic completeness there shd. be added to the Epilogue on earth an Epilogue in heaven, wh. shd. tell of the utter discomfiture of Satan, and the blessedness bestowed upon Job in the other world. To those who believe in the special inspiration of Scrip. the reason will be clear, "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest."

Text.—In many passages there is evidence that the MT. has suffered some corruption. As the earliest MS. is separated fm. the date of the composition of J. by more than a millennium at the latest date assignable, it is only fm. VV. that we can derive any help. The use of them is complicated by the fact that the text of the oldest of them, the LXX, is in such a confused condition. Until the text of the LXX is adjusted with some degree of finality we cannot adventure with any security on textual emendations, however suspicious we may be of the MT.

Literary Form.—It is a mistake to expect in any ancient Semitic writing examples of the literary forms that were evolved by the Greeks. The book of J. has characteristics wh. ally it in form at once to elegiac and didactic poems, to epic and the drama. At the same time there are highly wrought lyrical passages. The idea of poetic form had not advanced far enough for these distinctions to be fixed. Neglecting less important elements, we may say that J. is a series of didactic poems arranged dramatically for the elucidation of a great practical problem, and placed in a narrative setting. The action of J. is stated in the Prologue in heaven; the problem before Job and his friends is to explain what has happened without having the clue. Even the practical solution is attained only by Divine intervention.

Date and Authorship.—It is impossible to decide either of these with even approximate certainty. Every age fm. that of Moses to that of Ezra has been assigned. A late and worthless tradition declares Moses to be the author. Although the tradition is valueless as a tradition, yet there is nothing impossible in the view in itself. There is certainly a patriarchal atmosphere wh. wd. suit the desert of Sinai and the tents of Jethro, and a knowledge of Egp. suitable to one brought up in it. It is urged that this is artistic, and that references to city life and other signs of more advanced civilisation show J. to be the composition of a much later age. But we now learn that civilisation is older than was formerly thought. At the same time bare possibility is no argument for actuality. Had there been any excuse for assigning the authorship to Moses, the attraction of his name wd. have led to its being declared by tradition a certainty. The Solomonic period has also been suggested. It was one of great literary activity, accdg. to tradition; psalmists and prophets were named as writing; the king's devotion to wisdom wd. necessarily give an impetus to Hokmah or Wisdom literature, of wh. J. is the most important example. The intercourse maintained with Egp. wd. explain the Egyptian colouring, while Solomon's interest in natural history wd. explain the careful description wh. is given of the crocodile and hippopotamus. The patriarchal atmosphere, then as now, cd. be supplied fm. the nomads of the desert. Again, however, possibility is not even probability. What has been said of the Solomonic period applies with little change to that of Hezekiah, though with somewhat lessened emphasis. Much the same might be said of the idea that J. was the work of one of those who entered Egp. with Jeremiah after the murder of GEDALIAH. There are many points of similarity between Jeremiah and J., and the circumstances were fitted to raise the problem of J. Less likely, though not impossible, is the time of Ezra; we know now that there was intercourse between the Israelitish colony in Upper Egp. and their brethren in Pal. Nothing can be proved fm. language; it is certain that words peculiar to J. are numerous, wh. may as well be due to antiquity as to recency; alleged Aramaisms and Arabisms may as well prove J. to have originated at a time so early that Heb. had not yet been fully differentiated fm. its cognates. In the case of similar passages in different authors it is difficult to determine by internal evidence wh. has the priority. Yet more hazardous is it to attempt to fix the date of a document by the chronology of moral problems. As old as goodness and suffering must the problem of Job have been; and that is as old as the human race. The reference to J. in Ezekiel ($14.^{14, 20}$) is more important, as it implies in the audience of the prophet as great a familiarity with the history of J. as with that of Noah; that cd. scarcely be unless the book were already extant. The case of Daniel is not an objection, as he was a contemporary. This wd. restrict our choice to the ages of Hezekiah and of Solomon. The prominence given to the habits of animals, and esp. to the horse, points rather to the age of Solomon.

JOBAB. (1) A son of Joktan (Gn. $10.^{29}$; 1 Ch. $1.^{23}$), the reputed ancestor of an Arabian tribe. The name cannot be located with any certainty. Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.) compares the name with that of the tribe Yuhaibab, found in a Sabæan inscription. Sprenger thinks it may correspond to the Arb. Wabār, attached to a large part of el-Yemen. In one recension the LXX has Ἰωβόρ. (2) Son of Zerah, who reigned over Edom in Bozrah, before the days of kings in Israel (Gn. 36.[33f.]; 1 Ch. 1.[44f.]). In an apocryphal addition to the LXX version of the book of Job, the patriarch is identified with Jobab. He is said to be the son of Zerah, the son of Esau, his mother being Bossora, in wh. name we see clearly the Bozrah of the original text. (3) One of Jabin's allies, k. of Madon (Jo. 11.[1]). See also 1 Ch. 8.[9, 18].

JOCHEBED ("J". is glorious"), dr. of Levi, wife of Amram, mr. of Moses and Aaron (Ex. 6.[20]).

JOEL. (1) Eldest s. of Samuel (1 S. 8.[2]). (2) The prophet, s. of Pethuel, of whom nothing further is known. This name was borne by several persons in the lists in 1 Ch., Ez., and Ne.

JOEL, BOOK OF, the second of the bks. of the Minor Prophets (fourth in LXX). Contents.—J. opens with a description of the devastation wrought by locusts (1.[2-13]); then follows a call to a general fast (1.[14-20]). The 2nd chap. gives a description of the coming of a swarm of locusts (2.[1-11]); then there is a call for repentance, and a general fast (2.[12-17]); J. now promises to the people a restoration of their prosperity (2.[18-27]). From this point to the end of the prophecy J. becomes to a limited degree Apocalyptic. The Day of the Lord is the theme (2.[28]–3.[21]), in wh. there shall be (a) a spiritual outpouring on the Jewish people; (b) judgment executed on the enemies of Judah assembled in the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and (c) peace and prosperity to Judah.

Date.—There has been great diversity of critical opinion as to this; some with Credner making J. the earliest of literary prophets, others with Vatke declaring him to be among the latest. As there is no historical event referred to wh. can be recognised, it is only by considering the general conditions of life implied, or signs of literary dependence, that any idea can be formed of the date. In favour of an early date is the fact that there is no mention of Assyria—the oppressions suffered by the people are fm. the neighbouring peoples, Phil., Edomites, Egyptians, and Phœnicians; there is no reference to alien communities being established among the people, as was the case after the return fm. the Babylonian captivity. For a late date the fact that, while priests and elders are mentioned, there is no notice of king or princes; that among the neighbouring peoples neither Syria nor Israel are named, while on the other hand there is mention of the "Greeks." It is noted also that there is no condemnation of worship at the high places, or of the service of "other gods." The literary question is also difficult to decide: there are certainly, in proportion to its length, more passages in J. wh. find parallels in other prophetic writings than is the case with any other prophet; but only on examination can one decide on wh. side the dependence is. Historically the complete disappearance of the Phil. fm. notice after the Babylonian conquest is an important testimony to the early date. The want of any reference to king or princes is not conclusive: neither in Nahum nor Habakkuk is either mentioned. Elders are certainly mentioned, but as old men, not as members of a senate, as in 2.[16] they are put in parallelism with "children and those that suck the breast": though "priests" are mentioned there is no reference to the High Priest, who was the national head of the Jews during the time of their subjection to foreign powers. As for the Greeks, they were certainly combated by Sargon, if not also by Ramses II. In regard to the question of literary dependence; in certain cases the passages seem to fit either setting, e.g. Am. 1.[2] and Jl. 3.[16], though even here that of Joel is the more natural; it seems more cognate to the utterance of the voice of J". that "the heavens and the earth shall shake," than that "the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn and the top of Carmel shall wither," a thing that wd. happen in due course every summer. In the case of Zp. 1.[15] and Jl. 2.[2], the latter is clearly the primary because it is part of the picture of the approaching swarm of locusts, whereas the former is merely a rhetorical heaping up of epithets regarding the day of the Lord. An interesting case is Jl. 3.[10]; cp. Mi. 4.[3], and Is. 2.[4]; here there is a contrast. In Mi. and Is. J". was to compel the nations to be at peace; in Jl. the nations are invading Judah and every one who can bear arms rushes to them, and, failing regular weapons, improvises them from the implements of husbandry. Again, the latter must be the primary; the actual always precedes the ideal; the raids of the Phil. and the Midianites had made the extemporising of weapons a not unfamiliar occupation to the Judæan peasant. Hence the early date seems on the whole preferable.

Interpretation.—The main question of the exegesis of J. is whether the locust swarm is to be taken literally or as the symbol of an invading army. It is difficult to appreciate the allegorical view; the prophet describes the plague of locusts under the figure of an army; it seems an awkward suggestion that this swarm is a figurative description of an army. Further, 1.[4] seems to be a description of the devastation wrought the second year by the grubs fm. the eggs of the original swarm; this wd. have no meaning on the allegorical interpretation. The reference to the "Northerner" (AV. "the northern army") is the only difficulty; but though it is mainly fm. the E. that locusts invade Pal., yet a

NE. wind mt. easily deflect a swarm. The latter half of the prophecy was literal before the mind of the prophet; yet we may be at liberty to spiritualise it, as the prophets did not necessarily know the full meaning of the message committed to them (1 P. 1.[11]).

JOGBEHAH, a Gadite town in Gilead (Nu. 32.[35]). Its place in the record of Gideon's pursuit points definitely to el-Jubeihah (or el-Jubeihāt), a group of ruins seven miles NW. of 'Ammān.

JOHANAN. Several men of this name are mentioned in Scrip. Here we need refer only to the s. of Kareah, chief of the Jewish forces in the field after the fall of Jrs.; he joined GEDALIAH, and warned him of the treachery of Ishmael, but in vain. After the murder of Gedaliah J., agst. the advice of Jeremiah, went down to Egp., taking with him all the little community of Mizpah (Jr. 40.[8]–43.).

JOHN. (1) The Baptist, s. of the priest Zacharias and his w. Elizabeth, a kinswoman of the Virgin, born to them in their old age, accdg. to the promise of an angel (Lk. 1.[5ff.]). His birthplace is unknown. It was a town in the hill country of Judah (v. 39). Juttah has been suggested, but without good reason. J. was consecrated a Nazirite fm. his birth. He lived apart fm. the haunts of men (1.[80], 3.[2]), until, prob. 30 yrs. of age, he appeared in the wilderness, and the district of the lower Jordan, as a preacher of righteousness and repentance. His must have been a striking personality; his rough dress and ascetic ways formed a fit setting for his resolute and fearless courage. But, unknown as he was to the multitude, he was so thoroughly identified with his message that all the evangelists describe him, in the words of Is. 40.[3], as "a voice" (Mw. 3.[1ff.], &c.). He denounced the sins and sinners of the time, without respect of persons, summoning men to repent and to pursue nobler ways. Such as came to him confessing and penitent he baptized, his baptism being the sign and seal of inward cleansing, and the beginning of a new life (Ant. XVIII. v. 2). Only once (Mw. 3.[2]) is he said to have announced the nearness of the kdm. of heaven. But he regarded his work as preparatory, and himself as merely the forerunner of a greater than he, in whom undoubtedly he expected the Messiah (Mw. 3.[11], &c.; Jn. 1.[29ff.]). To bear witness to Him was, indeed, the main obj. of his coming (Jn. 1.[7]). His preaching created a great stir, and people fm. all parts of the country crowded to hear him. Men consulted him who wished to reform their lives, and he gave them advice suited to each case (Lk. 3.[10ff.]). So deeply did he impress the people that many wondered if he might not himself be Messiah (Lk. 3.[15]; Jn. 1.[19f.]). With deeper insight, he recognised the expected Deliverer in Jesus of Nazareth, and pointed his disciples to Him (Jn. 1.[29, 36]). But in spirit he yet belonged to the old dispensation. He cd. think of Messiah gaining His ends only by forceful methods, by axe, fan, and unquenchable fire (Mw. 3.[10ff.], &c.). The request of Jesus for baptism at first staggered J.; but the recognition of him as God's Prophet (Mw. 11.[9ff.]; Lk. 7.[26ff.]) carried with it the obligation to obey God's will as revealed by him. To the baptism required, therefore, he must submit who wished to "fulfil all righteousness" (Mw. 3.[13ff.]). On ascending fm. the water J.'s sptl. intuition was confirmed by the heavenly vision and voice (vv. 16f., &c.).

LOCUSTS FOR FOOD

When Jesus began His public ministry the company attending J. grew smaller. But there was no place for envy or jealousy in the great heart of the Baptist. He rejoiced when news of Jesus' success was brought him at ÆNON. It was for this he had wrought: and heroic unselfishness never found more touching expression than in his words, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (Jn. 3.[22ff.]).

J. did no miracle (Jn. 10.[41]); but his form, his manner of life, his intrepid rebuke of wickedness in high places, recalled the most striking prophetic figures of OT. times. He truly fulfilled the prediction of Ml. 4.[5f.], coming in the spt. and power of Elijah (Mw. 11.[14]; Lk. 1.[17]). The tetrarch, HEROD ANTIPAS, in whose territory J. preached, watched the popular movement with uneasy suspicion (Ant. XVIII. v. 2). J.'s denunciation of Herod's sin furnished the pretext for his imprisonment, while it incurred the deadly hatred of his partner in guilt; and in due course the tragedy of the prison followed (Mw. 14.[3ff.], &c.). Josephus lays the scene of J.'s murder in Machærus, the great fortress E. of the Dead Sea. But this stronghold appears then to have been in the hands of Herod's enemy, ARETAS. Possibly Tiberias witnessed the prophet's death. The ruin of Herod's palace there is called Qaṣr bint el-Melek, "Fortress of the k.'s dr.," wherein there may be a reminiscence of the fair dancer. Tradition says that J.'s body was buried at Samaria, the mod. Sebastieh, where the Crusaders erected the church of St. J., now a Moslem mosque. The head is said to have been finally buried in Damascus.

One pathetic incident during his imprisonment is related (Mw. 11.[2]; Lk. 7.[19]). There is no good reason to omit with Dr. Cheyne (E.B. s.v.), "in the prison," in the former passage. The disciples wd. have much freer access to their master than a prison suggests to us. But the change, for one who had ever been a child of the sun and the free air of the wilds, cd. hardly fail to be depressing. Doubts wh. cd. not touch him by the Jordan might seem natural in prison. Still more may he have been troubled by the diffc. between the Messiah of his anticipation, with axe, fan, and unquenchable fire, and this Man with His quiet ways. What cd. He hope to effect agst. prevailing wickedness? The Master's answer sent by J.'s messengers must have comforted the herald's heart.

The impression made by J. on his own time was very great. When Jesus was at the height of His fame, others besides Herod (Mw. 14.[2]; Mk. 8.[28], &c.), ignorant of His early life, thought Him the Baptist risen fm. the dead. Some, knowing only the baptism of J., and unaware of the marvels of Pentecost, were found later at Ephesus, and doubtless elsewhere. They may have been instructed by disciples of J. who had left Pal. before the manifestation of the Messiah. Their position illustrates the result of the Baptist's preaching. They swiftly saw it to be only a stage on the way to the Christian faith (Ac. 18.[25], 19.[1ff.]).

J.'s greatest success was found among the common people (Mw. 21.[26], &c.). Herod "knew that he was a righteous man and a holy" (Mk. 6.[20]). The testimony of Jesus is clear and emphatic to the supremacy of J. in the prophetic succession, and to the value of his witness (Mw. 11.[11]; Lk. 7.[28]; Jn. 5.[33]). Himself the greatest man of the old order, he had the insight to anticipate, and the grace to rejoice in the advent of better things than the old had ever known (Jn. 1.[15, 29], 3.[27ff.]), wh. shd. raise men to higher levels than even his aspiring soul cd. yet attain (Mw. 11.[11]; Lk. 7.[28]).

(2) The Apostle, s. of Zebedee and Salome, the sr. of the Virgin Mary (Mw. 27.[56]; Mk. 15.[40]; Jn. 19.[25]), who, with his br. JAMES, was among the first followers of Jesus. They were members of a fishing company on the Sea of Galilee (Lk. 5.[10]), and appear to have been fairly well-to-do. They were able to hire assistance (Mk. 1.[20]), and Salome was one of those who ministered to Jesus of their substance (Lk. 8.[3]). Whether he was a native of Capernaum or Bethsaida is not clear. The latter, the home of his partners (Jn. 1.[44]), must have been close to Capernaum (Mk. 1.[29]): it may have been the fisher vill. of the larger town. He was prob. the youngest of the apostolic group. If he be identical with the disciple whom Jesus loved, this will explain his outrunning of the older man, Peter (Jn. 20.[4]). Poss. J. was the companion of Peter, who, being a disciple of the Baptist, became a follower of Jesus (Jn. 1.[35ff.]). Having returned to his work, he was soon after called with his br. to be continuously with the Master (Mw. 4.[21], &c.). Chosen to be an "apostle," he belonged to the inmost group who enjoyed the special confidence of Jesus (Mk. 3.[13ff.], &c.). That we may ident. him with the disciple whom Jesus loved, to whom a peculiar degree of intimate fellowship wd. be granted, the following considerations make prob. (a) This disciple must have been one of the Twelve. (b) He cd. not have been excluded fm. the inmost group of three—Peter, James, and J. (c) He was not Peter, fm. whom he is frequently distinguished. (d) The saying that he shd. not die cd. not attach to James, who was the first of them all to die. John seems to be quite clearly indicated.

Some touch of fire and passion in them secured for him and his br. the title BOANERGES. He was not free fm. jealousy (Lk. 9.[49]), and he responded to the spur of personal ambition (Mk. 10.[35ff.], &c.). He kept closest to Jesus in the hour of His adversity, and received fm. the dying Saviour the sacred charge of His mr. (Jn. 19.[26]).

After Pentecost J. appears with Peter in the Temple (Ac. 3.[1]), and again evangelising in Samaria (8.[14ff.]). Paul did not see J. when first as a Christian he visited Jrs. (Gal. 1.[18f.]), but 14 yrs. later he is named as one of the pillars of the church (Gal. 2.[9]; cp. Ac. 15.).

Accdg. to cert. early Christian writings J. subsequently took up his residence in Ephesus. During the persecution of Domitian he was banished to the isle of Patmos, and at the death of that emperor returned to Ephesus, where he lived till the reign of Trajan (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF; EPISTLES; and REVELATION). Tertullian is the first to speak of a visit to Rm., where J. was plunged in a cauldron of boiling oil, suffering no harm (De Præsc. Hær. 36).

Some of the traditions regarding J. are quite in harmony with what we know of him fm. the Gospels. Irenæus (Adv. Hær. III. iii. 4) tells how his wrath blazed at Cerinthus, how he retreated fm. the bath when he saw that heretic, crying, "Let us go, lest the house fall" (cp. Lk. 9.[51ff.]). Clement of Alexandria (Quis Dives Salvus, 42) tells of a youth to whom the apostle was attracted, who became a convert, but, neglected thereafter by the bishop to whose care J. had commended him, fell away, and became the leader of a band of brigands. The aged apostle penetrated the robber haunts, and in the end won the wanderer back to faith and righteousness—conduct worthy of the disciple whom Jesus loved. He was wont to play with a pet partridge. "The bow," he said, "cannot be always bent." Very beautiful is the story of his extreme old age, when, no longer able to walk, he was carried into church, where he often repeated the command, "Little children, love one another," declaring that this was the sum of Christian duty (Jerome, Com. in Gal. 6.[10]). Last of the apostles, he died prob. 100 yrs. of age. An old tradition says he was killed by the Jews: but there is no certy. In the early Christian cents. his tomb was shown in Ephesus (Eusebius, HE. vii. 25; Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 9).

JOHN, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. When one thinks of writing a short article on the fourth Gospel, he is overwhelmed with the thought of the vast and multitudinous Lit. he has to make himself acquainted with. There is the Lit. of attack and defence, extending over more than a hundred yrs. If we begin with the first attack on the genuineness and authenticity of the fourth Gospel, we should start with The Dissonance of the Four Generally Received Evangelists, Evanson, 1792, who ascribed the work to a convert of the Platonic school in the second cent. But the controversy broke forth in all its strength in the publication of Bretschneider's Probabilia de Evang. et Epist. Joannis Apost. indole et origine. Of this book Weiss says, "In all mod. criticism of the Gospel there has hardly been one important suspicion advanced agst. its genuineness that was not here discussed" (Introduction, Eng. Translation, vol. ii. p. 389). Into the hist. of the criticism of the fourth Gospel it is not possible to enter within our limits. It is sufficient to say that it has gone on without intermission fm. 1820 to the present hour, and there are no signs of its abatement. Nor can it be said that learning and scholarship have been on one side more than on the other. Great names appear on both sides. Fm. Baur down to Schmiedel the attack has been persistently pushed, and the defence has been quite as strenuous. On the one hand Pfleiderer, Wrede, Schmiedel, and Bacon in America, have set forth the case agst. the apostolic author of the Gospel, and men like Lightfoot, Ezra Abbott, Westcott, Drummond, Matthew Arnold, Sanday, and others, have strenuously maintained that the Gospel is the work of an eye-witness. Many bks. on each side have been published during the present cent. We may refer to the multitudinous books of Loisy, and the contribution of Schmiedel, now trd. into Eng., on "the Johannine writings." As far as learning and scholarship are concerned there is abundance of both on either side. The names of men on the defence are as great as are those on the attack. Nor is there any sign of the cessation of the controversy. In truth the presuppositions on either side are incompatible. There is the presupposition of the attack, wh. is common to all attacks on the Gospels, that we must take for granted that all the accounts of Jesus are so far untrustworthy because they emanate fm. men who trusted Jesus, who worshipped Him, and who, therefore, magnified Him. They take for granted that the Jesus set forth in the Gospel cannot be the Jesus of hist., because He transcends the stature of ordinary men. Fm. this point of view Schmiedel gets his foundation pillars, because these seem to indicate that Jesus was not perfect. If this is applied to the Synoptic Gospels, it applies à fortiori to the fourth Gospel. With this presupposition the question is settled before the historical investigation has properly begun.

It is imposs. for us to get back to the historical Jesus, for we are told that the Jesus of the Gospels is the Jesus who has been fashioned in the reflection of the Church, and He does not represent reality, but represents what the needs of the Church demanded. It is clear that on these terms no historical investigation is required. But what if the Jesus of the Gospels is real? Well, that question is not even considered by the attack. It is too large a question to be discussed here; we simply point out that there is such a question.

As to the external evidence of the fourth Gospel, we may say that it really brings us nearer to the prob. time of its appearance than is the case with regard to the other Gospels. It really brings us to the confines of the first cent. We know that the number of authoritative Gospels, that is, Gospels recognised by all the churches, read in the public assemblies of the churches, cited and regarded as Scrip., were four. We know this fm. many witnesses, fm. Irenæus, from Clement of Alexandria, and fm. Tertullian. In all the churches in Egp., in Asia Minor, in Rome, in Gaul, and in North Africa these Gospels were sacred bks. The Diatessaron of Tatian is based on these four; Justin knew them as Memoirs of the Apostles; the Epistles of Ignatius are steeped in the imagery, and echo the thoughts, of the fourth Gospel in particular. Then, again, we find that the fourth Gospel is a book honoured by the Church, and by the Gnostics without the Church. At all events the bk. seems to be quoted by the Gnostics in the first half of the second cent. There are quotations from the fourth Gospel in Basilides, in the Clementine Homilies, in Valentinian. See Nicoll's Baird Lectures, The Gospels in Early Church History, for an excellent presentation of the evidence. Recent investigation into the Epistles of Ignatius has shown that the Ignatian letters are full of the spirit of the fourth Gospel. That they are closely connected together is without doubt. Some, indeed, have gone so far as to say that the Ignatian Epistles are first, or at all events they breathe the same atmosphere as that in wh. the fourth Gospel was produced. This is so improbable that we need not consider it.

It is admitted that the fourth Gospel made its appearance in Ephesus some time in the second cent. Extreme men will not allow it an appearance before the yr. 140. Others speak of it as appearing in the first part of the cent., say between 100 and 115. But this concession, demanded by the facts of the case, does not lead them to a concession of the Johannine authorship. In fact they mostly agree in affirming that the anct. tradition of the residence of John at Ephesus is baseless. This has become a commonplace with those who deny the Johannine authorship. Schmiedel heads one of his sections thus: "The Apostle John not in Ephesus." The main reason for his disregard of the persistent tradition of the early Church is the following: "We will point to one fact only. When Paul took farewell of those who presided over the community at Ephesus, he prophesied that after his departure fierce wolves wd. force a way in and wd. not spare the flock. This farewell address was not actually so delivered by Paul, but was composed by the author of the Acts (between c. 105 and 130), in accordance with his own views—a liberty wh. every anct. historian took with the speeches of his heroes, and wh. no one thought wrong, seeing that the most famous of the Gr. historians, Thucydides (c. B.C. 400), expressly declares that he followed this plan in his work because it wd. have been an impossibility to have reported the exact words of the speeches as delivered. But how cd. the author of the Acts of the Apostles, who was as full of a feeling of veneration for the original apostles as he was for Paul, have introduced into Paul's speech so unfriendly an utterance about his successors, if he had any idea that the most important of these was the apostle John? But, further, if it be supposed that Paul actually made the utterance, without, of course, having any idea of the person of his successor, how could he incorporate it in his bk., and thus seriously impede his main purpose—that of showing that unanimity was subsisting between Paul and the original disciples, instead of quietly ignoring it, as he does so much that is unfavourable to the original apostles and their adherents?" (The Johannine Writings, p. 174f.).

This is a good specimen of the method and practice of Schmiedel. Nor is it his alone. His questions are relevant only on the supposition of the late date of the Acts of the Apostles. Luke gave his summary of the speech to the elders of Ephesus, because he believed that Paul really made it. If Paul made it in the late fifties, why shd. he refer to John's residence at Ephesus in the eighties? Even supposing that Acts was written in the first quarter of the second cent., why should the author introduce into it a refc. alien to the spirit of the time wh. he sought to set forth in his bk.? The Acts of the Apostles represent a time when the distinction between Christian and Jew was unknown to the Roman Government, and the author was artistic enough to keep to the spirit of the time of wh. he wrote. The main purpose was not to show the unanimity between Paul and the original apostles, but to set forth the hist. of the spread of the kingdom of God fm. Jerusalem to Rome. The reasons for denying the Ephesian residence of John depend on considerations such as are set forth by Schmiedel in the foregoing passage; and we submit that such reasons are not sufficient to set aside the consistent and persistent tradition of the early Church.

The external evidence is sufficient to prove that there was in existence a bk. containing thoughts and teachings like those we have in the fourth Gospel, and that this bk. was in existence in the very beginning of the second cent. The internal evidence is equally cogent. It has been set forth with clearness again and again. Indeed, the striking diffcs. between the fourth and the Synoptic Gospels make it highly improbable that it shd. have obtained the place it had in the reverence of the Church, had it not been introduced by an authority wh. all the churches cd. recognise as adequate and sufficient. We need not enumerate these diffcs. here. They are many. There is the diffc. as to the time of the ministry of our Lord; and there is the diffc. as to the place. The Synoptic Gospels relate only a Galilean ministry, and they do not bring our Lord to Jrs. until the very end. John tells us of a ministry in Jrs. at the very beginning, and of a prolonged ministry in Judæa ere the ministry in Galilee began. The Synoptics date His public ministry fm. the time when John was cast into prison, the fourth Gospel speaks of a ministry of Jesus contemporaneous with that of John the Baptist. Other striking diffcs. appear. And these are obvious to every reader. Our contention is that these striking diffcs. wd. lead the readers of the Synoptics to reject the fourth Gospel, unless the latter came to them fm. an authority wh. they must have recognised as trustworthy.

As to the trustworthiness of the writer of the fourth Gospel, it may be said that those geographical references wh. were formerly used to convince the writer of blunders are now known to be accurate. It has been shown that the writer was a Jew, that He was a Jew of Pal., that he professes to have been an eye-witness, and that there is nothing to disprove that claim. It has been shown also that all refcs. to local hist. are correct; that allusions to Jewish customs, laws, and observances are accurate. It is not possible to enter into detail. But stress is laid by the attack on one passage, or a series of passages, wh. are said to convince the writer of ignorance so gross that he cannot be trusted anywhere when he speaks of Jewish laws and customs. These passages are John 2.[49-52] and 18.[14]. The refc. is to the statement that Caiaphas was High Priest that yr. On this Schmiedel speaks as follows: "One who writes under an assumed name often betrays himself by having false ideas of the places or institutions of the country in wh. he claims to be living. As far as places are concerned it cannot be shown with success that John does this. But, as regards institutions, he has been led to make as great a mistake as it is possible to imagine. By telling us twice that Caiaphas was 'High Priest that yr.' he assumes that the office changed hands every yr. As a matter of fact, the High Priest held the office for life, and, although it happened not infrequently that one was deposed, there was never any question of a yearly vacation of office. This of course is a fact wh. wd. have been as well known to a contemporary of Jesus in Pal. as the fact that the office of Emperor is hereditary is to a German of to-day. In face of a mistake on such a matter, how can we attach importance to a kge. of places in the country, wh. cd. easily be acquired even one hundred yrs. after the events with wh. they are associated ?" (pp. 188–9). In contrast we may place a quotation fm. Weiss. "As a native of Pal. he invariably reckons accdg. to Jewish time, wh. alone answers to all his dates : he knows and names the Jewish festival times and customs, even the time occupied in building the Temple : the ritual practice regarding circumcision : the domestic customs at marriage and burial ; and the relations between Jews and Samaritans. It is through him that we first learn the relationship between Annas and Caiaphas, the limits of the power of the Sanhedrin, and the part wh. the Scribes, with their conceit of learning, and the Pharisees played in it; the priests with their Levitical attendants, and the punishment of excommunication fm. the synagogue. In face of all this, the attempt to prove that when the evangelist describes Caiaphas as High Priest in the yr. of Christ's death, he meant that the High Priest was changed every yr., cannot be taken seriously" (Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 359–360). Thus the passages wh. to Schmiedel are decisive, and are considered by him to be sufficient to destroy our confidence in the accuracy of the writer of the fourth Gospel, by Weiss "cannot be taken seriously." Weiss comes to the study of them, after having verified the statements of the writer in many connections, and Schmiedel considers that he is discharged fm. the consideration of these accurate statements by this statement about the High Priest. Might he not have sought for another interpretation ? Does the writer affirm or intend to affirm anything regarding the tenure of office by the High Priest ? Here is an accurate statement : So and so, being Lord Provost for the yr. when the university buildings were opened, was knighted by the king. This is a statement of fact, but it says nothing about the tenure of office by the Lord Provost. Every Scotchman knows that a Lord Provost is elected for three yrs., and yet we may refer to any yr. of his reign as a yr. in wh. he was Provost. The writer seems to refer not to the High Priest's tenure of office, but to the fact that Caiaphas was High Priest in that fateful and eventful yr. Nay, he seems to lay stress on the connection between his official position and the prophecy wh. he uttered, being High Priest the yr. he prophesied, as if there was a sort of official inspiration attaching to the office. But Schmiedel seems to think that his interpretation is the only possible interpretation ; and, indeed, it has been repeated often enough since Baur first made it, for some people to believe it, if only by dint of repetition.

But then we are told that the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels is a very different figure from Him whom we meet in the fourth Gospel. It was wont to be said that the fourth Gospel was theological, and the three were historical. This is no longer said, for the contention is that all the Gospels are theological, or at least homiletical. It was found that the supernatural Jesus was so deeply imbedded in the structure of the Synoptics, that He cd. be removed fm. it only by disintegrating them. Taking the Synoptic Gospels as they stand, we have a figure of the same majesty, one who speaks with the same authority, one who goes about doing good, as we have in the fourth Gospel. Not to dwell on this at present, we listen while men tell us that in the fourth Gospel Jesus is the same fm. the first public appearance to the last, that He claims authority fm. the beginning, and that there is no progress, no change. They speak with emphasis on what they call the autonomy of Jesus. In short, they say that there are hardly any traces of humanity left in Him. This is so often repeated that it may be well to look at it.

We read in the fourth chapter, "Jesus therefore, being wearied with His journey, sat thus by the well." It is a commonplace statement, but those who contend that human traits are removed fm. the fig. set forth in the Gospel must read it with some surprise. It tells us that He cd. be wearied as other men were wearied, that He cd. suffer fatigue, and that He needed rest as other men do. We see Him seated by the well, wearied with His journey, and as we read the story we find other human traits. We find Him interested in the talk with the woman, gradually becoming more and more interested, until His weariness is quite forgotten. When His disciples returned they found him alert, interested, and refreshed, so that He could say, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." This is an experience true in itself, and easily verified in common life—weariness forgotten, fatigue vanishing when the attention is awakened, and mind and heart are enlisted in some event or happening that has aroused us. There cd. be no greater testimony to the humanity of our Lord, and to the fact that He is really one with us.

Take, again, the words "Jesus wept," and consider the interpretations of it wh. are abroad. We take one fm. the interesting bk. of Dr. Ernest F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, its Purpose and Theology. "The sympathy and compassion of Jesus, wh. are evident in every chapter of the Synoptic narratives, fall out of sight in the fourth Gospel. We have seen that, in the case of the miracles, mere pity for human suffering ceases to be a prominent motive: and little stress is laid on it in the portrait of Jesus as a whole. He stands separate fm. the world in the majesty of His Divine nature. He does not participate in human weaknesses and distresses, and looks down upon them fm. a tranquil height at wh. they cannot reach Him. The famous verse (11.[35]), 'Jesus wept,' might seem for a moment to disturb this picture, but does so only in appearance. The feeling expressed in that verse is not human compassion as of a man with his fellow-sufferers, but the sorrow of a Divine being who stands apart and contemplates the earthly tragedy. The Jews misinterpret the tears as a sign of unavailing regret over a lost friend, but we are meant in the light of the approaching miracle to understand them better. They do not mark the humanity of Jesus, but rather His Divine exaltation. Fm. His own untroubled height He surveyed the misery of our mortal lot, and wept" (pp. 167–8). It is rather a curious interpretation, yet it is the interpretation of those who insist that John shd. have written throughout fm. the standpoint of the Logos doctrine. But John has not written as they think he ought to have done. Jesus is not the impassive being who stands aloof fm. the sorrows of men, nor is He one who does not share the ordinary lot of men. We saw that He became wearied with His journey; we see in this passage that "He was moved with indignation in the spirit and was troubled (or troubled Himself)," and that He wept. Why should He have wept, on the theory of Dr. Scott? Tears are a sign of sorrow, of sympathy, of grief, and why shd. they not mean that here? We do not ask why He was moved with indignation, or why He troubled Himself. That wd. lead us too far afield. But we do ask why He wept? and we answer without hesitation that he wept in sympathy with those who wept, and that He felt with them the agony of sorrow, and the pang wh. comes fm. bereavement. Further on, when the Greeks came, seeking to see Him, we find again that His soul was troubled, and that He entered into an agony similar to that at Gethsemane. Further we find that this "Divine being who stands apart and contemplates the earthly tragedy" so entered into that tragedy as to die as other men die, and to be slain as other men were slain. The very fact of the death on the cross, so vividly set forth in this Gospel, is sufficient of itself to set aside the contention of Dr. Scott, that this is only the sorrow of a Divine being who stands apart fm. the human tragedy. He entered into and He shared that human tragedy, and all through the Gospel He is not far apart fm. men, not unsympathetic, nor impassive. Nay, we are not far away fm. the strong crying and tears on wh. the Epistle to the Hebrews lays stress.

Another difficulty presented by the attack, and on which great stress is laid, is what they call the autonomy of Jesus, or His self-determination. "The evangelist starts fm. the assumption that He who submitted Himself for a time to earthly limitations was possessed of a Divine dignity. Even while submitting He vindicated His authority by acting in everything on His own sovereign will, without compulsion fm. without" (Scott, p. 169). The proof of this statement is limited to those instances in wh. Jesus acts in relation to man. Jesus does not allow men to dictate to Him His course of action, and in this respect the fourth Gospel is absolutely at one with the Synoptics. In the Synoptics He speaks as one having authority, He does not allow His mr. and His brethren to intermeddle: other instances abound.

When, however, we inquire into the matter fully we find that the autonomy, or the self-determination of Jesus, assumes another form. It is not self-determination, it is obedience to the Father. This is the constant refc. He is sent by the Father, He speaks the Father's words, He does the Father's works: "The Father is greater than I." To set forth this in fulness wd. be to quote a large part of the Gospel. Even in that great passage where He speaks of having the power of laying down His life, the refc. to the Father occurs. "Therefore doth My Father love me, because I lay down My life that I may take it again. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received from My Father" (10.[17f.]). In relation to the Father Jesus was the one whom the Father sent into the world; He directed His action and His work in absolute dependence on the Father. The words He spoke and the works He did were done in such absolute obedience that they were the very words and deeds of the Father. This obedience to the Father is as absolute in the fourth Gospel as it is in the three.

Dr. Scott says: "There can be little doubt that, by thus importing the doctrine of the Logos into the Gospel record, John is not only compelled to do violence to historical fact, but empties the life of Christ of much of its real worth and grandeur while seeming to enhance it. The moral attributes, trust, pity, infinite sympathy, are replaced by certain metaphysical attributes, wh. are supposed to belong more essentially to the Divine nature" (p. 173). Dr. Scott can only make good this statement by such forced exegesis as we have already noticed. The real Jesus of the fourth Gospel really manifests trust, pity, forgiveness, and sympathy. But we come to the very crux of the matter when we read that the fourth Gospel is metaphysical. We just say, on the contrary, that there is no metaphysics in the fourth Gospel. It is concrete through and through. There is no speculation in it. Even in the prologue there is nothing to be compared with the speculative systems of Greece, or with the notions of the Gnostics. When we pass fm. the prologue, what we have in the Gospel is the attempt to depict the story of a personal life, lived out in relation to God, to man, and to the world. We see that life in these relations. In relation to God He is the Sent of God for the great work of redemption. He is in the world because the Father loves the world. He is the proof to man of the love of God. He is sent, not to condemn the world, but that the world mt. be saved. Nor does He ever forget that He is sent to do the Father's will, and to finish the Father's work. This relation of dependence on the Father and of obedience to Him is never lost sight of. In relation to man He comes to reveal the Father unto man. He is the light wh. lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. The light of the world, the living bread, the good shepherd, the way, the truth, and the life, and so on, in ever varied phrase, His relation to man is described. He is one with the Father, and He is one with man, but all the attributes ascribed to the Son are consistent with the view that He is Divine and human.

It is not possible in our limits to speak of the distinctive theology of the fourth Gospel. Nor can we give even an outline of its contents. Nor is this necessary in a short article like the present. The Commentaries, like those written by Westcott, Godet, Moulton and Milligan, Meyer, the Hand-Commentar, and many others, provide for the reader accounts of the theology and expositions of the contents, sufficiently good. It seemed best to us, and also most profitable for the reader, to pass in rapid review the main strands of the argument by wh. men have sought to disprove the Johannine authorship. Much more mt. have been said had we time and space. But it seems to us that all the phenomena of the Gospel are consistent with the supposition that it was written by the Apostle John in his old age, at the close of the first cent., and that the Gospel contains the reminiscences of an eye-witness, together with his reflection on what he had seen and heard. Brooding over all these things throughout the yrs., he sent forth this Gospel as the fit representation of what he had seen the life and work of his Lord to mean. This is his record of the personal life, this is his representation of its meaning, and it has commended itself to many generations as a fit and adequate rendering of the life of our Lord. Even those who deny that he had any share in its production attach a high value to its thought and theology. They call it a pearl of great price, they say that through it the Gospel made a conquest of the Greek mind, and many other things of like sort do they say. All of wh. we may welcome, if only we place it for ourselves into an appropriate setting in the personal life of Jesus.

But what about the style in wh. John writes? Well, it wd. appear that the Jesus of the Synoptics sometimes spoke in the Johannine fashion. See the passages in Mw. 11.$^{25-30}$, and Lk. 10.$^{21ff.}$, where He speaks of the Father and the Son in the same absolute way so familiar to us in the fourth Gospel. My own view is that this was one of the ways in wh. the Master was wont to speak. John, being young and impressionable, receptive of impressions made on him by Jesus in an extraordinary degree, fell into the Master's way of speech, thought in it, spoke it till it became his own way of speech, and he cd. speak and think in no other way. Instead, therefore, of John translating the Master's speech into his own modes of speech, it is rather the Master who has dominated the life, thought, and speech of John, until he cd. only speak and write in the Master's way.

James Iverach.

JOHN, THE FIRST EPISTLE OF. This epistle, in contrast to almost every other epistle in the NT., has not the name of the writer in the forefront, has no salutation to the people to whom it is addressed, and no formal, friendly greeting at the end. In these respects it resembles the Epistle to the Hebrews, and differs fm. all other epistles. It seems simply to assume that the writer wd. be well known to his readers, and that they wd. readily recognise the voice that speaks to them in tones of authority. Another contrast strikes the reader of this epistle. It is wholly directed towards the deepening and the unfolding of the Christian life. It presupposes that those who read it are already Christian; it does not again lay the foundations, it proceeds to the building of the superstructure. The Pauline Epistles show the apostle, in the exercise of his apostolic function, laying the foundation of the Christian society and organising it. They are full of active, aggressive, missionary enterprise. This aspect of laying the foundations, organising the Christian community, is here in the background, even if it appears at all. John is concerned with sustaining, nourishing, and building up the Christian and the Christian Church. John is always reminding his readers of what they have received, of what they are, and of what they are bound to be if they realise the fact and the meaning of the Christian life.

Corresponding to this upbuilding aim is the environment in wh. they live. They are in the world, and the world has taken on a new aspect, corresponding to the stage of Christian life to wh. they had attained. Formerly the environment was either Jewish or Gentile, and there was a great diffc. between the two. To the original disciples Judaism was the anct. kdm. of God, and it was opposed to Christ because there was a veil over their faces.

There was always the hope that it wd. turn to Christ, and the veil wd. be torn away. That period is past. Judaism had organised itself in hostility towards Christ. The distinction between Jew and Gentile had passed away. They were one in another sense than that of wh. Paul had spoken. To Paul the distinction had been done away in Christ. To John the distinction had been done away by the common opposition to Christ. So for him the great distinction was that between the Church and the cosmos. To him Judaism is simply a power entirely opposed to Christ. Hence the way in wh. in the Gospel he speaks of the Jews. Looking back, fm. the standpoint at the end of the first cent., to the scenes and memories of his youth, and regarding the Jews fm. the point of view of their determined opposition to Christ, he simply in the Gospel speaks of them as "Jews," or "the Jews." With this the epistle agrees. Jew and Gentile are part of the cosmos, and the cosmos is defined in terms of its opposition to Christ.

These things give us a clue to the date of the epistle. The first generation of Christians are passed away. The Church is so far organised, the world also is organised in its opposition to Christ. But the supreme danger to the Church is not fm. without but fm. within. Antichrist is within the Church, and there are some who endanger the faith by denying or ignoring its fundamental presupposition. This is in harmony with the prevision of Paul in his address to the Ephesian elders, and with the address to Ephesus in the Epistles to the Seven Churches. Thus if we date the epistle fm. John's residence at Ephesus, we reach a conclusion in harmony with all the facts.

As to the authorship it is not necessary to dwell much on that question. This we say though we are aware of contentions to the contrary on the part of many. The coincidences in lang., thought, style, and also in aim are so marked between the Gospel and this epistle that they can only be explained either by identity of authorship, or by deliberate imitation of the one by the other. It seems to us that imitation is out of the question. The external evidence is also satisfactory, so we simply take for granted that the Gospel and the epistle proceed fm. the same mind.

The epistle is so rich, so full, so plain in its teaching, yet so subtle; so massive, and yet so simple in its thought, that we despair as we attempt to outline its meaning. To us it is the greatest document in existence. In these five chapters there is a notable addition to the thought of the world. Nor are its literary features less remarkable than its thought. The manifold relations between section and section, the relations between each section and the whole, the marvellous way in wh. each verse contributes to the harmony of the whole organic unity, reminds us more of the massive march of nature than of the work of man. Yet the thought is never far fm. life, never becomes metaphysical, never loses touch of the ethical values, and never loses sight of its main purpose, which is to make the joy of the Christian full and perfect.

The keynote is struck in the first section. It touches the note of personal experience, and bears the witness of personal testimony. "That wh. was fm. the beginning, that wh. we have heard, that wh. we have seen with our eyes, that wh. we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life (and the life was manifested, and we have seen and bear witness, and declare unto you the life, the eternal life wh. was with the Father, and was manifested unto us): that wh. we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us: yea, and our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son, Jesus Christ: and these things we write, that our joy may be fulfilled" (1 Jn. 1.$^{1-4}$). So with solemn emphasis, with stately dignity, and with a fervent desire to comfort and bless the readers, the apostle begins his treatise. As he nears the end of his epistle he writes again, "These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God" (5.^{13}). Looking forward he writes that their joy may be fulfilled; as he completes his writing he again declares his aim, that they may know that they have eternal life. So throughout he writes to warn, to comfort, to deepen their life, and to guide them to fulness of joy.

It is characteristic that the apostle, having set forth his aim and purpose in the verse quoted above, shd. begin with a statement wh. at first sight seems to have little connection with the introductory section. "This is the message, wh. we have heard fm. Him, and announce unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." Why does the apostle go back beyond the beginning, beyond the historical manifestation of the Word of Life, and announce as the essential meaning of the message of the Word, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all? Referring to the commentaries for a full discussion, we may here briefly say that the full meaning of God has been revealed by the Word of Life, and that meaning is summed up for John in the phrase "God is light." In the Gospel he had recorded that "No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son, wh. is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (1.^{18}). So here the message of the Son regarding the Father is, God is light. The fulness of meaning in the phrase cannot be set forth here. But theologically and ethically it is of the highest significance. The ethical and spiritual meaning is drawn out in the following verses. For God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. Fellowship with the light is not consistent with a walk in darkness. This is drawn out positively and negatively in the following verses. Then he passes on to the remedy for sin, and the way by wh. we may be assured that sin is forgiven ($2.^{1-6}$). Obedience in love and light as realised in actual life is set forth, and then ($2.^{12-17}$) the great contrast between the world and the Church, or the temporal and the eternal, is described and enforced. At this point a new section begins, and a new theme is elaborated. The great contrasts in this part are truth and error. Truth has been manifested, and also falsehood. These have been manifested within the Church and without. In the Church it has taken the form of Antichrist. Not merely the Pseudo-christs of wh. the Gospels spoke, but something within the Church wh. has usurped the place of Christ and is in opposition to Him. See ANTICHRIST for a full exposition of the term. The emphasis is laid on the reality of Christ, on the fact that Jesus is the Christ, that the eternal Son has come in the flesh; and fm. these emphatic sayings we may gather that the falsehood is in those statements wh. affirmed that the incarnation was only seeming, that the Christ descended on Jesus at His baptism, and so on. But John affirms the reality of Jesus, His real incarnation. The section is very rich and full of meaning, with regard to the Father, with regard to Christ, with regard to the Holy Spirit, and also with regard to the life of the believer in relation to the truth in all these relations. Passing to the third chap. we find in the first twelve verses a contrast between the children of light and the children of darkness—or as John in his concrete fashion calls it, the children of God and the children of the devil. Then the transition is easily made to the fact that the children of light are the children of love. And the meaning of love is drawn out in itself and in its practical consequences. Brotherhood in Christ and the hatred of the world ($3.^{1-24}$) are set forth. "This is His commandment, that we shd. believe in the name of the Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, even as He gave us commandment. And he that keepeth His commandment abideth in Him and He in him. And hereby we know that He abideth in us, by the Spirit wh. He gave us" ($3.^{23, 24}$). In the first six verses of the fourth chap. we have a graphic description of the spirits of truth and error, in themselves and in their consequences, and then we come to a description of the Christian life. The spt. of Christianity is God and love. Read the passage, vv. 7–12, and note how rich and manifold is its delineation of love. How he sets it in this relation and in that, draws it out, unfolds it, passes fm. the nature of God to the service of man, and finds love triumphant everywhere. Finally, in the fifth chap., we have the power of the Christian faith, and its victory over the world. We have also triumphant activity, the boldness and the courage of the men who are in possession of the Christian life. Such is a very rough outline of this great epistle. It is possible to look at it fm. many points of view. We mt. look at it fm. the point of view of theology, and ask what it teaches regarding God, regarding man, regarding the world; we might ask what it teaches of redemption, of atonement, of the great doctrines of Christianity; we mt. ask what is its outlook into the future for the present world and for the world to come; and we cd. easily gather answers to all of these questions. To do so here wd. far transcend our limits. Even to regard it as a literary composition, and to endeavour to trace the correspondences part to part, and of each part to the whole, wd. be an enormous task. It seems to us the more we study it the more it resembles a living organism. A living organism is one, but it takes many sciences to describe its functions and relations. Think of the many systems, embodied in our scientific bks., wh. are needed to describe the human body, and all of them together fail just because they are abstract. This epistle is like the human organism. Every part gives the whole, and gives it in its concrete reality. To appreciate this epistle we must live it, dwell on it bit by bit, part by part, and yet bring the spt. of the whole into every part.

Fellowship with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ, fellowship with one another, opposition to every tendency wh. wd. mar that fellowship, is the summary of the meaning of the epistle. This also is its triumphant close. "We know that the Son of God is come and hath given us an understanding, that we know him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life."

JOHN, THE SECOND EPISTLE OF. There are interesting questions regarding this epistle, both with respect to its authorship, and to its contents, wh. we cannot discuss within our limits. They are more curious than important. We shall perhaps best fulfil the purpose of this dictionary by sketching its contents. The author does not mention his name, but describes himself as the Elder, the last representative of an older generation, around whom a new generation has grown up. There is no perfectly satisfactory explanation of the title "elect lady." Perhaps the best solution is to think of her as meaning here what is meant in the first Epistle of Peter, "She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you" (1 P. $5.^{13}$). We shall have a sufficient meaning if we think of a congregation wh. may be addressed as a unity or as a plurality accdg. to the point of view. The apostle loves her, but so do all that love the truth. He and they are in possession of the truth. He has great joy in the thought that her children are walking in the truth. This is the Father's commandment. Truth shd. manifest itself in love, and to love is no new commandment, it is fm. the beginning. Still it is an emphatic commandment. The mind of the apostle, being full of love, full also of the commandment to love, turns to that wh. may hinder and thwart love. All that tends to disparage Jesus Christ tends to destroy love. But there are some who do not confess or understand Jesus Christ. They do not confess that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh. This is the deceiver and Antichrist. It is implied that without Christ there is no life, no love. "Look to yourselves that ye lose not the things wh. ye have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward." It wd. be sad to miss the reward, for he that reapeth receiveth wages. These wages are great, full, and complete. Others laboured, and they may enter into their labours. The children of the elect lady may obtain wages if they enter into the labours of the apostles.

Apparently there were some who called on the children to go forward. They call on them to go forward, to take the lead; such is the meaning of the word "Whosoever goeth onward" in the ninth verse. But there is a going forward wh. may separate fm. the foundation. In the world of life departure fm. the true type of growth is fatal, and is rewarded by elimination and extinction. Growth must be accdg. to type. So a going forward wh. separates fm. Christ is not an advance, it is a departure fm. life. "Whosoever goeth onward and abideth not in the teaching of Christ, hath not God: He that abideth in the teaching, the same hath both the Father and the Son." Nothing but the true doctrine, and the abiding in it, can have possession of the Father and the Son. John commands separation fm. them lest they shd. be partakers of their evil works. Such is the outline of this brief and significant letter, wh. has all the characteristics of the apostle. It is of permanent worth, specially because of the light wh. it throws on the true idea of progress. True progress does not break with the past, does not become revolutionary, it is the unfolding of the true into its higher completeness. It is not the spt. of denial, it conserves what is true and good, and in particular the true progress of Christianity will never minimise Christ and His significance. He that abideth in the teaching hath the Father and the Son. JAMES IVERACH.

JOHN, THE THIRD EPISTLE OF. The Third Epistle is full of life and char. The greeting to Gaius, "the beloved, whom I love in the truth," with the good wishes regarding him on the part of the Elder, is full of interest. It is so plain that it need not be paraphrased, but it may be quoted. "Beloved, I pray that in all things thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth. For I rejoiced greatly, when brethren came and bare witness unto thy truth, even as thou walkest in truth. Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth." As we read through the epistle, we earnestly wish for some further kge. of this particular church, and of the three men who stand out so prominently and dramatically in it. We have first the man to whom it is addressed, Gaius, whose characteristics stand out in the opening verses. He is of such a char. as to justify the love and confidence reposed in him by "the Elder." Then there is Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence, and who had such influence over that church as to be able to resist even apostolic authority. He wd. not receive what the apostle had written. The churches had made such progress that when the epistle was written, leadership in them was evidently an obj. of ambition. Churches, also, had evidently some measure of independence. The central authority had not yet asserted itself, and the churches had a great measure of self-guidance. Diotrephes cd. resist the apostle. But calmly John asserts his authority, and calmly affirms, "Therefore, if I come, I will bring to remembrance his works wh. he doeth, prating agst. us with wicked words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and them that wd. he forbiddeth, and casteth them out of the church." It is a lively ecclesiastical situation—Diotrephes refusing to receive the brethren, coercing others also not to receive them, prating agst. the apostle, and excommunicating those who do not agree with him. We shd. like to have heard more of the matter—more also about Demetrius and the issue of the whole matter. But perhaps we may imagine the situation, for it has not been without many parallels in the hist. of the Church.

JOIADA. (1) One of the men who repaired the "old gate" (Ne. 3.[6] RV.). (2) Son of Eliashib, High Priest in the time of Nehemiah (12.[11], &c., 13.[28]). He married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite.

JOIAKIM, son of the famous Jeshua, the High Priest, colleague of Zerubbabel in leading the first contingent who returned from Babylon. He was father of Eliashib, who succeeded him as High Priest (Ne. 12.[10], &c.). The name is a contraction from JEHOIAKIM.

JOIARIB, a short form of JEHOIARIB. (1) One of the "men of understanding" (RV. "wh. were teachers"), whom Ezra sent to secure Levites, who might be "ministers for the house of our God" (Ez. 8.[17]), no Levites being found among the company of returning exiles who halted by "the river that runneth to Ahava." (2) One of the "princes of the people," who in Nehemiah's time dwelt in Jerusalem. They are called "chiefs of the province," but their special function is not defined (Ne. 11.[5]). (3) The founder of a course of priests (Ne. 11.[10]; cp. 12.[6, 19]).

JOKDEAM, a city of Judah (Jo. 15.[56]) named along with MAON, CARMEL and ZIPH. It is not mentioned in OEJ. It is prob. to be sought to S. of Hebron.

JOKNEAM, a Can. royal city "in Carmel" (Jo. 12.[22]), on the border of Zebulun (19.[11]). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (21.[34], &c.). OEJ. places it six Rm. miles N. of Legio, on the way to Ptolemais. It is identd. with Tell Qaimūn, a shapely hill or mound, with ruins, on the E. slope of Carmel. The district is well watered. On the E. is the torrent bed of Kishon (19.[11]).

JOKSHAN, son of Ketura, father of Sheba and Dedan (Gn. 25.[2]; 1 Ch. 1.[32]). No trace of this name has been found in connection with the Arabian tribes, and it is generally suspected that Jokshan here stands for Joktan. The change of "ṭ" into "sh," however, is a difficulty.

JOKTAN, s. of Eber and br. of Peleg, the reputed ancestor of many S. Arabian tribes. Of his thirteen sons not all have been identified, but most of them are found in tribes or villages in el-Yemen. Of Joktan nothing further is known, and no satisfactory account of his name has been suggested (Gn. 10.[26], &c.).

JOKTEEL. (1) An unidentd. city in the Shephelah of Judah (Jo. 15.[38]). (2) SELA, in Edom, taken and named J. by Amaziah, k. of Judah (2 K. 14.[7]).

JONADAB, JEHONADAB, "J″. hath incited." (1) The son of David's br. Shimeah, and so cousin to Amnon. He was reputed a very "subtil" or "wise" man. Perhaps, in the light of the counsel he gave his cousin in the matter of Tamar, hākhām might best be rendered here by our word "knowing." As Dean Stanley put it, he "was one of those characters who, in the midst of great or royal families, pride themselves, and are renowned, for being acquainted with the secrets of the whole circle in wh. they move. His age naturally made him the friend of his cousin Amnon, heir to the throne (2 S. 13.[3]). He perceived from the prince's altered appearance that there was some unknown grief—'Why art thou, the king's son, so lean?'—and, when he had wormed it out, he gave him the fatal advice for ensnaring his sister Tamar (vv. 5, 6)." His intimate knowledge of the situation enabled him to correct the report of wholesale slaughter brought to the king from Baal-Hazor. "Let not my lord suppose that they have killed all the young men, the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead; for by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined from the day that he forced his sister Tamar" (2 S. 13.[32]). (2) Son of Rechab ("rider"), the son of Hammath, of the Kenite family which had settled near JABEZ, a city of Judah (2 K. 10.[15]; 1 Ch. 2.[55]). This division of the tribe, like their kinsmen in the north under Heber, would of course be dwelling in tents. This is indeed plain from the commands laid upon the tribesmen by Jonadab, wh. they most zealously observed: "You shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons for ever; neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, but all your days ye shall dwell in tents" (Jr. 35.[6f.]). These prohibitions seem to have been dictated by the hot heart of the nomad, over against the settled people with whom his tribe was brought into such close contact. They concern the very points which emphasised the difference between them: the vine, in especial, being the recognised symbol of the settled life. That J. was a man of impressive personality is obvious, and it may be taken as certain that his precepts were enforced by the sanctions of religion. He may be regarded as one of the men thrown up at intervals by Arabian peoples, whose zeal for the purity of religion as they understand it may be described as fierce. Long after he was gone his rule was punctiliously observed. The tribesmen took shelter within the walls of Jerusalem at the approach of the Chaldean army, but they were incorruptible in their adherence to their time-honoured practices. For this fidelity they are praised. "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before Me for ever" (Jr. 35.).

Jonadab had doubtless heard of the reforming zeal of Jehu, and the heart of the Arab zealot was drawn to that dashing soldier with his thoroughgoing ways. He set out therefore to meet him (2 K. 10.[15]), and a congenial companion Jehu found him in the work of slaughter (v. 23). Jehu clearly understood the stern soul of the man. "Come with me," said he, "and see my zeal for the Lord" (2 K. 10.[16]). The rough usurper covered with a cloak of religious zeal the massacres to which his political ambitions urged him. No doubt he was thankful for the support of one whose religious convictions were as sincere as his own were hypocritical. See RECHABITES.

JONAH, s. of Amittai of Gath-Hepher (Gittah-Hepher, Jo. 19.[13]), prophesied the restoration of the coasts of Isr. by JEROBOAM II. (2 K. 14.[25]).

JONAH, BOOK OF. Contents.—J. is sent to preach repentance to the Ninevites; to escape that command he takes ship for TARSHISH: a storm strikes the vessel, wh. is like to be overwhelmed; the sailors cast lots and find that it is on account of J. that this storm has fallen upon them; on his advice, after making an effort to save him, they cast J. into the sea. God provides a great fish to swallow J., and after three days and three nights the fish deposits him on the shore. We have then a "prayer" of J. in the belly of the fish.

Although there are many echoes in it of the Psalms, there are also many strong and original expressions, full of picturesque vitality. It is a banal criticism that J. cd. not poetise in his circumstances; the suggestion wd. be satisfied if after he had reached safety J. put into verse the feelings of his time of trial.

In the third chap. J. goes to Nineveh and proclaims its impending destruction. As a result all the people repent with fasting. The fourth chap. relates how J. was angry at J″.'s mercy being extended to the Ninevites, and building a booth, waited outside the walls in the hope of the fulfilment of his prophecy. J″. brings him to a better understanding by means of a gourd wh. withered when smitten by a worm.

Historicity.—Many of the symbolical actions of the prophets are, if taken literally, difficult of comprehension. Thus Jeremiah going a month's journey to hide his girdle in a cleft of a rock beside the river Euphrates merely to show how valueless such a thing became when contaminated by damp, seems scarcely possible to have been done literally. This journey must almost necessarily have been accomplished in some symbolic way. The like holds of not a few other occurrences. May not the episode of J. and " the great fish " be explicable on somewhat similar lines? At the same time, when we enter the sphere of the miraculous, we can only under limitations argue as to possible and impossible. On the not uncommon idea that J. is a " midrash," one thing strikes the student; the extraordinarily exact suitability of the period chosen for its purpose. By hypothesis Assyria must have been very weak when the declaration of the impending overthrow of the city within forty days struck terror into the hearts of the whole population. Although the immediate successor of Shalmaneser II., Adadnirari, was a vigorous monarch, his successors Shalmaneser III., Ashurdan III., and Ashurnirari II., reigning for a period of about forty years, seem to have been rois fainéants. This period coincided with the reign of Jeroboam II., the time of the prophetic activity of J. As a rule the Jewish " midrash " was utterly independent of history, as all readers of the Talmud know. It wd. be impossible for a Palestinian Jew, without an amount of research repugnant to a maker of " midrashim " in the age of Ezra, to find out the forty years of feebleness in the Ninevite Empire in wh. to place his tale; all the more wd. the inquiry be repugnant to him that it wd. lower rather than heighten the moral point of the " midrash " to know that it was a time of Assyrian weakness when king and people yielded to the proclamation of J. Why was J., not Elijah, chosen as the messenger of J″.? He was a much more imposing figure than the obscure " s. of Amittai "; he too had fled fm. the work J″. assigned him; he too had messages for foreign potentates (1 K. 19.).

It seems necessary to regard the mission to Nineveh as historical. With the syncretist notions common to polytheism, the idea may have been entertained that J″. might require to be propitiated lest, in the weakened state of the gods of Asshur, He might overthrow the state and city. Even if such a thing were at all likely to be recorded we have practically nothing of the Annals of this period.
